PREFACE

SEVERAL years ago Dr. Park Hays Miller, editor of the Board of Christian Education of the Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A., and the editor of this dictionary were discussing the merits of Davis' Bible Dictionary and the possibility of revising that work. That book had first appeared in 1898, and subsequent revised editions were issued in 1903, 1911, and 1924. Both Dr. Miller and the editor agreed that it had fulfilled a useful purpose for many years for pastors, church workers, and Bible teachers and that its tradition of sound and conservative scholarship should be continued. At that time the editor was challenged to undertake the revision and rewriting of the volume, and after a preliminary survey of the fourth edition it was obvious that it was impossible to achieve a respectable revision without making numerous corrections on every page besides completely rewriting many of the important articles. So many advances have been made in Biblical studies since the time of Dr. Davis that the book had become thoroughly antiquated in philology, archaeology, the history of the ancient Near East, Biblical geography, and Old and New Testament criticism. The editor, as successor to the chair formerly occupied by Dr. Davis in Princeton Theological Seminary, was interested in continuing this form of practical Biblical studies and in giving new life to a well-known handbook, and accordingly he accepted the responsibility of revising and rewriting the work of his predecessor.

Each article has been approached objectively, and every statement has been scrutinized with great care. In all instances the editor preserved a conservative attitude in scholarship; in cases where reputable scholars differ he took cognizance of their views, but concluded with a preferred opinion which is consistent with the Bible itself. Theories that are purely subjective, in most cases, have not even been mentioned, not only to save space, but also to keep the book primarily a dictionary of the Bible. The editor, however, made no attempt to imitate a tradition, and while conserving the meritorious features of the fourth edition, he did not retain anything for the sole reason that it came from Dr. Davis, whom, by the way, he had never known. He has relied upon the best authorities of our time, and his object has been to produce a work which within his limitations will be accurate and authoritative in statement and content, and of constructive value for students of the Bible. Naturally many restrictions of space were imposed upon the editor, but as far as was possible within the brief compass of this volume he has included the most important results of recent developments in Biblical studies in order to bring the dictionary up to date.

In exercising economy of space, a consistent policy was adopted. In etymologies transliterations are employed only in special cases where it seemed necessary to represent the original language. The editor, with his linguistic interests, naturally would have preferred to transliterate every foreign word in connection with the etymology, but that would have increased the size of the volume unduly beyond its modest proportions. Accordingly, if no language is mentioned in an etymology, it is understood that the original language is Hebrew. Other languages have always been indicated in order to avoid confusion on this point. In case of differences of opinion on derivations, the most probable one has always been chosen, and for the sake of brevity the others generally had to be ignored. In writing the etymologies, the standard lexicons of Latin, Greek, Sanskrit, Iranian, Sumerian, Egyptian, Coptic, and Semitic languages were consulted.

In transliterating ב, ג, ד, כ, פ, ת without dagesh (i.e., where they follow a vowel directly and are not doubled) there have been kept in mind the needs of those who do not know Hebrew. Thus b, g, d, k, p, t would be rather meaningless to one who is not a Semitist; bh, gh, dh, kh, ph, th, except for the last two, do not suggest the proper pronunciation to the English reader. Practical considerations led the editor to be governed by the form or pronunciation that Hebrew proper names assume in the English Bible. Accordingly, ב, ג, ד, כ with or without dagesh are always written as b, g, d, k; פ and ת are represented by p and t, but פ and ת are written ph and th respectively. For convenience shin is written sh instead of ś. In this way accuracy has not been sacrificed, and the needs of the non-Hebraist are better met. Long vowels are indicated by the macron over the vowel; short vowels are unmarked; the three reduced vowels ā, e, ō, are marked with the breve, but the vocal schwa is written as a small e above the line.

The pronunciation of proper names has received due consideration. In his work Dr. Davis had indicated only the syllabic divisions and the accent, but this was felt to be inadequate. In this edition every proper name is phonetically transcribed and provided with diacritical marks in order that there may be no doubt about the correct pronunciation. The editor recognizes that in many cases a Biblical proper name has several accepted pronunciations, but in order to save space only one could be given. The preferred usage of Webster's New International Dictionary, Second Edition, 1934, has been followed; in a few cases, however, where Webster's second pronunciation seemed better, that was adopted. It was not deemed necessary to indicate the pronunciation of ordinary English words.

Dr. Miller and the reviser also felt that a number of articles should be included on words which had not been treated in the previous editions. The addition of these articles, it is hoped, will add to the usefulness of the book.

Biblical quotations have been taken from the American Standard Version. The Authorized Version (King James Version) still is the best-known Bible of the English-speaking world, and its spellings of proper names have all been included; it has also been quoted in certain important cases, where it differs from the American Standard Version. In a few cases, references have needs been made to the English Revised Version, and the Jewish Version (The Holy Scrip- tures According to the Masoretic Text—a New Translation, Jewish Publishing Society of America) has received due recognition in various important interpretations.

For economy of space no bibliography has been given in this dictionary, and only a few direct citations have been made. It would be well-nigh impossible for the reviser to refer to all the works he has consulted in the preparation of this new edition. In his own studies in the past he used Hastings' four works: A Dictionary of the Bible (the five-volume and the one-volume editions), A Dictionary of Christ and the Gospels, Dictionary of the Apostolic Church; the Encyclopaedia Biblica; and the International Standard Bible Encyclopaedia, and gleaned many facts from them. He has also found helpful suggestions in E. Kalt's Biblisches Reallexikon, 1938, and K. Galling's Biblisches Reallexikon, 1937, and the Cambridge Ancient History. Needless to say, he frequently consulted the standard commentaries in English and German on various books of the Bible, as well as works on Old and New Testament Introduction in the same languages. For a number of years he has been taking notes from scientific Biblical periodicals in English, German, Dutch, French, and Italian, and now many of these have found their way into this work. Of the utmost importance, however, in bringing this work up to date have been the publications of the American Schools of Oriental Research: the Annual, the Bulletin, and the Biblical Archaeologist; in fact, these were indispensable in the preparation of this edition.

For the geography of the Holy Land the editor leaned heavily upon Père F. M. Abel's Géographie de la Palestine, 2 vols., Paris, 1933-1938, although the writings of George Adam Smith, Alt, Dalman, and Albright were also consulted.

Unfortunately, the editor was unable to make use of the new Westminster Atlas of the Bible in the preparation of his articles. This very competent work, edited by Dr. George Ernest Wright and Dr. Floyd Vivian Filson, of McCormick Theological Seminary, was not begun until after he had completed most of his work on this dictionary. He is happy, however, to include in this volume a number of the maps prepared for Drs. Wright and Filson by Dr. Georges A. Barrois and Mr. Harold Arbo. These maps are not revisions of previous works but have been specially prepared on the basis of modern research. They are the most recent and authentic maps which we have of Bible lands. The full use which has been made in them of the newer techniques in map-making adds greatly to their accuracy and usefulness.

The English spelling of modern Palestinian place names is often inconsistent and shows much variation, but the better-known spellings as in the works of the American Schools of Oriental Research generally have been followed. Here the editor kept in mind the English reader and not the specialist in Arabic.

For a number of years, scholars of the United States of America and of Canada have taken an active leadership in Biblical and Semitic studies, and since the close of the First World War their labors have been especially productive.

In the preparation of this dictionary the editor has drawn extensively from the published works of his contemporaries and colleagues, especially from the following: Professor James Alan Montgomery, his preceptor at the University of Pennsylvania and the Divinity School of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Philadelphia; the late Professor George Aaron Barton, of the same institutions; Professor William F. Albright, Johns Hopkins University; the late Professor James H. Breasted and Professor A. T. Olmstead, both of the University of Chicago; Professor Charles C. Torrey and Professor Millar Burrows, both of Yale University; Professor Ephraim A. Speiser, University of Pennsylvania; Professor Philip K. Hitti, Princeton University; Professor Theophile J. Meek, University of Toronto; Dr. Robert H. Pfeiffer, Harvard University; Dr. Nelson Glueck, Hebrew Union College and American School of Oriental Research, Jerusalem; Dr. Cyrus H. Gordon, formerly of Smith College; and Dr. Georges A. Barrois, Princeton Theological Seminary.

In revising and rewriting the New Testament articles of the late Professors G. T. Purves and B. B. Warfield, the editor has had the co-operation of Dr. Bruce Manning Metzger, instructor in New Testament at the Princeton Theological Seminary, with whom he discussed many problems of New Testament criticism. For various articles Dr. Metzger also furnished much excellent material which has been incorporated into the dictionary. While the editor assumed responsibility for these articles in their final form, every one was checked by Dr. Metzger before it was submitted to the press. At the end of these articles the reviser retained the initials G. T. P. and B. B. W. for historical reasons, but, to indicate that they were revised and rewritten he appended his own initials, H. S. G.; he also signed whatever additional material he introduced on the New Testament. The rest of the articles in this book bear no signature. Every entry was carefully revised and generally rewritten. Much old material was completely eliminated, and the editor made extensive original contributions. This edition in form and content is an entirely new work, and to have signed all the new information and additions would have meant a continuous repetition of the editor's initials. He has, to all intents and purposes, made this dictionary his own, and accordingly he lets his name on the title page cover both his responsibilities and his original contributions.

The editor is grateful to Dr. Park Hays Miller for many helpful suggestions in the early days of this undertaking, to Miss Wilhelmina D'Arcy Stephens and her competent assistants for preparing the manuscript for the printer and for reading the proof, to Miss Jean Woodward Steele for her researches in finding suitable illustrations for the dictionary, and to Mr. John Ribble for the efficient manner in which he has seen the book through the press.

GUIDE TO PRONUNCIATION

THE diacritical marks and letters used for phonetic transcription are the same as those employed in Webster's New International Dictionary of the English Language, Second Edition, 1934.

ā as in fāte	ô as in ô-bey'
â as in vâ-ca'tion	ō as in ôrb
ã as in câre	ö as in ödd
ǣ as in ädd	õ as in sõft
ǻ as in in'fǻnt	õ as in cõn-nect'

ō as in nōte	' as in pardon (pār'd'n), eaten (ēt'n), evil (ē'v'l)

The sound of other letters or phonetic transcriptions will be self-evident to the English speaker and reader.

A hyphen is used in Biblical compound proper names whenever it is found in the spelling of the American Standard Version. All other syllabic divisions for the sake of pronunciation are indicated by a dot (·).

Two accent marks have been used. A heavy one (') denotes the primary accent or chief stress in a word. Many trisyllables and most polysyllables have a secondary or weaker accent, which is indicated by a light mark (ˈ). Generally, if the reader pronounces the word with the primary accent on the correct syllable, the secondary accent will automatically take care of itself.

THE WESTMINSTER DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE

A

Aar'on (ār'ūn) [Heb. 'Ahārōn, etymologically doubtful]. The brother of Moses and his senior by 3 years (Ex. 7:7). He was a descendant of Levi through Kohath and Amram (Ex. 6:14-27). As we do not read of perils attending his infancy it may be inferred that he was born before the promulgation of the nefarious Egyptian edicts dooming the Hebrew male children to death. He was younger than his sister Miriam (q.v.). He married Elisheba, daughter of Amminadab and sister of Nahshon, of the tribe of Judah, who bore him 4 sons, Nadab, Abihu, Eleazar, and Ithamar (Ex. 6:23; Num. 3:2). When Moses at Horeb was called to stand forth as the deliverer of his oppressed countrymen, and, wishing to escape the mission, complained that he was "slow of speech, and of a slow tongue," God repelled the objection, and said, "Is there not Aaron thy brother the Levite? I know that he can speak well." Aaron was forthwith instructed to go out and meet Moses in the wilderness. He did so, and the brothers came together (Ex. 4:10-16, 27). Returning to Egypt, they gathered together the elders of Israel and intimated to them the approaching deliverance (Ex. 4:29-31). Aaron acted as the spokesman and agent of Moses and carried the rod in the first interviews with the elders and with Pharaoh, and during the first 3 plagues (Ex. 4:30; 7:2, 9, 19 [by the command of Moses and hence Moses' act, Ex. 17:5]; 8:5, 16). But soon afterward Moses partly dispensed with the agency of Aaron, and thenceforth, whenever the rod was used symbolically, it was in the hand of Moses himself (Ex. 9:23; 10:13, and cf. v. 22; 14:16, 21; 17:5; Num. 20:11). Aaron and Hur supported Moses' arms during the battle with Amalek (Ex. 17:12). When the covenant between Jehovah and Israel was entered into at Mount Sinai, the ceremony of its ratification was concluded, as usual, by a common meal spread for the contracting parties. Aaron and 2 of his sons with Moses and 70 elders of Israel were appointed to partake of this meal as the legal representatives of the nation and to behold the vision of the God of Israel at the ceremony (Ex. 24:1, 9, 10). During the prolonged stay of Moses in the mount, the people became impatient at the absence of their leader and turned to Aaron with the demand that he make them gods to go before them. Aaron weakly yielded and made the golden calf (Ex., ch. 32). According to instructions which Moses received, Aaron and his sons were to fill the office of priest.

THE PRIESTHOOD ESTABLISHED

Accordingly, after the tabernacle had been completed, and was ready for actual services to begin, Aaron and his 4 sons were solemnly consecrated to the priesthood by being anointed with oil and clothed in splendid typical official vestments (Ex., chs. 28; 40:13-16; Lev., ch. 8). Aaron was thus the first high priest, an office which he filled for nearly 40 years. Shortly after leaving Sinai, he joined with Miriam in finding fault with Moses for having married a Cushite woman (Num. 12:1-16). The rebellion of Korah was directed as much against the exclusive priesthood of Aaron and his sons as against the civil authority of Moses. The divine appointment of Moses and Aaron to their respective offices was attested by the destruction of the rebels; and Aaron's right to the priesthood was further and specially vindicated by the budding of the rod taken for Levi and inscribed with Aaron's name (Num., chs. 16; 17). Toward the close of the journey in the wilderness, when the people were encamped for the 2d time at Kadesh, Aaron and Moses dishonored God by their conduct when Moses smote the rock. For this sin they were denied the privilege of entering the Promised Land (Num. 20:1-13). Soon afterward, when the Israelites were encamped at Moserah, by divine direction Aaron was led by Moses up Mount Hor and stripped of his sacred vestments, which were transferred to his son Eleazar. There he died, at the age of 123 years. The nation publicly mourned for him 30 days (Num. 20:23-29; 33:37-39; Deut. 10:6). See PRIEST and HIGH PRIEST.

Aar'on-ites (ār'ūn-its), in the Hebrew text simply Aaron, the name being used collectively. The priestly descendants of Aaron (I Chron. 12:27; 27:17, A.V.).

Ab (āb) [Heb. 'āb, from Akkad. abu, name of 5th month of the Babylonian and Jewish year. The bulrushes were cut in that month for building purposes]. See YEAR.

A-bad'don (ā-bād'dūn) [destruction, ruin]. 1. Destruction, ruin (Job 31:12); the place of the dead, synonymous with the grave (Ps. 88:11), Sheol (Job 26:6; Prov. 15:11), and death (Job 28:22).

2. A name of the angel of the abyss, who is called in Greek Apollyon (Rev. 9:11).

A-bag'tha (ā-bāg'thā). One of the 7 chamberlains of the Persian king Ahasuerus (Esth. 1:10). These chamberlains, guardians of the harem, ministered in the presence of the king (vs. 10, 11). They were eunuchs, as the Hebrew title denotes and custom required; and hence were probably foreigners and likely to bear foreign names.

Ab'a-nah (āb'ā-nā), in A.V. Ab'a-na (āb'ā-nā); in marg. of R.V. Amanah, of A.V. Amana (q.v.) [the name probably means stony]. One of the 2 rivers of Damascus; presumably the more important, for Naaman, of that city, mentions it first (II Kings 5:12). It is the modern Barada, the Chrysorroas of classical writers, which rises in a large blue pool of unfathomable depth on the high plain south of Zebedāny on Anti-Lebanon, 23 miles from Damascus, rushes in a s.e. course down the mountain, and then, turning e., runs along the n. wall of the city, to be lost finally in an inland lake, the middle lake of 3 existing. It flows sluggishly through the plain, but on its passage through Damascus it has a rapid course. Nine or 10 branches are taken from it, yet it flows on, deep and broad. It is the chief cause of the beauty and fertility of the plain of Damascus.

Ab'a-rim (āb'ā-rīm) [those beyond]. A region e. of the Jordan, so named by people living w. of the river. Jeremiah mentions Lebanon, Bashan, and Abarim in this order, from n. to s. (Jer. 22:20; in A.V., "passages"). The Israelites encamped in this region shortly before crossing the Arnon (Num. 21:11). In it the Reubenites were granted lands (Num. 32:2-37). The mountains of Abarim denote the bluffs which overlook the Dead Sea and Jordan Valley from the e., extending from Wadi Kefrein in n. to Wadi Zerka Mā'in or even to Wadi el-Hesā, which flows into the s. part of the Dead Sea. On these heights the Israelites encamped before they moved down to Shittim by the Jordan (Num. 33:47-49). From a peak of the range Moses looked across at the Promised Land (Num. 27:12; Deut. 32:49; 34:1).

Ab'ba (āb'ā) [Aram., father]. A term borrowed from childhood's language to express filial address to God (Mark 14:36; Rom. 8:15; Gal. 4:6). The corresponding Hebrew word is Ab.

Ab'da (āb'dā) [probably, servant (of God)]. 1. The father of Adoniram (I Kings 4:6).

2. A Levite, the son of Shammua (Neh. 11:17). See OBADIAH 12.

Ab'de-el (āb'dē-ēl) [servant of God]. The father of Shelemiah (Jer. 36:26).

Ab'di (āb'dī) [perhaps, contraction of servant of Jehovah]. 1. A Levite of the family of Merari. He was the son of Malluch, and father of Kishi (I Chron. 6:44). The Abdi of II Chron. 29:12 seems to be the same man. See KISH 4.

2. Son of a certain Elam (Ezra 10:26).

Ab'di-el (āb'dī-ēl) [servant of God]. A Gadite, resident in Gilead (I Chron. 5:15).

Ab'don (āb'dōn) [servile]. 1. The son of Hillel, a native of Pirathon, in the tribe of Ephraim. He judged Israel, or a portion of it, 8 years, and is the 11th judge in the order of enumeration. He had 40 sons and 30 sons' sons, who rode on as many ass colts—a sign of rank in days when the Hebrews did not yet have horses. He was buried in his native place (Judg. 12:13-15).

2. Head of a father's house of Benjamin, a son of Shashak, dwelling in Jerusalem (I Chron. 8:23, 26, 28).

3. A Benjamite, the first-born of Jeiel of Gibeon and an ancestor of King Saul (I Chron. 8:30; 9:35, 36). See KISH 2.

4. An official of King Josiah (II Chron. 34:20); see ACHBOR.

5. A town in the territory of Asher, given, with its suburbs, to the Levites of the Gershon family (Josh. 21:30; I Chron. 6:74). Abdon is perhaps identical with Khirbet 'Abdeh, 10 miles n.n.e. of Acre.

Ab'dē-ne'go (ā-bēd'nē-gō) [servant of Nego, probably a deliberate change from Nebo, the Babylonian god of wisdom]. The name given by the prince of the eunuchs at Babylon to Azariah, one of the 3 faithful Jews afterward miraculously saved from the fiery furnace (Dan. 1:7; 3:12-30; I Macc. 2:59).

Ab'el, I (ā'bēl) [Heb. Hebel, breath; applied to Abel from the shortness of his life; some derive it from Akkad. āblu, son]. A younger son of Adam, and by calling a shepherd. Abel was a righteous man (Matt. 23:35; I John 3:12); one of the Old Testament worthies whose conduct was controlled by faith (Heb. 11:4). He offered to God a lamb from his flock, which was accepted. It was not the kind of offering, but the character of the offerer, that God respected. As brought by Abel, the offering showed the surrender of the heart to God. The offering of the best further revealed the sense of obligation and gratitude to God as the sole bestower of the good, to whom all thanks were due. It expressed the consciousness in the offerer of entire dependence upon God for daily blessing and the desire for the continuance of God's favor. In one in whom the sense of sin was deep, it set forth the entire dependence of the sinner upon God's unmerited mercy. Cain's character was different from Abel's; the former was rejected, and, at the promptings of envy, slew Abel (Gen., ch. 4).

Ab'el, II (ā'bēl) [a grassy place, a meadow]. 1. The same as Abel-beth-maacah (II Sam. 20:14, 15, 18).

2. In I Sam. 6:18 it is apparently an erroneous reading for 'Eben, stone.

Ab'el-beth-ma'a'cah (ā'bēl-bēth-mā'ā-kā) and Ab'el of Beth-ma'a'cah (ā'bēl of bēth-mā'ā-kā), in A.V. written Ma'a'cah [Abel, i.e., meadow, near Beth-maacah]. A fortified town in the tribe of Naphtali (II Sam. 20:15; I Kings 15:20), famous for prudence, or for its adherence to Israelite customs (II Sam. 20:18; cf. Gr. text). Sheba fled thither when his revolt against David failed. Joab prepared to assault the town to capture him, but a "wise woman," after conference with Joab, agreed to have the rebel slain, and thus saved the town (II Sam. 20:14-22). Ben-hadad seized it and other towns when Asa of Judah sought his aid against Baasha of Israel (I Kings 15:20). In 734 B.C. Tiglath-pileser captured it, and carried off its inhabitants to Assyria (II Kings 15:29). Its site is probably marked by Tell Abil, a village w. of the Jordan on a knoll overlooking the valley, 12 miles n. of Lake Hūleh and opposite Dan. Girded by a well-watered, fertile plain, it merits its name Abel-maim, meadow of waters (II Chron. 16:4).

Ab'el-cher'a'mim (ā'bēl-kēr'ā-mīm) [meadow of vineyards]. A place e. of the Jordan to which Jephthah pursued the Ammonites (Judg. 11:33); perhaps Khirbet es-Sūk on the way from 'Ammān to Hesbān.

Ab'el-ma'im (ā'bēl-mā'im). See ABEL-BETH-MAACAH.

Ab'el-me-ho'lah (ā'bēl-mē-hō'lā) [meadow of dancing]. A town, apparently in the Jordan Valley, where Elisha was born (Judg. 7:22; I Kings 4:12; 19:16). It was fixed by Jerome 10 Roman miles s. of Scythopolis (Bethshean). Conder places it at 'Ain Helweh, 9½ miles s. of Bethshean. The primitive site probably was in this neighborhood at Tell Abu Sifreh, a spur formed by the junction of the wadies el-Mālīh and el-Helweh.

Ab'el-miz'ra'im (ā'bēl-miz'rā'im). See ATAD.

Ab'el-shit'tim (ā'bēl-shit'im) [meadow of acacias]. See SHITTIM.

Ab'ez (ā'bēz). See EBEEZ.

Ab'i (ā'bī). See ABIJAH 7.

Ab'i'a (ā-bī'ā). See ABIJAH.

Ab'i'ah (ā-bī'ā). See ABIJAH.

Ab'i-al'bon (ā'bī-āl'bōn) [the component "albon" may be a scribal confusion from Shaalbonite, II Sam. 23:32]. One of David's mighty men (II Sam. 23:31). The LXX supports the reading Abiel in this passage, which is the name he bears in I Chron. 11:32.

Ab'ia-saph (ā-bī'ā-sāf), or E-bi'a-saph [the Father has gathered, or added]. A descendant of Levi through Korah (Ex. 6:16, 18, 21, 24; I Chron. 6:23; 9:19).

A·bī'a·thar (ā-bī'ā-thār) [the Father is pre-eminent]. A priest, the son of Ahimelech, of the line of Eli. On the slaughter by Doeg at the instance of King Saul of the priests at Nob, Abiathar escaped, carrying the ephod with him; and, as was natural, cast in his lot with David (I Sam. 22:20-23). When David at length ascended the throne, Zadok and Abiathar apparently shared the high priesthood between them (cf. I Chron. 15:11, 12; II Sam. 15:24 seq., 35, etc.). The mention of Ahimelech, son of Abiathar, as priest with Zadok in II Sam. 8:17, is regarded by some as a copyist's error, whereby the names of father and son were transposed. But the number of allusions to Ahimelech, the son of Abiathar, as priest, is so great that an error is improbable (I Chron. 18:16, LXX; 24:3, 6, 31). A simpler explanation is that, since Abiathar was becoming quite old (he was about 70 years of age at the time of Absalom's revolt), his son and legal successor assumed the burdensome priestly functions and was called priest, as Hophni and Phinehas served during the lifetime of Eli and were called priests (I Sam. 1:3; 2:11). The aged Abiathar remained faithful to the king during Absalom's rebellion, and rendered the fugitive monarch great service (II Sam. 15:24, 29, 35, 36; 17:15; 19:11); but when later Adonijah sought to wrest the succession to the throne from Solomon, Abiathar cast his priestly influence with the military influence of Joab, another old man, in favor of the attractive aspirant (I Kings 1:7). Though this attempt failed, he again favored Adonijah after David's death (I Kings 2:12-22). For this he was deposed from the high priesthood, and Zadok, a priest of approved loyalty, but of the other branch of the Aaronic family, was put into his place (I Kings 2:26, 35). His deposition involved that of his sons, Ahimelech and Jonathan; and thus the rule of the house of Eli came to an end, according to prophecy (I Sam. 2:31-35). The passage in I Kings 4:4 probably refers to the time immediately prior to his deposition. Abiathar is alluded to by our Lord in the New Testament (Mark 2:26).

A·bīb (ā'bīb) [an ear of corn]. The month that the Hebrews were directed to make the first of the year in commemoration of their departure from Egypt (Ex. 12:1, 2; 13:4). Harvest began in it. The feast of unleavened bread or the passover fell during the month (Ex. 12:1 seq.; 23:15; Deut. 16:1). The Jewish months following the moon, and ours being fixed, the two cannot be made exactly to correspond. Abib most nearly approaches our month of March, though in some years its end moves some distance into our April. After the Captivity the name Abib gave place to Nisan (Neh. 2:1; Esth. 3:7). See YEAR.

A·bī'dā (ā-bī'dā), in A. V. once A·bī'dah (ā-bī'dā) (Gen. 25:4) [the Father knows]. A descendant of Abraham through Midian (Gen. 25:4; I Chron. 1:33).

A·bī'dān (ā-bī'dān) [the Father is judge]. The representative prince of the tribe of Benjamin in the wilderness. His father's name was Gideon (Num. 1:11; 2:22; 7:60, 65; 10:24).

A·bī-el (ā'bī-ēl) [God is a father]. 1. A Benjamite, the father of Kish and of Ner, and the grandfather of Saul and of Abner (I Sam. 9:1; 14:51). See KISH 2.

2. An Arbatite, one of David's mighty men (I Chron. 11:32), called in II Sam. 23:31 Abialbon (q.v.).

A·bī-e·zer (ā'bī-ē'zēr) [the Father is help]. 1. A descendant of Manasseh through Machir, and founder of a family (Josh. 17:2; I Chron. 7:18); abbreviated in Num. 26:30 to Iezer (A. V. Jeezer). The judge Gideon belonged to this family (Judg. 6:11).

2. Collectively, the family of Abiezer (Judg. 6:34; 8:2).

3. One of David's heroes (II Sam. 23:27; I Chron. 11:28; 27:12).

A·bī-ez·rite (ā'bī-ēz'rīt). One belonging to the family of Abiezer (Judg. 6:11, 24; 8:32). In Num. 26:30 abbreviated. A. V. has Jeezerite, but the spelling should rather be Iezrite to accord with the Hebrew and be consistent with Abiezerite.

Ab'igail (āb'ī-gāl) once Ab'igal (āb'ī-gāl) [perhaps, the Father is rejoicing]. 1. The wife of Nabal. She was a woman of good understanding, and of a beautiful countenance, and on the death of her first husband became one of David's wives (I Sam. 25:3, 14-44; 27:3; II Sam. 2:2). When the Amalekites captured Ziklag they took her captive, but she was rescued by David after he had defeated the enemy (I Sam. 30:5, 18). She bore him a son called Chileab (II Sam. 3:3) or Daniel (I Chron. 3:1).

2. A sister of David (I Chron. 2:16); not, however, a daughter of Jesse, but of Nahash (II Sam. 17:25, in R. V. Abigail). She was the mother of Amasa.

Ab'ihail (āb'ī-hāl) [the Father is strength]. In the Hebrew text the h is a different letter in the name of the men (h), and in that of the women (h). The difference is commonly attributed to an early misreading of the text. 1. A Levite of the family of Merari (Num. 3:35).

2. Wife of Abishur (I Chron. 2:29).

3. A Gadite (I Chron. 5:14).

4. Wife of King Rehoboam and a descendant of Eliab, David's brother (II Chron. 11:18).

5. Father of Queen Esther (Esth. 2:15).

A·bī'hu (ā-bī'hū) [the Father is He]. A son of Aaron. He shared in the privileges, in the sin, and in the fate of Nadab, the eldest son, and like him died childless (Ex. 6:23; 24:1; 28:1; Lev. 10:1-7; Num. 3:2).

A·bī'hud (ā-bī'hūd) [the Father is majesty]. A descendant of Benjamin through the family of Bela (I Chron. 8:3).

A·bī'jah (ā-bī'jā), in A. V. of O. T. 4 times A·bī'ah (I Sam. 8:2; I Chron. 2:24; 6:28; 7:8), in A. V. of N. T. A·bī'a [Jehovah is a father]. 1. The wife of Hezron, a man of the tribe of Judah (I Chron. 2:24).

2. A descendant of Aaron. His family had grown to a father's house in the time of David, and was made the 8th of the 24 courses into which David divided the priests (I Chron. 24:1, 6, 10). See 8 below.

3. A descendant of Benjamin through Becher (I Chron. 7:8).

4. The younger son of Samuel, who was appointed by his father a judge in Beer-sheba but proved corrupt (I Sam. 8:2; I Chron. 6:28).

5. A son of Jeroboam. While yet a child he fell dangerously sick. Jeroboam sent his queen in disguise to the Prophet Ahijah, who had predicted that he should obtain the kingdom, to inquire what the issue of the sickness would be. The prophet recognized the queen, notwithstanding her disguise, pronounced judgment against Jeroboam for his apostasy from Jehovah, and added that the child would die at once, and that alone of all that household he would obtain honorable burial, because in him was found some good thing toward the Lord God. All came to pass as the seer had foretold (I Kings 14:1-18).

6. The name given in Chronicles to the son and successor of Rehoboam (II Chron. 12:16; 13:1 to 14:1). See ABIJAH.

7. The mother of Hezekiah (II Chron. 29:1). In II Kings 18:2 she is called with great brevity Abi.

8. A chief of the priests who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Neh. 12:4, 7). Possibly he was a representative of the old course of Abijah, but the connection cannot be established, and in view of Ezra 2:36 seq. is not probable. In the next generation, a father's house among the priests bore this name (Neh. 12:17). The father of John the Baptist belonged to this family (Luke 1:5).

9. A priest who, doubtless in behalf of a father's house, signed the covenant in the days of Nehemiah (Neh. 10:7).

A·bī'jam (ā-bī'jām), variant of Abijah. The son and successor of Rehoboam on the throne of Judah. His mother's name was Maacah, a descendant of Absalom (I Kings 15:2; II Chron. 13:2). See MICAHAI 1. He sinned after the manner of his father, and had not a heart true to Jehovah. The kings of Judah had not yet become reconciled to the revolt of the ten tribes, and Abijam continued the war with Jeroboam which his father had waged (I Kings 15:6, 7). According to II Chron. 13:3, compared with II Sam. 24:9, the whole population "able to go forth to war" was under arms. In the slaughter which accompanied the warfare, 500,000 men of Israel were slain (II Chron. 13:16-20). Abijam had 14 wives, 22 sons, and 16 daughters (II Chron. 13:21). He reigned 3 years, and died, leaving his son Asa to succeed him in the kingdom (I Kings 15:1-8; II Chron. 14:1).

Ab'ī-le'ne (āb'ī-lē'nē) [Gr. Abilēnē, so called from Abila, its capital, and that again probably from Heb. 'ābēl, meadow]. A tetrarchy near Anti-Lebanon. Its capital Abila lay upon the Barada, 18 or 20 miles n.w. from Damascus, in part upon the site of the modern village of es-Suk. There is a romantic gorge, with a Roman road cut in the cliff, a cemetery, a number of tall pillars, a stream below, and the so-called "tomb of Abel" above. The local tradition that Abel was buried here doubtless originated in the similarity of sound between Abel and Abila. Of the formation of the tetrarchy Josephus makes no mention. In Luke 3:1 it is referred to as separate from the tetrarchy of Philip, and as governed by Lysanias in the 15th year of Tiberius. Likewise an inscription at Abila, dating from the reign of Tiberius, mentions Lysanias as tetrarch of Abilene at that time. Some years later the 2 tetrarchies were still distinct; for Caligula, A.D. 37, bestowed the "tetrarchy of Philip," then dead, and the "tetrarchy of Lysanias" upon Herod Agrippa, the Herod of The Acts (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 6, 10), and Claudius confirmed to him "Abila of Lysanias" (Jos. Antiq. xix. 5, 1).

There was an Abila in Perea, e. of Gadara, but it is not mentioned in Scripture.

A·bīm'a·el (ā-bīm'ā-ēl) [El (God) is Father]. A name in the genealogy of Joktan. It may denote a person, a tribe, or a locality, and is to be sought in Arabia (Gen. 10:28; I Chron. 1:22).

A·bīm'e·lech (ā-bīm'ē-lēk) [the Father is king]. 1. The personal name or official title of a king of Gerar, at whose court Abraham attempted to pass off Sarah as his sister (Gen. 20:1-18). The king and the patriarch at a later period entered into a covenant with each other (Gen. 21:22-34).

2. A king of the Philistines at Gerar, at whose court Isaac attempted to pass off Rebekah as his sister, and with whom he also, like his father, at last formed a covenant (Gen. 26:1-33).

3. The son of the judge Gideon by a concubine. This woman was a native of Shechem, where her family had influence. One natural penalty of polygamy is that the sons by one mother tend to quarrel fiercely with those by another; and Abimelech, obtaining assistance from his mother's relatives, killed 70 sons of his father on one stone at Ophrah, the native city of the family. One son only, Jotham, escaped from the massacre. Then Abimelech was elected king of Shechem. Before he had ruled 3 years, he and his subjects were at variance, and his throne, founded in blood, had begun to totter. A plot against him was formed by Gaal. It came to the ears of Zebul, Abimelech's second in command. Gaal was defeated and driven out of Shechem, the city being afterward destroyed and sown with salt. A thousand men and women who had taken refuge in its tower were burned to death. When Abimelech shortly afterward was besieging Thebez, he was mortally wounded by a millstone dropped on his head from the city wall by a woman. Regarding it as dishonorable to be killed by a female, he ordered his armor-bearer to draw his sword and slay him, which he did (Judg., ch. 9).

4. See ACHISH.

5. A priest, a son of Abiathar (I Chron. 18:16). The spelling is doubtless a copyist's error for Ahimelech. The LXX reads Ahimelech; see also I Chron. 24:6, etc.

A·bīn'a·dab (ā-bīn'ā-dāb) [the Father is generous]. 1. A man of Kiriath-jearim, who, when the Ark was sent back by the Philistines, gave it accommodation in his house, where it remained until the reign of David. A son of Abinadab was consecrated to act as its custodian (I Sam. 7:1, 2; II Sam. 6:3; I Chron. 13:7).

2. The 2d son of Jesse and an elder brother of David (I Sam. 16:8; 17:13).

3. A son of Saul, killed with his father in the battle of Gilboa (I Sam. 31:2).

4. Father of a son-in-law of Solomon (I Kings 4:11, A.V.). See BEN-ABINADAB.

A·bīn'o·am (ā-bīn'ō-ām) [the Father is pleasantness]. The father of Barak (Judg. 4:6; 5:12).

A·bī'ram (ā-bī'rām), variant of Abram [the Father is exalted]. 1. A Reubenite, a brother of Dathan and fellow conspirator with Korah (Num., ch. 16).

2. The first-born son of Hiel, who rebuilt Jericho (I Kings 16:34). His death, when its foundations were laid, in part fulfilled a curse pronounced by Joshua (Josh. 6:26).

Ab'ī-shag (āb'ī-shāg) [perhaps, father has wandered, erred]. A beautiful girl from Shunem, employed to attend upon King David when he was old and declining in vitality (I Kings 1:1-4). Adonijah wished to marry her after David's death, and made application for the needed permission to Solomon, who not merely refused his request but interpreted it to mean an insidious claim for the crown and put him to death (I Kings 2:13-25).

A·bīsh'a·i (ā-bīsh'ā-i) and Ab'shai (I Chron. 18:12 marg.) A son of David's sister Zeruiah, and brother of Joab and Asahel (II Sam. 2:18; I Chron. 2:15, 16). When David found Saul and his followers asleep, Abishai asked permission to kill the king; but David would not sanction his doing harm to "Jehovah's anointed" (I Sam. 26:5-9). He served under Joab in David's army (II Sam. 2:18; 10:10). When Abner, fleeing from the battle at Gibeon, was compelled to kill Asahel, the two brothers of the latter, Joab and Abishai, pursued the homicide, but without effect (II Sam. 2:18-24). He was loyal to David during the revolts of Absalom and Sheba (II Sam., chs. 16; 20). He desired to slay Shimei for cursing David, even when Shimei asked forgiveness (II Sam. 16:9; 19:21). He was one of David's mighty men who had lifted up his spear against 300 and slain them (II Sam. 23:18; I Chron.

11:20). He defeated the Edomites also in the Valley of Salt, slaying 18,000 of them and garrisoning their country (I Chron. 18:12, 13). He succored David in the fight with Ishbibenob (II Sam. 21:16, 17).

A-bish'a-lom (ā-bīsh'ā-lōm). See ABSALOM.

A-bish'u'a (ā-bīsh'ū-ā) [the Father is salvation]. 1. A Benjamite of the family of Bela (I Chron. 8:4).

2. The son of Phinehas the priest (I Chron. 6:4, 5, 50; Ezra 7:5).

A-bī'shur (ā-bī'shūr) [the Father is a wall]. A man of Judah, family of Hezron, house of Jerahmeel (I Chron. 2:28, 29).

A-bī'tāl (ā-bī'tāl) [the Father is dew, perhaps in the sense of refreshment]. One of David's wives. Her son was Shephatiah (II Sam. 3:4; I Chron. 3:3).

A-bī'tub (ā-bī'tūb) [the Father is goodness]. A Benjamite, son of Shaharaim by his wife Hushim (I Chron. 8:8-11).

A-bī'ud (ā-bī'ūd) [The Gr. form, probably, of Heb. Abihud, q.v.]. A member of the royal line of Judah (Matt. 1:13). The name is omitted in I Chron. 3:19.

Ab'ner (āb'nēr) [the Father is a lamp]. A variant, Abiner, is used in the Heb. text of I Sam. 14:50. The son of Ner, King Saul's uncle. During the reign of that monarch Abner was commander in chief of the army (I Sam. 14:51). He first became acquainted with David when that youth offered to meet Goliath in combat (I Sam. 17:55-58). On the death of Saul, Abner availed himself of the tribal feeling adverse to Judah, and turned it to the advantage of the house to which he was related by blood, and to which he had owned allegiance. He proclaimed Saul's son Ish-bosheth king at Mahanaim (II Sam. 2:8). During the war between the house of Saul and David which followed, in an interview which he held at Gibeon with Joab, David's commander in chief, Abner proposed what he seems to have intended for a tournament between 12 young men picked from Ish-bosheth's supporters and as many taken from the followers of David, but mutual animosities converted the mimic combat into a real battle; and the 2 armies being drawn into the struggle, that which Abner led was defeated with great slaughter (II Sam. 2:12-32). During the retreat from this battle Abner was pursued with hostile intent by Asahel, one of Joab's brothers, and, after repeatedly warning him off, had at last to strike him dead in self-defense (II Sam. 2:18-24). Soon afterward Abner had a serious charge brought against him by Ish-bosheth, which so irritated him that he intimated his intention of transferring his allegiance to David, and was as good as his word. First he sent messengers to David, and then sought an interview with him, and was graciously received. But Joab, believing or pretending to believe that Abner had come simply as a spy, went after him, invited him to a friendly conversation, and stabbed him dead. The ostensible reason for this assassination was revenge for the death of Asahel, who, however, had died in fair fight. An unavowed motive probably was fear that Abner might one day displace him from the command of David's army. The king was justly incensed against the murderer, and conspicuously showed the people that he had no complicity in the crime. He attended the funeral, lamented the unworthy fate of the prince and great man who had fallen in Israel, and finally left it in charge to his successor to call Joab to account for the crime (II Sam. 3:6-39; I Kings 2:5). Abner had at least one son, Jaasiel (I Chron. 27:21). He seems to have had a regard for the house of God, for he dedicated to it some of the spoils which he had taken in battle (I Chron. 26:28).

Abom'i-na'tion of Des-o-la'tion. Idolatry, with its blighting effect upon man, its degradation of the divine ideal, and its violent outward, as well as its less visible insidious, opposition to the Kingdom of God. To Daniel was revealed: "In the midst of the week he shall cause the sacrifice and the oblation to cease; and upon the wing of abominations shall come one that maketh desolate" (Dan. 9:27); "and they shall profane the sanctuary, even the fortress, and shall take away the continual burnt-offering, and they shall set up the abomination that maketh desolate" (Dan. 11:31); and "from the time that the continual burnt-offering shall be taken away, and the abomination that maketh desolate set up, there shall be a thousand two hundred and ninety days" (Dan. 12:11). These prophecies depict outstanding features of the development of the Kingdom of God, which are typical for all time. A notable fulfillment of Dan. 11:31, which the Jews were quick to discern, was the stoppage of the daily sacrifice by Antiochus Epiphanes in June, 168 B.C., and the erection on the brazen altar of an idolatrous one, on which sacrifices were offered to Jupiter Olympius (I Macc. 1:54; 6:7; II Macc. 6:2; Jos. Antiq. xii. 5, 4; 7, 6). But the prophecy of the abomination of desolation was not exhausted by this fulfillment. The prophecy belongs to Messianic times (Dan. 9:27), and yet more generally to the conflict of the Kingdom of God until its final triumphant establishment (cf. Dan. 12:7, 11, with ch. 7:25-27; cf. ch. 12:2). Christ reiterated the prophecy, enjoining to flee to the mountains those who should see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, standing in the Holy Place (Matt. 24:15, etc.).

A'bra-ham (ābrā'hām), at first A'bram [Abram in Heb. means "the Father is high." Abraham has the same meaning. In S. Arab. h denotes the presence of a vowel. When h was understood as a consonant, it was vocalized, and thus arose two a's in -rāhām). Son of Terah, progenitor of the Hebrews, father of the faithful, and the friend of God (Gen. 11:26; Gal. 3:7-9; James 2:23).

Is Abraham a tribal name? Is he the personification of a tribe? The justification for raising this question is the fact that many names in the genealogical registers of the Hebrews denote tribes and not individuals (Gen., chs. 10; 25:1-4). It is not always easy—at times it is impossible—to decide whether a people or a person is meant. But it is important to note, further, that a tribal name and history often include persons whose deeds are recorded in the name of the tribe and as the acts of the tribe (see CHRONOLOGY, I. 3). Noah, for example, may be the name of a tribe; but, if so, in the narrative of the flood it denotes likewise an individual member of that tribe, who was saved with his family in the ark. In the case of Abraham, Gen. 11:26, 27; 12:1-10 might readily be read as the story of a tribe's origin and migration; in fact, it does recount the movement of a sheik and his people; the separation of Abram and Lot might also be tribal, and so too the treaty with Abimelech. But though the tribal element may enter into the narrative, the history is not exclusively tribal. The majority of the deeds recorded in it cannot be explained as tribal movements without violence and improbable interpretations. They are the acts of an individual (Gen. 15:1-18; 16:1-11; 18:1 to 19:28; 20:1-17; 22:1-14; ch. 24), and during all the centuries that followed the Hebrews themselves regarded Abraham as an individual (Isa. 29:22; 41:8; 51:2; Jer. 33:26; Ezek. 33:24; Matt. 8:11).

I. Chronology. 1. His life before his arrival in Canaan, 75 years. In his early life Abraham dwelt with his father and his brethren in Ur of the Chaldees. He married Sarai, his half sister. See SARAH 1. After the death of his brother Haran, he, his wife, and Lot his nephew migrated, under the headship of Terah, from Ur to go to the Land of Canaan (Gen. 11:27-31). The motive which led the family to change its habitation is not stated in Gen., ch. 11. Josephus inferred from the narrative that Terah was actuated by a desire to escape from associations which reminded him of the son who had died (Jos. Antiq. i. 6, 5). It has also been suggested that the migration of the family may have been prompted by the wish to better their condition in a new and freer country, or have been incited by political disturbances in Sumer, such as an invasion of the Elamites. Stephen understood Gen. 12:1 to refer back to this time, and to be the initial command, given while the family was yet in Ur, for he says: "The God of glory appeared unto our father Abraham, when he was in Mesopotamia, before he dwelt in Haran" (Acts 7:2). Stephen's interpretation is countenanced by Gen. 15:7 and Neh. 9:7, although these passages might refer to God's providence. All the various causes suggested may have co-operated; and the natural motives may have been the means providentially employed by God to persuade the party to obey the heavenly vision. The family departed from Ur and, taking the customary route, followed the Euphrates toward the n.w. On reaching Haran, the party temporarily abandoned the purpose of journeying to Canaan and took up residence where they were.

When Abraham was 75 years old, he departed from Haran to go to Canaan. This move may have been due to God's will as revealed by him in Ur, or to a command now first received. Stephen, as already said, adopts the former interpretation and the wording of the details in Gen. 12:1 well suits, with our present meager knowledge of the community at Haran, this explanation. The departure is related after the record of Terah's death. It does not follow, however, from this that Abraham tarried at Haran until his father died. The narrator as usual concludes what he has to say of Terah before taking up the detailed history of Abraham. Still it is a plausible conjecture that Abraham did tarry so long, for the same party that left Ur now, with the exception of Terah, leaves Haran, and this also is the interpretation of Stephen. But if so, Abraham was born when Terah was at least 130 years old, and not 70, as is often unnecessarily inferred from Gen. 11:26. In this passage Abraham is mentioned first, either because he was the first-born and born in Terah's 70th year, or else, if he was a younger son and born after Terah's 70th year, because he was the progenitor of the chosen people (cf., for a similar interpretation, Gen. 5:32 with 9:22, 24). From Haran Abraham went to Canaan. He may have left Mesopotamia on his way to Palestine in the late 20th century, but the date is uncertain. What route did he take? Probably the road by way of Damascus, for a great highway led from Mesopotamia past that city to Canaan; and later mention is made of Abraham's steward, Eliezer of Damascus. Abraham did not stop long at any place along the way, but properly speaking journeyed continuously; for he was 75 years old when he left Haran, and he spent ten years in Canaan before he took Hagar to wife (Gen. 16:1-3), and he was 86 years old when Hagar bore Ishmael (v. 16); so that not more than a year elapsed between the departure from Haran and the arrival in Canaan.

I. 2. Unsettled life in Canaan, at most 10 years. He encamped at Shechem (Gen. 12:6), at Beth-el (v. 8), journeyed to the south country (v. 9), and was driven by famine into Egypt. In Egypt, through fear for his life, he represented Sarah merely as his sister (vs. 10-20). He returned to the south country (Gen. 13:1), was again at Beth-el (v. 3). He and Lot now separated on account of their increasing possessions. Lot chose the plain of the Jordan (vs. 5-12). Abraham afterward moved his tent to the oaks of Mamre at Hebron (v. 18).

I. 3. Residence at the oaks of Mamre, at least 15, perhaps 23 or 24 years. Abraham was in treaty with the Amorite chieftains of the vicinity (Gen. 14:13), pursued Chedorlaomer (vs. 1-16), was blessed by Melchizedek (vs. 17-24). The promise of an heir was given him and was believed; the promise of Canaan as an inheritance was confirmed by covenant (Gen., ch. 15). Ishmael was born (Gen., ch. 16). After an interval of 13 years (Gen., chs. 16; 17:1), the promise was unfolded. Man's attempt to fulfill God's promise did not alter God's intention: not the bondwoman's child, but the free woman's; not the child of the flesh, but the child of promise. On this occasion the covenant sign of circumcision was appointed, and the name Abram was changed to Abraham (Gen., ch. 17). Sodom was destroyed (Gen., chs. 18; 19).

I. 4. Residence in the south country, some 15 years during the childhood of Isaac. Sarah was taken to the court of Abimelech (Gen., ch. 20). When Abraham was 100 years old, Isaac was born, and a little later Ishmael was expelled (Gen. 21:1-21). At a well owned by Abraham, Abimelech and he concluded a treaty, and Abraham named the well Beer-sheba (vs. 22-34). When Isaac was somewhat grown (Gen. 22:6; Josephus conjectures 25 years, Jos. Antiq. i. 13, 2), Abraham's faith was put to an open test by the command to sacrifice his only son. In obedience to this command, he and Isaac repaired to the mountains of Moriah, where a ram was graciously substituted for Isaac. They returned to Beer-sheba (Gen. 22:1-19).

I. 5. Again at Hebron, after an uneventful interval of some 20 years. Here Sarah died, aged 127 years (Gen., ch. 23).

I. 6. Probably in the south country with Isaac, about 38 years. After the death of Sarah, when Abraham was 140 years old (Gen. 24:67; 25:20), he sent to Mesopotamia to obtain a wife from his own people for Isaac. Rebekah was brought back and met Isaac at Beer-lahai-roi (Gen., ch. 24). That Abraham took Keturah to wife is next recorded (see KETURAH). Abraham died, aged 175 years, and was buried in the cave of Machpelah (Gen. 25:1-9).

II. The size of the community under Abraham. Abraham departed from Haran with his wife, his nephew, and the souls that they had acquired (Gen. 12:5), and in Canaan he obtained additional servants by purchase, by gift, and doubtless by birth (Gen. 16:1; 17:23, 27; 18:7; 20:14). He was rich in flocks and herds, and their necessary accompaniment, menservants and maidservants (Gen. 12:16; 13:2, 7; 24:32, 35, 59; 26:15). He led 318 trained men, born in his house, to the rescue of Lot (Gen. 14:14). He was recognized by the neighboring chieftains as a mighty prince (Gen. 23:6), with whom they would do well to make alliances and conclude treaties (Gen. 14:13; 21:22 seq.). Yet when deprived of the aid of his allies, as when he went to sojourn in Egypt, his sense of insecurity triumphed over his better self, and he repressed part of the truth in regard to Sarah. He desired peace and was a man of peace (Gen. 13:8), yet like many other hardy settlers found in time of need brave hardship and danger and do battle for relatives and friends (Gen., ch. 14).

III. The religious belief of Abraham. His nearer ancestors served other gods (Josh. 24:2). Their worship was at least corrupted by the prevalent animism of Babylonia, which assigned a spirit to every object in nature, and which led to the conception of 11 great gods besides innumerable minor deities. The great gods were the deities of the majestic and impressive objects in nature: of the sky; of the earth; of the ocean and all subterranean waters; of the moon, the sun, and the storm; and of the 5 planets visible to the naked eye. Various Sumerian cities had their special divinities. The religion of Ur was a polytheism of the grossest sort. The patron of that city was the moon-god Nannar, who was also recognized as the king of Ur and the lord of heaven. His sanctuary occupied a considerable area in the city. On a terrace stood the ziggurat, which was the chief glory of the city. It was a tower of solid brickwork and was already old in Abraham's day. In front of it were the twin temples of Nannar and his wife Ningal. At the top of the ziggurat was a shrine of Nannar.

Abraham's faith was distinguished from the belief of the great majority of his contemporaries of whom we have any knowledge, in that Abraham believed in God as the almighty (Gen. 17:1), the everlasting (ch. 21:33), the most high (ch. 14:22), the possessor or maker of heaven and earth, i.e., the actual and lawful Lord of all (ch. 24:3), the righteous judge, i. e., the moral governor of all the earth (ch. 18:25); Abraham believed in this God as the disposer of events, who sees and takes knowledge of what occurs on earth, and who gives and withholds as he will. In this faith Abraham obeyed, worshiped, and guarded the honor of God. How came Abraham by this faith? 1. Reason lent its aid, as it still helps the intelligent Christian. Polytheists have often arrived at henotheism; and there are traces of henotheism among Abraham's countrymen in Babylonia. A clear, logical mind, such as Abraham exhibits, would tend to pass from henotheism to monotheism. Melchizedek had come to worship the most high God, possessor of heaven and earth; and his religious conceptions and practices called forth profound recognition from Abraham. Evidence seems to show that occasionally an individual among the Egyptians, Assyrians, and Babylonians arrived at a speculative belief in the unity of God, but without influencing the people at large. 2. The religious inheritance which he received from his forefathers aided Abraham. In support of this source of religious information may be urged: (a) the reasons for believing in a primitive revelation; (b) the existence of the line which began with Adam and included such true worshippers of God as Seth (see Gen. 4:26), Enoch, and Noah. 3. Special revelation was granted to Abraham by dreams, visions, and theophanies (Gen. 12:7; 15:1, 12, 17; 17:1; 18:1, 2; 22:1, 2). Theophanies are as conceivable in Abraham's time as is the manifestation of Christ at a later age.

IV. Harmony between the Hebrew record and contemporary history. With our present knowledge it is impossible to fix exact dates for Abraham. According to Bishop Ussher's chronology, Abraham was born 1996 B.C. The route taken by the invading armies (Gen., ch. 14) was southward along the e. edge of Gilead and Moab. The explorations of Albright and Glueck have shown that there was a line of important cities along this route before 2000 B.C. and for a century or two thereafter, but not in later periods. According to Genesis (chs. 18; 19) Sodom and Gomorrah not only flourished, but were also destroyed, in the time of Abraham. About the 20th century B.C. there was a great pilgrimage shrine at a place now called Bāb ed-Dra', near the s. end of the Dead Sea, not far from the probable site of Sodom and Gomorrah. Glueck's explorations in Edom and Moab show that, although those regions were thickly settled at that time, shortly thereafter there began a gap lasting until the 13th century B.C. in their sedentary occupation. Archaeological evidence thus favors dating Abraham c. 2000 B.C., and Bishop Ussher's date of the birth of Abraham and that of the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah (1898 B.C.) seem quite reasonable.

Genesis, ch. 14, appears to refer to a loose control over Palestine which was exercised by the Elamite dynasty at Larsa. Rim-Sin, the last king of this dynasty, was defeated by Hammurabi (1792-1750). The name Chedorlaomer seems to be an Elamite formation, Kudur-Lagamar, servant of the god Lagamar, but this king has not been identified. One conjecture is that he is the Elamite king Kuter-Nahhunte I (c. 1625-1610 B.C.). The most we can say now is that he represents the power of Elam. It may be that Arioch represents the dynasty of Kudur-Mabuk, who placed his son Warad-Sin on the throne of Larsa; the latter was succeeded by his brother Rim-Sin. Even though the names of the invading kings cannot be positively identified with any of the royal names on extant records, it is certain that the author of Gen., ch. 14, did not invent these names or recount an imaginary incident. From early times the kings of Sumer and Akkad invaded the w. Thus Lugal-zaggisi, king of Erech, maintains that he conquered the land from the Persian Gulf to the Mediterranean. Sargon, who (c. 2425) deposed Lugal-zaggisi and founded the dynasty of Agade, also exercised dominion as far as the Mediterranean and perhaps made a voyage across a part of it. It is not certain whether he reached Cyprus. Naram-Sin, too, of the same dynasty, had an empire which extended to the w. Gudea (late 22d century B.C.), king of Lagash, had contacts with the w. and procured cedars, juniper wood, and boxwood from Syria. We have, accordingly, evidence that certain kings of Sumer and Akkad made expeditions w. and often held Canaan in subjection. Even though we cannot identify the kings against whom Abraham fought, the Hebrew record (Gen., ch. 14) gives an accurate and somewhat detailed picture of the political conditions in Canaan and Babylonia during the time of Abraham.

A'bra-ham's (ā'brā-hāmz) Bos'om. The Jews fondly thought of being welcomed by Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob to paradise (IV Macc. 13:17); and of having fellowship with Abraham, even resting, as it were, on his breast (Luke 16:22). In the rabbinical speech of the 3d century A.D., to say that a person was sitting in Abraham's bosom meant that he had entered paradise.

A'bram (ā'brām) (Gen. 11:26 to 17:5). See ABRAHAM.

A'bro'nah (ā-brō'nā). In A. V. E'bro'nah [a passage, or a place opposite]. A station of the Israelites in the wilderness (Num. 33:34, 35), an oasis, modern 'Ain Daffiyeh, 7½ miles n. of Ezion-geber.

Ab'sa-lom (āb'sā-lōm) and A-bish'a-lom (I Kings 15:2, 10) [the Father is peace; cf. Salem (peace), the name of a deity in the Ras Shamra literature]. 1. The third son of David, king of Israel. He was born in Hebron, and had for his mother Maacah, the daughter of Talmi, king of Geshur, in Aram (II Sam. 3:3). He was of faultless form, and had long, fine hair, of which he was inordinately proud. His beauty was shared by his sister Tamar, who so fascinated her half brother Amnon that he criminally dishonored her, for which two years afterward he was treacherously assassinated at the instance of Absalom, whose guest he was at the time. Though Absalom was his father's favorite, his crime was too gross to be overlooked even by his indulgent parent. He had to go into exile, and remained three years with his maternal relatives in Geshur, and two more at Jerusalem, before he was allowed to return to the court or see his royal father. He soon afterward deliberately set himself to win the hearts of the people away from the king his father, and when the plot was ripe, repaired, under false pretenses, to Hebron, and raised the standard of rebellion. Probably he had heard that Solomon was to succeed David, and considered the arrangement unfair to himself, as he was the older of the two brothers, and, unlike Solomon, was of royal blood by the mother's as well as the father's side. Whether or not he was aware that it was by the divine choice, as recorded in I Chron. 22:7-10, that Solomon was designated to the sovereignty, is less certain; if he did know it, then the enormity of his rebellion was heightened. It is noticeable, in connection with this point, that the priests and Levites sided with David, and brought him much moral as well as material support; but the mass of the people seem to have gone against the king, and he had to escape with a few faithful followers from Jerusalem to save his life. Of David's two chief counselors, the abler one, Ahithophel, had gone over to Absalom; the other, Hushai, was faithful to David, and went after the fugitive king. David sent him back to Jerusalem to pretend adherence to Absalom, and thwart the counsel of Ahithophel. When the time arrived for offering advice to Absalom, Ahithophel astutely recommended that he should be allowed to take 12,000 men that very night and follow David before David recovered from his depression. He would kill only the king, and the people would then come over to Absalom. Before the scheme was carried out, Hushai was asked if he adhered to it, and of course he raised objections, and proposed a rival scheme of his own, so preposterous that it does not say much for Absalom's penetration that he did not see that it was meant to effect his ruin. Hushai counseled long delay, a course that would really tend to make Absalom weaker and David stronger. He flattered Absalom's self-conceit by proposing that he should be commander, which would give the army a poor leader. When victory was achieved, which he assumed to be a certainty, he provided that there should be extensive and unnecessary bloodshed, a serious political blunder as well as a great crime. Hushai's absurd scheme, however, recommended itself to Absalom and the people, and Ahithophel, seeing that it was all over with the rebellion, went home and committed suicide. Hushai, understanding that the danger was not yet over, sent David counsel immediately to cross the Jordan, which he did. Absalom and the rebel army were beginning to revert to the policy of Ahithophel; and ultimately a compromise was made between his plan and that of Hushai, i.e., hostilities should be immediate, but Absalom should be the commander in chief. The battle took place in the wood of Ephraim, apparently near Mahanaim, where David was then residing. The rebel host, undisciplined and badly led, went down at once before David's veterans, handled by three skillful commanders. When the rout took place, Absalom, riding furiously on a mule, got his head entangled among the spreading branches of an oak, great disservice being done him by the long hair of which he was so proud. The animal ran away, leaving him hanging helpless but alive. Joab, one of the three commanders, thrust three darts through the heart of the unhappy prince, and ten of Joab's immediate followers, surrounding him, completed the slaughter. David had given express directions that Absalom should not be injured, and on hearing of his son's death he gave himself up to excessive grief (II Sam. 13:1 to 19:8). Absalom was buried near the place where he died, in a pit under a great cairn of stones. He had reared for himself a pillar at Jerusalem to keep his name in remembrance (II Sam. 18:17, 18). What is now called Absalom's tomb is in the valley of the Kidron. In the beginning of the 4th century A.D., however, it seems to have been regarded as the tomb of Hezekiah (Bordeaux Pilgrim), but scarcely in agreement with II Chron. 32:33. The decorations of the monument date from the Greco-Roman period, but the chamber itself may be older. According to the title, Psalm 3 was composed by David during Absalom's rebellion.

2. Father of Mattathias and probably of Jonathan, captains of the Jewish army under the Maccabees, Jonathan and Simon (I Macc. 11:70; 13:11; Jos. Antiq. xiii. 5, 7; 6, 4).

Ab'shai (ăb'shî). See ABISHAI.

A-bu'bus (ă-bŭ'bŭs). Father of that Ptolemy who was the governor of the district about Jericho (I Macc. 16:11, 15).

A-byss' [Lat. abyssus, from Gr. abyssos, bottomless]. Hades, the place of the dead (Rom. 10:7); in particular, the dwelling of evil spirits, presided over by Apollyon, that is, Satan (Rev. 9:11; 17:8; 20:1-3, in A.V. "bottomless pit"; cf. Luke 8:31, in A.V. "the deep").

A-ca'cia. See SHITTAE TREE.

Ac'cad (ăk'ăd), Āk'kad (ăk'ăd). An ancient city in the land of Shinar and one of 4 towns which constituted the original kingdom of Nimrod (Gen. 10:10). The name was extended to denote a district called the land of Akkad. This district embraced n. Babylonia, the region between the Tigris and the Euphrates, where the 2 rivers are close together and almost parallel, and included within its bounds the cities of Babylon and Cutha. See BABYLONIA.

Ac'co (ăk'ô), in A.V. Ac'cho (ăk'ô) [sultriness, hot sand]. A city on a small promontory of the coast of Palestine, about 25 miles s. of Tyre. The town looks across the bay of its own name to Mount Carmel, about 8 miles to the s. It was assigned to the tribe of Asher, but was not occupied by the Hebrews (Judg. 1:31). In the time of Hoshea it submitted to Shalmaneser, king of Assyria (Jos. Antiq. ix. 14, 2), and again in 701 to Sennacherib. It was chastised by Ashurbanipal in 640, who deported a part of its population. About the close of the 3d century B.C., its name was changed to Ptolemais, in honor of one of the early Ptolemies. It acquired importance politically as the key of Galilee and as a seaport at the end of commercial routes to Decapolis and Arabia (I Macc. 5:15, 21, 55; 10:1; Jos. Antiq. xiii. 12, 2 seq.). Jonathan Maccabaeus was treacherously slain there (I Macc. 12:48; Jos. Antiq. xiii. 6, 2). A large number of Jews found a home within its walls (Jos. War ii. 18, 5), and a Christian community early grew up here. On his last journey to Jerusalem, Paul spent a day here with the brethren (Acts 21:7). Later the town became the seat of a Christian bishop. The Arabs restored the old name, which the Franks corrupted into Acre. It fell into the hands of Saladin in 1187, but was taken in 1191 by Philip Augustus, king of France, and Richard I, king of England. From 1229 it was held by the Knights of St. John, and was often called in consequence St. Jean d'Acre. Prior to 1799 it was strongly fortified by Jezzar Pasha, who ruled with energy, but with such cruelty that he was nicknamed "the Butcher."

In that year it was attacked by Napoleon, who was baffled, and at once began his retreat from Syria. Jezzar's victory was largely due to English sailors, who had been landed to give him aid. In 1832 it was wrested from the Turkish sultan by one of his subjects, Ibrahim Pasha, son of Mohammed Ali, the ruler of Egypt. On November 3, 1840, it was bombarded by the British and Austrian fleets, until the day was decided by the explosion of the powder magazine, which caused the death of from 1,700 to 2,000 Egyptian soldiers. The place was given back to the sultan, but in World War I it was captured by Allenby in 1918.

Ac'cos (āk'ōs) [Gr. form of Hakkoz (I Chron. 24:10)]. Probably the priestly family Hakkoz (I Mace. 8:17).

Ac'curs'ed. Anything on which a curse has been pronounced, devoting it to destruction (Josh. 6:18; 7:1, 11, 13, 15; 22:20). See ANATHEMA.

A'cel'da'ma (ā-sēl'dā-mā). See AKELDAMA.

A'cha'ia (ā-kā'yā). Originally a state of Greece situated in the n. part of the Peloponnesus (now the Morea). After Greece had been conquered by the Romans, the Emperor Augustus divided that country with the adjacent regions into two provinces, Macedonia and Achaia. The latter comprehended the whole of the Peloponnesus, with continental Greece s. of Illyricum, Epirus, and Thessaly. Corinth was the capital, and was the residence of the proconsul by whom the province was ruled. It is in the second or comprehensive sense that the word Achaia is used in the New Testament (Acts 18:12, 27; 19:21; Rom. 15:26; II Cor. 1:1; 9:2; I Thess. 1:7, 8).

A'cha'icus (ā-kā'yē-kūs) [Lat. from Gr., belonging to Achaia]. A Christian who came with two others from Corinth to Paul (I Cor. 16:17).

A'chan (ā'kăn) and A'char [trouble or troubler, cf. Heb. 'ākar, to trouble]. A son of Carmi, of the house of Zimri, family of Zerah, tribe of Judah. At the capture of Jericho he appropriated to his own use and hid in his tent a Babylonian garment and a wedge of gold, part of the spoil of Jericho, which had been devoted to utter destruction. He thereby troubled Israel. His transgression led to the defeat of the Israelites before Ai. Lots were then cast to discover the culprit who had brought on the catastrophe, and Achan was pointed out as the individual. He made confession of his guilt, but this did not avert his fate. He was stoned to death in the valley of Achor (Josh. 7:1-26; 22:20; I Chron. 2:7).

A'char (ā'kār). See ACHAN.

Ach'bor (āk'bōr) [a mouse]. 1. The father of Baal-hanan, king of Edom (Gen. 36:38; I Chron. 1:49).

2. The son of Michaiah and father of Elnathan. He was a trusted officer at the court of Josiah (II Kings 22:12, 14; Jer. 26:22; 36:12). Called Abdon in II Chron. 34:20.

A'chim (ā'kīm) [Gr., from Heb. Jachin or Jakim, He, i.e., God, raises or establishes]. An ancestor of Jesus in the line of Joseph, who lived after the Exile (Matt. 1:14).

A'chish (ā'kīsh). The son of Maach and king of Gath, to whom David twice fled during the time that he was persecuted by Saul (I Sam. 21:10-15; 27:1-12; 28:1, 2; 29:1-11). He is probably the Achish who was king of Gath at the beginning of Solomon's reign: for the latter was the son of Maachah, a name which is radically identical with Maach, the father of the Achish already known. The reign of about 50 years required by this assumption is not extraordinary (cf. among many others the reigns of Uzziah and Manasseh). Achish survived his contemporary, David, at least 3 years (I Kings 2:39). In the title of Psalm 34 he is called Abimelech, which may have been an official designation of the Philistine kings as Pharaoh was a title of the Egyptian monarchs.

Ach'me'tha (āk'mē-thā) [Aram. from Old Pers. Hagmatāna]. A city in the province of the Medes. When the Jews asserted that Cyrus had issued a decree permitting them to build the Temple, their adversaries sent to Babylon to inquire if the document were in existence. Darius ordered an investigation. The house of the archives in Babylon was first searched, but in vain. The quest was continued in Achmetha, in the province of the Medes, and the decree was found in the palace (Ezra 5:6 to 6:2). Achmetha was Ecbatana, the capital of Media, the summer residence of the Persian kings, and a treasure city (Herod. 1.98; iii. 64; Xen. Cyropaedia viii. 6, 22). It is the modern Hamadan.

A'chor (ā'kōr) [trouble]. The valley near Jericho where the unhappy Achan was stoned to death (Josh. 7:24-26; Isa. 65:10; Hos. 2:15). It lay s. of Jericho, for it formed part of the n. boundary of Judah (Josh. 15:7), whereas Jericho was a city of Benjamin.

Ach'sah (āk'sā), in A. V. once Ach'sa (āk'sā) (I Chron. 2:49) [an anklet]. A daughter of Caleb, son of Jephunneh, who promised her in marriage to anyone who should capture Kirjath-sepher. Othniel, his younger brother or half brother, took the town, and received the maiden. At her request her father gave her the upper and nether springs (Josh. 15:16-19; Judg. 1:12-15; I Chron. 2:49). See DEBIR 2.

Ach'shaph (āk'shāf) [sorcery]. A royal city of Canaan (Josh. 11:1), captured by Thutmose (Thothmes) III; also by Joshua (Josh. 12:20). It stood on the boundary of the territory of Asher (Josh. 19:25).

Ach'zib (āk'zīb) or Chē'zib, as it was with equal correctness pronounced by the Hebrews [deceitful]. 1. A town of s. Palestine (Josh. 15:44; Micah 1:14); probably the same as Cozeba (I Chron. 4:22). Elliger identifies it with Tell el-Beida on the road from Adullam ('Aid el-Mā) to Tell el-Judeiydeh. Chēzib (Gen. 38:5), a place near Adullam, is commonly identified with 'Ain el-Kezbeh, with which Achzib also has been equated.

2. A town on the seacoast of Asher (Josh. 19:29), from which the Canaanite inhabitants were not driven out (Judg. 1:31). It yielded to Sennacherib in 701 B.C. It was known as Ekdippa to the Greeks and Romans (Jos. War i. 13, 4); and has been identified as ez-Zib, 8½ miles n. of Acre.

Acts, The, in A. V. Acts of the Apos'tles, The. The common title, which is as old as the 2d century, does not mean that the book relates all the acts of the apostles. Its purpose was to show the establishment of Gentile Christianity by the Spirit through the apostles. At first Peter and afterward Paul is most prominent; but frequently the apostles as a body are represented as taking action (Acts 1:23-26; 2:42; 4:33; 5:12, 29; 6:2; 8:1, 14; 15:6, 23). The book is addressed to a certain Theophilus, probably a Gentile Christian who occupied some official position under the Roman Empire. The author refers (Acts 1:1) to a previous treatise by himself concerning the life and teachings of Christ, which was clearly our Third Gospel, because 1. it was addressed to Theophilus; 2. it consists of a narrative of Christ's life and teaching until his ascension (Luke 24:51); 3. it presents the ministry of Christ with special reference to its universal mission, which would naturally be the point of view adopted by the author of The Acts; 4. the vocabulary and style of the two books are notably alike. Further, while the author does not name himself in either book, he uses the first person plural in certain portions of the narrative of Paul's journeys (the "we" sections, Acts 16:10-17; 20:5 to 21:18; 27:1 to 28:16), and by this intimates that he was a companion of the apostle; that he joined him on his Second Journey at Troas and accompanied him to Philippi, again rejoined him at Philippi in the Third Journey and went with him to Jerusalem, and traveled with him from Caesarea to Rome.

The earliest tradition of the postapostolic age assigns both the Third Gospel and The Acts to Luke, and the allusions to Luke in Paul's epistles accord with the above references to his movements in The Acts, while no other of Paul's known companions will fit into them. From Col. 4:14, Philemon 24, we learn that Luke was with Paul in Rome, and no mention of him occurs in epistles written when, according to The Acts, its author was not with the apostle. His language is in accord with that of Greek medical writers, and the classical elements in his style, as well as his evident acquaintance with the Roman world, indicate that the author was an educated man such as a physician would be likely to be.

Analysis. Chapter 1 recounts Christ's last interviews with the apostles through 40 days, his promise of the Spirit, and his command to preach to all the world (v. 8), followed by his ascension and the actions of the disciples until Pentecost. Then follows an account of the church in Jerusalem after Pentecost (chs. 2:1 to 8:3), in which certain representative facts are described (the first conversions, the first opposition, the first discipline, the first persecution, the first organization, the first martyrdom), and, after each, a brief notice of its effect upon the Church (chs. 2:41-47; 4:23-37; 5:11-16, 41, 42; 6:7; 8:1-3). Here Peter is most prominent, though the first martyr and the man who prepared for the following period was Stephen. Next we have an account of the transition of the Church to a missionary religion, offering salvation by faith alone to all men (chs. 8:4 to 12:25). Here five significant events are described: 1. Philip's work in Samaria and the Ethiopian steward's conversion (ch. 8:4-40); 2. Saul's conversion and earliest preaching (ch. 9:1-30); 3. Peter's missionary work in Syria, leading to the conversion of Cornelius and the conviction of the Church that the gospel was for Gentiles (chs. 9:31 to 11:18); 4. the founding of the Gentile church of Antioch, a new center for further Gentile work (ch. 11:19-30); 5. the Herodian persecution, whereby the Jews finally repudiated Christianity (ch. 12). Then follows the establishment of Christianity, chiefly through Paul, in the principal centers of the empire (ch. 13 to the end). This was done in 3 great journeys: the 1st, to Cyprus and the interior of Asia Minor (chs. 13; 14), led to the Council of Jerusalem (ch. 15:1-35), when the standing in the Church of uncircumcised Gentiles was formally recognized; the 2d, to Macedonia and Greece (chs. 15:36 to 18:22); the 3d, to Ephesus as well as Greece (chs. 18:23 to 20:3), followed by Paul's last visit to Jerusalem (chs. 20:4 to 21:26), where he was arrested, and, after defending himself before the Jews, Felix, Festus, and Agrippa, and after 2 years' imprisonment in Caesarea (chs. 21:27 to 26:32), was sent, on his appeal to the emperor, to Rome (chs. 27:1 to 28:16), where he preached for 2 years (ch. 28:17-31).

Various dates have been assigned to The Acts. A few would place the composition of the book at about A.D. 100, while others prefer 75-85. Many, more plausibly, think that The Acts was written just at the close of the "two years," i.e., A.D. 63 (ch. 28:30). Some think that Luke ended there because his object was attained in bringing Paul, as an apostolic preacher, to Rome, and because he knew no more. Accordingly The Acts should be dated at least before Paul's martyrdom, which took place about A.D. 67. The remarkable historical accuracy of The Acts has been verified (see, e.g., Ramsay's Church in the Roman Empire). Its harmony with Paul's epistles has been much debated and successfully defended. It is written with much artistic power, and supplies the information necessary to explain the rise of Christianity as a universal religion during the 33 years from the death of Christ covered by its narrative. Ad'a-dah (ăd'ă-dă) [holiday, festival]. A town on the extreme s. of the tribe of Judah (Josh. 15:22). It has not been identified, unless Adadah is a misreading of 'Ar'ara, about 12 miles s.e. of Beer-sheba. See AROER 3.

A'dah (ăd'ă) [Heb., ornament, but since Lamech's other wife was named Zillah (shad-ow), Adah may signify brightness. Cf. Arab. ghudwat, ghadât (dawn, morning)]. 1. One of Lamech's wives, and mother of Jabal and Jubal (Gen. 4:19-21, 23).

2. One of Esau's wives, daughter of Elon, the Hittite (Gen. 36:2, 4); in Gen. 26:34 the daughter of Elon, whom Esau took to wife, is named Basemath (q.v.).

A'da'lah (ă-dă'yă) [Jehovah has adorned]. 1. A man of Bozkath, father of Josiah's mother (II Kings 22:1).

2. A Levite descended from Gershom (I Chron. 6:41, 42).

3. A priest, descended through Jeroham from Malchijah (I Chron. 9:12; Neh. 11:12).

4. A Benjamite, son of Shimei (I Chron. 8:21).

5 and 6. Two men descended from Bani, each of whom was induced to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:29, 39).

7. A son of Joiarib (Neh. 11:5).

8. Father of Maaseiah (II Chron. 23:1).

A'da'li'a (ă-dă'li-ă). One of Haman's ten sons (Esth. 9:8).

Ā'dām (ăd'ăm) [human being, mankind; meaning, etymologically, ruddy from Heb. ādām (red); another suggestion is that it means formed, i.e., a creature, from Akkad. adāmu (make, produce); cf. also Akkad. admu (child)]. 1. The first human being. Mankind was made, as were all other created things, by God (Gen. 1:26); and was made male and female (Gen. 1:27; Matt. 19:4-6), the man being first formed, then the woman (Gen. 2:7, 20-23; I Tim. 2:13). Like all other living beings, his body was formed of the ordinary materials of the universe and life was granted by God (Gen. 2:7; cf. v. 19; 6:17; 7:22; Job 10:8-12; 27:3; 33:4). He was made in the image of God (Gen. 1:26, 27). Paul describes the similarity as consisting in knowledge, or, more completely, in knowledge, righteousness, and true holiness (Eph. 4:22-25; Col. 3:9, 10). Mankind was invested with dominion over the inferior animals (Gen. 1:26-28); was exhorted to be fruitful and multiply, to replenish the earth and subdue it (v. 28); and shared in the approval when God pronounced everything he had made very good (v. 31). Adam, the first of mankind, was placed with Eve in the Garden of Eden to dress it and keep it in order. A command was laid upon him, in the nature of a covenant of life and death (Gen. 2:16, 17). On his transgression, sentence of death was passed upon him, toil and undesired results were annexed to labor, and he was expelled from the garden (Gen., ch. 3; II Esdras 3:4-7, 21, 22). Afterward he had children, Cain, Abel, and, when he was 130 years old, Seth. He lived 800 years more, at last dying at the age of 930. See CHRONOLOGY, I.

Paul draws a double parallel between Adam and Christ, calling our Lord the last Adam (Rom. 5:12-21; I Cor. 15:22, 45).

2. A city in the Jordan Valley beside Zarethan (Josh. 3:16). Its identification with Tell ed-Dāmīeh on the e. bank of the river, less than a mile below the mouth of the Jabbok and 18 miles above Jericho, is assumed by many scholars.

Ad'a-mah (ăd'ă-mă) [soil]. A fenced city of Naphtali (Josh. 19:36). The Palestine surveyors place it at ed-Dāmīeh, 5 miles s.w. of Tiberias, but the context favors a location n.w. of the Sea of Tiberias.

Ad'a-mant [in Gr., unconquerable]. An extremely hard metal or mineral, especially the diamond. It is the traditional rendering of the Hebrew shāmīr, a hard substance compared with flint and the stony heart (Ezek. 3:9; Zech. 7:12), and used to point graving tools (Jer. 17:1, where it is rendered "diamond").

Ad'a-mi-ne'keb (ăd'ă-mī-nē'kēb) [perhaps, Adami of the pass], in A. V. Ad'ami (ăd'ămi) [human]. A frontier town of Naphtali (Josh. 19:33), called Adam of the pass, in distinction probably from Adam of the ford (cf. Josh. 3:16); perhaps Khirbet ed-Dāmīyah, five miles s.w. of Tiberias, at the mouth of a pass on the old caravan route from Gilead to Acre. See NEKEB.

A'dar, I (ăd'ār) [perhaps, amplitude, magnificence]. A town of Judah, better written Addar (q.v.).

A'dar, II (ăd'ār) [Akkad. adaru, addaru, probably, dark, cloudy]. The later name of the 12th month of the Jewish year, borrowed by the Jews from the Babylonian calendar during the Exile (Ezra 6:15; Esth. 3:7, 13; 9:15). It extended from the new moon in February to that in March. See YEAR.

Ad'a-sa (ăd'ă-să). A town near Beth-horon (I Macc. 7:40, 45, cf. v. 39; Jos. Antiq. xii, 10, 5), at the junction of the two main lines of advance on Jerusalem; modern Khirbet 'Ad-dāseh, about 5 miles n. of the city.

Ad'be-el (ăd'bē-ēl) [perhaps El (God) has invited, or disciplined. Cf. Arab. adaba, to invite, discipline]. A tribe descended from Ishmael (Gen. 25:13; I Chron. 1:29). In the 8th century B.C. a tribe called Idiba'il dwelt in n. Arabia, at no great distance from the frontier of Egypt.

Ad'dan (ăd'ăn) or Ad'don. A place in Babylon from which people who could not prove their Israelitish descent went to Palestine after the Captivity (Ezra 2:59; Neh. 7:61).

Ad'dar (ăd'ār) [perhaps, amplitude, magnificence]. 1. A town of Judah, on the s. boundary line of Palestine (Josh. 15:3, in A.V. written Adar). In Num. 34:4, it is called Hazar-addar. See HEZRON 1.

2. A Benjamite. See ARD.

Ad'der. The rendering of 4 Hebrew words, referring probably to 4 distinct species of venomous snake. 1. Shephiphōn, the creeper. Probably the Vipera cerastes, the horned sand snake of Arabia and Egypt. At Thebes it was regarded as sacred (cf. Herod. ii, 74). It is a venomous viper, 3 to 6 feet long, of a gray color, and with a horn above each eye. It hides in the sand, and may well be the serpent which bites the horses' heels so that the rider falls backward (Gen. 49:17).

2. Pethen, a species of serpent incapable of being affected by the voice of the snake charmer, and therefore called the deaf adder (Ps. 58:4, 5). It is very venomous (Ps. 91:13). It is the asp of Deut. 32:33; Job 20:14, 16; and Isa. 11:8. Probably the Naja haje of Egypt; see ASP.

3. Akshub (Ps. 140:3). In the LXX and in the quotation in Rom. 3:13 it is translated

"asp." Bochart considers it the common adder (Pelias verus), and Colonel Hamilton Smith the puff adder of the Cape colonists, Vipera arietans, but there is as yet no certainty as to the identification.

4. Shepha', šiph'ōnī (Prov. 23:32), translated in Isa. 11:8; 14:29; 59:5, cockatrice (q.v.).

Ad'di (ăd'dī) [a Greek form of Iddo]. An ancestor of Christ who lived several generations before Zerubbabel (Luke 3:28).

Ad'don (ăd'ōn). See ADDAN.

Ad'der (ăd'dēr). See EDER.

Ad'i-da (ăd'i-dă). See ADITHAIM and HADID.

Ad'i-el (ăd'i-ēl) [El (God) is an ornament].

1. A Simeonite (I Chron. 4:36).

2. A priest, son of Jahzerah (I Chron. 9:12).

3. Father of the supervisor of David's treasures (I Chron. 27:25).

Ad'in (ăd'in) [soft, delicate]. Founder of a family, members of which returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:15) and Ezra (Ezra 8:6). Its chief signed the covenant made by Nehemiah to serve Jehovah (Neh. 10:16).

Ad'i-na (ăd'i-nă) [delicate]. A Reubenite, one of David's military officers (I Chron. 11:42).

Ad'i-no (ăd'i-nō). One of David's mighty men, an Eznite; the same as Josheb-basshebeth (II Sam. 23:8). Adino the Eznite, it seems, was originally not intended to be a proper name, and the present Hebrew text is doubtless corrupt. In accordance with the parallel passage in I Chron. 11:11, Luther and most modern commentators change the text, altering the words "Adino the Eznite" to "He lifted up his spear." The same expression occurs also in II Sam. 23:18 and thus favors this interpretation.

Ad'i-tha'im (ăd'i-thă'im) [perhaps, double crossing]. A town in the lowland of Judah (Josh. 15:36). Identified with a place called el-Hadithen, 2½ miles n. of Ajlalon.

Ad'i-lā (ăd'i-lā) [Jehovah is justice; cf. Arab. adala, to act equitably]. Father of a herdsman of David (I Chron. 27:29).

Ad'mah (ăd'mă) [perhaps, redness]. One of the cities of the plain (Gen. 10:19; 14:2, 8) which was destroyed with Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen. 19:25, 28, 29; Deut. 29:23; Hos. 11:8).

Ad'ma-tha (ăd'mă-thă) [Persian name, probably meaning unconquered]. One of the 7 princes of Persia and Media under Ahasuerus (Esth. 1:14). See PRINCE.

Ad'na (ăd'nă) [pleasure]. 1. A priest, head of the father's house Harim in the 2d generation after the Exile (Neh. 12:15).

2. A son of Pahath-moab, induced by Ezra to divorce his foreign wife (Ezra 10:30).

Ad'nah (ăd'nă) [pleasure]. 1. A Manassite who joined David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:20).

2. A man of Judah, of high military rank under Jehoshaphat (II Chron. 17:14).

Ad'o-ni-be'zek (ă-dō-nī-bē-zēk) [lord of Bezek]. A king of Bezek, conquered by the warriors of the tribe of Judah, who cut off his thumbs and great toes. This he regarded as a divine requital for similar cruelties perpetrated by him on 70 kings (Judg. 1:4-7).

Ad'o-ni'jah (ăd'ō-nī-jă) [Jehovah is Lord]. 1. A son of David by Haggith, one of his wives. He was the 4th son born to the king at Hebron (II Sam. 3:2, 4). He was a goodly young man, and apparently his father's next favorite after Absalom. Blinded by foolish fondness, David never rebuked him for a misdeed. When David was stricken in years Adonijah attempted to seize the throne. He was doubtless aware of his father's intention that Solomon should be king (I Kings 1:13; I Chron. 23:1; 28:5); but since the first- and third-born sons of David, and probably the second-born also, were dead, Adonijah as the eldest remaining son doubtless felt that he had a claim to the crown, although neither law nor custom required the succession to go to the eldest. He won Joab to his cause, who, he hoped, would bring with him the army; and Abiathar, the priest, who, he expected, would bring with him the priests and the Levites. But Zadok the priest, Benaiah, commander of the royal bodyguard, and Nathan the prophet he did not gain. He invited his partisans to a great open-air feast at the stone of Zohaleth by the fountain of Rogel, and had himself proclaimed king. But Solomon had been divinely chosen to be the successor to David; and Bathsheba, Solomon's mother, supported by Nathan the prophet, waited on the aged king to remind him of his promise concerning Solomon, reported the proceedings of Adonijah, and asked instructions. Promptly, by David's order, Solomon was proclaimed king; the open-air feast came to an abrupt termination, the guests took to flight, and Adonijah sought asylum at the altar (I Kings 1:5-50). Solomon pardoned him for the time; but when Adonijah asked that the maid Abishag be given him to wife and thereby justified the belief that he was again aiming at the kingdom, Solomon ordered that he be put to death (I Kings 1:51-53; 2:13-25).

2. One of the Levites whom Jehoshaphat sent to instruct the people of Judah (II Chron. 17:8).

3. For Neh. 10:16, see ADONIKAM.

Ad'-o-ni'kam (ăd'-ô-nî-kām) [the Lord is risen]. Founder of a family, members of which returned from Babylon both with Zerubbabel and with Ezra (Ezra 2:13; 8:13; Neh. 7:18). The head of this family, apparently, sealed the covenant in Nehemiah's time (Neh. 10:16), but is called Adonijah.

Ad'-o-ni'ram (ăd'-ô-nî-rām) [the Lord is exalted]. An officer who was over the tribute during the reigns of David and Solomon. He was the son of Abda, and was called also Adoram (II Sam. 20:24) and Hadoram (II Chron. 10:18). When the 10 tribes revolted, Rehoboam sent him to treat with the rebels, who, however, instead of listening to him, stoned him to death (II Sam. 20:24; I Kings 4:6; 12:18; II Chron. 10:18).

Ad'-o-ni'-ze'dek (ăd'-ô-nî-zē'dĕk), in A.V. Ad'-o-ni'-ze'dec (ăd'-ô-nî-zē'dĕk) [the Lord is righteousness]. A king of Jerusalem who, on learning that Ai had been captured by the Israelites, and that the Gibeonites had made peace with Joshua, formed a confederacy with four other Amorite kings to punish Gibeon. He and his confederates were defeated, taken, and slain (Josh. 10:1-27). In the LXX called Adonibezek.

Ad-op'tion. The act of taking a stranger to be one's own child, as in the case of Moses and Esther (Ex. 2:10; Esth. 2:7). In the N. T. the word is used to denote: 1. The choice by Jehovah of the Jewish nation to be his special people (Rom. 9:4).

2. The reception of all true Christians to be in a special sense the sons of God (Gal. 4:5; Eph. 1:4). The spirit of adoption enables us to feel to God as children to a loving father. It is distinguished from the spirit of bondage, which compels one to feel to him as a slave to a master (Rom. 8:14-21).

3. The redemption of the body; its deliverance from sin, pain, and death in the glorified state (Rom. 8:23).

Ad'-o-ra (ăd'-ô-rá). See ADORAIM.

Ad'-o-ra'im (ăd'-ô-rā'im) [perhaps, two mounds]. A city of Judah fortified by Rehoboam (II Chron. 11:9). It is probably identical with Adora, shortened into Dora (I Macc. 13:20; Jos. Antiq. xiii. 9, 1; 15, 4; xiv. 5, 3; War i. 2, 5). It is identified with Dura, a village on a hillside about 5 miles w. by s. of Hebron.

Ad'-o-ram (ăd'-ô-rām). See ADONIRAM.

Ad-ram'-me-lech (ăd'-drām'-ĕ-lĕk) [Adar is king]. 1. A deity to whom the colonists of Samaria, who had been brought from Sepharvaim, burned their children in the fire (II Kings 17:31). At that time this god was worshiped in n.w. Mesopotamia under the name of Adad-milki, a form of the Syrian god Hadad.

2. A son of Sennacherib. With another brother he murdered his father, and afterward escaped to Armenia (II Kings 19:37; Isa. 37:38).

Ad-ram'-myt'-ti-um (ăd'-rā-mīt'-tî-ūm). A maritime city in Mysia. Under the Romans it belonged to the province of Asia. The vessel in which Paul embarked at Caesarea for Rome was a ship of Adramyttium, about to sail to the places on the coast of Asia (Acts 27:2).

Ad'-ri-a (ăd'-rî-á). The name was derived from the commercial town of Adria on the lower Po, and in the narrowest sense it denoted only the neighboring part of the Adriatic Sea. But the name was extended to include the Tarentine Gulf, the Sicilian Sea, the Ionian Sea, the Corinthian Gulf, and even the waters between Crete and Malta, as in Acts 27:27.

Ad'-ri-el (ăd'-rî-ĕl) [(my) help is God]. A Meholahite, to whom Saul gave his daughter Merab in marriage, though he had previously promised her conditionally to David (I Sam. 18:19).

Ad'-ul'-lam (ăd'-dŭl'-ām) [retreat, refuge]. A town in the Shephelah, in the territory of Judah, mentioned between Jarmuth and Socoh (Josh. 15:35). It was in existence, inhabited by Canaanites, as early as the time of Jacob (Gen. 38:1, 2). A petty king ruled over it at the time of the conquest (Josh. 12:15). It was fortified by Rehoboam (II Chron. 11:7), continued to flourish in the time of Micah the prophet (Micah 1:15), and was inhabited after the Exile (Neh. 11:30; II Macc. 12:38). In its vicinity was the cave which David at one period of his wanderings made his headquarters, and whither his father and his brethren and many other adherents went down to join him (I Sam., ch. 22; II Sam. 23:13; Jos. Antiq. vi. 12, 3). An echo of the name probably still lingers in 'Aid el-Miyeh (Mā), but the primitive site is at Tell Sheikh Madhkūr about 9 miles e.n.e. of Beit Jibrin (Eleutheropolis). This hill dominates the wadi es-Sūr and the roads leading into the region of Beth-zur. It is not far from the place where David and Goliath fought.

Ad-ul'tery. 1. In a special sense, sexual intercourse of a married man with a female not his wife, or that of a married woman with a man not her husband. Polygamy, with inferior wives and concubines, is not adultery. Under the Mosaic Law adultery was punished with death (Lev. 20:10).

2. In a general sense, all sexual impurity in thought, word, or deed, or whatever tends thereto. This is the sense in the Seventh Commandment, interpreted on the principles of the Sermon on the Mount (Ex. 20:14; Deut. 5:18; Matt. 5:27, 28).

3. Figuratively, the worship of false gods or other infidelity to the covenant with Jehovah (Jer. 3:8, 9; Ezek. 23:37, 43; Hos. 2:2-13), God claiming our undivided affections, as a husband does the undivided regard of the woman who has sworn him fidelity.

Adum'mim (ă-dŭm'īm) [red objects]. The ascent of Adummim is a pass leading up from the Jordan Valley to the hill country. The boundary between Judah and Benjamin passed near it (Josh. 15:7; 18:17), and the shortest and most traveled road from Jerusalem to Jericho ran through it. It is the scene of our Saviour's parable of the Good Samaritan. Jerome ascribes the origin of the name to the blood frequently spilled there by robbers (cf. Luke 10:30); but it more probably arose from the red marl of the neighborhood. An echo of the name is still heard in Tal'at ed-Dumm, ascent of blood, the name given to a hill and fortress halfway between Jerusalem and Jericho, and to the wadi which the road follows downward.

Aeneas (ē-nē'ās) [Lat. from N. T. Gr. Aineas, classical Gr. Aineias; the name of a Trojan hero]. A man at Lydda bedridden 8 years with palsy. His restoration by the power of the risen Jesus resulted in large increase of the Church in that region (Acts 9:32-35).

Aenon (ē'nōn) [Gr. probably from Aram. 'Ēnāwān, fountains]. A village, or merely a locality of perennial springs, near Salim, where John at one time at least baptized because there was there much water (or, as in Gr., many waters) (John 3:23). The site has not been identified. But according to Jerome, Aenon and Salim were situated in the Jordan Valley, 8 Roman miles s. of Scythopolis. The names have ceased to be heard. Measurement indicates either the place now called ed-Deir, in the neighborhood of which are 7 springs and extensive ruins, or Umm el-'Amdān, hard by on the e., or the ruins and spring at the base of Tell Rīdghah, which, however, is only 7 Roman miles from Scythopolis.

The modern map can, indeed, show villages bearing the names of 'Ainūn and Salim. A town called Salim is situated 4 miles e. of Shechem, on an extensive plateau s. of Wadi Fār'ah. 'Ainūn is a ruin on the e. slope of Wadi Tubas, about 10 miles n.e. of Shechem and 4 miles n. of the Fār'ah Valley. The objection to identifying 'Ainūn with Aenon mentioned by John is that 'Ainūn is not near Salim. The villages are distant from each other about 8 miles, and Wadi Fār'ah lies between. 'Ainūn is but little farther from the important city of Shechem than from Salim, and is more closely connected with Shechem by road. Rejecting 'Ainūn, one thinks of the plentiful waters of the Fār'ah Valley but 3 miles distant from Salim, or even the 2 living springs which supply Salim with water; but a place of fountains near this Salim would be in Samaria, and it is scarcely probable that John the Baptist was laboring among the Samaritans (cf. Matt. 3:5; 10:5; Luke 3:3).

Another site proposed is Shilhim (in LXX Seleim), in the wilderness in the extreme s. of Judah, near which was a place called Ain (Josh. 15:32); but Ain is constantly connected with Rimmon and not with Shilhim.

More probable as a Judean site for Aenon is another Wadi Fār'ah, a secluded valley with copious springs about 6 miles n.e. of Jerusalem. The name Aenon has not survived in connection with these springs, but within 2 miles of them is another valley, Wadi Saleim.

Agabus (ăg'ă-bŭs). A Christian prophet of Jerusalem. He went to Antioch and predicted a great famine which took place in the days of the emperor Claudius (Acts 11:28; see Jos. Antiq. xx. 2, 6; 5, 2). When Paul passed through Caesarea on his last journey to Jerusalem, Agabus, who was there, bound his own hands and feet with Paul's girdle, and announced that this would be done also to the owner of the girdle when he reached the capital (Acts 21:10, 11).

Agag (ăg'ăg) [perhaps, flaming or violent]. Whether Agag was a title of the kings of Amalek, as Pharaoh was for those of Egypt, or was a recurring name in the royal line, is unknown. Specially: 1. A king of Amalek whose greatness was alluded to by Balaam (Num. 24:7).

2. The king of Amalek slain by Samuel, after he had been spared by Saul (I Sam. 15:9-33).

Ag'ag'ite (ăg'ă-gīt). An appellation given to Haman, the great enemy of the Jews (Esth. 3:1, 10; 8:3-5). Its reference to his Amalekite descent (Jos. Antiq. xi. 6, 5, and see AGAG) is extremely doubtful.

A'gar (ăg'ār). See HAGAR.

Ag'ate [Gr. achatēs, so named from a river in Sicily near which the agate abounded]. A precious stone composed of various kinds of colored quartz, especially of amethyst, chalcedony, and jasper. Two Hebrew words are so rendered: 1. Kadhōd, which means sparkling (Isa. 54:12; Ezek. 27:16, both A.V.). This characteristic ill accords with the agate, which in its natural state is wanting in luster; hence the R.V. translates it rubies, and the margin of the A.V., chrysoprase.

2. Shēbō; perhaps a loan word, Akkad. šubū, a precious stone, or derived from Psephō, an island s. of Meroë noted for its gems. It was the middle stone in the 3d row of gems on the high priest's breastplate (Ex. 28:19; 39:12).

Age. 1. The time counted by years, or more precisely by years, months, and days, that one has lived in the world. Extraordinary age is ascribed to men in the registers of Gen., chs. 5; 11; dwindling as the genealogy approaches Abraham; see CHRONOLOGY. Abraham died at the age of 175 (Gen. 25:7), and his wife Sarah at 127 (Gen. 23:1), Isaac at 180 (Gen. 35:28), Jacob at 147 (Gen. 47:28), Joseph at 110 (Gen. 50:26), Moses at 120 (Deut. 34:7), and Joshua at 110 (Josh. 24:29). The ordinary length of human life is reckoned at 70 years, or, by reason of strength, 80 years, in the prayer of Moses (Ps. 90:10). David died an old man at 70 (II Sam. 5:4; I Kings 2:11). Veneration for old age is inculcated in the Bible (Lev. 19:32; Prov. 20:29), and old age itself is considered a blessing (Ex. 20:12; Deut. 5:16).

2. A frequent rendering in the N. T. of the Gr. aiōn, whence Lat. aenon:

(a) A certain specified period of the world's history, past or future (I Cor. 10:11, in A.V. world; Eph. 2:7; 3:9; Col. 1:26; Heb. 6:5). More frequently it signifies an indefinitely long period of time, eternity past or to come; "unto the ages" being equivalent to "forever" (cf. text and marg., Luke 1:33; Rom. 1:25; 9:5; 11:36; Heb. 13:8), or "for evermore" (II Cor. 11:31). "The age of the ages" is "for ever and ever" (Eph. 3:21). "Unto the ages of ages" is also "for ever and ever" (Gal. 1:5; Phil. 4:20; Rev. 1:18).

(b) The world, literally (Heb. 1:2 marg.); or figuratively (Matt. 13:22; Luke 16:8; 20:34; Rom. 12:2; I Cor. 1:20; 2:6, 7, 8; II Cor. 4:4; Gal. 1:4; II Tim. 4:10; Titus 2:12—all marg.). The connecting link between (a) and (b) appears when "the world" means the duration of this world (Matt. 12:32; 13:40; 24:3), and of that to come (Mark 10:30; Luke 18:30; Heb. 2:5).

(c) The course of the world (Eph. 2:2 and marg.).

A'gee (ăg'ē) ['ăgē', perhaps, a fugitive]. A Hararite, the father of one of David's mighty men (II Sam. 23:11).

Ag'ri-cul'ture. The word does not occur in Scripture, but the idea does; and the analogous term "husbandry" is found in both O. T. and N. T., while husbandman is common. Adam was expected to dress the Garden of Eden (Gen. 2:15); Cain cultivated the soil (ch. 4:2); Noah planted a vineyard (ch. 9:20); and Isaac sowed (ch. 26:12). Agriculture was in an advanced stage among the ruling race in the delta of the Nile at the time of the sojourn of the Israelites in Egypt. Cereals of various kinds were cultivated and exported (Gen. 41:49, 57; 43:2). Wheat, rye, or rather spelt, and barley, are mentioned, besides which there were crops of flax (Ex. 9:31, 32). The crops cultivated by the Israelites were sometimes summed up as corn and wine (Gen. 27:37; Ps. 4:7). If a third agricultural product was named it was generally olives (Deut. 6:11). When the enumeration was more ample, the list was increased to wheat, barley, vines, fig trees, pomegranates, and olives (Deut. 8:8), not to speak of honey, which was from wild bees (cf. also Deut. 11:14; 12:17). To this list Isaiah adds figs (Isa. 28:25, 27), and Ezekiel beans, lentils, and millet (Ezek. 4:9). The Israelites had plows drawn by oxen (I Kings 19:19; Isa. 2:4), and pruning hooks, sickles, etc. (ibid.;

Now, however, appeared the most formidable prophet known in the history of Israel, Elijah the Tishbite. He was sent to Ahab to predict years of drought and famine as the punishment of Ahab's sin. Toward the close of the drought, which lasted 3 years and 6 months (I Kings 18:1; Luke 4:25; James 5:17), Elijah, by divine command, again confronted Ahab, and demanded that the prophets of Baal and he should meet on the top of Mount Carmel and submit the question between them to a decisive test. The meeting took place; Jehovah vindicated himself by sending fire from heaven to consume Elijah's sacrifice. By direction of the prophet the people who had witnessed the event and acknowledged Jehovah took the 450 prophets of Baal and 400 prophets of the Asherah down to the brook Kishon, and slew them. Jezebel, on learning what had been done, uttered imprecations against herself if Elijah were alive by the morrow. The prophet, fearing for his life, fled to Mount Horeb. God sent him back with the charge to anoint Hazael to be the king of Damascus and the scourge of idolatrous Israel, Jehu to be the king of Israel to supplant the family of Ahab and put down the worship of Baal by the power of the state, and Elisha to be prophet to destroy idolatry by moral suasion. The cup

An Ancient Plow

Deut. 16:9; Joel 3:13, etc.). The purpose now effected by rotation of crops was carried out by letting the land lie fallow every 7th year (Ex. 23:10, 11). Agriculture and the keeping of flocks and herds continued, through all the period of Scriptural history, the staple industries of Palestine, which was not to any considerable extent a commercial land.

A-grip'pa (á-grip'á). See HEROD.

A'gur (ā'gūr) [garnered, hireling, or collector]. Son of Jakeh, and author of the maxims contained in Prov., ch. 30 (see v. 1).

A'hab (ā'hāb) [father's brother]. 1. A king of Israel, and son and successor of Omri. He began to reign about 875 B.C., in the 38th year of Asa, king of Judah (I Kings 16:29). He married an idolatress, Jezebel, the daughter of Ethbaal, king of Sidon. She worshiped Baal, and since her husband was weak and irresolute, she ruled over him, and made him also a Baal worshiper (I Kings 16:30-33). This was a revolution in the national religion of Israel. When Jeroboam set up the two golden calves, he still desired to worship Jehovah nominally, using them as helps for the purpose. But Ahab, under Jezebel's influence, wholly gave up the adoration of Jehovah in favor of Baal. The intolerant Jezebel did not stop with Ahab's perversion, but attempted to force the whole people to adopt her faith. The prophets of Jehovah were sought out and slain. Only a remnant escaped, being hidden in a cave by a high functionary, Obadiah.

of iniquity of Ahab and Jezebel was made full to overflowing by the affair of Naboth's vineyard. About this time Ahab had won a victory over King Ben-hadad of Damascus, and had permitted that potentate, who had been captured, to escape with a treaty. The approach of Shalmaneser, king of Assyria, led to an alliance between the king of Damascus, Ahab of Israel, and other neighboring kings, to resist the invader. Ahab furnished 2,000 chariots and 10,000 infantry. The allies were defeated at Karkar, in the district of Hamath, in (854) 853 B.C. The war with Damascus was soon afterward renewed, and Ahab, taking advantage of a visit from Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, proposed a joint expedition for the recovery of Ramoth-gilead, beyond Jordan. The prophets of Baal spoke well of the enterprise, Micaiah, the only prophet of Jehovah obtainable, foreboded the death of Ahab. The man of doom resolved to go into the battle disguised, and he proposed that the king of Judah should put on his royal robes, thus becoming a mark for every missile. But a certain man drew a bow at a venture and smote Ahab between the joints where the plates of his armor met. Ahab died that evening, and the siege of Ramoth-gilead was raised. Ahab's chariot and armor were washed in the pool of Samaria, the dogs, as Elijah had predicted, licking his blood. Ahab died after a reign of 22 years, and was succeeded by his son Ahaziah (I Kings 16:29 to 22:40; II Chron. 18:1-34).

2. A lying and immoral prophet, a son of Kolaiah. Jeremiah predicted that Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, would roast him in the fire (Jer. 29:21-23).

A-har'ah (â-hâr'â). See AHIRAM. A son of Benjamin, probably the founder of a family (I Chron. 8:1), who is called Ehi (Gen. 46:21) and Ahiram (Num. 26:38).

A-har'hel (â-hâr'hël) [ety. doubtful: strength has tarried; or brother of Rachel]. A son of Harum, founder of a family which was enrolled in the tribe of Judah (I Chron. 4:8).

A-ha'sai (â-hâ'sî). See AHZAI.

A-has'bai (â-hâs'bî) [ety. uncertain; perhaps, I seek refuge with Jehovah]. A Maacathite, the father of Eliphelet, one of David's heroes (II Sam. 23:34). See UR, II.

A-has'u'e-rus (â-hâz'û-ê'rûs) [Old Pers. Xšayāršan, the chief of rulers]. 1. The father of Darius the Mede (Dan. 9:1). See DARIUS 1.

2. A Persian king, the husband of Esther (Esth. 1:2, 19; 2:16, 17). Ahasuerus, through the Greeks, is better known to us as Xerxes. The Book of Esther tells of his sensuality, his fickleness, his lack of forethought, his despotism, and his cruelty. Greek history presents essentially the same picture of Xerxes (Herod. vii. 35, 37; ix. 107). He was the son of Darius Hystaspis, whom he succeeded on the Persian throne, 486 B.C. His mother was Atossa, the daughter of Cyrus. In the 2d year of his reign he subdued the Egyptians, who had revolted against his father Darius. After about 4 years' preparation, he led an immense host to invade Greece; but fled back to Persia on seeing his great fleet defeated (480 B.C.) by a much smaller number of Greek ships at Salamis. The next year (479 B.C.) his general, Mardonius, whom he had left behind with an army, allowed his camp at Plataea to be forced by the Greeks, when such a slaughter ensued as rendered the Persian invasion hopeless. In 465 Xerxes was murdered by a courtier, and was succeeded on the throne by his son, Artaxerxes Longimanus. Xerxes is probably again mentioned as Ahasuerus in Ezra 4:6, where the author completes the history of Samaritan machinations at the Persian court against the Jews, resuming in v. 24 the narrative which he interrupted at v. 5. Ezra 4:7-23 obviously is out of chronological sequence and as regards the contents probably should follow ch. 10.

A-ha'va (â-hâ'vâ). A locality in Babylonia, doubtless to the n. of Babylon (Ezra 8:15). It serves to indicate the river or canal in its vicinity on which Ezra assembled the people who proposed to go to Jerusalem with him (cf. Ezra 7:28 with ch. 8:31). It appears to have been distant about 9 days from Babylon (chs. 7:9; 8:15, 31). On mustering the Jews who were present and finding no Levites, except priests, among them, Ezra sent for and secured a number of these ministers for the house of God. Here also a fast was kept, and the protection of God supplicated for the journey.

A'haz (â'hâz), in A. V. of N. T. A'chaz [He, i.e., Jehovah, has seized]. 1. A king of Judah who was proclaimed king when 20 years old, in succession to his father Jotham, about 736 B.C. He was an idolater, causing his son to pass through the fire, and sacrificing and burning incense on high places and under green trees (II Kings 16:3, 4). He was unsuccessfully besieged in Jerusalem by the army of Rezin, king of Syria, and Pekah, king of Israel (II Kings 16:5; Isa. 7:1). In connection with this crisis, before the invading force arrived, Isaiah was sent to exhort him to rely upon Jehovah and not to call in foreign aid. He did not believe, and refused to ask a sign. Thereupon the prophet uttered the celebrated prophecy relative to the birth of Immanuel (Isa. 7:1-16); see IMMANUEL. Ahaz turned to Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, and purchased his aid with the treasures of the Temple and the palace. Tiglath-pileser marched to his assistance. The approach of the Assyrians seems to have led Rezin and Pekah to raise the siege of Jerusalem. Tiglath-pileser attacked Philistia, overran Samaria, took Damascus and slew Rezin, and connived at the murder of Pekah and enthronement of Hoshea as king of Israel. With other vassals of Assyria, Ahaz went to Damascus to do homage to Tiglath-pileser (II Kings, ch. 16; II Chron., ch. 28). While there he admired a heathen altar, and had a facsimile of it made at Jerusalem. Ahaz died about the year 721 B.C., after reigning 16 years, and left his son Hezekiah to ascend the throne. Hosea, Micah, and Isaiah prophesied during the whole of Ahaz's reign, zealously witnessing for Jehovah (Isa. 1:1; 7:1-16; Hos. 1:1).

Ahaz is mentioned on the Assyrian monuments by the name Yauhazî, which corresponds to Heb. Jehoahaz, the full form of Ahaz. Ahaz means, "He has seized," while Jehoahaz signifies, "Jehovah has seized."

2. A descendant of Jonathan (I Chron. 8:35, 36; 9:42).

A'ha-zî'ah (â'hâ-zî'â) [Jehovah has seized].

1. A king of Israel who succeeded his father Ahab on the latter's death. His entire reign lasted only 2 years (I Kings 22:40, 51). He joined with Jehoshaphat in fitting out ships of Tarshish to go to Ophir for gold; but the vessels were wrecked at Ezion-geber. Ahaziah proposed a second attempt; but Jehoshaphat, warned by a prophet, declined (I Kings 22:48, 49; II Chron. 20:35-37). After the death of Ahab, Moab, under King Mesha, rebelled; but Ahaziah took no steps to reduce it to subjection (II Kings 1:1; 3:5). Ahaziah fell through a lattice in his palace, and was seriously injured. He sent to consult Baal-zebub, the god of Ekron, as to the result. Elijah intercepted the messengers, and sent them back with the message that the injury would prove fatal (II Kings 1:2-17). Ahaziah left no son to succeed him, so the throne passed over to his brother Jehoram (v. 17).

2. A king of Judah, who began to rule the kingdom about 843 B.C. (II Kings 9:29), apparently during his father's sickness (II Chron. 21:18, 19), and succeeded his father Joram or Jehoram the next year (II Kings 8:25). He was then 22 years old, and reigned only a year. His mother, Athaliah, was his evil genius (II Chron. 22:3). He went with Joram, king of Israel, to fight with the Syrians at Ramoth-gilead. Joram returned to Jezreel wounded, Ahaziah paid him a visit, was with him during the revolt of Jehu, and was killed with him by that ruthless soldier (II Kings 8:25-29; 9:16-29; II Chron. 22:1-10). By a reversal of the constituent parts of his name, he is called Jehoahaz in II Chron. 21:17. "Azariah" in II Chron. 22:6 (where 15 Hebrew manuscripts have Ahaziah) has probably arisen from Ahaziah through corruption of the text.

Ah'ban (â'hân) [the brother has discerned, given heed]. A man of Judah, family of Hezron, house of Jerahmeel (I Chron. 2:29).

A'her (â'hêr) [another]. A Benjamite (I Chron. 7:12). Margin identifies him with Ahiram. See AHARAH.

A'hi (â'hî), probably contraction of Ahijah. 1. Chief of the Gadites in Gilead in Bashan (I Chron. 5:15).

2. An Asherite, son of Shamer, of the family of Beriah (I Chron. 7:34).

A·hi'ah (â-hî'â) [See AHIAH.

A·hi'am (â-hî'âm) [perhaps, mother's brother]. One of David's mighty men (II Sam. 23:33).

A·hi'an (â-hî'ân) [perhaps, little brother]. A Manassite of the family of Shemida (I Chron. 7:19).

A·hi'e'zer (â-hî-e'zēr) [the (divine) brother is help]. 1. Son of Ammishaddai, and head of the tribe of Dan in the wilderness (Num. 1:12; 2:25; 7:66).

2. A man of Gibeah who joined David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:3).

A·hi'hud (â-hî'hūd) [the (divine) brother is majesty]. 1. The prince representing the tribe of Asher on the commission to divide the land (Num. 34:27).

2. Head of a father's house in Geba of Benjamin (I Chron. 8:7).

A·hi'jah (â-hî'jâ) [in A.V. sometimes A·hi'ah (viz. 1, 3, 6) [Jehovah is a brother]. 1. A Benjamite who assisted in carrying off inhabitants of Geba (I Chron. 8:7). See AHOAH.

2. A man of Judah descended through Jerahmeel (I Chron. 2:25).

3. A son of Ahitub, and great-grandson of Eli. He at one time in the reign of Saul performed the functions of high priest at Gibeah (I Sam. 14:3, 18). He is probably to be identified with Ahimelech, the son of Ahitub, but he may have been his elder brother.

4. A Pelonite, one of David's mighty men (I Chron. 11:36).

5. A Levite who in David's reign was over the treasures of the tabernacle and the dedicated offerings (I Chron. 26:20; but see marg.).

6. A scribe in Solomon's reign (I Kings 4:3).

7. A prophet belonging to Shiloh, who, meeting Jeroboam, rent his own garment in 12 pieces, and directed Jeroboam to take 10, as an indication that he should be king over 10 tribes (I Kings 11:29-39). After Jeroboam had become king, he sent his queen disguised to the now aged and half-blind prophet to inquire whether their child who was sick would recover. Ahijah recognized her under her disguise, and predicted that the child would die (I Kings 14:1-18). He committed his prophecies to writing (II Chron. 9:29).

8. The father of Baasha, king of Israel (I Kings 15:27, 33).

9. A chief of the people who set his seal to the covenant to keep the law of God (Neh. 10:26; in R.V. irregularly Ahiah).

A·hi'kam (â-hî'kām) [the (divine) brother is risen]. Son of Shaphan and a prince of Judah (II Kings 22:12). He protected Jeremiah when priests and false prophets demanded Jeremiah's death (Jer. 26:24). He was the father of Gedaliah (II Kings 25:22).

A·hi'lud (â-hî'lūd) [a brother is born, or child's brother]. Father of the recorder Jehoshaphat (II Sam. 8:16; 20:24; I Kings 4:3), and quite likely the same as the father of Solomon's purveyor Baana (I Kings 4:12).

A·him'a'az (â-hîm'â-âz) [the brother is wrath]. 1. Father of Ahinoam, Saul's wife (I Sam. 14:50).

2. A son of Zadok, high priest in David's time. He and Jonathan, Abiathar's son, maintained communication between David and the loyal party in Jerusalem during Absalom's rebellion (II Sam. 15:27, 36; 17:20). He was the first to bring David intelligence of the victory over Absalom (II Sam. 18:19-30). It may have been he who was afterward Solomon's purveyor in Naphtali (I Kings 4:15).

A·hi'man (â-hî'mān) [the brother is fortune]. 1. A son of Anak, and probably founder of a family of Anakim (Num. 13:22), the Nephilim (Num. 13:33; see GIANT), driven from Hebron by Caleb (Josh. 15:14; Judg. 1:10).

2. A Levite who acted as porter of the house of God (I Chron. 9:17).

A·him'e'lech (â-hîm'e'lēk) [the (divine) brother is king]. 1. A son of Ahitub, and chief priest at Nob. David, fleeing from Saul, but pretending to be on the king's business, being in great want of food, received from him the showbread, which, by the law, was a perquisite of the priests. He also obtained the sword which had formerly belonged to Goliath (I Sam. 21:1-9; in Mark 2:26 the event is dated in the time of Abiathar, Ahimelech's son). Doeg the Edomite reported the occurrence to Saul, who, interpreting it as a proof that Ahimelech and the other priests were treacherous, gave orders that they should be slain. One inhabitant of Nob—Abiathar, a son of Ahimelech—escaped from the massacre (I Sam. 21:7; 22:7-23; title of Psalm 52).

2. The son of the Abiathar who escaped from the slaughter at Nob, and the grandson of Ahimelech, son of Ahitub. He was one of 2 high priests during David's reign (II Sam. 8:17; I Chron. 24:3, 6, 31). Ahimelech in I Chron. 18:16 is probably a copyist's error for Ahimelech.

3. A Hittite, and follower of David (I Sam. 26:6).

A·hi'moth (â-hî'mōth) [the brother is death]. A Levite, a son of Elkanah (I Chron. 6:25).

A·hin'a'dab (â-hîn'â-dāb) [the (divine) brother is generous]. Solomon's purveyor in Mahanaim (I Kings 4:14).

A·hin'o'am (â-hîn'o'-ām) [the (divine) brother is pleasantness]. 1. Saul's wife, a daughter of Ahimaaz (I Sam. 14:50).

2. A woman of Jezreel, one of David's wives (I Sam. 25:43; 27:3), taken captive at Ziklag by the Amalekites (I Sam. 30:5). She was the mother of Amnon (II Sam. 3:2).

A·hi'o (â-hî'o) [little brother]. 1. A son of Abinadab and brother of Uziah. The two drove the cart on which David was taking the Ark to Jerusalem (II Sam. 6:3, 4).

2. A Benjamite, son of Elpaal (I Chron. 8:14).

3. A Benjamite, son of Jehiel by his wife Maachah (I Chron. 8:29, 31; 9:35, 37).

A·hi'ra (â-hî'râ) [ety. uncertain; the brother is evil or Ra (an Egyptian sun-god) is a brother]. A son of Enan, and head of the tribe of Naphtali during the early journeyings in the wilderness (Num. 1:15; 2:29; 7:78; 10:27).

A·hi'ram (â-hî'rām) [the (divine) brother is exalted]. 1. A Benjamite, founder of a family (Num. 26:38). Aharah (I Chron. 8:1) doubtless represents the same name; and Ehi (Gen. 46:21) is probably a corruption, as the last syllable of Ahiram was easily overlooked by a copyist by reason of the recurrence of similar Hebrew letters in the two following names.

A·his'a'mach (â-hîs'â-māk) [the (divine) brother has supported, sustained]. A Danite, the father of the craftsman Aholiab (Ex. 31:6).

A·his'h'a-har (â-hîsh'â-hār) [the (divine) brother is the dawn]. A man descended from Benjamin through Jedaiel and Bilhan (I Chron. 7:10).

A·hi'shar (â-hî'shār) [the (divine) brother is a singer or is straight, upright]. An official who was over Solomon's household (I Kings 4:6).

A·hith·o·phel (á-hîth'ô-fêl) [ety. uncertain; perhaps, the brother is folly]. A resident of Giloh in s.w. Judah, one of David's counselors (II Sam. 15:12), father of one of David's mighty men (II Sam. 23:34), and perhaps the grandfather of Bath-sheba (cf. II Sam. 11:3 with ch. 23:34). So unerring was his sagacity that his advice was "as if a man inquired at the oracle of God" (II Sam. 16:23), but he was morally untrustworthy. Absalom found him ready to betray David, and to point out how he might be destroyed. When Absalom preferred the absurd counsel of Hushai, who was secretly in David's interest, Ahithophel, foreboding that it was therefore all over with the rebellion, committed suicide (II Sam. 15:12, 31-34; 16:15; 17:23).

A·hi'tub (á-hî'tüb) [the (divine) brother is goodness]. 1. A son of Phinehas, and grandson of Eli (I Sam. 14:3), and father of Ahimelech, the priest (I Sam. 22:9).

2. A son of Amariah, and father of Zadok, the priest (II Sam. 8:17; I Chron. 6:7, 8).

3. A later priest in the same family, son of another Amariah, and grandfather of another Zadok, also a priest (I Chron. 6:11, 12; Neh. 11:11).

Ah'lab (ä'láb) [a fat, fruitful place]. A town within the territory of Asher, from which that tribe did not drive out the Canaanite inhabitants (Judg. 1:31). Probably the names Ahlab and Helbah are a doublet and are equivalent to Assy. Maḥaliba, modern Khirbet el-Maḥalib, about 4 miles n.e. of Tyre.

Ah'tai (ä'ti) [O that!]. 1. A descendant (daughter?) of Sheshan (I Chron. 2:31, 34), but the name may be gentilic and not the name of an individual.

2. Father of Zabad (I Chron. 11:41).

A·ho'ah (á-hô'á). A Benjamite of the family of Bela (I Chron. 8:4); perhaps Ahijah (1). See AHOHITE.

A·ho'hite (á-hô'hî't). A descendant of Ahoah (II Sam. 23:9, 28; I Chron. 11:12, 29).

A·ho'lah (á-hô'lá). See OHOLAH.

A·ho'li'ab (á-hô'lî'áb). See OHOLIAH.

A·hol'i'bah (á-hô'lî'bá). See OHOLIBAH.

A·hol'i'ba'mah (á-hô'lî'bá'má). See OHOLIBAMAH.

A·hu'mai (á-hû'mî) [perhaps, brother of water]. A descendant of Judah (cf. I Chron. 4:2 with ch. 2:18, 19, 50).

A·huz'zam (á-hûz'ám), in A. V. A·hu'zam (á-hûz'ám) [possession]. A man of Judah, son of Ashhur, of the family of Hezron (cf. I Chron. 4:5, 6 with ch. 2:24).

A·huz'zath (á-hûz'áth) [possession]. A friend of Abimelech, king of Gerar, in Isaac's time (Gen. 26:26). See FRIEND OF THE KING.

Ah'zai (ä'zi), in A. V. A·ha'sai, contraction of Ahaziah. A priest descended from Immer through Meshillemoth (Neh. 11:13); probably the person called Jahzerah in I Chron. 9:12.

A'i (ä'i), in A. V. in Genesis Ha'i, which includes the Hebrew article [ruins]. Aijah and Aiath (Neh. 11:31; Isa. 10:28) are feminine forms of the word.

1. A town e. of Beth-el and near Beth-aven, with a valley on its n. (Gen. 12:8; Josh. 7:2; 8:11). It lay n. of Michmash, if Aiath is the same as Ai, as it probably is. Its site was apparently near the modern Deir Diwan, on the ancient road between Michmash and Beth-el, about midway between the two places. Three quarters of a mile n.w. of Deir Diwan is the ruin et-Tell, the heap (cf. Josh. 8:28). At first Ai was unsuccessfully attacked by Joshua (Josh. 7:2-5). When it was found that the defeat was caused by the sin of Achan, and when he had suffered for it, Ai was again attacked, and this time was taken by stratagem. Its inhabitants, numbering about 12,000, were slaughtered, its king was hanged on a tree, and the city was burned (Josh. chs. 7; 8). It lay in ruins until some time after the account in Joshua was written (Josh. 8:28), but ultimately was rebuilt (Isa. 10:28; Ezra 2:28).

2. A city of the Ammonites, apparently not far from Heshbon (Jer. 49:3).

A·i'ah (ä-i'á), in A. V. once A'jah [falcon].

1. A Horite, son of Zibeon and brother of Anah (Gen. 36:24; I Chron. 1:40).

2. The father of Rizpah, Saul's concubine (II Sam. 3:7; 21:8, 10, 11).

A·i'ath (ä-i'áth). See AI.

A·i'ja (ä-i'já), A·i'jah (ä-i'já). See AI.

Ai'ja-lon (ä'já-lön), in A. V. occasionally Aja-lon [place of harts]. 1. A village of the Shephelah, near a valley (Josh. 10:12; II Chron. 28:18), mentioned as Aialuna in the Tell el-Amarna letters. It corresponds to Yalo, a village 14 miles n.w. of Jerusalem, on a low spur, looking n. over a beautiful plain. It was assigned to the tribe of Dan, which did not expel the Amorite inhabitants (Judg. 1:34, 35). Aijalon was designated to be a Levitical city for the Kohathites (Josh. 21:20, 24; I Chron. 6:69). After the secession of the 10 tribes, it was included in Benjamin, and was fortified by Rehoboam (I Chron. 8:13; II Chron. 11:10); but in the time of Ahaz it was captured by the Philistines (II Chron. 28:18).

2. A place in the tribe of Zebulun, where the judge Elon was buried (Judg. 12:12). Exact site unknown, but Khirbet el-Lön and Tell el-Buṭmeh in the Sahel el-Baṭṭauf (Plain of Asochis) have been proposed.

Ai'je-leth hash-Sha'här (ä'jê-lêth hâsh-shä'här) in A. V., with omission of the Heb. article, Ai'je-leth Sha'här (ä'jê-lêth shä'här) [hind of the dawn]. Probably a tune, to which the chief musician was directed to set the Twenty-second Psalm (Psalm 22, title).

A'in (ä'en). See AYIN.

A'jah (ä'já). See ALAH.

Aja-lon (ä'já-lön). See AIJALON.

A'kan (ä'kän). See JAAKAN.

A·kel'da-ma (ä-kêl'dá-má), in A. V. A·eel'da-ma [Gr. from Aram., field of blood]. A parcel of ground known as the potter's field. The priests purchased it with the 30 pieces of silver which Judas cast down in the Temple. They designed it to be a burial place for strangers (Matt. 27:7). The Greek spelling Akeldama represents Aram. ḥākēl demā, field of blood. The better attested Greek reading (H)akeldamach is from the same Aramaic source with the addition in Greek of ch, which shows the noun as indeclinable. Cf. Iōsēch (Luke 3:26) and Setrach (Ecclus. 50:27). The plot of ground, which was bought with the price of blood, and which was the place where Judas hanged himself, was accordingly well called the field of blood (Matt. 27:8; Acts 1:19). Peter alludes to Judas as acquiring the field (Acts 1:18, 19). Probably he does not mean that it was purchased by Judas in person, but by the priests with Judas' ill-gotten money. The traditional site, dating from the time of Jerome in the 4th century, is on the s. side of the Valley of Hinnom. This identification is not improbable, for the locality is one which can furnish potter's clay, and has long been surrendered to burial purposes. Many crusaders were subsequently buried there. Its modern name is Ḥākḥ ed-Dumm.

Ak'kad (äk'äd). See ACCAD.

Ak'kub (ăk'ûb) [follower, cunning]. 1. A descendant of Shecaniah through Elioenai (I Chron. 3:21, 24).

2. A Levite who founded a family of Temple porters known by his name (I Chron. 9:17; Ezra 2:42; Neh. 11:19; 12:25).

3. The head of a family of the Nethinim (Ezra 2:45).

4. A Levite who helped to expound the Law (Neh. 8:7).

Ak'ra-bat-ti'ne (ăk'ră-bă-tî'nê). A place in Idumaea (I Macc. 5:3), probably Akkrabbim.

Ak-rab'bim (ăk-răb'im), in A.V. once Ae-rab'bim (ăk-răb'im) (Josh. 15:3) [scorpions]. An ascent on the s.e. frontier of Judah near the s. point of the Dead Sea, and not far from the desert of Zin (Num. 34:4; Josh. 15:3; Judg. 1:36).

Al'a-bas'ter [Gr. alabastros, alabastos, which is of uncertain origin]. The material of which the cruse was made from which Jesus was anointed at Bethany (Matt. 26:7; Mark 14:3; cf. Luke 7:37). Alabaster commonly denotes massive gypsum of a fine-grained variety, white in color, and delicately shaded. Being more easily worked than marble, it can be made into columns or turned on the lathe into cups, boxes, basins, or vases. Anciently, alabaster denoted any stone suitable for working into such utensils. Most of the extant ancient ointment flasks are made of a light-gray translucent limestone.

Al'a-meth (ăl'ă-mêth). See ALEMETH.

Al'am'me-lech (ă-lăm'ê-lêk). See ALLAME-LECH.

Al'a-moth (ăl'ă-môth) [maidens]. A musical term (I Chron. 15:20; Psalm 46, title). It probably refers to maiden or soprano voices, but the meaning is very uncertain.

Al'ci-mus (ăl'sî-mûs) [Gr., strong; probably for Heb. Eliakim]. A high priest appointed by Antiochus Eupator (II Macc. 14:3, 7; Jos. Antiq. xii. 9, 7), confirmed by Demetrius I in 162 B.C. (I Macc. 7:5-9), and installed by Bacchides at the head of an army (vs. 10-20). He was entirely Greek in sympathy, and was abhorred by the Jews. He was driven out of Palestine by Judas Maccabaeus (I Macc. 7:21-25); but was brought back by Bacchides (ch. 9:1), and destroyed the inner wall of the Temple, 160 B.C. (v. 54). His sudden death soon afterward was regarded by the Jews as a punishment for the impious act (vs. 55, 56).

Al'e-ma (ăl'ê-mă). A town in Gilead (I Macc. 5:26), conjectured to be 'Almā or 'Ilmā, 10 miles s. w. of Buṣr el-Ḥariri.

Al'e-meth (ăl'ê-mêth), in A.V. once Al'a-meth; the Hebrew pronunciation, in the latter instance, due merely to the fact that the name stands in pause in the sentence (I Chron. 7:8) [concealment]. 1. A Benjamite, descended through Becher (I Chron. 7:8).

2. A descendant of King Saul (I Chron. 8:36; 9:42).

3. A town (I Chron. 6:60); R.V. Al'le-meth. See ALMON.

Al'eph (ăl'êf) [ox]. The 1st letter of the Hebrew alphabet. Greek alpha, whence English a, is derived from this letter, but Hebrew aleph is a consonant, having no representative in English. In the spelling of Hebrew names in the English Bible it does not appear. It is the initial letter, for example, in the original of the words Edom, Ophir, and Ur. In transliteration it is represented by the apostrophe (').

Al'eph stands at the head of the first section of Psalm 119, since in the original each verse of the section begins with this letter.

Al'ex'an'der (ăl'êg-zăn'dêr) [Gr., defending men]. 1. Alexander the Great, king of Macedonia, who followed his father Philip. He began to reign 336 B.C. After quelling disturbances at home, he crossed the Hellespont to attack the Persians, whom he met and defeated at the Granicus, and again at Issus on the n.e. corner of the Mediterranean Sea. After the Battle of Issus, Alexander took Damascus, which contained great treasure, and Sidon, and laid siege to Tyre. From there he sent to the Jewish high priest Jaddua, demanding his allegiance and supplies for his army. Jaddua refused on the ground of being subject to the Persian king. Angry at this answer, Alexander set out in person for Jerusalem as soon as he had reduced Tyre. According to Josephus, the Jews were in terror at his approach, but Jaddua threw open the gates and went in full priestly robes to meet the conqueror, who fell at his feet in worship of the God whom Jaddua represented. He explained that before he left Macedonia he had seen in a dream the Deity in the garb of this high priest, and had been promised victory over Persia. He granted the Jews many special privileges (Jos. Antiq. xi. 8, 5). From Palestine he went on to Egypt, where he founded Alexandria; he then returned through Palestine to Persia, where he overthrew the Persian king Darius Codomannus. After further conquests he died in Babylon in 323 B.C., aged 33. After his death, dissensions soon arose among the generals, and all the members of Alexander's family were made away with. Finally 4 generals ruled separate provinces: Ptolemy in Egypt, Seleucus in Babylonia, Cassander in Macedonia, and Lysimachus in Thrace.

Antigonus had attempted to maintain the unity of the empire, but he was defeated by these 4 men in the Battle of Ipsus in 301 B.C., where he lost his life. The empire was then split into a number of parts, the 3 most important of which were Syria, with all the eastern provinces and a portion of Asia Minor; Egypt; and Macedonia. The Seleucidae, or dynasty of Seleucus, established themselves in Syria; the Ptolemies, or Lagidae, ruled Egypt; Macedonia, of which Greece was a dependency, became, after much strife and bloodshed, the kingdom of the Antigonidae, the descendants of Antigonus.

2. Alexander Balas, a pretender, who claimed to be the son of Antiochus Epiphanes. By the help of Ptolemy, king of Egypt, whose daughter Cleopatra he married, he reigned over Syria 150-146 B.C. He proved incapable of holding the kingdom and, betrayed by Ptolemy, was easily driven out by Demetrius II. He appointed Jonathan Maccabaeus high priest and sued for the help of the Jews (I Macc. 10:1, 18-20; Jos. Antiq. xlii. 2, 1; 4, 8).

3. A son of Simon of Cyrene (Mark 15:21).

4. A member of the high priestly family at Jerusalem when Peter and John were tried there (Acts 4:6).

5. A defender brought forward by the Jews during the tumult at Ephesus (Acts 19:33).

6. One who "made shipwreck concerning the faith," blasphemed, and was excommunicated by Paul (I Tim. 1:19, 20).

7. Alexander the coppersmith, who did the apostle and his associates much injury (II Tim. 4:14, 15).

Al'ex'an'dri'a (äl'ëg-zän'drî-ä) [named after its founder]. A city founded by Alexander the Great, in the year 332 B.C., on the n. coast of Egypt, of which it was designed to be the Greek metropolis. A site was fortunately selected w. of the mouths of the Nile, and the Mediterranean current which sweeps from the w. carries the mud of the river away from the harbor and prevents silting. The city was built on a tongue of land lying between the Mediterranean Sea and Lake Mareotis, and connected by a mole with the Isle of Pharos, on which there was a celebrated lighthouse. The city was admirably situated for commercial purposes. It became the great port for the export of Egyptian wheat, cargoes destined for Rome being carried direct to Puteoli, unless unfavorable winds compelled the vessels to coast along Asia Minor (Acts 27:6; 28:11-13). It was also the mart of interchange between the Orient and the Occident. The city flourished greatly under the Ptolemies, and subsequently under the Romans, until it extended along the coast 15 miles by a breadth of one. During the time that the old Roman Empire was dominant, Alexandria was considered the 2d city of the empire, having a population of 600,000 or 700,000. Its inhabitants were drawn from many nationalities—Greeks, Egyptians, Jews, Romans—who used the Greek language as the medium of communication. The different peoples occupied, as a rule, different quarters of the city. The Jews resided in the n.e. part, enjoyed equal rights with the other citizens, and were governed by their own ethnarch (Jos. Antiq. xix. 5, 2; War ii. 18, 7). The Ptolemies founded a museum with a renowned library of several hundred thousand volumes, and the city was looked upon as one of the greatest intellectual centers in the world. The translation of the Hebrew Scriptures into Greek was begun in Egypt, probably in this city, in the 3d century, and completed by the 2d century, B.C. Here, too, the spirit of Greek philosophy permeated Judaism, and exegetes like Philo arose who excessively allegorized Scripture. The Jews of Alexandria had their own synagogue in Jerusalem, and were among the persecutors of Stephen (Acts 2:10; 6:9); but the teaching of John the Baptist and the knowledge of Jesus also gained entrance into Alexandria, and under God produced such men as Apollos (Acts 18:24, 25). Tradition ascribes the planting of the Christian Church in Alexandria to the Evangelist Mark. In the early Christian ages the city was the seat of a celebrated Christian catechetical school, with such teachers as Clement and Origen, and the home of bishops like Hesychius and Athanasius.

Al-lam'me'leah (äl-läm'ë-lëk) in A.V. A-lam' me'leah [perhaps, oak of Melech (the king)]. A village of Asher (Josh. 19:26). The wadi el-Melech, which drains the waters of the plain of el-Battöf into the Kishon opposite Mount Carmel, may possibly echo the name.

Al'le-lu'ia. See HALLELUJAH.

Al'le-meth (äl'ë-mëth). See ALMON.

Al'lon (äl'lön) [an oak]. A Simeonite, descended from Shemalah (I Chron. 4:37).

In Josh. 19:33 Allon is not a proper name, as in A.V., but a common noun, the oak or terebinth of Bezaananim. In Judg. 4:11, A.V., plain should be oak or terebinth. See ZAANANNIM, BEZAANANIM.

Al'lon-bac'uth (äl'lön-bäk'üth), in A.V. Al'lon-bach'uth (äl'lön-bäk'üth) [oak of weeping]. An oak near Beth-el under which Deborah, Rebekah's nurse, was buried (Gen. 35:8).

Al'mo'dad (äl-mö'däd) [LXX Elmōdad, God is a friend; cf. Arab. wadda, to love]. A people descended from Shem through Joktan (Gen. 10:26; I Chron. 1:20). They doubtless settled in the s. of Arabia.

Al'mon (äl'mön) [something hidden]. A village within the territory of Benjamin, assigned to the priests (Josh. 21:18). In I Chron. 6:60 it is called Allemeth (Alemeth). Both names have the same root. Its site is Khirbet 'Almit, a mound between Geba and Anathoth.

Al'mon-dib'la-tha'im (äl'mön-dib'lä-thä'im). A station of the Israelites between the Arnon and Shittim (Num. 33:46); probably same as Beth-diblathaim. It has been identified with Deileilat el-Gharbiyeh, a town commanding 3 roads, 2½ miles n.e. of Libb.

Al'mond. A tree and its fruit (Gen. 43:11; Eccl. 12:5), called in Hebrew shākēd, the awakening one, probably because it is the first tree to awake from the sleep of winter, i.e., to blossom in the spring. It is the Amygdalus communis of botanists. In Palestine it is found on Lebanon, Hermon, and in most of the region beyond Jordan. The town of Luz in the hill country of Ephraim derived its name from the almond. The tree grew also in Mesopotamia (Gen. 30:37, R. V.). There are two varieties, the bitter and the sweet; the former has white flowers, the latter roseate. Almonds were sent by Jacob to the Egyptian dignitary (Gen. 43:11). The cups on the branches of the golden candlestick were modeled after almond blossoms (Ex. 25:33, 34). When the rod marked with Aaron's name budded it brought forth almond blossoms (Num. 17:8). The rod of an almond tree, which Jeremiah saw in his earliest vision, signified symbolically Jehovah's wakefulness (Jer. 1:11, 12). The white hairs on the head of the aged are probably compared to the white flower of the bitter almond tree (Eccl. 12:5).

Al'mug, in II Chron. Al'gum [perhaps from Sans. valgu, valgum]. A timber brought in abundance by sea from Ophir during the reign of Solomon. It was used to make pillars or balustrades, as also harps and psalteries (I Kings 10:11, 12; II Chron. 9:10, 11). It is generally supposed to be red sandalwood (Pterocarpus Santalinus). According to Josephus, it resembles the wood of the fig tree, but is whiter and shines more (Jos. Antiq. viii. 7, 1). It may accordingly be the Santalum album of botanists. The tree is a native of India and the Eastern islands. If found on Lebanon (II Chron. 2:8) it must have been introduced there. The wood, which is odoriferous, is burned to perfume temples and private houses both in India and in China.

Al'oes. Not the botanical genus Aloe, consisting of succulent plants belonging to the order Liliaceae, and furnishing a bitter purgative medicine. The chief value of the Scriptural plant is evidently its fragrance (Ps. 45:8; Prov. 7:17; S. of Sol. 4:14). It seems to be Agallocha, called by a name derived from an Indian dialect: cf. Sans. aguru, Pali agaru, agalu. From one of these words, or a cognate, the Heb. 'ahālim and 'ahāloth are probably a corruption. The species Aquilaria agallocha grows in Sylhet, in the e. of Bengal, and at Tennasserim, in the Eastern Peninsula. It is a large tree, having alternate lanceolate leaves, a leathery calyx, no petals, ten stamens, and a two-celled seed vessel. The wood contains a resin, and an essential oil, which constitutes the perfume for which it is prized in the East. It is the lignaloes of Num. 24:6, and the aloes of John 19:39, one of the kinds of spice with which Nicodemus designed to anoint the body of our Lord.

A'loth (ā'lōth). The name of a place (A.V. and R.V. marg.) known only as constituting with Asher one of the 12 districts from which Solomon drew provisions (I Kings 4:16). This reading understands b in bē'ālōth as the preposition in, while R.V. regards the expression as one word, Bealoth, q.v.

Al'pha (āl'fā). The first letter in the Greek alphabet; derived from the Phoenician, and corresponding to the Hebrew letter aleph. Omega is the last letter of the Greek alphabet. "I am Alpha and Omega" means "I am the first and the last" of beings (Rev. 1:8, 11; 21:6; 22:13; cf. Isa. 44:6).

Al'pha-bet [from alpha+beta, the first two letters of the Greek alphabet]. The history of writing holds a very important place in the development of civilization. Even in prehistoric times man gave concrete expression to his thoughts by drawing pictures. Thus he was able to depict a great number of ideas. In the course of time, these pictures lost their original form and became conventionalized, but in many cases the outline of the earlier picture remained obvious. From these more or less standardized pictograms were developed sense signs or ideograms, sound signs or phonograms or syllabic signs, and determinatives, all of which are grouped under the term of hieroglyphs in Egyptian writing.

Modern scholars trace the origin of our alphabet from the Egyptian hieroglyphs. Sometime before 3000 B.C. the Egyptians had evolved 24 letters or uniconsonantal signs, which constituted an incipient alphabet. It was used, however, only as a supplement to the cumbersome hieroglyphic system.

In 1904-1905 some inscriptions were discovered at Serābit el-Khādem on the Sinai peninsula, about 50 miles from Mount Sinai; these are known as the proto-Sinaitic inscriptions and date from the end of the 19th or the beginning of the 18th century B.C. There is a fairly unanimous agreement among scholars that the language of these inscriptions is Semitic and that the characters are a pure alphabet. It is believed that the proto-Sinaitic characters are derived from the Egyptian hieroglyphs by the principle of acrophony: each sign was given a phonetic value corresponding to the initial sound of its Semitic name. Thus beth, house, represents the sound of b; gimel, camel, g, etc. The proto-Sinaitic alphabet apparently is the link between the Egyptian hieroglyphs and the Phoenician alphabet.

A number of inscriptions from the 17th to the 12th century B.C. show the development from the proto-Sinaitic to the Phoenician. In the Ras Shamra tablets we have a type of cuneiform which had been adapted to alphabetic purposes before the 14th century B.C. on the analogy of the Phoenician alphabet. The famous Ahiram epitaph from Byblos (Gabal) in the early Phoenician alphabet is dated about 1100 B.C. The inscription on the Mesha or Moabite stone (c. 850 B.C.) is written in a similar alphabet. The Siloam inscription (c. 700 B.C.) shows slight variations in the formation of some of the characters. The Lachish letters contemporary with the final siege of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar furnish us with valuable epigraphic material; a schoolboy's scratching of the first five letters of the Hebrew-Phoenician alphabet on a step in Lachish shows that the alphabet was studied in its conventional order as early as the 7th century B.C. The Elephantine papyri written in Aramaic date from the 5th century B.C. The Samaritans retained an alphabet which resembles the Phoenician or Old Hebrew, while the Jews between the 6th and 4th century B.C. gradually adopted the Aramaic alphabet, which had grown out of the Phoenician. From the Aramaic script developed the square characters in which Hebrew Bibles are now printed.

The Greek alphabet was derived from the Phoenician; the tradition that Cadmus brought letters into Greece from Phoenicia has therefore a historical basis. The Greek alphabet developed into two types: the Eastern and the Western. From the latter was derived the Latin alphabet, which is what we now use in English. See table of alphabets.

Alphaëus (āl-fē'ūs) [Lat. from Gr., probably from Aram. Hilpai, or Ἰλπᾱ, Ἰλπᾱ; meaning uncertain]. 1. The husband of one of the Marys, and father of James the Less and Josés (Matt. 10:3; Mark 15:40); often identified with Clopas, in A.V. Cleophas (John 19:25; Mark 15:40). While their identification has the support of tradition and appears probable, it remains doubtful and cannot be proved. See JAMES 2.

2. The father of Levi or Matthew (Mark 2:14; cf. Matt. 9:9).

Altar. An elevated structure on which incense is burned or sacrifice offered to the deity. It might be a mound of earth; or a huge stone or a platform built of several stones, dressed or undressed; or an object of similar shape made of metal. In patriarchal times, worshippers reared altars wherever they pitched their tents or had special occasion to sacrifice to

Worshipping at an Altar of Stones

God (Gen. 8:20; 12:7; 22:9; 35:1, 7; Ex. 17:15; 24:4). The fundamental law of the Hebrew altar, which was embodied in the theocratic covenant and was given at Sinai before the tabernacle was built, enjoined the erection of an altar of earth or stone wherever Jehovah should manifest himself. This law was the primary warrant for the altars at the tabernacle and Temple, where Jehovah's presence continually was, and for the transient altars and sacrifices on occasions of theophanies (Judg. 2:5, etc.).

The tabernacle had two altars: 1. The brazen altar or altar of burnt offering, which stood in the outer court and directly in front of the door of the tabernacle. It was 5 cubits square and 3 high. It consisted of a hollow frame of acacia wood overlaid with brass, and it was furnished with rings and staves that it might be transported from place to place. On its upper corners were projections called horns. It was without steps, but had a ledge around it, midway between the bottom and the top for the priests to stand on. It was probably intended to be filled with earth. All sacrifices were offered at this altar. Its position at the very threshold taught distinctly that man has no access to Jehovah except as a sinner atoned for by blood (Ex. 27:1-8; 30:28; 38:30; 40:29; cf. I Kings 1:50; Ps. 118:27). 2. The golden altar, or altar of incense, which stood in the Holy Place before the veil that hung before the mercy seat. It was a cubit square and 2 cubits high, and was made of acacia wood overlaid with gold, with a border of gold about its top, horns at its corners, and 2 golden rings at each side for staves. Incense of prescribed ingredients, lighted by fire from the brazen altar, was burned on it morning and evening when the light of the candlestick was seen to. It symbolized the obligatory and acceptable adoration of God by his people (Ex. 30:1-10, 28, 34-37; 40:5; cf. Heb. 9:4 and I Kings 6:22; Lev. 16:18, 19). When Solomon's Temple was built, the new brazen altar had nearly 4 times the dimensions of the old (I Kings 8:64; II Chron. 4:1). A new golden altar was also made (I Kings 7:48; II Chron. 4:19).

These were the only permanent altars on which sacrifices or incense could be acceptably offered (Deut. 12:2, 5, 6, 7). But the rearing of altars and offering of sacrifice in other places where God manifested himself was authorized by the fundamental law; and the privilege was embraced, as for example, by the Israelites at Bochim, by Gideon, by Manoah (Judg. 2:1-5; 6:20-25; 13:15-23). And Joshua erected an altar on Mount Ebal to serve for a single occasion. As the 12 tribes of Israel were assembled there for a national function, and the Ark of the Covenant was present, this altar was for the time being the national altar (Josh. 8:30-35), and quite in the spirit of the Deuteronomic legislation (Deut. 27:5-8). The law of the altar was necessarily in abeyance twice: 1. When God forsook the tabernacle and the Ark was in the hands of the Philistines, or in dreaded seclusion at Kiriath-jearim, there was no place where Jehovah manifested himself (Ps. 78:59-64; I Sam. 6:20 to 7:4). Samuel, as the prophet and representative of Jehovah, erected an altar at Ramah and sacrificed in several places (I Sam. 7:9, 17). Out of the confusion of worship caused by the capture of the Ark, the domination of the Philistines, and the political complications connected with Saul and David, there arose and continued for a time 2 high priests and 2 altars, the original altar at the original tabernacle and a new altar near the Ark in Jerusalem (I Kings 3:2, 4, 15; II Chron. 1:3-6). 2. When the 10 tribes revolted, the pious Israelites of the n. who were debarred from the pilgrimage to Jerusalem were compelled either to abstain from worshipping Jehovah by sacrifice, or else to erect local altars. They chose in some instances the latter alternative (I Kings 13:30, 32; 19:10).

After the Exile, at a time when the insistence of Deuteronomy upon one central, national altar had long been known, the Jews who were living at Yeb (Elephantine) in Upper Egypt in the 6th century B.C., and in the 2d century B.C. those Jews dwelling near Leontopolis, ventured to build in each of these places a local temple to Jehovah and to erect an altar and offer sacrifices on it to the God of heaven (Elephantine papyri; Jos. Antiq. xiii. 3, 1; War vii. 10, 2 and 3).

Altars were not always intended for sacrifices or for the burning of incense; the 2½ tribes who settled e. of the Jordan built an altar designed to be a memorial of their affinity in blood to the other tribes, who crossed the river (Josh. 22:10-34).

Altash'heth (āl-tāsh'hēth), in A.V. less accurately Alt-as'chith (āl-tās'kith) [do not destroy]. A compound word occurring in the titles of Psalms 57; 58; 59; 75. It probably refers to the name of some Hebrew melody to the tune of which those psalms were to be sung. Cf. Isa. 65:8: "Destroy it not."

A'lush (ā'lūsh). An encampment of the Israelites between Egypt and Mount Sinai (Num. 33:13, 14).

Al'vah (āl'vā) or A-li'ah [high, tall]. Spelling implies a confusion of waw and yod. A duke of Edom, descended from Esau (Gen. 36:40; I Chron. 1:51). He probably bears the name of his district (Gen. 36:43).

Al'van (āl'vān) or A-li'an [high, tall]. For spelling, see ALVAH. A Horite (Gen. 36:23; I Chron. 1:40).

A'mad (ā'mād) [people of duration or, better, station, domicile]. A frontier village of Asher (Josh. 19:26). Not identified.

A'mal (ā'māl) [labor, sorrow]. An Asherite, son of Helem (I Chron. 7:35).

Am'a-lek (ām'ā-lēk). Son of Eliphaz, Esau's son, by his concubine Timna (Gen. 36:12); or, collectively, the Amalekites (Ex. 17:8; Num. 24:20; Deut. 25:17; Judg. 5:14, etc.).

Am'a-lek-ites (ām'ā-lēk-its). Descendants of Esau (Gen. 36:12). For a long time they were centered about Kadesh-barnea. In this neighborhood they dwelt at the time of the Exodus (Num. 13:29; 14:25). The territory occupied by them was visible from the mountains of Abarim (Num. 24:20; Deut. 34:1-3). They were among the foremost people of their time in that part of the world (Num. 24:20), but in the days of Saul they were somewhat weakened through the secession of the Kenites (I Sam. 15:6). From their center near Kadesh, the people roamed and their camps radiated. They harassed the rear of the Israelites soon after the Hebrews had left Egypt and entered the wilderness; and at Rephidim on the w. of Sinai they engaged with Israel in battle and were defeated. Because of their hostility to Israel, their utter destruction was authorized (Ex. 17:8-16; Deut. 25:17-19). A year later, when Israel had reached Kadesh, and in defiance of God attempted to push n. into Canaan, the Amalekites opposed and repulsed them (Num. 14:43-45). About that date perhaps or later, their name became attached to a hill district in Ephraim (Judg. 12:15; cf. ch. 5:14). Soon after the time of Moses and Joshua, they aided Eglon, king of Moab, to wrest Jericho from the Israelites; and a few generations later they were allied with the Midianites in oppressing northern Israel (Judg. 3:13; 6:3, 33). Evidently they had been working their way e., in friendly intercourse with other inhabitants of the desert; and in Saul's time their bands were found roaming through a stretch of perhaps 500 or 600 miles of wilderness from the border of Egypt, near their original seat, to Havilah, a designation which includes northern central Arabia (I Sam. 15:7; 27:8). They suffered crushing defeat from Saul; their king, Agag, was captured and later slain by Samuel. In David's time, Amalekite robbers took Ziklag, but were overtaken by David, who so severely smote them that they seem never to have recovered (I Sam., chs. 15; 30). During the reign of Hezekiah, the sons of Simeon "smote the remnant of the Amalekites that escaped" and dispossessed them of Mount Seir (I Chron. 4:43).

A'mam (ā'mām). A village of Judah in the southland (Josh. 15:26) upon the wadi eṣ-Šini.

A-ma'na (ā-mā'nā) [faith, firmness, a treaty]. The mountains of Anti-Lebanon, doubtless those in which the Abanah or, as it is also called, Amanah has its source (S. of Sol. 4:8).

Am'a-ri'ah (ām'ā-rī'ā) [Jehovah has said]. 1. Son of Meraioth, a priest descended from Phinehas (I Chron. 6:7).

2. A priest in the same high-priestly line of descent, a son of Azariah (I Chron. 6:11; Ezra 7:3).

3. A chief of the priests, who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:2, 7). A father's house bore his name in the next generation (v. 13).

4. A priest, doubtless head of a father's house, who sealed the covenant in Nehemiah's time (Neh. 10:3).

5. A man who had taken a foreign wife, whom Ezra made him divorce (Ezra 10:42).

6. A man of Judah, family of Perez (Neh. 11:4).

7. A son of Hezekiah (A.V., Hizkiah) and an ancestor of the Prophet Zephaniah (Zeph. 1:1).

8. A chief priest in Jehoshaphat's time (II Chron. 19:11).

9. A Levite, descended through Kohath and Hebron (I Chron. 23:19; 24:23).

10. An assistant distributor of the freewill offerings of God in Hezekiah's time (II Chron. 31:14, 15).

Am·a·sa (ām'ā-sā), probably a variant of Amasai. 1. The son of David's half sister Abigail and Jether an Ishmaelite (I Chron. 2:17). He was Joab's cousin (II Sam. 17:25). Absalom appointed Amasa captain of his army (ibid.). After Absalom's defeat and death, Amasa was forgiven by David and appointed commander in chief in place of Joab (II Sam. 19:13). On the breaking out of the revolt headed by Sheba, Amasa received orders to have an army in readiness to start in 3 days. He was behind his time; and Abishai was sent after Sheba with troops, among whom was Joab. The 2 companies united at Gibeon; and Joab, under pretext of greeting Amasa with a kiss, stabbed him (II Sam. 20:1-13). See AMASAI 2.

2. A prince of Ephraim and son of Hadlai. When captives from Judah were being carried off by the Israelite army under Pekah, he aided in securing their release (II Chron. 28:12).

Am·as·a·i (ā-mās'ā-i) [Jehovah has borne]. 1. A Levite of the Kohathite family, descended through Abiasaph and an ancestor of He-man the singer (I Chron. 6:35). Amasai in v. 25 is perhaps a different person of the same family and name, but descended from the brother of Abiasaph (Ex. 6:24).

2. A chief who early joined David and at one time was a prominent captain (I Chron. 12:18). Perhaps he was David's nephew Amasa.

3. A Levite who blew a trumpet before the Ark in David's reign (I Chron. 15:24).

4. A Kohathite whose son aided in the religious revival in Hezekiah's reign (II Chron. 29:12).

Am·ash'sa·i (ā-māsh'sā-i) in A.V. Am·ash'ari (ā-māsh'ā-i), perhaps two variant spellings of Amasai combined. A priest, the son of Azareel. He lived in Jerusalem, at Nehemiah's request (Neh. 11:13). See MAASAI.

Am·a·si'ah (ām'ā-si'ā) [Jehovah has borne]. A son of Zichri, and high military officer under Jehoshaphat (II Chron. 17:16).

Am·a·zi'ah (ām'ā-zi'ā) [Jehovah is strong]. 1. A king of Judah who, about 799 B.C., at the age of 25 years, undertook the conduct of the government in behalf of his father Joash, who had become incapacitated. On the murder of his father, he succeeded to the throne (II Kings 14:1; II Chron. 24:25-27). When he found himself firmly established in power, he put the murderers of his father to death; but spared their children, in conformity with the principle laid down on the subject in the Mosaic Law (Deut. 24:16). He hired 100,000 Israelitish mercenaries to accompany him on an expedition against the Edomites, but at the command of a man of God he dismissed them and, taking the forces of Judah alone, defeated the Edomites in the Valley of Salt and captured their capital, Sela. But he brought back idols of the Edomites, and set them up for his gods. The dismissed Israelites on their way home plundered the cities of Judah n. of Beth-horon. Amaziah, following bad advice, challenged Jehoash, king of Israel, to fight, but he was defeated in a battle at Beth-shemesh, taken prisoner, and carried to Jerusalem. Part of the wall of Jerusalem, his capital, was broken down by Jehoash, and treasure and hostages were taken by him to Samaria. About the year 782 B.C. a conspiracy was formed against Amaziah in Jerusalem. He fled to Lachish, but 12 years later was sought out there and murdered. He reigned 29 years (II Kings 14:1-20; II Chron. 25:1-27).

2. A Simeonite (I Chron. 4:34).

3. A Levite of the family of Merari (I Chron. 6:45).

4. Priest of Beth-el, who tried to silence the Prophet Amos (Amos 7:10-17).

Am·ber. The hardened or fossilized resin of a now extinct pine tree (Pinus succinifer) allied to the Norway spruce or to the silver fir. That it was originally fluid is plain from the fact that it is found to enclose numerous remains of plants and of insects. The pines producing it grew in the s.e. part of what is now the bed of the Baltic Sea, and it is still picked up on the s. shore of that sea. It was regarded as a gem, and early became an object of commerce over regions very remote from the Baltic Sea. It is generally yellow, and that is the color of amber referred to in Ezek. 1:4, 27; 8:2, R.V. marg., and A.V. See HYACINTH 2 and ELETUM.

A'men' (ā'mēn', ā'mēn') [firm, established]. 1. Jesus, as the faithful and true One (Rev. 3:14; cf. Isa. 65:16, R.V. marg.).

2. An interjection, "So be it," "May it be" as has been asked, said, promised, or threatened (Matt. 6:13, R.V. marg.; Deut. 27:16-26; II Cor. 1:20). To render it more emphatic, it is sometimes redoubled (Num. 5:22). Jesus begins many of his sayings with this word, which is then translated "verily." This idiom is peculiar to him.

Am·ethyst. A precious stone, believed to be intended by the Hebrew name for the last gem in the third row on the Jewish high priest's breastplate (Ex. 28:19; 39:12). The amethyst formed the twelfth foundation of the New Jerusalem (Rev. 21:20). It is a glassy, clear, purple or bluish violet variety of quartz, the color, it is believed, being produced by manganese.

A'mi (ā'mī). See AMON, I. 3.

Am·in·a·dab (ā-min'ā-dāb). See AMMINADAB.

Am·i·non (ām-i'nōn), a diminutive used in a contemptuous sense for Amnon (II Sam. 13:20 marg.).

Am·i'tai (ā-mī'tī) [truthful]. The father of Jonah the prophet (II Kings 14:25; Jonah 1:1).

Am'mah (ām'ā) [mother, beginning, foundation]. A hill near Giah, on the road from Gibeon through the wilderness to the Jordan (II Sam. 2:24; cf. vs. 16, 29).

Am'mi (ām'ī) [my people] (Hos. 2:1).

Am'mi-el (ām'ī-ēl) [God is a paternal uncle or kinsman]. 1. Son of Gemalli, and representative of the tribe of Dan on the commission to spy out Canaan (Num. 13:12).

2. A man of Lo-debar, and father of Machir (II Sam. 9:4, 5; 17:27).

3. A son of Obed-edom (I Chron. 26:5).

4. Father of Bath-shua (I Chron. 3:5); see ELIAM.

Am·mi'hud (ām-mī'hūd) [the (divine) uncle or kinsman is majesty]. 1. An Ephraimite, descended through Tahan, and father of Elishama (Num. 1:10; I Chron. 7:26).

2. A man of Simeon, and father of Shemuel (Num. 34:20).

3. A man of Naphtali, and father of Pedahel (Num. 34:28).

4. Father of Talmal, king of Geshur (II Sam. 13:37, R.V. marg., and A.V.). In the Hebrew text the name is written with h and r instead of h and d, but is traditionally pronounced Ammihud.

5. A descendant of Judah through Perez (I Chron. 9:4, R.V.).

Am-mi'hur (ā-mi'hūr). See AMMIHUD 4.

Am-min'a-dab (ā-mīn'ā-dāb), in A.V. of N.T. A-min'a-dab [the (divine) uncle or kinsman is generous]. 1. A man of Judah, family of Hezron, house of Ram (I Chron. 2:10). He was the father of Nahshon, the prince of Judah (Num. 1:7), father-in-law of Aaron the priest (Ex. 6:23), and an ancestor of David (Ruth 4:19; Matt. 1:4; Luke 3:33).

2. A Levite, family of Kohath, house of Uzziel. He was head of his father's house in David's reign (I Chron. 15:10, 11; cf. Ex. 6:18, 22).

3. A Levite, family of Kohath (I Chron. 6:22). The genealogies of Kohath, however, regularly have the name Izhar in this place (I Chron. 6:37, 38; Ex. 6:18, 21, 24), so that Amminadab is probably either another name of Izhar or a corruption of the genealogy.

Am-mi'a-dib (ā-mīn'ā-dīb) [the (divine) uncle or kinsman is generous, noble]. If a proper name, which is doubtful, then it is someone famous for his chariots (S. of Sol. 6:12; cf. text and marg.).

Am-nul'shad'dai (ām-nūl'shād'dī) [an uncle or kinsman is the Almighty]. A Danite, father of Ahiezer (Num. 1:12; 2:25).

Am-miz'a-bad (ā-mīz'ā-bād) [the (divine) uncle or kinsman has endowed]. A son of David's mighty man Benaiah (I Chron. 27:6).

Am'mon (ām'ōn) [cf. Heb. 'am, Arab. 'amm, paternal uncle, kinsman; or perhaps Heb. 'am, people, and Arab. 'amm, crowd, multitude]. Same as Ben-ammi, Lot's younger son, ancestor of the Ammonites (Gen. 19:38).

Am'mon-ites (ām'ōn-its). A people descended from Ben-ammi, Lot's second son (Gen. 19:38). They dispossessed the Zam-zummim of the territory between the Arnon and the Jabbok (Deut. 2:20, 21; 3:11); but were in turn driven out by the Amorites and compelled to keep on the border of the e. desert, with the upper Jabbok as their w. boundary (Num. 21:24; Deut. 2:37; Judg. 11:13, 22). For having joined the Moabites in hiring Balaam to curse the Israelites, they were excluded from the congregation of the Lord to the 10th generation (Deut. 23:3-6). They aided Eglon, king of Moab, in subjugating a portion of the Israelites (Judg. 3:13). In the time of Jephthah they again oppressed the Israelites e. of Jordan (Judg. 10:6, 9, 18). Just before Saul became actual king, Nahash, the Ammonite king, besieged Jabesh-gilead. Saul came to the assistance of the beleaguered citizens, and totally defeated Nahash (I Sam. 11:1-11). Nahash befriended David; doing this, perhaps, because both were enemies of Saul. On the death of Nahash, David sent an embassy to his son, Hanun; but the ambassadors were insulted, and war supervened. In the first campaign, the confederate Syrians and Ammonites were defeated by the Israelites, led by Joab and Abishai (II Sam., ch. 10; I Chron., ch. 19). In the second, the Israelites captured Rabbah, the Ammonite capital (II Sam., chs. 11; 12; I Chron. 20:1-3). Solomon took several Ammonite women as wives (I Kings 11:1). In the time of Jehoshaphat Moabites, Ammonites, and Edomites unsuccessfully invaded Judah (II Chron. 20:1-30). To Uzziah and Jotham the Ammonites sent tribute (II Chron. 26:8; 27:5). Ammonites joined with others in vexing Jehoiakim (II Kings 24:2); and after the Fall of Jerusalem, they frustrated the attempt of the Jews to form a new community (II Kings 25:25; Jer. 40:11-14). As inveterate enemies of Israel, they were denounced by the prophets (Jer. 49:1-6; Ezek. 21:20; 25:1-7; Amos 1:13-15; Zeph. 2:8-11). They opposed the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem by the returned exiles (Neh. 4:3, 7); yet internarrations between them and the Israelites took place, which were censured by Ezra and Nehemiah (Ezra 9:1, 2; Neh. 13:23-31). Judas Maccabaeus, under strong provocation, made war against them (I Macc. 5:1-8). Their chief deity was Milcom, another designation of Molech (I Kings 11:7, 33). In the time of Jephthah they were worshipping Chemosh, the Moabite god (Judg. 11:24).

Am'nōn (ām'nōn) [faithful]. 1. A son of David by Ahinoam, the Jezreelitess; born at Hebron while that was his father's capital. He dishonored Tamar, his half sister, and was in consequence murdered by her full brother Absalom (II Sam., chs. 13; 3:2; I Chron. 3:1).

2. A son of Shimon, registered with the tribe of Judah (I Chron. 4:20).

A'mok (ā'mōk) [deep, inscrutable]. A chief of the priests who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:7). In the next generation, a father's house bore this name (Neh. 12:20).

The Egyptian God Amon

A'mon, I (ā'mōn) [faithful or master workman]. 1. Governor of the city of Samaria under Ahab (I Kings 22:10, 26).

2. A king of Judah who at the age of 22 succeeded his father Manasseh. He followed his father's bad example. It has been suggested that his name is the same as that of the Egyptian god Amon and thus reflects the heathenism of his father. In two years his servants murdered him in his palace. The people of the land put the murderers to death, and placed his son Josiah on the throne (II Kings 21:19-26; II Chron. 33:21-25).

3. One of the class known as the children of Solomon's servants (Neh. 7:57-59); called Ami in Ezra 2:57.

A'mon, II (ā'mōn) [Egypt. Amūn, the hidden one]. Originally a local god of Thebes, or No-am, the capital of Upper Egypt (Jer.

46:25, R.V.; Nahum 3:8, R.V.). With the rise of that city during the Middle Kingdom, he assumed national importance and was often identified with Re under the name of Amon-Re. See EGYPT, II. 3 (4); II. 4.

Am'orites (ām'ō-rits) [Akkad. Amurru]. The early history of the Amorites is obscure, but they played an important part in the Fertile Crescent. Amurru, the land of the Amorites, extended from Palestine to Mesopotamia. During the 3d millennium B.C. the Babylonians called Syria and Palestine the land of the Amorites. Dyn. I of Babylon, founded by Sumu-abu c. 1894 B.C., was Amorite; its most important king was Hammurabi. This dynasty came to an end about 1595 B.C., when the Hittites sacked Babylon.

The Amorites occupied Canaan before the conquest by the Hebrews (Gen. 10:16; 15:21; Ex. 3:8). At the time of Abraham, they dwelt at least on the w. shore of the Dead Sea and back on the mountain (Gen. 14:7, 13). Even then they were the most powerful tribe in the hill country, and their name was practically synonymous with that of the inhabitants of that region (Gen. 15:16), if not, as later when their power had further increased, with that of the inhabitants of Canaan generally (Gen. 48:22; cf. Josh. 7:7; 9:7; 11:19 with II Sam. 21:2; Judg. 6:10; Amos 2:10). At the time of the Exodus they were still in the hill country (Num. 13:29; Deut. 1:7, 19, 20, 44); but before this date they had carried their conquests to the e. of the Jordan (Num. 21:26-30), and taken possession of the land from the Arnon to Mount Hermon and from the wilderness to the Jordan (Deut. 3:8; 4:48; Josh. 2:10; 9:10; Judg. 11:22). At this time they occupied the entire hill country w. of Jordan from Jerusalem to Hebron, and w. to and inclusive of the Shephelah (Josh. 10:5, 6) as far n. as Ajalon and even the territory of Ephraim (Judg. 1:35; Josh. 11:3; 13:4). For their wickedness they were devoted to destruction; but a strong remnant remained in the land after the conquest (Judg. 1:35; 3:5), with whom in Samuel's day there was peace (I Sam. 7:14), and who with other survivors of the earlier races were made bondservants by Solomon (I Kings 9:20, 21; II Chron. 8:7). See OG and SIHON; also HAMMURABI.

Am'os (ām'ós) [burden; burden bearer]. 1. A prophet from Tekoa, in the territory of Judah, about 6 miles s. of Bethlehem (Amos 1:1). He belonged to the humbler class. He was a herdsman; one of a number of shepherds who had their homes at Tekoa, but doubtless spent their lives out in the wilderness that extends from the village e. to the Dead Sea. In some sheltered spot in this wild region, down on the lower level toward the sea, he found further humble employment as a dresser of sycamore trees (Amos 1:1; 7:14, 15). From the acquaintance which he displays with distant places and events, it seems probable that he had driven sheep or carried hides and wool as far as Egypt and Damascus. Although a man of Judah, he was called to prophesy in the Northern Kingdom. He appeared at Beth-el, then the king's sanctuary and a royal house, which still probably had within it one of the two golden calves reared by Jeroboam I as objects of worship (Amos 8:14; cf. Hos. 8:5, 6; 10:5). Amos spoke with such boldness and faithfulness against the sins of the king and the people that Amaziah, the idolatrous priest at Beth-el, sent word to King Jeroboam II that Amos was conspiring against him in his own kingdom (Amos 7:10). The time and circumstances of Amos' death are unknown.

Amos was a monotheist; he knew God as omnipotent, the God of creation and providence, the sovereign ruler of individuals and nations, inflexible in justice, whose power reaches unto Sheol and who knows the thoughts of men. Amos was also a shrewd observer of men and manners, and able to reflect upon what he saw, and to generalize and look at it in its relation to God.

The prophecy of Amos is a fine example of pure Hebrew style. The diction is simple, and yet the speech is dignified and impressive. The prophet uses imagery with moderation, but with effect. Amos is not so tender in his entreaty or so full of feeling as Hosea, who belonged to the people among whom he labored; there is a certain air of aloofness about Amos, natural enough in a prophet from another tribe and kingdom.

The Book of Amos is the 3d of the Minor Prophets. Amos prophesied after the time of Hazael and Ben-hadad (Amos 1:4), in the days of Uzziah, king of Judah, and in the days of Jeroboam, son of Joash, king of Israel, 2 years before the earthquake (Amos 1:1; 7:10; cf. Zech. 14:5), and probably while the kingdom was at its greatest extent (Amos 6:14; cf. II Kings 14:25). Amos' prophetic ministry accordingly belongs to the period about 760-746 B.C.

The theme of the prophecy is the judgment of the Lord (Amos 1:2); and the book consists of 3 parts: 1. Introductory (chs. 1; 2). 2. Three discourses (chs. 3 to 6), followed by a series of 5 visions (chs. 7:1 to 9:7). These 1st 2 parts of the book are denunciatory, and each subdivision ends with the announcement of judgment to come. 3. Promissory (ch. 9:8-15). 1. In the introductory section (chs. 1:2 to 2:16) the prophet denounces judgment upon 6 neighboring Gentile nations, then upon Judah, and finally upon Israel. The 1st 7 denunciations are embraced in 7 stanzas of precisely the same structure, are opened and closed in the same way, and are linked to the introductory denunciation of Israel, to which they lead up, by the familiar opening formula. The argument seems to be: If these heathen nations are to be punished, how much more should Judah be, which has sinned against the law of God; and if Judah is punished, how much more should Israel be, which has sinned more deeply. 2. Denunciation of Israel occupies the body of the book (chs. 3:1 to 9:7). There are 3 discourses, each beginning with the formula, "Hear this word" (chs. 3:1; 4:1; 5:1), followed by 5 visions. In the 1st vision devouring locusts are seen; but at the prayer of the prophet God forgives Israel and ends the work of devastation. In the 2d vision fire is seen, which devours the waters and would have destroyed the land; but again at the prophet's prayer God makes the evil to cease. Perhaps an actual invasion of locusts occurred during the ministry of the Prophet Amos, and was followed by a season of intense heat and the resulting drought (see JOEL). Most probably Amos sees in these visions calamities which were sent to warn Israel and were checked by God's grace but failed to bring the nation to repentance (ch. 4:6-11). Therefore the people must prepare to meet their God in judgment (ch. 4:12); and the 3d vision, that of the plumb line, shows that a desolating judgment is certain to come and is according to the undeviating standard of righteousness (ch. 7:7-9). At this point the prophet is interrupted by the priest of Beth-el, and forbidden to prophesy; but he resumes his recital. In the 4th vision a basket of summer fruit is seen, indicating that Israel is ripe for judgment, yea, in God's sight is already plucked (ch. 8:1-3); Amos here uses a pun: kāyis (summer fruit) suggests kēš (end). In the 5th vision Jehovah is seen standing beside the altar, doubtless that at Beth-el (cf. ch. 3:14), and commanding to smite and slay; showing that the order is being issued for the judgment to begin (ch. 9:1-4). 3. Epilogue. The prophecy concludes with promises (ch. 9:8-15): the Exile into a sifting (vs. 8-10); restoration of the royal house of David to its former glory (v. 11); extension of the kingdom over Edom and other heathen nations (v. 12); restoration of Israel from captivity (vs. 13-15). Here a beautiful picture of abundance and perfection in the realm of nature gives the proper background for visualizing spiritual happiness and perfection.

Of the promises of good, with which the book closes, ch. 9:8b-15, it has been asserted that the passage can scarcely have been the original conclusion of Amos' vision of judgment, because it differs from the rest of the prophecy in phraseology, conception, and outlook. It is, of course, a matter of small moment whether it was written by Amos at the time he penned the visions or later. No ground has been found for rejecting its genuineness. The prophets frequently annexed to the prediction of judgment a prophecy of hope. There was a purpose in the doom, which is followed by restoration. The godly needed encouragement, and it was necessary to show the congruity between the overwhelming judgment and God's long-standing promise of the stability of David's throne and the perpetuity and triumph of God's Kingdom on earth.

Permanent lessons of The Book of Amos: In this book we find truths which can never become superfluous or obsolete. The truths that justice between man and man is one of the divine foundations of society; that privilege implies responsibility, and that failure to recognize responsibility will surely bring punishment; that nations, and by analogy individuals, are bound to live up to that measure of light and knowledge which has been granted to them; that the most elaborate worship is but an insult to God when offered by those who have no mind to conform their wills and conduct to his requirements—these are elementary but eternal truths.

2. An ancestor of Christ (Luke 3:25).

A'moz (ām'ōz) [strong]. The Prophet Isaiah's father (Isa. 1:1, etc.).

Am'phip'olis (ām-fīp'ō-lis) [Gr., a city pressed on all sides]. A city of Thrace, situated at the mouth of the Strymon on a bend of the river. It was founded by the Athenians in the 5th century B.C., and called Amphipolis because nearly surrounded by the river. Under the Romans it was the chief town of Macedonia Prima. It was on the Via Egnatia, 33 miles s.w. of Philippi, and Paul accordingly passed through it while traveling by that road from Philippi to Thessalonica (Acts 17:1).

Am'pli'a'tus (ām'plī-ā'tūs), in A.V. Am'pli-as (ām'plī-ās) [Lat., enlarged]. A Christian of Rome to whom Paul sent salutation (Rom. 16:8).

Am'ram, I (ām'rām) (I Chron. 1:41). See HEMDAN.

Am'ram, II (ām'rām) [the (divine) paternal uncle or kinsman is exalted]. 1. A Levite, son of Kohath, husband of Jochebed and founder of the father's house of the Amramites, who in the time of Moses numbered approximately 2,000 males (Num. 3:17, 19, 27, 28). He was an ancestor of Aaron and Moses, and lived to the age of 137 years (Ex. 6:20; for form of expression cf. Gen. 46:16-18, 19-22, 23-25; Matt. 1:5, 6, 8, 11).

2. A son of Bani, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:34).

Am'ram-ites (ām'rām-its). The descendants of Amram, constituting a subdivision of the Levites (Num. 3:27; I Chron. 26:23).

Am'ra'phel (ām'rā-fēl). King of Shinar, ally of Chedorlaomer in the invasion of the w. (Gen. 14:1, 9); formerly quite generally identified with Hammurabi by considering Amraphel a corruption of Hammurabi, thus Amrabi. The final l is a difficulty, and the equivalence is now seriously questioned by a number of leading scholars. See HAMMURABI.

Am'u'let. Anything worn as a protection against sorcery. It often serves at the same time as an ornament (Isa. 3:20, R.V.; cf. Gen. 35:4).

Am'zi (ām'zi), perhaps a contraction of Amaziah. 1. A Levite, a descendant of Merari (I Chron. 6:46).

2. A priest of the course of Malchijah (Neh. 11:12).

A'nab (ā'nāb) [grapes]. A town in the mountains of Judah (Josh. 11:21; 15:50), Khirbet 'Anāb, about 3 miles w. of Debir (Dāhariyeh), which is 13 miles s.w. of Hebron.

A'nah (ā'nā) [possibly, hearkening-to]. 1. A daughter of Zibeon, and mother of Oholbamah, one of Esau's wives (Gen. 36:2, 14, 18, 25, R.V.). The LXX (vs. 2, 14) reads son instead of daughter, which presupposes Heb. bn, son, instead of bt, daughter, of the Masoretic text. The Samaritan Hebrew and the Peshitta have son only in v. 2. The LXX would identify this Anah with number 2.

2. A son of Zibeon (Gen. 36:24; I Chron. 1:40); he is said to have discovered hot springs in the wilderness.

3. A son of Seir and brother of Zibeon, a Horite chief (Gen. 36:20, 29; I Chron. 1:38).

If we follow the LXX and regard Anah as a tribal name rather than a personal name and think of relationships between clans or tribes rather than individuals, it is quite possible to consider the above 3 references as signifying the same Horite group.

A'na'ha'rath (ā-nā'hā-rāth) [possibly, nostril or pass]. An ancient town on the frontier of Issachar (Josh. 19:19). Possibly en-Na'urah, 5 miles n.e. of Jezreel, echoes the name.

A'nai'ah (ā-nī'ā) [Jehovah has answered]. One who stood by Ezra when he read the book of the Law to the people (Neh. 8:4), and who afterward sealed the covenant to serve God (Neh. 10:22).

A'nak (ā'nāk) [cf. Arab. 'unḳ, neck]. Collective name of the Anakim (cf. Num. 13:22 with Deut. 1:28), who possibly, though not necessarily, were descended from Arba (cf. Josh. 14:15 with 15:13). The word Anak is properly a race name, and since it is often used with the article in Hebrew (Num. 13:22, 28, but not v. 33), it is really an appellative and probably means the long-necked (people).

An'a'kim (ān'ā-kīm); A.V. has An'a'kims (ān'ā-kīmz), formed by adding Eng. plural ending s to the Heb. plural. A stalwart race, connected with the Rephaim (Num. 13:33; Deut. 2:10, 11, 21). Three families of them settled at Hebron (Num. 13:22), and others were found in neighboring towns and elsewhere throughout the hill country (Josh. 11:21; 15:14; cf. Rephaim, ch. 17:15, R.V.). They were cut off by the Israelites in the general campaign under Joshua (Josh. 10:36-39; 11:21), and particularly at Hebron, on the allotment of the land by Judah under Caleb (Josh. 14:12; 15:13-19; Judg. 1:10-15). A remnant was left in Gaza, Gath, and Ashdod, in the Philistine country (Josh. 11:22). The giant Goliath, of Gath, was probably one of the Anakim.

An'a'mim (ān'ā-mīm). An Egyptian tribe, of which nothing is known (Gen. 10:13; I Chron. 1:11).

A·nam'me-lech (á-nám'ě-lěk) [Anu is king]. One of the deities worshiped by the people of Sepharvaim, a city of Babylonia (II Kings 17:31). Anu was god of the sky. When Sepharvites were brought to colonize Samaria, they burned their children in the fire to him, worshiping Anu as Molech was worshiped.

A'nān (ā'nān) [a cloud, or probably a contraction of Ananiah]. One who with Nehemiah sealed the covenant to worship Jehovah (Neh. 10:26).

A·na'nī (á-nā'nī), contraction of Ananiah. A son of Elioenai (I Chron. 3:24).

An'a-ni'ah (ān'á-nī'á) [Jehovah has appeared]. 1. The father of Maaseiah (Neh. 3:23).

2. A town of Benjamin (Neh. 11:32). Formerly identified with Beit Hanina, but probably Bethany, e. of Jerusalem.

An'a-ni'as (ān'á-nī'ās), Gr. form of Hanaiah. 1. A disciple of Jerusalem who, with his wife Sapphira, sold a piece of land, and taking a portion of the price, laid it at the apostles' feet (Acts 5:1 seq.). The Christian community held all things common. "Neither was there among them any that lacked: for as many as were possessors of lands or houses sold them, . . . and laid . . . [the prices] at the apostles' feet: and distribution was made unto each, according as any one had need." No one was under obligation to do this (v. 4), and the end proposed did not demand that all property be sold, but forbade it. Property was sold as need required. Ananias brought part of the proceeds, and laid it at the apostles' feet ostensibly as the whole. Peter rebuked him for having lied to the Holy Spirit, and he fell down and expired, as did his wife Sapphira, who came in three hours afterward; in ignorance of what had taken place, she repeated her husband's falsehood, and had the same doom foretold for her by Peter.

2. A Christian at Damascus who was informed in a vision of Saul's conversion, and sent to restore his sight and admit him to the Christian Church by baptism (Acts 9:10-18).

3. A high priest appointed by Herod, king of Chalcis, about A.D. 48 (Jos. Antiq. xx. 5, 2). Four years later he was sent to Rome by the governor of Syria to answer for violence done by the Jews to the Samaritans, but he was acquitted through the influence of Agrippa, and returned to Jerusalem (Jos. Antiq. xx. 6, 2 and 3; War ii. 12, 6 and 7). Jonathan, former high priest, was politically associated with him. In the year 58, Paul was arraigned before Ananias, and he appeared against the apostle before the procurator Felix (Acts 23:2; 24:1). Jonathan, his colleague, was now murdered, and about the year 59, toward the close of Felix' administration, Ananias himself was deposed by Agrippa (Jos. Antiq. xx. 8, 5 and 8; War ii. 13, 3). He appears to have resided on the s.w. hill of Jerusalem, in the upper city, near the palace of the Hasmonaeans. He was murdered in the year 67 (Jos. War ii. 17, 6 and 9).

A'nath (ā'nāth) [a n. Semitic goddess of war, represented with helmet, shield, spear, and battle-ax]. Father of the judge Shamgar (Judg. 3:31; 5:6).

An'ath'e·ma [Gr., anything devoted]. In the N. T., a person or thing devoted to destruction. It corresponds to the Heb. hērem (Rom. 9:3, R.V.; I Cor. 12:3, R.V., and A.V. marg.; Gal. 1:8, 9, R.V.; see Lev. 27:28, 29; Josh. 6:17; 7:1, R.V.).

An'ath'e·ma Mar'a-nath'a (á-nāth'ě-má mār'á-nāth'á) [Gr., one devoted to destruction, and Aram. Mārānā thā, O our Lord, come!]. Formerly interpreted as one accursed at the coming of the Lord (I Cor. 16:22, A.V.), with the sense of a double imprecation. Maranatha is, however, a distinct sentence consisting of two Aramaic words. E.R.V. divides Maran atha. Our Lord is come or comes; A.R.V. analyzes better: Marana thā, O our Lord, come! Cf. Rev. 22:20, "Amen: come, Lord Jesus."

An'a·thoth (ān'á-thōth) [probably the plural of Anath, a goddess (cf. Beth-anath, and the plural, Ashtaroth)]. 1. Head of a father's house of Benjamin, family of Becher (I Chron. 7:8).

2. Head and representative of the men of Anathoth, who in their name sealed the covenant to worship Jehovah (Neh. 10:19).

3. A city in the territory of Benjamin assigned to the priests (Josh. 21:18; I Chron. 6:60). It was the home of Abiathar the high priest (I Kings 2:26), and the birthplace of Jeremiah, and the prophet's life was also endangered here (Jer. 1:1; 11:21). The town was reoccupied after the Exile (Ezra 2:23). Its site is represented by the modern 'Anāta, which is 2½ miles n.e. of Jerusalem. It was once a fortified town.

An'a·thoth·ite (ān'á-thōth-it), in A.V. An'e·thoth·ite, An'e·toth·ite, and An'toth·ite. A native or inhabitant of Anathoth (II Sam. 23:27; I Chron. 11:28; 27:12).

An'drew (ān'drōō) [Gr. Andreas, manly]. The brother of Simon Peter, of Bethsaida on the Sea of Galilee (John 1:44). By vocation he was a fisherman like his brother (Matt. 4:18; Mark 1:16-18), and with his brother had a house at Capernaum (Mark 1:29). He was a disciple of John the Baptist, but being directed by John to Jesus as the Lamb of God, he obtained an interview with Jesus and became convinced that Jesus was the Messiah. Forthwith he found his brother and induced him to visit Jesus (John 1:35-42). He was afterward called to permanent fellowship with Jesus (Matt. 4:18, 19; Mark 1:16, 17; cf. John 6:8), and appointed an apostle (Matt. 10:2; Mark 3:18; Luke 6:14; Acts 1:13). He joined with his brother and James and John in inquiring regarding the destruction of the city and Temple, and the Second Advent of Christ (Mark 13:3, 4), and with Philip he presented the request of the Greeks to Jesus (John 12:22). Nothing trustworthy is known of his subsequent life. According to tradition, he suffered martyrdom at Patrae in Achaia by crucifixion on a cross shaped like the letter X. This is now called St. Andrew's Cross. It is also related that a ship bearing two relics of him was wrecked in a bay of Scotland, afterward called St. Andrew's Bay. The mariners who reached the shore introduced the gospel into the region. Andrew, therefore, became the patron saint of Scotland, and gave name to St. Andrew's town. His festival is kept by the Greek and Roman Churches on November 30. In the Church of England it has become customary on that day to preach on the subject of missions. The Acts of St. Andrew, an alleged Gospel from his pen, is spurious.

An'dro·ni'cus (ān'drō-nī'kūs) [Gr., conquering men]. A Jewish Christian, and once fellow prisoner of Paul, to whom at Rome Paul sent greeting (Rom. 16:7).

A'nem (ā'nēm) [two fountains]. A town in the territory of Issachar, given with its suburbs to the sons of Gershom (I Chron. 6:73). Probably a corruption of the text out of Engannim (Josh. 21:29; cf. 19:21).

A'ner (ā'nēr). 1. An Amorite, resident at Mamre, and one of Abraham's confederates in the battle with the eastern kings (Gen. 14:13, 24).

2. A town of Manasseh w. of the Jordan. It was given with its suburbs to the Kohathites

(I Chron. 6:70). In Josh. 21:25, Taanach (A.V., Tanach) appears in its stead and is considered by many scholars as the correct reading for Aner.

An'e-thothite (ăn'ê-thôth-it) or An'e-toth-ite (ăn'ê-tôth-it). See ANATHOTHITE.

An'gel [Gr. angelos, messenger, envoy]. 1. A celestial being a little higher in dignity than man. Angels are spiritual beings (Heb. 1:14), and they neither marry nor are given in marriage (Matt. 22:30). From their worship of God as well, probably, as from their nature, they are called, at least in poetry, sons of God (Job 1:6; 38:7); and from their character, holy ones (Job 5:1, R.V.; Ps. 89:5, 7, R.V.). Their office is denoted by the term angel (messenger). In the later books differences among angels in rank and dignity are implied, for there are archangels (chief angels), as well as those of a more ordinary kind (I Thess. 4:16; Jude 9). This twofold distinction does not seem to be all. Both among fallen angels and angels unfallen there are thrones, dominions, principalities, and powers (Rom. 8:38; Eph. 1:21; 3:10; Col. 1:16; 2:15). Cherubim and seraphim seem also to belong to the angelic order. The inanimate powers of nature, by which the ordinary economy of the universe is carried on, may be personified as God's messengers (Ps. 104:4, R.V.); but pestilence and death, when acts of the divine government, are represented as under angelic charge (II Sam. 24:16; Zech. 1:7-17). Unseen they encamp round about them that fear God (II Kings 6:17; Ps. 34:7; Isa. 63:9). The angel of the Lord came in human form to Abraham, Hagar, and Lot, to Moses and Joshua, to the Israelites at Bochim, to Gideon and Manoah. An angel came to Elijah and to Daniel. Angels are fittingly prominent in the history of Jesus, announcing his birth and that of his forerunner, heralding his advent to the shepherds, ministering unto him after his victory over temptation and in the Garden (Luke 22:43, a passage omitted in many ancient authorities), and bearing tidings to his disciples at the resurrection and ascension. An angel also aided Peter and stood by Paul. The names of some angels or archangels are mentioned, namely, Gabriel (Dan. 8:16; 9:21; Luke 1:19, 26), and Michael (Dan. 10:13, 21; 12:1; Jude 9; Rev. 12:7). The Apocrypha adds Raphael and Uriel; see MICHAEL 11. The ancient Persians recognized the existence of angels of different rank and many scholars maintain that the later Hebrew conception of angels was influenced by Zoroastrianism.

While any angel sent to execute the commands of God might be called the angel of the Lord (II Sam. 24:16; I Kings 19:5, 7), yet mention is made of an angel under circumstances that justify one in always thinking of the same angel, who is distinguished from Jehovah, and yet is identified with him (Gen. 16:10, 13; 18:2-4, 13, 14, 33; 22:11, 12, 15, 16; 31:11, 13; Ex. 3: 2, 4; Josh. 5:13-15; 6:2; Zech. 1:10-13; 3:1, 2), who revealed the face of God (Gen. 32:30), in whom was Jehovah's name (Ex. 23:21), and whose presence was equivalent to Jehovah's presence (Ex. 32:34; 33:14; Isa. 63:9). The angel of the Lord thus appears as a manifestation of Jehovah himself, one with Jehovah and yet different from him. See THEOPHANY.

2. The representative of a church; but whether this is the presbyter or bishop, or the pastor of the local church, or a celestial being of the angelic order watching over the church, is by no means clear. For the interpretation that the angel is a preacher, cf. the meaning of the name Malachi. Another view is that these angels are personifications of their churches (Rev. 1:20; 2:1, 8, 12, 18; 3:1, 7, 14).

A-ni'am (á-ní'am [I am a paternal uncle or kinsman, or perhaps from the root ná'em, to be pleasant, agreeable]. A Manassite, family of Shemida (I Chron. 7:19; cf. Num. 26:32).

A'nim (ā'nim) [fountains]. A town in the hill country of Judah, mentioned immediately after Eshtemoah (Josh. 15:50). It is apparently identical with Khirbet Ghuwein, about 11 miles s. of Hebron and 3 s. of es-Sem'ua, i.e., Eshtemoa.

An'ise. An umbelliferous plant (Pimpinella anisum) somewhat like caraway in appearance, occasionally cultivated in the East for its seeds, which are used as a seasoning and as a carminative. The English versions render the Greek word anēthon (Matt. 23:23) in the text by anise, on the marg. by dill. The latter is Anethum graveolens of the same order (umbelliferous) as anise, resembles anise in appearance and properties, and is more commonly grown in gardens.

An'kle Chain. A chain binding together the two ankles of a woman, so as to compel her to take short steps, and, especially when combined with anklets, to make a tinkling sound when she walked (Num. 31:50; Isa. 3:20, both R.V.; in A.V. called simply chains and ornaments of the legs).

An'klet. An ornament for the ankles, consisting of metallic or glass rings, and corresponding to bracelets on the wrists. Anklets are often worn by boys as well as women in the East (Isa. 3:18, R.V.; in A.V., called tinkling ornaments about the feet). See ANKLE CHAIN.

An'na (ăn'ā), Gr. form of Hannah [grace]. A widow, daughter of Phanneel of the tribe of Asher. Her married life had lasted 7 years. At the age of 84 she visited the Temple daily, and was there when the Infant Jesus was brought to be dedicated. A prophetess, she recognized and proclaimed him to be the Messiah (Luke 2:36-38).

An'nas (ăn'ās), Gr. for Hanan, contraction of Hananiah [Jehovah has been gracious]. A high priest at Jerusalem, as was Caiaphas, in the year when John the Baptist began his ministry (Luke 3:2), it is thought about A.D. 26. He is called Ananos by Josephus. He was appointed high priest about A.D. 6 by Quirinius, governor of Syria, and was deposed by the procurator of Judea, Valerius Gratus, about A.D. 15. Each of his 5 sons became high priest, and he was father-in-law of the high priest Caiaphas (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 2, 1 and 2; John 18:13). Although Annas was no longer officiating high priest when Jesus was arrested, he was yet the most influential priest and still bore the title (Luke 3:2; Acts 4:6), and to him Jesus was first taken (John 18:13), and after being examined by him was sent bound to Caiaphas (John 18:24). When Peter and John were subsequently arrested, Annas was prominent among their examiners (Acts 4:6).

An-nun'cia-tion [Lat. annuntiatio, announcement]. The announcement by the angel Gabriel to the Virgin Mary that she was to give birth to the Son of God (Luke 1:26-38). Annunciation or Lady Day is celebrated March 25.

A-noint'. To pour oil upon the head, or in any other way apply it to a person or to a thing. Among the Jews there were an ordinary, a sacred or official, and a medical or surgical anointing. The ordinary one was simply a matter of the toilet (II Sam. 12:20; Dan. 10:3; Matt. 6:17). The anointing of the head with oil in the time of Jesus was extended, as an act of courtesy, also to guests (Luke 7:46). The official anointing was conferred on prophets, priests, and kings. Elijah the prophet was directed to anoint Elisha, his successor (I Kings 19:16). Aaron the high priest, and those who followed him in the same office, were anointed with a holy consecrating oil (Ex. 28:41; 29:7; 30:30; 40:13, 15). Saul (I Sam. 9:16; 10:1), David (I Sam. 16:1, 12, 13; II Sam. 2:7; 3:39, etc.), Solomon (I Kings 1:34), Hazael of Syria (I Kings 19:15), Jehu (I Kings 19:16), Jehoash (II Kings 11:12), and others were anointed kings. Messiah and Christ mean the Anointed One. Jesus the Christ was anointed by the Spirit to be Prophet, Priest, and King. Of things, the altar (Ex. 29:36; 40:10), and the tabernacle (Ex. 30:26; 40:9), the laver, etc. (Ex. 40:9-11), were also anointed. The medicinal or surgical anointing, not necessarily with oil, was a customary remedy applied to the sick and wounded (Isa. 1:6; Luke 10:34; Rev. 3:18). The Christian places reliance, not in the natural means in themselves, but in God who works through the means and renders them effectual (James 5:14, 15).

Ant. Any hymenopterous insect of the family Formicidae. Ants are social insects like bees and wasps, to which they are not remotely akin. The species are numerous and widely diffused, the larger members, however, occurring in the tropics. The ant is held up as an example of industry and forethought, industriously providing food in summer and gathering grain in harvest (Prov. 6:6-8; 30:24, 25). That the ants of Palestine store food on which to live in winter is not expressly asserted in Proverbs, but it is clearly stated in similar Arabic maxims.

An'telope. An animal (Heb. tē'ō) mentioned in Deut. 14:5 and Isa. 51:20, both R.V. It was captured in nets, and was ceremonially fit for food. Targum, followed by A.V., renders wild ox; probably meaning the bubale, Antelope bubalis, of Egypt and Arabia, classed by the Arabs with wild oxen. In the Greek versions and the Vulgate, the word is generally rendered oryx, which refers to the Antelope leucoryx. This animal has horns which are long, slender, conical, and with ringlike ridges round. The animal is white, with the exception of a long tuft of hair under the throat, which is black. It is a native of Senaar, Upper Egypt, and Arabia, and is said to be found in Syria.

An'tho·thi'jah (ān'thō-thi'jā), in A.V. An'to·thi'jah. A Benjamite descended through Shashak (I Chron. 8:24).

An'ti·christ' [Gr. antichristos, against or instead of Christ]. The word antichrist may mean, as the etymology shows, an enemy of Christ or a usurper of Christ's name and rights. The former was probably its primary meaning, though the other idea was also attached to it. In the N.T. John alone uses the term (I John 2:18, 22; 4:3; II John 7). From I John 2:18, R.V., we learn that the Christians had been taught that "Antichrist" would appear in "the last hour," i.e., before the Second Advent of Christ. While not denying that Antichrist would be a single person, John lays stress on the spirit to be embodied in him, and declares that already many antichrists had come. The substance of the antichristian spirit, he says, is denial that Jesus is the Christ or the real incarnation of the Son of God, by which is meant not only denial of the doctrine, but moral antagonism to its religious implications. This opposition was already appearing in the Church in the persons of false teachers and false disciples, for Antichrist arises out of nominal Christianity itself. But while John alone uses the term, the doctrine is taught elsewhere. Jesus himself not only warned his apostles of "false Christs" (Matt. 24:5, 23, 24; Mark 13:21, 22)—by which, however, he meant primarily Jewish Messianic pretenders—but plainly intimated that apostasy would arise within the Church (see parables of Tares, Ten Virgins, Matt. 7:22, 23; 24:12, etc.). Paul more fully teaches (II Thess. 2:3-12) that before the Second Advent "the man of lawlessness" (R.V. marg.) must be revealed, "he that opposeth and exalteth himself against all that is called God or that is worshipped," and "in the temple of God" (probably the Church) claims to be God (to usurp the place of God). Paul too, like John, represents this as the culmination of a process of apostasy (II Thess. 2:7; cf. I Tim. 4:1). Many interpreters also see in the "beast" of Rev., ch. 13, a further description of Antichrist. Thus the N.T. declared that Christian history would not be a pure development of goodness and truth, but that within Christendom apostasy would arise, develop, have many representatives, and finally culminate in Antichrist proper (either a person or an institution, perhaps both), of which the essential spirit would be antagonism to Christ and the impious claim of that allegiance from man's mind and life which is alone due to God and his Son. In different periods, various apostasies have seemed to believers to be Antichrist, and have more or less embodied the antichristian principle; but doubtless the full manifestation of Antichrist is yet to come, and will precede and be destroyed at the Second Advent of the Lord. An'ti·och (ān'ti-ōk) [Gr. Antiocheia]. 1. The metropolis of Syria under the Macedonian Greek dynasty (I Macc. 3:37 et passim), founded about 300 B.C. by Seleucus Nicator and named by him after Antiochus, his father. It was situated on the s. side of the Orontes, about 15 miles from its mouth, the river being navigable up to the city. Mount Casius approached it closely on the s., and the Amanus mountains were not far off on the w., while in front lay the valley of the Orontes, 5 or 6 miles across. The city became large and numerous inhabited. It remained the capital when the Roman province of Syria was erected in 64 B.C. Its population was mixed, with not a few Jews. Christians who fled from Jerusalem to avoid the persecution which arose upon the martyrdom of Stephen preached the gospel here, addressing at first only Jews who spoke the Aramaic tongue, then those who spoke Greek. Barnabas was despatched from Jerusalem to aid the work. After laboring there for a while he fetched as a coadjutor Paul from Tarsus. For a whole year these two great evangelists made the city the sphere of their labors and taught much people. The disciples were called Christians first in Antioch (Acts 11:19-26). Further reinforcements arrived in the persons of prophets (ch. 11:27). This city also became the birthplace of foreign missions. From Antioch Paul and Barnabas were sent on a missionary journey (ch. 13:2). On its completion they returned to the city (ch. 14:26). The disciples at Antioch kept up active intercourse with the brethren at Jerusalem. In time of famine, they sent relief to them (ch. 11:28-30), and they submitted the question regarding the circumcision of Gentile converts to a council at Jerusalem (ch. 15). The Second Missionary Journey of Paul, like the first, commenced with a departure from Antioch (ch. 15:35, 36), to which Paul returned, this time by way of Caesarea (ch. 18:22). At Antioch Paul withstood Peter to the face because of his vacillating conduct with regard to the Gentile converts (Gal. 2:11). In apostolic days it was a great city of over 500,000 inhabitants and known as "Antioch the Beautiful," "The Queen of the East," and "The Third Metropolis of the Roman Empire" (after Rome and Alexandria). In A.D. 538 Chosroes, the Persian king, took and destroyed it. It was rebuilt by the Roman emperor Justinian. In A.D. 635 it was taken by the Moslems, from whom it passed in 1084 to the Turks. Except between 1098 and 1269, when it was the seat of a Christian kingdom founded by the crusaders, it has remained in Mohammedan hands. The place, still called Antakiya, is now unimportant.

2. A town in Asia Minor, also founded by Seleucus Nicator and named after his father, Antiochus. It was situated in Phrygia, near the borders of Pisidia, and was accordingly designated Antioch toward Pisidia and Pisidian Antioch to distinguish it from Antioch in Syria. It was included within the Roman province of Galatia, and was the center of the civil and military administration of the s. part of the province. Jews dwelt there, and had a synagogue (Acts 13:14). Barnabas and Paul visited it on their First Missionary Journey (Acts 13:14-52; 14:19-21; II Tim. 3:11). In 1833 Arundel identified the ruins of this Antioch near the modern town of Yalvach.

Ant'i-o-chus (än-ti'ô-kûs) [Gr., withstand-er]. 1. ANTIOCHUS III, surnamed the Great, king of Syria and 6th ruler of the Seleucidan dynasty, father of Seleucus IV and Antiochus Epiphanes (I Macc. 1:10; 8:6-8). He reigned from 223 to 187 B.C. He attempted to wrest Coelestria, Phoenicia, and Palestine from Ptolemy IV, but was defeated at Raphia 217 B.C. After the death of Ptolemy he renewed the attempt and was successful, gaining the decisive battle of Paneas in 198. He invaded Europe, but his victorious career was terminated at Thermopylae. On his retreat he was decisively defeated at Magnesia in Asia in 190. By the terms of peace he was obliged to send 20 hostages to Rome, including his son, and pay an enormous tribute. While plundering a temple in Susiana he was murdered by a mob. The Seleucidian line was continued as follows:

2. ANTIOCHUS E·PIPH·A·NES (ê-pîf'ä-nêz), the 8th ruler of the house of Seleucidae, 175-163 B.C. (I Macc. 1:10; 6:16). He passed 15 years of his life as a hostage at Rome (I Macc. 1:10). He was an energetic prince who extended and strengthened his kingdom, but enraged his subjects by religious intolerance. He stirred up the Jews by robbing the Temple and setting up a statue of Jupiter in the Holy of Holies. He also pulled down the walls of Jerusalem, commanded the sacrifice of swine, forbade circumcision, and destroyed all the sacred books that could be found. It was these outrages which induced the revolt of the Maccabees (I Macc. 1:41-53). He died between Elymais and Babylon, shortly after receiving news of the Jewish revolt (I Macc. 6:1-16).

3. ANTIOCHUS EU·PA·TOR, son of the above. As a minor he reigned 2 years under the regency of Lysias (I Macc. 6:17-63). He was slain and succeeded by Demetrius Soter.

4. ANTIOCHUS VI, the young child of the pretender Alexander Balas. He was set up as king by the general Tryphon, who used him merely as a cloak for his own ambition, and slew him as soon as he felt himself established, 142/1 B.C. (I Macc. 11:39, 40, 54; 13:31, 32).

5. ANTIOCHUS VII, brother of Demetrius II, who reigned in the stead of Demetrius during his imprisonment by Arsaces, 138-129 B.C. He defeated Tryphon (I Macc. 15: 1, 10-14), made first a treaty with Simon Maccabaeus, but afterward repudiated his help and tried to rob the Temple. His attempt was frustrated by Simon's sons Judas and John Hyrcanus. Later Simon and 2 of his sons, Matathias and Judas, were assassinated. Antiochus besieged Jerusalem and again established Syrian suzerainty over Judea (I Macc. 16:1-10).

6. A Jew known only as being the father of the councillor Numenius (I Macc. 12:16).

Ant'i-pas (än'ti-päs), contraction of Antipater. 1. A Christian who suffered martyrdom at Pergamum, in Asia Minor (Rev. 2:12, 13).

2. Son of Herod the Great; see HEROD 2.

Antipater (ān-tip'ā-tēr) [Lat., from Gr., in place of the father]. 1. A Jew, son of Jason. He was a counselor, and one of two ambassadors sent by Jonathan and the elders to Rome to renew the alliance (1 Macc. 12:16; 14:22; Jos. Antiq. xiii. 5, 8). His father was perhaps the Jason who had formerly gone on a similar mission (Jos. Antiq. viii. 17).

2. Father of Herod the Great (Jos. Antiq. xiv. 7, 3).

Antipatris (ān-tip'ā-tris) [Gr., belonging to Antipater]. A town founded by Herod the Great, in the fertile plain of Caphar Saba, on the site of that village, near the mountains, and called after Antipater, his father. It was surrounded by a river (Jos. Antiq. xiii. 15, 1; xvi. 5, 2; War i. 4, 7; 21, 9). It lay on the Roman military road between Jerusalem and Caesarea, about 39 miles from the former city and 24 from the latter. The old name lingers under the modern form Kefr Saba, and its site was sought at this village; but the conditions of the site are in all other respects fulfilled at Rās el 'Ain, at the junction of the old Roman road from Jerusalem with that from Ramleh through Lydda to Caesarea. From the base of the mound that covers the site the River 'Aujah gushes forth a full-sized stream. It was the limit of Paul's journey the first night while he was being taken as a prisoner from Jerusalem to Caesarea (Acts 23:31). See APHEK 3.

Antonia (ān-tō'nī-ā), Tow'er of. A castle connected with the Temple at Jerusalem. It presumably occupied the site of the stronghold Birah, which appertained to the Temple and was restored by Nehemiah (Neh. 2:8). John Hyrcanus built the tower, and he generally dwelt in it and kept the priestly vestments there, for he was entitled to wear them (Jos. Antiq. xv. 11, 4; xviii. 4, 3). Until the time of Herod the Great it was known as the Baris, but Herod repaired it at vast expense, and fortified it more firmly than before in order that it might guard the Temple, and named it Antonia in honor of Mark Antony (Jos. War i. 21, 1; v. 5, 8). It was situated at the n.w. corner of the Temple area, on a rock 50 cubits in height, the highest point in the neighborhood. Its presence there prevented the area from being foursquare (Jos. War vi. 5, 4). The fortress had the amplitude and form of a palace, with chambers, courts, barracks, and baths. Its walls rose 40 cubits above the rock on which they rested. At the corners were turrets, 3 of which were 50 cubits high, while the 4th, which overlooked the Temple, was 70 cubits. It was separated by a deep trench from the hill Bezetha (Jos. War v. 4, 2), but was connected with the n. and w. cloisters, at the junction of which it stood, with gates for the guards and a staircase (cf. Acts 21:35 with v. 37; v. 40 with ch. 22:24), and with the inner Temple at its e. gate by a subterranean passage (Jos. Antiq. xv. 11, 7), which seems to have existed in the Baris as built by Hyrcanus (ibid. xiii. 11, 2). Over the Temple end of this underground passage Herod erected a tower. The arrangement was intended to afford him a way of escape in case of a popular sedition. In the castle a Roman legion was stationed, which stood on guard in the cloisters, especially during the Jewish festivals, to prevent any excesses on the part of the populace (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 4, 3; War v. 5, 8). The castle was finally demolished by order of Titus in A.D. 70.

The most tragic event in the history of the castle occurred during the reign of Aristobulus, son of Hyrcanus. The king lay sick in one of its chambers. His beloved brother Antigonus, returning from the war, hastened clad in armor and accompanied by his military escort to the Temple to offer prayers for the recovery of the king. The act was misrepresented to Aristobulus; but he summoned his brother to his bedside, with the request that he come unarmed, and ordered soldiers to lie in the underground passage and slay him if he appeared in armor. The queen suppressed the message in part, and contrived to have Antigonus informed that the king desired to see his splendid armor. Suspecting nothing, he entered the passage clad in mail and was murdered. The deed was reported to the king, and the shock brought on a hemorrhage. A slave bore away the vessel in which the blood had been caught, but stumbled on the spot where Antigonus had been slain. The blood of the two brothers mingled on the floor. A cry of horror ran through the palace, and roused the king to inquire the cause. When he learned what had occurred he was filled with an agony of remorse and instantly expired (Jos. Antiq. xiii. 11).

Paul, when rescued from the infuriated mob that had dragged him out of the Temple, was carried into this castle, and on the way was allowed to address the people from the stairs (Acts 21:30 seq.).

Antothijah (ān-tō-thī'já). See ANTHOTHIAH.

Anthothite (ān-tōth-it). See ANATHOTHITE.

Anub (ā'nūb) [ety. uncertain, perhaps, joined together]. A man of Judah, son of Hakkoz (1 Chron. 4:8, R.V.).

Ape. The Hebrew word kōph, derived from Sans. kapi, is rendered ape, and probably includes both apes, which are without tails, and monkeys, which possess them. There is a Greek word kēbos or kēpos (long-tailed monkey), but the LXX uses pithēkos, which according to Aristotle is tailless. There is no genuine ape either in Malabar or in any other part of India. If the animals that were brought to Palestine by the vessels that went to Ophir for gold (I Kings 10:22; II Chron. 9:21) came from India, they were a species of tailed monkey, perhaps that called Hanuman (Semnopithecus entellus), which is common throughout India, and is worshiped as a god. There is no reason to believe that any one kind, or even family, of apes is intended.

Apelles (ā-pēl'ez). An approved Christian at Rome to whom Paul sent a salutation (Rom. 16:10).

Apheema (ā-fēr'ē-mā). A government district which in the time of Jonathan Maccabaeus was separated from Samaria, annexed to Judea, and placed under the authority of the high priest (I Macc. 11:34; cf. ch. 10:30, 38). The name is probably a Greek form of Ephraim, and designates the most s. part of Samaria (cf. John 11:54).

Apharshites (ā-fār'sūk-its or Aph'ar-sāth'chites) (ā-fār-sāth'kīts). A tribe from beyond the Euphrates, settled by Asnapper in Samaria (Ezra 4:9; 5:6).

Apharites (ā-fār'sīts). An eastern tribe, transplanted by Asnapper to Samaria (Ezra 4:9).

Aphek (ā'fēk) [strength, fortress]. 1. A city apparently n. of Zidon (Josh. 13:4), and hence commonly identified with Afka, the ancient Aphaca, 23 miles n.e. of Beirut, at the source of the River of Byblos, the Adonis or Nahr Ibrāhīm.

2. Aphek, variant Aphk, situated within the territory of Asher, but not cleared of its Canaanite inhabitants (Josh. 19:30; Judg. 1:31). It is located by Alt at Tell Kurdāneh, near the sources of the Na'mein River, which flows into the Mediterranean a little to the s.e. of Acco.

3. A town in the Plain of Sharon (Josh. 12:18, cf. Greek text of Rahlfs), at the source of the 'Aujeh, at Rās el-'Ain (Jos. War ii, 19, 1). Perhaps it was here that the Philistines encamped before the first battle with Israel at Ebenezer. Shiloh was within 25 miles (I Sam. 4:1, 12). See ANTIPATRIS.

4. A town apparently between Shunem and Jezreel. The Philistines pitched at Shunem, but soon discovered that the Israelites had occupied the heights of Gilboa. From Shunem they advanced to Aphek, and thence to Jezreel, where they attacked the Israelites who had descended to the spring at Jezreel, forcing them back to their former position on Gilboa and completing the slaughter on that mountain (I Sam. 28:4; 29:1, 11; 31:1). It may also be the town of Aphek to which Benhadad advanced with the intention of giving battle to Ahab, and to which he and his army retreated after his defeat, and where a wall fell and 27,000 of his soldiers were killed (I Kings 20:26-30); and it may also be the town where Joash, king of Israel, should, according to prophecy, smite the Syrians till they were consumed (II Kings 13:14-19). The situation presupposed in the narratives is fully met by a town w. of the Jordan in the Plain of Jezreel. Still the Aphek referred to in these two passages may be the town of that name beyond Jordan in Golan, about 3 miles e. of the Sea of Galilee, on the highway between Damascus and Beth-shean, and now represented by the village of Afik or Fik.

Aphe'kah (ā-fē'kā) [strong place, fortification]. A town in the hill country of Judah (Josh. 15:53); probably the same as Aphek 1.

Aph'ah (ā-fī'ā). An ancestor of King Saul (I Sam. 9:1).

A'phik (ā'fik). See APHEK 2.

Aph'rah (ā'f'rā), in R.V. Beth-'le-aph'rah [dust]. A town (Micah 1:10), site unknown.

Aph'ses (ā'f'sēz). See HAPPIZZEE.

A-poc'a-lypse (ā-pōk'ā-līps) [Gr., disclosure, revelation]. A name frequently given to the last book of the Bible. See REVELATION.

A-poc'ry-pha (ā-pōk'ri-fā) [Gr. apokrypha, hidden things, used by ecclesiastical writers for: 1. matters secret or mysterious; 2. of unknown origin, forged, spurious; 3. unrecognized, uncanonical]. The name generally given to the following 16 books: I and II Esdras, Tobit, Judith, The Rest of Esther, The Wisdom of Solomon, Ecclesiasticus, Baruch with The Epistle of Jeremy, The Song of the Three Holy Children, The History of Susanna, Bel and the Dragon, The Prayer of Manasses, I, II, III, and IV Maccabees. Sometimes the number is limited to fourteen, III and IV Maccabees being omitted.

Unlike the books of the O.T., which are in Hebrew, with some portions in Aramaic, the apocryphal productions are in Greek, though at least Judith, Ecclesiasticus, Baruch, chs. 1:1 to 3:8, and I Maccabees were originally written in Hebrew. The Jewish Church considered them uninspired, and some of their writers disclaim inspiration (Prologue to Ecclesiasticus; II Macc. 2:23; 15:38). The Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha were produced between about 250 B.C. and somewhere in the early Christian centuries. They are not found in the Hebrew canon; they are never quoted by Jesus; and it cannot with certainty be affirmed that the apostles ever directly allude to them. The early churches permitted them to be read for edification, and recommended them to the catechumens for study, but rejected them from the canon, their decision carrying authority during the Middle Ages, as it does now with the various Protestant Churches. Thus the Church of England in the 6th of the Thirty-nine Articles published in 1562 calls the apocryphal treatises books which "the Church doth read for example of life and instruction of manners; but yet doth it not apply them to establish any doctrine." The Westminster Confession of 1643 declares, as a matter of creed, that "the books, commonly called Apocrypha, not being of divine inspiration, are no part of the canon of Scripture, and therefore are of no authority in the Church of God, or to be any otherwise approved or made use of than other human writings." The Council of Trent at its sitting on April 8, 1546, declared the following apocryphal books to be canonical: Tobit, Judith, The Wisdom of Solomon, Ecclesiasticus, Baruch (The Epistle of Jeremy being ch. 6), and I and II Maccabees, and adding The Rest of Esther to the canonical Esther, and incorporating The History of Susanna, The Song of the Three Holy Children, and Bel and the Dragon with Daniel. The Council pronounced an anathema against anyone who ventured to differ from it in opinion. This has since regulated the belief of the Roman Catholic Church. The Apocrypha was introduced into the English version by Coverdale in 1535, and was included in the King James Version, but began to be omitted as early as 1629. When inserted, it was placed between the O.T. and the N.T. A controversy on the subject was carried on between the years 1821 and 1826, which resulted in the exclusion of the Apocrypha from all Bibles issued by the British and Foreign Bible Society.

1. I Es'dras [Esdras, Gr. for Ezra]. The book narrates in Greek the decline and fall of the Kingdom of Judah from the time of Josiah, the destruction of Jerusalem, the Babylonian Captivity, the Return of the exiles, and the share taken by Ezra in reorganizing the Jewish polity. In some respects it amplifies the Biblical narrative; it probably is a translation from a Hebrew or Aramaic original. It is followed by Josephus in the legend of the three courtiers (cf. I Esdras 3:1 to 4:44 with Jos. Antiq. xi. 3, 2-8, etc.). The date of the book lies between 300 B.C. and A.D. 100. The work is known as III Esdras in the Vulgate, where it appears as an appendix to the N.T.;

no authority is attributed to it by the Church of Rome.

2. II ES'DRAS. This is in quite a different style from I Esdras, which it follows, under the name of IV Esdras, in the Vulgate in the appendix to the N.T. It is not a history, but a religious treatise, much in the style of the Hebrew prophets, and is apocalyptic in character. Its kernel, consisting of chs. 3 to 14, purports to record 7 revelations granted to Ezra in Babylon, several of which took the form of visions: the woman that mourned (chs. 9:38 to 10:56), the eagle and the lion (chs. 11:1 to 12:39), the man that rose from the sea (ch. 13:1-56). The author of these chapters is unknown; but he was evidently a Jew, full of affection for his people (Jesus in ch. 7:28 is wanting in the Oriental versions). Since the vision of the eagle, which is expressly based on the prophecy of Daniel (II Esdras 12:11), seems to refer to the Roman Empire, a date from about A.D. 88 to about A.D. 117 is generally accepted. A date later than A.D. 200 is precluded by the citation of II Esdras 5:35 in Greek by Clement of Alexandria, with the preface, "Esdras the prophet says." The first 2 and the last 2 chapters of II Esdras (chs. 1; 2; 15; 16) are additions. They are lacking in the Oriental versions and in a majority of the best Latin manuscripts. They date from a time after the LXX was in circulation, for the Minor Prophets are arranged in the order of the Greek version (ch. 1:39, 40). Chapters 1 and 2 abound in reminiscences of the New Testament and justify the rejection of Israel and the substitution of the Gentiles (chs. 1:24, 25, 35-40; 2:10, 11, 34); and accordingly were written by a Christian, not unlikely a Christian Jew.

3. TO'BRI. This is a narrative of a certain pious Naphtalite, Tobit by name, who has a son Tobias. The father loses his eyesight. The son, dispatched to obtain payment of a debt to Rages in Media, is led on by an angel to Ecabata, where he makes a romantic marriage with a widow, who still remained a virgin, though she had been married to seven husbands, all of whom had been killed by Asmodeus, the evil spirit, on their marriage day. Tobias, however, is encouraged by the angel to become the eighth husband of the virgin-widow, and escapes death by burning the inner parts of a fish, the smoke of which puts the evil spirit to flight. Then he cures his father's blindness by anointing the darkened eyes with the gall of the fish which had already proved so useful. Tobit is manifestly a moral tale, and not serious history. The book was probably written in Aramaic toward the close of the 3d century B.C.

4. JU'DITH. A thrilling narrative of how Judith, a Jewish widow, in order to deliver her people, insinuated herself into the good graces of Holofernes, an Assyrian commander, then besieging Bethulia. She seized his sword when he was asleep and cut off his head. The narrative contains misstatements, anachronisms, and geographical absurdities. It is doubtful if there is any truth in the story, which may possibly have been suggested to the author by the narrative of Jael and Sisera (Judg. 4:17-22). The first distinct reference to the book is in an epistle of Clement of Rome, about the end of the 1st century A.D., but it may have existed as early as 175 to 100 B.C., say 400 or 600 years after the event it professed to record. By that time to say that Nabuchodonosor (Nebuchadnezzar) reigned in Nineveh, instead of Babylon (Judith 1:1), would not look so erroneous as it would to a contemporary of the great king. It is believed that the Greek text goes back to a lost Hebrew original.

5. THE REST OF ES'THER. The Hebrew canonical Esther ends with a short 10th chapter of 3 verses. The apocryphal production adds 10 verses more, and 6 chapters (chs. 11 to 16). In the LXX this supplementary matter is distributed in 7 portions through the text, and does not interrupt the history. It amplifies parts of the Scripture narrative by supplying a religious element, though it often contradicts the history as contained in the Hebrew. These Greek additions may be the work of different authors, and are by some supposed to have been interpolated by an Egyptian Jew, who wrote about the time of Ptolemy Philometor, 181-145 B.C. Some authorities, however, date the additions to a period between 125 B.C. and A.D. 90.

6. THE WIS'DOM OF SOL'O-MON. This pseudograph is an ethical treatise in commendation of wisdom and righteousness, and in denunciation of iniquity and idolatry. The passages which point out the sin and folly of image worship recall those on the same theme in The Psalms and Isaiah (cf. Wisd. of Sol. 13:11-19 with Psalms 115; 135:15-18; and Isa. 40:19-25; 44:9-20). It is remarkable to what extent the author, in referring to historical incidents illustrative of his doctrine, limits himself to those recorded in the Pentateuch. He writes in the person of Solomon; says that he was chosen by God as king of his people, and was by him directed to build a temple and an altar, the former on the model of the tabernacle. He was a man of genius and of piety, his religious character being sustained by his belief in immortality. He wrote in Greek, and probably was an Alexandrian Jew, who lived apparently between 150 and 50 B.C.; some would date the book as late as between 50 B.C. and A.D. 10. Though never formally quoted or in any way referred to in the N.T., yet occasionally both the language and the trains of thought in the N.T. somewhat resemble those in The Wisdom of Solomon (cf. Wisd. of Sol. 5:18-20 with Eph. 6:14-17; Wisd. of Sol. 7:26 with Heb. 1:2-6; and Wisd. of Sol. 14:13-31 with Rom. 1:19-32).

7. EC-CLE'SI-AS'TI-CUS, called also The Wisdom of Jesus, the Son of Sirach. This is a comparatively long work, extending to 51 chapters. In ch. 50:1-21 great commendation is bestowed on Simon, the high priest, the son of Onias, probably the 2d of that name (c. 218-198 B.C.). The work may, therefore, have been written in the 1st quarter of the 2d century B.C. (200-175). It was originally in Hebrew. The author, Jesus, son of Sirach, of Jerusalem (ch. 50:27), was the grandfather of the translator, who arrived in Egypt "in the eight and thirtieth year of Euergetes the king." The reference is probably to Ptolemy Physcon, surnamed Euergetes (II), who reigned as coregent from 169 to 164 and as sole king from 145 to 116 B.C. This would give 132 B.C. as the date of the grandson's arrival in Egypt, soon after which the translation was made. The great theme of the work is wisdom. It is a valuable ethical treatise, in places reminding one of the books of Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and parts of Job, in the canonical Scriptures, and of The Wisdom of Solomon in the Apocrypha.

8. BAR'UCH, with The Epistle of Jeremy (Jeremiah). A pseudograph. Baruch was Jeremiah's friend. The first 5 chapters are made nominally to emanate from Baruch, while the 6th is headed "The Epistle of Jeremy." After an introduction describing the origin of the work (Baruch 1:1-14), the book of Baruch falls naturally into 3 divisions: 1. Israel's confession of sin and prayer for forgiveness and restoration to favor (chs. 1:15 to 3:8). This part bears evidence of having been written originally in Hebrew. It possibly belongs to the early decades of the 2d century B.C., although it may date from the times of the Persian supremacy. 2. Exhortation to return to the fountain of wisdom (chs. 3:9 to 4:4). 3. Encouragement, and promise of deliverance (chs. 4:5 to 5:9). Opinion is divided whether these 2 latter sections were written originally in Hebrew or in Greek. It is disputed whether the similarity between ch. 5 and Psalm of Solomon 11 indicates that the chapter was based upon the psalm, and hence written after the middle of the 1st century B.C., or that both writings rest independently on the LXX. The Epistle of Jeremy warns the Jews in exile against Babylonian idolatry.

9. THE SONG OF THE THREE HO'LY CHIL'DREN was designed to fit into the canonical Daniel between ch. 3:23 and v. 24. It was probably written in the 1st century B.C., and may have been composed originally in Hebrew. (Cf. Song of Three Childr. 35-68 with Psalm 148).

10. THE HIS'TO-RY OF SU-SAN'NA. This is also an apocryphal addition to Daniel, showing how the prophet sagaciously discovered an accusation against Susanna, a godly woman, to be a malignant slander. The book probably goes back to a Hebrew original which may have been written 80-50 B.C. In the LXX it precedes Daniel, while in the Vulgate it directly follows it.

11. BEL AND THE DRAG'ON. Another apocryphal addition to The Book of Daniel; the prophet proves that the priests of Bel and their families ate the food offered to the idol; and he kills a dragon, for which, a second time, he is put into a lions' den. The original may have been written in Hebrew in the 1st century B.C. In the LXX it directly follows Daniel, while in the Vulgate it comes after Susanna.

12. THE PRAYER OF MA-NAS'SES, king of Judah, when he was held captive in Babylon (cf. II Chron. 33:12, 13). Not in Roman canon, but appended to N.T. Author unknown; date very uncertain, but earlier than the 3d century A.D.

13. I MAC'CA-BEES. A historical work of great value, giving an account of the Jewish war of independence under the Maccabee family of Levites in the 2d century B.C.; see ANTI-OC'HUS 2 and MACCABEE. Its author, whose name is unknown, was evidently a Palestinian Jew who wrote perhaps between 105 and 63 B.C. It was translated into Greek from a Hebrew original which survived as late as the time of Jerome.

14. II MAC'CA-BEES is professedly an abridgment of the large work of Jason of Cyrene. It is concerned chiefly with Jewish history from the reign of Seleucus IV, 175 B.C., to the death of Nicanor in 161 B.C. It is much less valuable than the First Book, and the author has a love of the marvelous which diminishes the credibility of his narrations, though they contain a good deal of truth. The book was written after 125 B.C., and before the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70.

15. III MAC'CA-BEES professes to record events from the reign of Ptolemy (IV) Philopator (221-203 B.C.). After his victory at Raphia (217), Ptolemy tries to enter the Temple in Jerusalem but, struck from heaven, he falls to the ground. Upon his return to Alexandria, he seeks to massacre the Jews of Egypt, but all his attempts are miraculously thwarted. In the end he frees them and gives them a banquet lasting 7 days. The book was written shortly before or shortly after the beginning of the Christian Era. It is extant in Greek, but not in the Vulgate.

16. IV MAC'CA-BEES is a moral treatise advocating the mastery of the passions, and illustrating its teaching by examples of constancy under suffering, drawn from Maccabaeae times. It was written after II Maccabees and before the destruction of Jerusalem. It is extant in Greek, but not in the Vulgate.

Ap'ol'lo'ni-a (āp'ō-lō'nī-ā) [Gr., pertaining to Apollo]. A town of Macedonia, on the Egnatian Way, 28 miles W. of Amphipolis. Paul passed through it as he journeyed to Thessalonica (Acts 17:1).

Ap'ol'lo'ni-us (āp'ō-lō'nī-ūs) [Lat., from Gr., pertaining to Apollo]. 1. An official under Antiochus Epiphanes, who, sent to Judea to collect tribute, treacherously ordered a massacre at Jerusalem (I Macc. 1:29-32; II Macc. 5:24-26; cf. ch. 4:21). He became governor of Samaria (Jos. Antiq. xii. 5, 5). He was defeated and slain by Judas Maccabaeus (I Macc. 3:10; Jos. Antiq. xii. 7, 1).

2. Governor of Coele Syria, whom Demetrius II made general of his army. He was defeated in battle by Jonathan Maccabaeus at Ashdod (I Macc. 10:69-85). Less credibly, Josephus speaks of him as on the side of Alexander Balas (Jos. Antiq. xiii. 4, 3 and 4).

Ap'ol'los (ā-pōl'ōs), modification of Apollonius, Apollodorus, or Apollonides. A Jew born at Alexandria, eloquent and learned, and deeply versed in the O.T. Scriptures. He became a disciple of John the Baptist, and zealously taught concerning the Messiah, though knowing only the baptism of repentance. While itinerating in Asia Minor for this purpose, he met, at Ephesus, Aquila and Priscilla, who instructed him more fully; and the brethren wrote letters of introduction for him to the brethren in Achaia. On arriving in Greece, he helped the Christians, publicly confuting the Jews, and showing from the Scriptures that Jesus is the Christ (Acts 18:24-28). The disciples with whom Paul soon afterward fell in at Ephesus, who knew only John's baptism, and had never heard that there was a Holy Spirit, were probably converts of Apollos (Acts 19:1-7). Apollos' preaching at Corinth raised a party in the church at that place (I Cor. 1:12; 3:4, 5, 6, 22; 4:6). But Paul had all confidence in him, and urged him to revisit Corinth (I Cor. 16:12). He also enjoined Titus to help Apollos, apparently then in or on his way to Crete (Titus 3:13). It is thought by many scholars that Apollos was the writer of The Epistle to the Hebrews.

Ap'ol'lyon (ā-pōl'yūn) [Gr., destroying, a destroyer]. The angel of the abyss (Rev. 9:11). The Greek synonym of Hebrew Abaddon.

A'pos'tle [Gr., one sent forth, a messenger, an ambassador (John 13:16, R.V. marg.)]. 1. One of the men selected by Jesus to be eye-witnesses of the events of his life, to see him after his resurrection, and to testify to mankind concerning him (Matt. 10:2-42; Acts 1:21, 22; I Cor. 9:1). They were chosen in succession at a very early period of the Saviour's public life. First came Andrew and his brother Simon, the well-known Simon Peter (Matt. 4:18-20; 10:2; Mark 1:16-18; Luke 6:14; John 1:35-42); then apparently James and John, sons of Zebedee (Matt. 4:21, 22; 10:2; Mark 1:19, 20; Luke 6:14); then seemingly Philip and Nathanael, named also Bartholomew (John 1:43-51); and subsequently 6 more, viz., Matthew, called also Levi (Matt. 9:9-13; Mark 2:14-17; Luke 5:27-32); Thomas; James the son of Alphaeus; Simon the Zealot or Cananaean; Judas, the brother of James; and Judas Iscariot (Matt. 10:1-4; Mark 3:16-19; Luke 6:13-16; Acts 1:13, all R.V.). The apostles were regarded as illiterate men by the higher Jewish dignitaries who had before them Peter and John (Acts 4:13). All they seem to have meant was that the apostles had received elementary rather than higher education. Jesus gave great attention to their spiritual training: yet to the last they failed to understand his mission, believing that he was about to set up a temporal rather than a spiritual kingdom (Matt. 20:20-28; Mark 10:35-45; Acts 1:6); they slept in the hour of his agony in the Garden (Matt. 26:40), and held aloof all the day of his death on the cross (Matt. 26:56; Mark 14:50). They were often called disciples or pupils (Matt. 11:1; 14:26; 20:17; John 20:2). Peter, James the son of Zebedee, and John, seem to have possessed a clearer comprehension of the Teacher's instructions and a higher appreciation of him than the others. On three different occasions they were singled out from the rest for special privilege. They were in the room at the raising from the dead of Jairus' daughter (Mark 5:37; Luke 8:51); they were present at the transfiguration (Matt. 17:1; Mark 9:2; Luke 9:28), and were in the Garden of Gethsemane during the agony (Matt. 26:37; Mark 14:33). Peter, though rash and impetuous in speech, was constitutionally the best fitted to lead. He is generally mentioned first, but not always (Gal. 2:9). John was the disciple whom Jesus peculiarly loved (John 19:26; 20:2; 21:7, 20). Thomas was scrupulous as to evidence, but yielded when the proof he sought was complete. Judas proved a traitor, who, betraying his divine Lord to death for the sake of lucre, and then repenting, committed suicide. The step taken to fill his place showed that the number of the apostles, fixed originally at 12, required, for a time at least, to be kept at that figure; the reason probably was that there might be as many apostles as there were tribes of Israel. Two men possessing the necessary qualifications were put forward, the one Joseph, called Barsabbas and surnamed Justus, and the other Matthias. The lot fell upon Matthias, who was consequently elected in Judas' room (Acts 1:15-26). The descent of the Holy Spirit on the Day of Pentecost produced a spiritual transformation of the apostles, fitting them for the great work to which they were called—the evangelization of the world (Acts, ch. 2). To this they at once addressed themselves, Peter and John taking the lead (Acts, chs. 3 to 5; 9:32 to 12:18). James was also zealous, for he became so obnoxious to the Jewish authorities that they slew him with the sword (Acts 12:2). Paul was divinely chosen and called for the arduous work of preaching the gospel to the Gentiles (Acts 9:1-31; 22:5-16; 26:1-20). He had not itinerated with Jesus while our Lord was on the earth; but he possessed the apostolic qualification of having seen Jesus after his resurrection. On the way to Damascus Jesus appeared to him and spoke to him, changing his hostility into passionate devotion. He was able to say: "Am I not an apostle? have I not seen Jesus our Lord?" (I Cor. 9:1). Paul was a highly educated man, and able to address cultured audiences of the Gentiles at Athens, Rome, and elsewhere. Nor did his intellectual acquirements lead him away from his proper work. His labors were so abundant that the record of them fills about half the book called The Acts. Where the several apostles labored, how they lived, and how they died is in most cases known only by the doubtful evidence of tradition. One matter, however, and an all-important one, is placed by tradition on a secure foundation, namely, that no second Judas appeared among them; all were faithful to the end; and some at least, if not even the majority, sealed their testimony to Jesus with their blood.

2. The word is occasionally applied in a less restricted sense in the N.T. to men of apostolic gifts, graces, labors, and successes. It is so notably of Barnabas, who was sent forth with Paul (Acts 13:3; 14:4, 14). Similarly one still meets with such expressions, as Judson, the apostle of Burma. The name is applied also to Jesus, in Heb. 3:1.

Ap'pa'im (ăp'ă-im) [nostrils; cf. Lat. naso]. A man of Judah, family of Hezron, house of Jerahmeel (I Chron. 2:30, 31).

Ap'phi-a (ăf'i-ă). A Christian woman, probably the wife of Philemon (Philemon 2).

Ap'pi For'um (ăp'i fō'rūm) [Lat., market place of Appius]. A town in Italy, about 39½ miles from Rome, on the celebrated Apian Way from Rome to Capua. Paul was met at this town by Christians from Rome, when he was being brought a prisoner to the capital (Acts 28:15).

Ap'ple. A tree and its fruit (S. of Sol. 2:3; 8:5; Prov. 25:11), the rendering of the Hebrew tappuah, which is akin to Arabic tuffākh (apple). The one referred to in the O.T. is probably our apple tree Pyrus malus, which Thomson found growing splendidly at Askelon in the Philistine country. The name may have included the quince as well. Tristram believes that the apricot is meant. The apple tree is enumerated with the vine, the fig tree, the pomegranate, and the palm tree, as one of the chief trees cultivated (Joel 1:12). There were several towns called Tappuah—in the lowland (Josh. 15:34), near Hebron (v. 53), and on the border of Ephraim and Manasseh (ch. 17:8), where doubtless many apple trees grew.

The apple of the eye refers to the eyeball or the pupil (Deut. 32:10; Ps. 17:8; Zech. 2:8). For apple of Sodom, see VINE.

Aq'uila (ăk'wī-lă) [Lat., eagle]. A Jew, born in Pontus, who with his wife, Priscilla, lived for a time at Rome, but had to leave that city when the Emperor Claudius commanded all its Jewish inhabitants to depart. He removed to Corinth, where he worked at his craft, tentmaking. Paul, who was of the same occupation, lodged with him at Corinth, and formed a high opinion of him and his wife (Acts 18:1-3). They were his fellow passengers from Corinth as far as Ephesus, on his way to Syria (Acts 18:18, 19). In the First Epistle to the Corinthians, they join Paul in sending salutations from Asia, i.e., probably from Ephesus (I Cor. 16:19). At Ephesus they met Apollos, and instructed him more completely in Christian doctrine (Acts 18:26). Afterward they seem to have returned to Rome, for Paul sends them salutations in his letter to that church (Rom. 16:3). But they must again have left it, for in the apostle's Second Epistle to Timothy, written from Rome, salutations are sent them anew (II Tim. 4:19).

Ar (ăr) [city]. One of the chief cities of Moab, more fully called Ar of Moab (Isa. 15:1). It lay on the n. boundary of Moab (Num. 21:15; Deut. 2:18), in the Arnon Valley (Num. 22:36; Deut. 2:36; Josh. 13:9). The Greeks connected the name with Ares, the god of war, the Roman Mars, and called it after him Areopolis. The Jews and others in the early Christian centuries named it Rabbath Moab; it is now known as Khirbet er-Rabbah, about 13¾ miles s. of the Arnon.

A'ra (ă'ră). A man of Asher (I Chron. 7:38).

A'rab (ă'răb) [ambuscade]. A village in the hill country of Judah (Josh. 15:52), modern er-Rabiye, a ruin e. of Dumah (Dōmeh), not far from 'Umm el-'Amad. See ARBITE.

Ar'a-bah (ăr'ă-bă) [arid region, desert]. 1. The geographical name of that great depression of the land in which are found the Sea of Galilee, the Jordan, and the Dead Sea (Josh. 11:2; 12:3, R.V.). The name apparently belonged also to the extension of the valley to the Gulf of 'Akabah at the head of the Red Sea (Deut. 2:8, R.V.). In A.V. the word is translated, being generally rendered by plain, but also by desert or wilderness (Ezek. 47:8; Amos 6:14).

2. The same as Beth-arabah (Josh. 18:22).

Ar'a-bi'a (ā-rā'bi'-ā) [Lat., from Gr. Arabia, from Heb. 'arāb, probably waste, desert. Cf. Ethiopic 'abra, to be dry, waste, and Arab. 'arab, Arab. See also ARAHAH]. The most westerly of the 3 great peninsulas in s. Asia. Arabia, the largest peninsula in the world, is bounded on the e. by the Persian Gulf and the Gulf of Oman, on the s. by the Indian Ocean, and on the w. by the Red Sea. Northward it projects triangularly and passes into the Syrian desert, which is bounded on 3 sides by the Fertile Crescent. The length of the w. coast line is about 1,800 miles, while the width of the land is about 600 miles from the Red Sea to the Persian Gulf. Its area is about  $\frac{1}{4}$  that of Europe and  $\frac{1}{2}$  that of the United States. The n. central plateau is called Nejd; it is separated from the w. coast by a low-lying sandy region which is called the Hejaz, s. of which is Asir. Yemen occupies the s.w. corner of the peninsula. Hadramaut is on the s. coast. Oman constitutes the s.e. corner. On the e. coast are Kuwait and al-Ḥasa (ancient al-Bahrain). Arabia lies athwart the enormous belt of desert, commencing near the Atlantic Ocean with the Sahara, and extending through Chinese Turkestan, almost to the Pacific Ocean. Arabia is consequently largely desert.

Among the Hebrews the name Arabian denoted the inhabitants of the desert portion (Jer. 3:2), whether near Babylonia or Ethiopia (Isa. 13:20; II Chron. 21:16), often as distinguished from the prominent settled tribes (Jer. 25:24; Ezek. 27:21). Eventually Arabia came to denote the entire peninsula. Ptolemy, the geographer of Alexandria who wrote in the 2d century A.D., divided the country into 3 regions: Arabia Felix, the Happy or Fertile; Arabia Petraea, the Stony; and Arabia Deserta, the Desert. Arabia Felix was of indefinite extent. Arabia Petraea, having for its capital Petra, was the district between the Red and the Dead Seas; and Arabia Deserta, the Syrian desert. The streams are few and small, none navigable. The geology is little known, but gold and precious stones were obtained. The feature of the botany is the prevalence of aromatic plants, some of them furnishing valuable spices. Of its birds the most noted is the ostrich; of its quadrupeds the camel, the Arab horse, and the wild ass.

Scholars regard Africa as the probable Semito-Hamitic home and Arabia as the cradle of the Semitic people and the center of their distribution. South Arabia had an ancient civilization, but the dates are somewhat uncertain. According to one chronology, the Minaean Kingdom flourished from c. 1300 to 650 B.C., and in its heyday embraced most of s. Arabia. The capital was at Kārṇāw, modern Ma'in; the names of 26 kings have been identified. The Sabaean period extends from 950 to 115 B.C. About 650 B.C. the Sabaeans succeeded to the power of the Minaeans. Their capital was at Ma'rib, about 60 miles e. of Ṣan'ā'. This is the most glorious era of s. Arabian history. Katabān, with its capital at Tamna', and Hadramaut, with the capital at Shabwah, had their own kings during a part of this period. The 1st Himyarite Kingdom extends from 115 B.C. to c. A.D. 300. During this period s. Arabian colonists laid the basis of the Abyssinian Kingdom and civilization. The 2d Himyarite Kingdom extends from A.D. 300 to 525. This was interrupted by a brief Abyssinian rule (c. 340-378). Both Judaism and Christianity were well established in s. Arabia. The last king of the Himyarite dynasty was a Jew, who in 523 massacred the Christians. In consequence the Abyssinians invaded the land and remained in control (525-575). This great civilization finally disintegrated and decayed, and in 575 the region became a Persian satrapy. In 628 the 5th Persian satrap embraced Islam. See SHEBA, I.

Arab tribes often came into contact with the Hebrews (Gen. 37:28, 36; Judg., chs. 6 to 8). Solomon bought from the Arabs gold, silver, and spices (II Chron. 9:14). Jehoshaphat received tribute from them in flocks of sheep and goats (II Chron. 17:11). In the reign of Jehoram, Arabs with other marauders plundered Jerusalem (II Chron. 21:16). They were afterward defeated by Uzziah (II Chron. 26:7). Isaiah and Jeremiah denounced judgments against their race (Isa. 21:13-17; Jer. 25:24), and both used the wandering Arab in their poetic illustrations (Isa. 13:20; Jer. 3:2). Arabs were hired allies of the Syrians against Judas Maccabaeus (I Macc. 5:39). There were Arabs (perhaps Jews from the Nabataean Kingdom) present on the Day of Pentecost (Acts 2:11), and Paul sojourned for a time in Arabia, before commencing his apostolic work (Gal. 1:17). The scantiness of water, the courage of the Arabs, and their wandering life, prevented even the greatest of the ancient empires from conquering Arabia and holding it in subjection. Both Judaism and Christianity had rooted themselves in Arabia when, in the 7th century of the Christian Era, Mohammed arose and founded Islam. Before his death (A.D. 632) his faith was well established throughout the peninsula, and in a century more the Arabs had built an empire extending from the Pyrenees across Spain and n. Africa to Transoxiana and Sind and the s. Punjab. See SELA and TADMOR.

Ar'a-bi'an (ā-rā'bi'-ān). One of the Arab race; a native or inhabitant of Arabia (II Chron. 17:11).

Ar'ad (ār'ād) [wild ass]. 1. A town on the border of the s. country and the wilderness of Judah (Num. 21:1; Josh. 12:14; Judg. 1:16). The site is marked by Tell 'Arād, on a barren-looking eminence 17 miles s. of Hebron. Its king fought against the Israelites when they were at Mount Hor and took some of them captive; but the Israelites roused themselves to new trust in God, and devastated the territory of the king, and eventually he himself or his successor was vanquished by Joshua (ibid.).

2. A Benjamite, descended through Beriah (I Chron. 8:15).

Ar'a-dus (ār'ā-dūs). See ARVAD.

Ar'ah (ār'ā) [wayfarer, traveler]. 1. Founder of a family, members of which returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:5; Neh. 7:10).

2. An Asherite, a son of Ulla (I Chron. 7:39).

A'ram (ār'ām). 1. A person, or, collectively, the Aramaean people, descended from Shem, who inhabited the region known as Aram (Gen. 10:22, 23; I Chron. 1:17).

2. The plain occupied by the Aramaeans, extending from the Lebanon Mountains to beyond the Euphrates, and from the Taurus Mountains on the n. to Damascus and beyond on the s. The contact between the Hebrews and the Aramaeans goes back to the patriarchal period (Gen. 31:47), where is given the earliest citation of an Aramaic phrase. The maternal ancestry of Jacob's children is accordingly Aramaic, a tradition preserved in Deut. 26:5. About contemporaneously with the rise of the Hebrew monarchy appear the Aramaean states n. and e. of Canaan. Several districts were distinguished:

(1) A'RAM-NA'HA-RA'IM, i.e., Aram of the Rivers, referring either to the Euphrates and Tigris, or, more probably, to the Euphrates and Khabur. It is commonly believed that in this region Paddan-aram was situated (Gen. 28:5; 24:10). This is the Aram where the patriarchs dwelt before they went to Canaan, where the ancient cities of Haran and Nisibis stood, where later Edessa, the noted seat of Syrian culture, arose; the Aram which the Hebrews speak of as, "Beyond the River" (II Sam. 10:16).

(2) A'RAM-DA-MAS'CUS. The Hebrews during almost, if not quite, the entire period of their kingdom, found Aramaeans in Damascus (II Sam. 8:5; I Kings 15:18). The city became eventually the center of Aramaean influence w. of the Euphrates, and waged intermittent warfare with the n. Israelites during almost their entire existence as a separate kingdom.

(3) A'RAM-ZO'BAH. In the days of Saul, David, and Solomon, another powerful Aramaean kingdom flourished w. of the Euphrates, namely the Kingdom of Zobah (I Sam. 14:47; II Sam. 8:3; cf. II Chron. 8:3), called Aram-Zobah by Hebrew writers (II Sam. 10:6). At one time its dominion extended as far as the borders of Hamath on the n.w. (I Chron. 18:3; II Sam. 8:10); it had Damascus to the s. or s.w., for one of its towns, Berothai, was situated between Hamath and Damascus (cf. II Sam. 8:5, 8 with Ezek. 47:16), and during this prosperous period probably exercised sway well toward the Euphrates on the e. and the Hauran on the s.

(4) A'RAM-MA'A-CAH lay e. of the Jordan within the contemplated bounds of Israel, hard by Mount Hermon (Josh. 12:5; 13:11). From the description of Abel, which belonged to the tribe of Naphtali, as "Abel [in the neighborhood] of Beth-maacah," it may be inferred that Maacah extended as far w. as the Jordan.

(5) GE'SHUR in Aram was a small kingdom not far from Maacah, and like it e. of the Jordan, near Mount Hermon, and within the territory allotted to Manasseh (Deut. 3:14; cf. II Sam. 15:8, R.V. marg., with ch. 13:37).

(6) A'RAM-BETH-RE'HOB (II Sam. 10:6). The location is uncertain. If identical with the place mentioned in Num. 13:21 and Judg. 18:28, it was near both Maacah and Dan.

3. A descendant of Asher (I Chron. 7:34).

4. A Greek form of Ram, the father of Aminadab (Matt. 1:3; Luke 3:33, R.V. marg.). See ARNI.

Ar'a-ma'ic (ār'a-mā'ik) or the Ar'a-mae'an (ār'a-mē'an) or Ar'a-me'an (ār'a-mē'an) Lan'guage. A North Semitic language. Since this language was put into the mouth of the Chaldaeans (Dan. 2:4), it came to be called Chaldee, or Chaldaic. This inaccurate term has been discarded, since we now know that the Chaldaeans spoke Akkadian. The Greeks called Aram Syria (abbreviated from Assyria). Consequently the people are in the Bible often called Syrians and their language Syrian (Ezra 4:7) or "Syriack" (Dan. 2:4, A.V.). The term Syriac, however, is now restricted to the dialect of Edessa and its developments.

From the 14th century B.C. reference is found in the Assyro-Babylonian literature to the Arimi, or Ahlamē, who as nomads wandered in the wilderness w. of Mesopotamia. For the early undivided Aramaic language we have: (a) monumental inscriptions from Syria and Asia Minor from c. 800 B.C. into the Persian period; (b) dockets, weights, etc., from Assyria and Babylonia from the 8th century to the 5th B.C.; (c) papyri, chiefly from one deposit at Elephantine in Upper Egypt, dating from 500-400 B.C.

The Aramaic ultimately divided into 2 groups, the Eastern and the Western. The former, occupying the Euphrates Valley, includes the Aramaic of the Babylonian Talmud; Mandaic, the language of the Mandaeans, a gnostic sect; and Syriac, the dialect of Edessa, which, with local variations, became the language of the Aramaic-speaking churches of Syria and Mesopotamia. For the dialects of Western Aramaic, we may make the following divisions (with the caution that the distinctions are often only chronological and literary): 1. Biblical Aramaic, found in Ezra 4:8 to 6:18; 7:12-26; Dan. 2:4b to 7:28; Jer. 10:11 (a gloss); Gen. 31:47 (a cited phrase of two words). 2. Post-Biblical Jewish Aramaic: (a) words and phrases in N.T., Josephus, etc.; (b) the Targums; (c) passages in the Mishnah, the Gemara, and the Midrashim; the Fast Calendar. 3. Samaritan Aramaic. 4. Nabataean of the century before and the century after Christ. 5. Palmyrene of Tadmor (Palmyra) of the 2d and 3d centuries A.D. 6. Christian Palestinian, going back possibly to the 5th century, contained in Biblical translations and Christian literature of Greek origin.

Aramaic was used by Laban (Gen. 31:47, R.V.); it is seen in the proper names Tabrimmon and Hazael (I Kings 15:18, R.V.; 19:15). It is found in inscriptions on weights as early as the time of Shalmaneser V and Sargon II, showing that it was used by traders at Nineveh. It became the international language of business and diplomacy (II Kings 18:26, R.V. marg.). With the rise of the Persian Empire we find its administration using Aramaic as the lingua franca over its Semitic territories from the e. to the upper end of Egypt. The official documents in The Book of Ezra appear in Aramaic. The Jews spoke the new language both in the Babylonian Diaspora and in Palestine, where the corruption of Hebrew was fast proceeding, as the Bible testifies (Neh. 13:23 seq.). The process went on apace, and the patent testimony is found in the Aramaic portions of the Books of Ezra and Daniel, as well as in the extensive Aramaic influence in the Hebrew language of the later Biblical literature. Aramaic became the vernacular of the Jews, while Hebrew was reserved for the synagogue and school, at the most surviving as a vehicle of intercourse in the speech of cultivated circles.

A'ram-mit'ess (ār'a-mīt'ēs). A woman of Aram (I Chron. 7:14).

A'ram-ma'a-cah (ār'ām-mā'a-kā). See ARAM 2 (4).

A'ram-na-ha-ra'im (ār'ām-nā'hā-rā'im). See ARAM 2 (1).

A'ram-Zo'bah (ār'ām-zō'bā). See ARAM 2 (3).

A'ran (ār'ān) [mountain goat]. A descendant of Dishan or offshoot of that Horite tribe (Gen. 36:28; I Chron. 1:42).

Ar'a-rat (ār'a-rāt) [Heb. for Akkad, or Assyria: Urartu]. A mountainous country n. of Assyria, centering about the elevated plateau of the Araxes. In the time of Jeremiah it was the seat of a kingdom apparently adjacent to those of Minni and Ashkenaz (Jer. 51:27). When the sons of Sennacherib killed their father they escaped into the land of Ararat, which is Armenia (II Kings 19:37). On one of the mountains of Ararat the ark of Noah rested (Gen. 8:4). According to the Babylonian account of the Flood, the ark rested on Nizir, a mountain e. of Assyria. Traditions with respect to the resting place of the ark attach themselves to various mountains in w. Asia; but by Mount Ararat is now meant a noble mountain almost midway between the Black Sea and the Caspian, near the junction of Turkey, Armenia, and Iran (Persia). It has 2 peaks, one higher than the other. The loftier one rises 16,916 feet above the level of the ocean, more than 10,000 feet above the tableland on which it stands, and 3,000 above the line of perpetual snow. The ascent is so difficult and laborious that the Turks call Ararat Aghri Dag, or the Painful Mountain. Its summit was long deemed inaccessible, but it was at length reached by Parrot in 1829, and in 1850 by Col. Khoelzko and his party of 60, while they were engaged on the trigonometrical survey of Trans-Caucasia.

Ar'a-rite (ār'd-rit). So R.V., following the present Hebrew text, once in II Sam. 23:33, where A.V. has Hararite as in the corresponding passage, I Chron. 11:35.

Ar'a'thes (ā-rā'thēz), in A.V. Ar'tarra'thes (ār'tī-d-rā'thēz). King of Cappadocia (163-130 B.C.), surnamed Philopator (I Macc. 15:22).

Ar'au'nah (ā-rō'nā). A Jebusite who possessed a threshing floor on Mount Moriah. David purchased the floor in order to erect there an altar to Jehovah that the plague then raging might be stayed (II Sam. 24:18-25; I Chron. 21:15-28). The place afterward became the site of Solomon's Temple (II Chron. 3:1). Araunah is called Ornan in Chronicles, Ornah in the Hebrew text of II Sam. 24:16, and yet differently in v. 18. It is difficult to determine which was the original form of the name.

Ar'ba (ār'bā), in A.V. once Ar'bah (ār'bā) [four]. Father or greatest man of Anak (Josh. 14:15; 15:13). He founded, or gave name to, Kiriath-arba, the city later known as Hebron, or else he derived his title from the town (Josh. 14:15; Judg. 1:10). See HEBRON 2.

Ar'bat'hlte (ār'bā-thīt). An inhabitant of Beth-arabah (II Sam. 23:31; I Chron. 11:32).

Ar'bat'ta (ār-bāt'ā), in A.V. Ar'bat'tis (ār-bāt'is). A locality near Galilee (I Macc. 5:23). The readings of the name vary greatly in the manuscripts, perhaps to be identified with Arubboth.

Ar'be'la (ār-bē'lā). A place (I Macc. 9:2); according to Josephus, the well-known town of the name in Galilee (Jos. Antiq. xii. 11, 1), now Irbid. See BETH-ARBEL.

Ar'bite (ār'bīt). A native of Arab, in the hill country of Judah (II Sam. 23:35; a variant reading is found in I Chron. 11:37).

Ar'che-la'us (ār'kē-lā'ūs) [Gr., leader of people, chief]. The elder of 2 sons whom Malthace, a Samaritan wife, bore to Herod the Great, the younger one being Antipas, afterward Herod the Tetrarch (Jos. Antiq. xvii. 1, 3). With his brother Antipas and his half brothers Herod and Philip, he received his education at Rome. While there Antipater, a half brother of his, falsely accused him and Philip of plotting to murder their common father; but Archelaus and Philip were acquitted, and the accuser was put to death (Jos. Antiq. xvi. 4, 3; xvii. 7, 1; War i. 31, 2 to 32, 7). Herod died immediately afterward, 4 B.C.; and when his will, which had been altered a few days previously, was opened, it was found that the greater part of the kingdom was left to Archelaus, though tetrarchies had been cut out of it for Antipas and Philip, and some cities reserved to Herod's sister Salome (Jos. Antiq. xvii. 8, 1). But at that time the Jewish kingdom stood to imperial Rome in the relation of a protected state. Archelaus therefore prudently abstained from ascending the throne till he had solicited permission from Augustus, the Roman emperor, and he resolved to start at once for the metropolis to urge his suit in person (Jos. Antiq. xvii. 8, 4). But before he could leave, an unhappy incident occurred. A number of people, who conceived that they had a grievance, wished it redressed by strong measures then and there. Their demand was clearly premature, but they would take no denial; and when they could not have their way, they rioted at the passover, till, sorely against his will, for he wished to gain popularity, Archelaus had to put down the sedition by military force, and 3,000 people lost their lives. In consequence of this, a deputation of Jews was dispatched to Rome, to urge the emperor not to allow Archelaus to obtain the kingdom. His younger brother, Herod Antipas, also appeared as his rival, petitioning that he, in place of Archelaus, might be made king. The emperor confirmed Herod's will in its essential provisions. Archelaus obtained the larger portion of the kingdom, but only with the title of ethnarch, or ruler of a people, which was inferior to that of king (Jos. Antiq. xvii. 8, 1; 9, 7; 11, 5). His rival Antipas was given only a tetrarchy. Soon after this, Joseph and Mary returned with the Infant Jesus from Egypt. They might consider that the queller of the passover riot was not a man overtender of human life, and that it was only common prudence for them to turn aside to Galilee so as to keep out of his jurisdiction (Matt. 2:22). A parable of our Lord himself seems to refer to the circumstances attending the accession of Archelaus. "A certain nobleman," we read, "went into a far country, to receive for himself a kingdom, and to return" (Luke 19:12). "But his citizens hated him, and sent an ambassador after him, saying, We will not have this man to reign over us" (Luke 19:14). If the reference is really to Archelaus, then another verse may be history rather than parable. "But these mine enemies, that would not that I should reign over them, bring hither, and slay them before me" (Luke 19:27). Quite in keeping with this view, Josephus says that Archelaus used not only the Jews but the Samaritans barbarously, out of resentment for their old quarrels with him. Both nationalities, therefore, sent embassies to Rome to complain of his cruelty. They succeeded in their object. In the 9th year of his government, about A.D. 6, he was deposed, and banished to Vienne, in Gaul, while his wealth was put into the emperor's treasury (Jos. War ii. 7, 3).

Ar'che-vites (ār'kē-vits). Babylonians, inhabitants of Erech. A body of them were settled by Asnapper in Samaria after the ten tribes had been carried captive (Ezra 4:9).

Ar'chi (ār'kī). See ARCHITE.

Ar'chip'pus (ār-kip'ūs) [Gr., master of the horse]. A Christian at Colossae who approved himself as a champion of the gospel, was intimate with Philemon, and an office-bearer in the church (Col. 4:17; Philemon 2).

Ar'chite (ār'kit), in A.V. once (Josh. 16:2) Ar'chi, the Hebrew form. A member of a Canaanite tribe of the same name, or else a native or inhabitant of a village known as Erech. The border of the Archites was on the boundary between Ephraim and Benjamin, w. of Beth-el, where is the modern 'Ain 'Arık (Josh. 16:2). Hushai, David's faithful counselor, was an Archite (II Sam. 15:32).

Arctu'rus (ār-kū'rūs) [Lat., from Gr., the Bear ward]. A large and bright star, which the Greeks and Romans called by this name, meaning the keeper of the Bear, because in its course through the heavens it always kept behind the tail of Ursa Major, or the Great Bear. In the A.V. of Job 9:9 and 38:32 it is the translation of the Hebrew 'āsh or 'ayish. But 'āsh is not Arcturus, the Bear keeper, but probably the Bear itself, and is so rendered in the R.V.

Ard (ārd) [hump, humpbacked; cf. Aram. 'ardā, truffle]. A son of Bela and grandson of Benjamin (Gen. 46:21; cf. Num. 26:38, 41 with 40). He gave name to a family of the tribe of Benjamin (ibid.). The person called Addar in I Chron. 8:3 is probably he. The variation in form is probably due to a copyist's transposition of two letters very similar in Hebrew, or to his confusion of Hebrew daleth and resh.

Ar'don (är'dön) [humpbacked; see ARD]. A man of Judah, family of Hezron, house of Caleb (I Chron. 2:18).

A-re'li (ä-rē'li). A son of Gad, and founder of a family (Gen. 46:16; Num. 26:17).

Ar'eop'agite (är'ë-öp'ä-jīt). A judge of the court of Areopagus (Acts 17:34).

Ar'eop'agus (är'ë-öp'ä-gūs) [Gr., hill of Ares]. 1. One of the lower hills on the w. of the Acropolis of Athens. It was consecrated to Ares, the god of war. It is a narrow, naked ridge of limestone rock, running from n.w. to s.e., and terminating abruptly over against the Acropolis, or citadel of Athens. This s.e. end was crowned by several altars; and rises 50 or 60 feet above the valley separating it from the Acropolis, which is much the higher of the 2 hills. Ares corresponds to the Roman Mars, and Areopagus is the same as Mars' Hill.

2. The supreme court of Athens, which met on the hill called Areopagus to pass sentence. It was constituted of venerable and eminent citizens. The seats of the judges and others connected with the court are still seen hewn in the rock; and toward the s.w. there is a flight of steps descending to the market place. It was before the Areopagus that Paul pleaded his own cause and that of Christianity, and the philosophic character of his discourse arose from his vivid consciousness that he was addressing some of the most intellectual men in the most intellectual city in the world.

During judicial trial the court sat in the Stoa Basileios, its official chamber, in the Agora (market place), and adjourned to the hill to pass formal sentence. It has been argued that Paul made his defense in the chamber of justice and not on the hill, before the Areopagus and not on the Areopagus (Curtius). Or perhaps Paul appeared before the council of the Areopagus for the purpose of having his qualifications examined by a court which apparently had the power to admit foreign lecturers (Ramsay). The narrative in The Acts militates against the supposition that Paul's discourse was a formal defense in a trial before the court (Conybeare and Howson). It appears more probable that Paul addressed an informal gathering of philosophers on the Areopagus (Acts 17:16 seq.).

Ar'etas (är'ë-täs) [Gr., from Nabataean Arab. Hārithath; cf. Arab. Hārith]. More than one king of Arabia Petraea, during the time that it was occupied by the Nabataean Arabs, bore this name. Among others, 1. A contemporary of the high priest Jason, about 170 B.C. (II Macc. 5:8).

2. Aretas IV (9 B.C.-A.D. 40), father-in-law of Herod the Tetrarch. When Herod prepared to divorce his daughter in order to marry Herodias, Aretas declared war against Herod and totally defeated his army in A.D. 36. The Romans took Herod's part, and Vitellius was dispatched to chastise Aretas, but the death of the Emperor Tiberius put an end to the expedition (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 5, 1-3). It was about A.D. 39 or 40, during the reign of Caligula, or perhaps in 36, that Aretas for a brief period held Damascus (II Cor. 11:32). See NABATAEANS, SELA.

A-re'us (ä-rē'ūs). See ARIUS.

Ar'gob (är'göb) [region of clods, glebe]. 1. A region of Bashan, included within the dominions of Og, and bordering on Geshur and Maacah. It contained 60 fenced cities, besides the nomad encampments taken by Jair (Deut. 3:4, 13, 14; Josh. 13:30; I Kings 4:13); see HAVVOth-JAIR. The Targum indicates the district of Trachonitis, but this region lies too far to the e. Josephus identifies a portion of it with Gaulonitis (cf. Jos. Antiq. 8:2, 3 with I Kings 4:13). The precise location, except that it lay in Bashan, is uncertain.

2. A man assassinated along with Pekahiah, king of Israel, by Pekah, who aspired to the throne (II Kings 15:25).

Ar'ia-ra'thes (är'i-ä-rä-thēz). See ARATHES.

A-rid'a-i (ä-rīd'ä-i). A son of Haman (Esth. 9:9).

A-rid'a-tha (ä-rīd'ä-thä). A son of Haman (Esth. 9:8).

A-ri'eh (ä-rī'ē) [lion]. A man assassinated along with King Pekahiah, Argob, and others, by Pekah, the son of Remaliah (II Kings 15:25).

A-ri-el (är'i-ēl) [Heb. 'ārī'ēl: ety. uncertain; generally explained as (1) lion of God; (2) altar hearth. Probably from Akkad. Aralū (Aralū), which has a double sense of "under-world" and "mountain of the gods," the cosmic mountain in which according to an Assyrian text the gods were born and reared. Heb. har'ēl means "mountain of God" and is thus a popular ety. of the Akkad. loan word]. 1. A Moabite (II Sam. 23:20, R.V.).

2. An ominous name applied to Jerusalem (Isa. 29:1, 2, 7). The same word occurs 3 times in Ezek. 43:15, 16, first as har'ēl and in the other 2 instances as 'ārī'ēl; each of these 3 examples is preceded by the definite article. The Targum defines this word in both Isaiah and Ezekiel as altar, and from the context in Isaiah this seems to be the preferable explanation of the word as applied to the city. R.V. translates the last 2 cases of the word in Ezekiel as altar hearth. Cf. Isa. 29:1, R.V. marg.

3. A chief of the Jews who were with Ezra at the River Ahava (Ezra 8:16).

Ar'im-a-thae'a (är'i-mä-thē'ä) [Lat. from Gr. modification of Ramah]. The town from which the councilor Joseph came, who obtained permission of Pilate to take away the body of Jesus and give it honorable interment in his own new sepulcher (Matt. 27:57-60; Mark 15:43; Luke 23:51-53; John 19:38). Arimathaea is the Greek form of Ramah, but which town of that name is intended is uncertain. Ramleh near Lydda is out of the question; for it was not built until the beginning of the 8th century A.D. The name occurs in I Macc. 11:34 (cf. Jos. Antiq. xiii. 4, 9) as belonging at that period to Samaria.

Ar'i-och (är'i-ök) [perhaps Sumerian é-ri-aku, servant of the moon-god]. 1. King of Ellasar, who was confederate with Chedor-laomer on his invasion of the Jordan Valley (Gen. 14: 1, 9). Some scholars have identified this king with one of the sons of Kudur-Mabuk, kings of Larsa: Warad-Sin (c. 1836–1824 B.C.) or Rim-Sin (c. 1824–1763 B.C.). The chronology of the period has not been definitely established. See BABYLONIA.

2. Captain of the king's guard at Babylon under Nebuchadnezzar (Dan. 2:14, 15). It pertained to the office to execute sentences of death (Dan. 2:24).

Ar-is'a-i (á-ris'á-I). A son of Haman (Esth. 9:9).

Ar-is-tar'chus (är'is-tär'küš) [Gr., best ruling]. A Macedonian of Thessalonica who was with Paul at Ephesus, and in the riot was seized by the mob and probably dragged into the theater; but he seems not to have been seriously injured (Acts 19:29). On the apostle's return from Greece, whither he had gone from Ephesus, Aristarchus accompanied him from Troas to Asia (Acts 20:4, 6). He was subsequently his fellow voyager to Rome (Acts 27: 2; cf. Philemon 24), as also at one time his fellow prisoner (Col. 4:10).

Ar-is-to-bu'lus (á-ris'tó-bū'lūs) [Gr., best advising]. 1. A celebrated Jewish philosopher at Alexandria (II Macc. 1:10b).

2. A Christian, to whose household at Rome Paul sent salutations (Rom. 16:10).

Ar-i'us (á-rī'ūs), in A.V. Ar'eus. King of Sparta (I Macc. 12:20; Jos. Antiq. xiii. 5, 8), probably the first of the name, who reigned from 309 to 265 B.C.

Ark. A chest, box, or vessel of similar shape. 1. Noah's ark was the rude vessel which Noah was divinely ordered to construct, and in which he floated about when the Deluge was on the earth. If the cubit, in terms of which the dimensions of the ark are stated, was the ordinary cubit of 18 inches, then the length of the ark was 450 feet, the breadth 75 feet, and the height 45 feet. The ark was made of gopher, probably cypress, wood, and rendered watertight by being daubed inside and outside with bitumen. It had lower, 2d and 3d stories. A door in the side afforded ingress and egress. A window, probably a cubit in height, extended, with slight interruptions, all around the vessel. A rooflike covering protected the inmates from rain and sun (Gen. 6:14 to 8:19). The ark was designed for the accommodation of Noah, his family, and the animals which were selected to be preserved.

2. The infant Moses' ark, made for his reception when he was exposed upon the Nile, was a basket composed of papyrus leaves or stems, or both, plaited together, and rendered watertight by a coat of bitumen (Ex. 2:3–6).

3. The Ark of the Covenant or Testimony was the central object of the tabernacle. It was a chest 2½ cubits long, 1½ cubits broad, and the same in depth; made of acacia wood, and overlaid within and without with pure gold. A rim or molding of gold encircled it at the top. At the bottom were 2 golden rings on each side, through which poles of acacia wood overlaid with gold were put for the purpose of carrying the Ark about. It was covered by a lid of solid gold which was called the mercy seat. Two cherubim of gold stood on this cover, of one piece with it, one at each end, spreading their wings on high so as to overshadow it, and facing each other, but looking down toward the mercy seat. They were symbols of the presence and unapproachableness of Jehovah who, as King of Israel in the midst of his people, dwelt between the cherubim, uttered his voice from between them, and met the representative of his people there (Ex. 25:10 seq.; 30:6; Num. 7:89; I Sam. 4:4). It was made specially as a receptacle for the testimony, which was written on the tables of stone (Ex. 25:21; 31:18; Deut. 10:3, 5), and it was placed in the Holy of Holies (Ex. 26:34). Afterward a pot of manna, Aaron's rod that blossomed, and the book of the Law were put beside the Ark (Ex. 16:34; Num. 17:10; Deut. 31:26; Heb. 9:4), but apparently were removed during the times of confusion (I Kings 8:9). The Ark was placed in charge of the Kohathite Levites (Num. 3:29–31; 4:4–15). The priests, who were Levites and of the family of Kohath, bore it themselves on occasions of special solemnity (Josh. 3:3; 6:6; 8:33; II Sam. 15:24, 29; I Kings 8:3). It went before the Israelites when they left Mount Sinai (Num. 10:33); either in the van or, as the expression may denote, like a king in the midst of his troops, leading and directing the march, while the priests who accompanied it signaled the orders of Jehovah (Num. 10:5, 6, 8; and for the phraseology Ex. 32:1; Deut. 3:28; 10:11; 31:3b). It went in advance of the people into the Jordan and halted, where the stream ceased to flow, until the tribes had done crossing to the other side (Josh. 4:9–11). It was carried in the midst of the host for 7 days around Jericho before the walls of the city fell down (Josh. 6:1–20). From Gilgal by Jericho it was removed to Shiloh (I Sam. 3:3). Having been taken in Eli's time to the field of battle, as a talisman which was expected to work wonders in the contest with the Philistines, it was captured by the enemy (I Sam., ch. 4), but was soon afterward sent back into the Hebrew territory (I Sam. 5:1 to 6:11). It was successively at Beth-shemesh, where the inhabitants looked into it and were punished (I Sam. 6:12–20; see BETH-SHEMESH); at Kiriath-jearim (I Sam. 7:1, 2); and at Perez-uzzah, where Uzzah was struck dead for touching it (II Sam. 6:1–11; I Chron. 13:1–14; cf. Num. 4:15, 19, 20). See OBED-EDOM. Thence it was taken by David to Jerusalem (II Sam. 6:12–23), being now borne by men (v. 13) who, if the custom in Israel before and during the reign of David was followed, were priests or priests assisted by other Levites (Josh. 3:3, 13; 4:9; 6:4, 6; II Sam. 15:24, 25, 29), as the Chronicler states (I Chron. 15:1–15). At Jerusalem it was put in a temporary tabernacle erected for it by David (II Sam. 6:17; 7:1, 2; I Chron. 16:1, 4–6, 37–43). Later it was placed in the Holy of Holies in Solomon's Temple (I Kings 8:1–9). Josiah refers to it (II Chron. 35:3), but the meaning is obscure. It disappeared when Jerusalem was destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar, and has not been reported since.

Sacred chests were in use among other peoples of antiquity. They were employed by the Greeks and Egyptians, and served as receptacles for the idol, or for symbols of the deities, or for other sacred objects.

Ar'kit (är'kit). A tribe descended from Canaan (Gen. 10:17; I Chron. 1:15). Modern 'Arka is about 12 miles n. of Tripolis in Syria. Arkantu mentioned by Thutmose III (1482–1450 B.C.) may be the same place. It is called Irkata in the Amarna tablets. It was captured by Tiglath-pileser III in 733 B.C.

Ar'ma-ged'don (är'má-géd'ün). See HARMAGEDON.

Ar-me'ní-a (är-mē'ní-á). See ARARAT.

Arm'let. An ornament like a bracelet, but surrounding the arm higher up than the wrist (Ex. 35:22, R.V.). There were armlets among the spoil of the Midianites (Num. 31:50, R.V.). In parts of the East an armlet, generally studded with jewels, is worn by kings as one of the insignia of royal authority (cf. II Sam. 1:10).

Ar'mo'ni (är-mō'nī) [pertaining to the palace]. One of Saul's sons by his concubine Rizpah. He was slain by the Gibeonites to satisfy justice (II Sam. 21:8-11).

Ar'mor. Covering worn to protect the person against offensive weapons (Eph. 6:11). It consisted of: 1. The shield. Shields were used by all nations of antiquity. The Israelites employed a larger and a smaller kind (I Kings 10:16, 17). The larger kind, translated shield, buckler, target, belonged to the heavy armed spearmen and lancers (I Chron. 12:8, 24, 34; II Chron. 14:8). The smaller shield, rendered shield or buckler, was carried by archers (I Chron. 5:18; II Chron. 14:8). Shields were of various shapes—round, oval, and oblong. They were commonly made of several thicknesses of leather or of wood covered with leather (cf. Ezek. 39:9), which was oiled to keep it glossy and pliable, and to protect it against the wet (Isa. 21:5). They were sometimes covered with brass (Jos. Antiq. xiii. 12, 5), or made entirely of brass (I Kings 14:27, probably), or even of beaten gold (I Kings 10:17; II Chron. 9:16; I Macc. 6:2, 39). Bronze shields were often 2 or 3 feet in diameter. Sometimes a shield-bearer accompanied a warrior into battle (I Sam. 17:7). 2. Helmets were made of leather and eventually of iron and brass (I Macc. 6:35). They were known to Egyptians, Philistines, Assyrians, Babylonians, Persians (I Sam. 17:5; Jer. 46:4; Ezek. 23:23, 24; 27:10). Helmets of brass were in occasional use among the Israelites and Philistines as early as the time of Saul (I Sam. 17:5, 38). Uzziah armed his troops with helmets and coats of mail (II Chron. 26:14). 3. The breastplate or properly coat of mail, as it is sometimes rendered, covered the breast, back, and shoulders. It was made of leather, quilted cloth, linen (Herod. iii. 47), brass, or iron (I Sam. 17:5; Rev. 9:9), and even gold (I Macc. 6:2). There were joints in it or between it and the adjacent armor (I Kings 22:34). Scale-armor coats were worn by Goliath, and chain coats by the soldiers of Antiochus Eupator (I Sam. 17:5, Heb.; I Macc. 6:35, Gr.). 4. Greaves, consisting of thin plates of metal, were occasionally worn to protect the front of the leg below the knee (I Sam. 17:6); and sometimes, 5. Laced boots set with nails (Isa. 9:5, R.V. marg.). For offensive weapons, see the several articles.

Ar'my. The army of Israel consisted originally of infantry only (Num. 11:21; I Sam. 4:10; 15:4), composed of spearmen, slingers, and archers. It included all the able-bodied men of the nation—all the males from 20 years old and upward, able to go forth to war, being enrolled for service (Num., ch. 1; II Sam. 24:9). The Levites were not numbered in the wilderness for military service; but they might bear arms, if the occasion arose (Num. 1:48-50; cf. I Chron. 12:26-28 with v. 23). The number of men reported as participating in various battles is sufficiently large to include the greater part of the adult male population of the region. For military operations of no great magnitude, each tribe furnished its quota of warriors (Num. 31:4; Josh. 7:3; Judg. 20:10); but inroads of the enemy were naturally met by all the manly spirits seizing their weapons to defend their firesides. In time of national peril messengers were sent throughout all the coasts of Israel to summon the men of war by the sound of the trumpet, by proclamation, or by symbolic act, to come to the rescue (Judg. 6:34, 35; 19:29; I Sam. 11:7).

The militia of Israel was organized on the basis of the political divisions. The unit, both military and political, was the thousand, a term apparently interchangeable with father's house, family, or clan (Ex. 12:37; Num. 1:2, 3, 16, 46; Judg. 6:15; I Sam. 10:19, 21; 17:18). A chieftain of Judah was accordingly often an 'alluph or chiliarch (Zech. 9:7; 12:5), as were the chiefs of Edom (Gen., ch. 36; Ex. 15:15). For both political and military purposes the thousands were divided into hundreds (Ex. 18:25; Num. 31:14, 48; II Sam. 18:1; II Chron. 25:5), and fifties (Ex. 18:25; I Sam. 8:12; II Kings 1:9; cf. Num. 1:25), and tens (Ex. 18:25; cf. Num. 26:7). The actual number composing a father's house or thousand necessarily varied constantly, according to natural law; and it is probable that the "thousand" was usually very much smaller than the technical name indicates (cf. the varying numbers in legion and regiment). Each of these divisions was under its own officer (Num. 31:14; Judg. 20:10; I Sam. 8:12; II Kings 1:9; 11:4; II Chron. 25:5). The commander in chief and the officers formed a council of war (I Chron. 13:1; cf. II Kings 9:3, 13).

The first traces of a standing army in Israel are found in the reign of Saul. He retained 3,000 men of all Israel to hold the Philistines in check (I Sam. 13:2), and impressed any men of marked valor whom he saw (I Sam. 14:52). David increased the army, and organized it into 12 divisions of 24,000 footmen each (I Chron., ch. 27), and Solomon added a large force of chariots and horsemen, which he distributed in the cities throughout his kingdom (I Kings 9:19; 10:26; cf. ch. 4:26; II Chron. 9:25). The successors of these 3 kings of all Israel continued to bestow attention on the organization and equipment of the host, as Jehoshaphat (II Chron. 17:13-19), Amaziah (II Chron. 25:5, 6), Uzziah (II Chron. 26:11-15), Judas Maccabaeus (I Macc. 3:55). See WAR.

Ar'nān (är'nān) [Arab., quick, lively]. Founder of a family, presumably of the lineage of David (I Chron. 3:21).

Ar'ni (är'nī). Ram, the father of Amminadab (Luke 3:33, R.V.; cf. Ruth 4:19). The Hebrew name Ram generally appears in the LXX as Arran or Aram; Arni, Arnei, which is found in the better texts of Luke, may be a mere corruption.

Ar'nōn (är'nōn) [rushing, roaring stream]. A river which anciently formed the boundary between the Amorite country on the n. and that of the Moabites on the s. (Num. 21:13, 26), and at a later period between the tribe of Reuben on the n. and again Moab on the s. (Deut. 3:8, 16; Josh. 13:16). It had fords (Isa. 16:2). Its valley is the deep chasm of the wadi el-Mōjib. The stream is perennial, formed by the junction of 3 smaller tributaries, and falls into the Dead Sea. It is fringed by oleanders, the vegetation of its banks is exuberant, and its waters are full of fish.

Ar'od (ār'ōd) or Ar'o-di (ār'ō-dī) [hump-backed; see Arō]. A son of Gad, and founder of a family (Gen. 46:16; Num. 26:17).

Ar'o'er (ā-rō'ēr) [naked, nakedness; or juniper thicket]. 1. A town on the right or n. bank of the river Arnon. It was the s. point of the Amorite kingdom ruled by Sihon (Deut. 2:36; Josh. 12:2; Judg. 11:26), and afterward of the tribe of Reuben (Josh. 13:16); but it was fortified and occupied by Gadites (Num. 32:34). It was fortified by Mesha, king of Moab (Moabite Stone, 26; see MOABITE STONE). It fell into the hands of Hazael, king of Syria (II Kings 10:33; I Chron. 5:8). In the time of Jeremiah it belonged to Moab (Jer. 48:19). It is now called 'Arā'ir, and is a desolate heap just s. of Dibon and a little e. of the Roman road which runs n. and s. through Moab.

2. A city in Gilead on the frontier of Gad; before, that is, e. of, Rabbah, doubtless Rabbath Ammon (Josh. 13:25; and perhaps Judg. 11:33). It may be sought to the n.w. of 'Amman at 'Arjan or about 4¼ miles to the e. at Khirbet es-Safra.

3. A village of Judah, to which David sent spoil after his victory over the Amalekites who had pillaged Ziklag (I Sam. 30:28). Its ruins lie in the wadi 'Arāra, 12 miles s.e. of Beer-sheba. See ADADAH.

If Ar'oer in Isa. 17:2 is a proper and not a common noun meaning nakedness, ruin, the phrase in which it stands may be rendered, "The cities of Ar'oer," and interpreted as dependencies of the Gadite Ar'oer; or, "The cities Ar'oer," the 2 Ar'oers e. of the Jordan being used representatively for all the cities of the region. The reading of the LXX (Damasus), deserted forever, suggests that the word is not to be taken as a proper noun.

Ar'o'erite (ā-rō'ēr-it). A native or inhabitant of Ar'oer (I Chron. 11:44, where the reference is probably to Ar'oer 3).

Ar'pach'shad (ār-pāk'shād), in A.V. Ar'phax'ad. A son of Shem (Gen. 10:22, 24; I Chron. 1:17, 18, both R.V.). He was a remote ancestor of Abraham, was born 2 years after the Flood, at the age of 35 begat Shelah, and died 403 years afterward, at the age of 438 (Gen. 11:10-13). Ar'pachshad is not necessarily a person. The structure of these genealogical registers, as is apparent, is such that the name may be that of a tribe or land, of which the people were descended from that son of Shem born 2 years after the Flood. Ar'pachshad was long identified with the mountainous country on the upper Zab n. and n.e. of Nineveh, called by the Greek geographers Arrapachitis. Some scholars consider the word as a compound: Arpach (=Arrapachitis) + Chesad (Chaldea).

Ar'pad (ār'pād), in A.V. twice Ar'phad (ār'fād). A city, generally coupled in the O.T. with Hamath, from which, consequently, it was not far distant (II Kings 18:34; 19:13; Isa. 10:9; Jer. 49:23). It has been placed at Tell Erfād, 13 miles n. of Aleppo. It was a place of importance, and was subjected to repeated visitations from the Assyrians. It saw the army of Adad-nirari in 896 B.C., and of Ashurnirari in 754; it was besieged and taken by Tiglath-pileser (742-740); and an uprising of cities which included Arpad was suppressed by Sargon in 720.

Ar'phax'ad (ār-fāk'sād). See ARPACHSHAD.

Ar'sa'ees (ār'sā-sēz). King of Persia and Media (I Macc. 14:2, 3; 15:22), from 174 to 136 B.C. He was the 6th of the name, but is better known as Mithridates I of Parthia. His rule extended far beyond the bounds of Media and Persia. He conquered Asia from the Hindu Kush to the Euphrates and raised the Parthian kingdom to an empire.

Ar'tax-erxes (ār'tāk-sūr'k'sēz) [Old Persian Artaxšathra, he who gives the lordship to holy law]. The 3d son of Xerxes and his successor on the Persian throne, 465 B.C. He is called Longimanus (Longhanded). This epithet is generally interpreted literally, but some scholars take it figuratively as meaning only that Artaxerxes had a widely extended dominion. He was led to forbid building at Jerusalem (Ezra 4:7), but afterward permitted it (ch. 6:14). In the 7th year of his reign (458 B.C.) Artaxerxes let Ezra lead a great multitude of exiles back to Jerusalem (Ezra 7:1, 11, 12, 21; 8:1). In the 20th year of his reign (445 B.C.) he permitted Nehemiah to make his 1st journey to the Jewish capital, and rebuild the walls of the city (Neh. 2:1, etc.). In the 32d year of his reign (433 B.C.) he allowed Nehemiah, who had returned for a little to Persia, to revisit Jerusalem, and become governor of the restored city and the adjacent country (Neh. 13:6). Artaxerxes died in the year 424 B.C.

Ar'temas (ār'tē-mās) [Gr., contraction of Artemidōros, gift of Artemis]. A companion whom Paul thought of sending on an errand to Titus (Titus 3:12).

Ar'temis (ār'tē-mīs). The Greek goddess of hunting, corresponding to the Roman Diana (Acts 19:24, R.V. marg.); see DIANA.

Ar'ub'both (ā-rüb'ōth), in A.V. Ar'u'both (ā-rōō'bōth) [the lattices]. A place mentioned (I Kings 4:10) in connection with Socoh and Hepher; probably to be identified with 'Arrābeh near Dathan. Alt places it to the n.w. in the region of Tell el-Asāwar.

Ar'u'mah (ā-rōō'mā) [perhaps, a height]. A village near Shechem, once the residence of Abimelech (Judg. 9:41). It has been supposed to be identical with Rumah (II Kings 23:36), and has been placed doubtfully at el-'Ormeh, 6 miles s.e. of Shechem.

Ar'vad (ār'vād) [perhaps, wandering]. The most n. of the Phoenician cities, modern Ruwād. In Ezekiel's time, it furnished mariners and valiant defenders of the stronghold of Tyre (Ezek. 27:8, 11). It is the island of Aradus (I Macc. 15:23), about 2 miles from the mainland, and 30 miles n. of Tripolis and 125 miles n. of Tyre.

Ar'vad-ite (ār'vād-it). One of the inhabitants of Arvad. They were reckoned to Canaan (Gen. 10:18; I Chron. 1:16).

Ar'za (ār'zā) [delight]. The steward of King Elah's house in Tirzah (I Kings 16:9).

A'sa (ā'sā) [physician, or perhaps a contraction for Jehovah has healed; cf. Arab. 'asā, to heal; Aram. 'āsā, 'assā, physician]. 1. A Levite, son of Elkanah who lived in a village of the Netophathites (I Chron. 9:16).

2. A king of Judah, who ascended the throne in the twentieth year of Jeroboam, king of Israel. He was son of Abijam and grandson of Rehoboam. His mother (actually his grandmother) was Maacah, daughter of Absalom (I Kings 15:9-10, cf. v. 2). His reign began with 10 years of peace (II Chron. 14:1). He took away the male prostitutes out of the land, abolished the idols of his predecessors, and removed his grandmother from her position of queen mother, because she had made an abominable image for an Aserah (I Kings 15:9-13; cf. ch. 14:22-24; II Chron. 14:1-5; 15:16). He also destroyed the strange altars, the high places, and the sun images throughout Judah (II Chron.

14:3-5) as fully as he was able (cf. I Kings 22:46; II Chron. 19:4); but, though his own heart was perfect with Jehovah, the people still occasionally sacrificed to Jehovah on high places (I Kings 15:14; II Chron. 15:17). His kingdom was invaded by the Ethiopian Zerah, at the head of an enormous host of Africans, but by the help of Jehovah he defeated them, and drove them from the land (II Chron. 14:9-15). In the 15th year of his reign, encouraged by the Prophet Azariah, he completed the religious reformation, restored the altar of burnt offering at the Temple, and induced the people to renew the covenant with Jehovah (II Chron. 15:1-15). In the 36th (probably, 16th) year of his reign (see CHRONOLOGY, IV), Baasha, king of Israel, invaded Benjamin and fortified Ramah on the main road from Jerusalem to the n. Asa, finding himself too weak to capture Ramah and reopen the road, took the Temple treasures, and hired Ben-hadad, king of Damascus, to attack Baasha. Ben-hadad invaded the n. portion of the Israelite kingdom, compelling Baasha to withdraw from Ramah. Asa took the building materials which Baasha had gathered at Ramah and fortified Geba and Mizpah. The Prophet Hanani reproved the king for his worldly policy, after his experience of God's help at the time of the Ethiopian invasion. Asa resented the interference of the prophet, and put him in prison (I Kings 15:16-22; II Chron. 16:1-10). In the 39th year of his reign he became diseased in his feet. In his distress he sought help from the physicians, but not from Jehovah (I Kings 15:23; II Chron. 16:12). In his latter days he was not so true to Jehovah as in his earlier life. He died in the 41st year of his reign, and was buried with royal honors in a sepulcher which he had made for himself in the city of David.

As'a-hel (ās'-ā-hēl) [God has made]. 1. Son of David's sister Zeruiah, and brother of Joab and Abishai (I Chron. 2:16); noted for valor and fleetness (II Sam. 2:18; 23:24). He was in the army of David; and in the rout of Ish-bosheth's troops at Gibeon, he pursued Abner, their commander, in the desire to kill him. Abner, after vainly warning him to desist, in self-defense gave him a mortal thrust (II Sam. 2:12-23). His death occurred before David became king of all Israel; yet when David organized the army in 12 divisions, the 4th was assigned to Asahel and Zebadiah his son after him (I Chron. 27:7). The form of the statement is peculiar. It may denote that the command of the division for the 4th month was vested in the house of Asahel, being exercised by his son who was now the head of the house. Perhaps the new organization perpetuated an earlier arrangement, only on a larger scale.

2. One of the Levites employed by Jehoshaphat to teach the people the Law (II Chron. 17:8).

3. An overseer of the Temple in the reign of Hezekiah (II Chron. 31:13).

4. Father of a certain Jonathan (Ezra 10:15).

As'a'iah (ā-sā'yā), in A.V. twice As'a'hi'ah (ās'-ā-hi'yā) (II Kings 22:12, 14) [Jehovah has made]. 1. A Simeonite prince (I Chron. 4:36).

2. A Levite, head of the family of Merari in David's time (I Chron. 6:30; 15:6, 11).

3. A man of Judah, son of Baruch, and head of the family of Shelah (Shilonites) at the time of the return from the Captivity (I Chron. 9:5). He was known also by the synonymous name Maaseiah (Neh. 11:5).

4. An officer whom Josiah sent with others to the Prophetess Huldah to inquire of Jehovah about the things which he had heard from the Law found by Hilkiah (II Kings 22:12, 14; II Chron. 34:20).

A'saph (ā'sāf) [collector; or perhaps, Jehovah has gathered]. 1. A Levite, the son of Berachiah, of the Gershonite family (I Chron. 6:39, 43). With Heman and Ethan, he sounded cymbals before the Ark during its removal from the house of Obed-edom to the city of David (I Chron. 15:16-19). He was then assigned the permanent office of sounding cymbals at the service (I Chron. 16:4, 5, 7); and when the service was finally and fully arranged, his family, with him at the head, was one of the three families permanently charged with the music and song and instructed in the art (I Chron. 25:1-9). Their position was on the right (ch. 6:39). The family often receives mention (II Chron. 20:14; 29:13). A hundred and twenty-eight, all of them singers, came back from Babylon (Ezra 2:41; Neh. 7:44), and conducted the psalmody when the foundations of Zerubbabel's Temple were laid (Ezra 3:10). Twelve psalms—Psalms 50; 73 to 83—are attributed in the titles to the family of Asaph (cf. II Chron. 29:30). Psalm 50 belongs to the 2d book of psalms; the others constitute the bulk of the 3d book. In them the usual name of the deity is God, rather than Jehovah. Asaph, like the other chief singers, is called a seer (II Chron. 29:30; cf. ch. 35:15 and I Chron. 25:5).

2. Father of Hezekiah's recorder (II Kings 18:18).

3. Keeper of the king's park in Palestine under Artaxerxes Longimanus, king of Persia (Neh. 2:8).

4. In I Chron. 26:1 read Ebiasaph (cf. ch. 9:19).

As'ar'a-mel (ā-sār'-ā-mēl), in A.V. Sar'a-mel. Perhaps a title of Simon Maccabaeus, šar 'am 'ēl, prince of the people of God; since the word is preceded by the preposition in, some think it represents a place, standing for həšar 'am 'ēl, the court of the people of God, the forecourt of the Temple (I Macc. 14:28). If the 2d interpretation be correct, we have to assume that the translator mistook Hebrew w (and) for b (in) and then regarded the word as a place name. Or the preposition in may have been inserted by a copyist who supposed that the word was the name of a place.

As'a-rel (ās'-ā-rēl), in A.V. As'a-re-el (ā-sā-rē-ēl) [God has bound]. A son of Jehallelel (I Chron. 4:16).

As'ca-lon (ās'kā-lōn) (I Macc. 10:86). See ASHKELON.

Ascen'sion [Lat. ascensio, ascending]. Forty days after Easter the risen Christ finally parted from his disciples (Acts 1:1-12; Mark 16:19; Luke 24:50, 51) and returned to the Father. The record indicates a bodily disappearance by an upward movement into the sky. The event took place at the Mount of Olives as the apostles were discussing the Kingdom with Christ. The ascension is the point of contact between the Jesus of the Gospels and the mystical Christ of the Epistles and thus preserves the historical character of the former and the universality of the latter in true continuity.

Ascents', A.V. De'grees'. A word occurring in the titles of 15 psalms, Psalms 120 to 134, which are called Songs of Ascents. It is the rendering of Heb. ma'ālōth, ascents or goings up (Ezra 7:9), steps (Ex. 20:26; I Kings 10:19). A Jewish tradition tells that the 15 Songs of Ascents were sung as an ascent was made by 15 steps from the court of the women to that of the men, a view not now generally entertained. The common opinion is that they were sung by the pilgrims during the ascent to Jerusalem (cf. I Sam. 1:3; Ps. 42:4; 122:4; Isa. 30:29).

As'enath (äs'ê-năth) [Egypt. ns-N.t, belonging to the goddess Neith]. Daughter of Poti-phera, priest of On, wife of Joseph and mother of Manasseh and Ephraim (Gen. 41:45, 50-52; 46:20).

A'ser (ä'sër). See ASHER.

Ash. The rendering in the A.V. of the Hebrew ōren in Isa. 44:14. The wood of the tree was suitable for use in making idols. A tree which the Arabs call 'arān is said by one of their writers to grow in Arabia Petraea, and is described as having thorns and producing bunches of bitter berries. But by ōren the LXX understood the fir tree. Jerome renders it pine. R.V. translates the word by fir tree, and places ash in the margin. Perhaps the Syrian fir (Pinus halepensis) is meant, which flourishes on the mountains of Palestine, and is occasionally found as far s. as Hebron. See FIR.

A'shan (ä'shān) [smoke]. A town in the lowland, allotted to Judah, afterward transferred to Simeon and assigned with its suburbs to the Levites (Josh. 15:42; 19:7; I Chron. 4:32; 6:59). In the present text of Josh. 21:16 or I Chron. 6:59 Ashan and Ain have become confounded through the misreading of one letter. Ashan is apparently identical with Borashan (smoking pit) of A.R.V. (I Sam. 30:30). Cf. A.V. Chor-ashan, E.R.V. Corashan (smoking furnace). For similarity of Hebrew b and c (k), see table of ALPHABET.

Ash'are'lah (äsh'ä-rē'lā), in A.V. Asa-re'lah [perhaps, God has fulfilled with joy; cf. Arab. 'ashira, to be cheerful. The preferred Hebrew text has s instead of sh]. A son of Asaph (I Chron. 25:2). Called, in v. 14, Jesharelah, q.v.

Ash'bea (äsh'bē-ä) [let me call as witness]. A descendant of Shelah, of the tribe of Judah. The members of the family wrought fine linen (I Chron. 4:21). Beth-Ashbea may, however, be the name of a place.

Ash'bel (äsh'bēl) [perhaps, a secondary form of Eshbaal, man of the Lord]. A son of Benjamin and founder of a tribal family (Gen. 46:21; Num. 26:38; I Chron. 8:1). Apparently represented by Jediael in I Chron. 7:6.

Ash'che-naz (äsh'kē-nāz). See ASHKENAZ.

Ash'dod (äsh'dōd), in N.T. Azo'tus [perhaps, strength, fortress]. One of the 5 chief Philistine cities, ruled over by a lord, and seat of the worship of Dagon (Josh. 13:3; I Sam. 5:1 seq.; 6:17; I Macc. 10:83; 11:4). Anakim remained in it after the conquest of Canaan by the Hebrews (Josh. 11:22). It was assigned to Judah (Josh. 15:46, 47), but was not possessed by that tribe. The Ark of God was carried to Ashdod by the Philistines after they captured it at Ebenezer, and was placed in the temple of Dagon (I Sam. 5:1-8). A judgment falling on the inhabitants, the Ark was transferred to Gath (I Sam. 5:6-8). Uzziah broke down the walls of Ashdod (II Chron. 26:6). The Tartan or Assyrian commander in chief under Sargon besieged it with success (Isa. 20:1). In the time of the Assyrian kings, from Sargon to Esarhaddon, Ashdod was ruled by an official called king by the Assyrians. According to Herodotus (ii. 157), Psammetichus, king of Egypt, besieged it for 29 years. Only a remnant survived (Jer. 25:20; cf. Zeph. 2:4; Zech. 9:6). Its inhabitants were among those who opposed the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem, and they spoke a different language from the Israelites of that day; nevertheless some of the returned Jews married women of Ashdod (Neh. 4:7; 13:23, 24). The city was twice besieged and partially destroyed by the Maccabees (I Macc.

5:68; 10:84), but was rebuilt by the Romans about 55 B.C. In N.T. times it was called Azotus (Acts 8:40).

Philip preached the gospel from this place as far as Caesarea (Acts 8:40). The city became the seat of a bishop in the 4th century A.D. Its approximate site is the mud village of Esdūd on the e. slope of a low, round knoll, 9 miles n.e. from Ascalon, 3 from the Mediterranean, and about midway between Jaffa and Gaza, about 18 miles from the latter place.

Ash'dod-ite (äsh'dōd-it), in A.V. once Ash'doth-ite. A native or inhabitant of Ashdod (Josh. 13:3; Neh. 4:7).

Ash'doth-ite (äsh'dōth-it). See preceding article.

Ash'doth-pis'gah (äsh'dōth-piz'gā). See PISGAH.

Ash'er (äsh'ēr), in A.V. of N.T. A'ser, following the Greek form [happy]. 1. The 8th son of Jacob, and the 2d by Zilpah, Leah's maidservant (Gen. 30:12, 13; 35:26). His blessing given by Jacob on his deathbed is thus worded:

"Out of Asher his bread shall be fat,
And he shall yield royal dainties" (Gen. 49:20).

That of Moses:

"Blessed be Asher with children;
Let him be acceptable unto his brethren,
And let him dip his foot in oil.
Thy bars shall be iron and brass;
And as thy days, so shall thy strength be"
(Deut. 33:24).

He had 4 sons, Jimnah, Ishuah, Isui, and Beriah; and a daughter named Serah (Gen. 46:17; I Chron. 7:30).

2. The tribe of which Asher, the son of Jacob, was the progenitor. As assigned, its territory extended on the n. to the n. boundary of Palestine, and on the s. reached to the s. of Carmel, a length of about 60 miles. On the e. it was bounded by the territories of Zebulun and Naphtali, and on the w. by the Mediterranean (Josh. 19:24-31). But from Tyre, Sidon, Accho, and other strong places the Asherites did not expel the Canaanite inhabitants (Judg. 1:31, 32). The failure of the Asherites to capture and occupy the Phoenician plain along the sea left them only the inland hill country, except near Carmel. This was well adapted for the culture of the olive, so that the inhabitants might dip their feet in oil (cf. Deut. 33:24).

3. Asher may possibly denote a town also, e. of Shechem (Josh. 17:7); perhaps Teyāsir, about 11 miles n.e. of Shechem on the road to Beth-shean.

A'she'rah (ä-shē'rā), pl. A'she'rim (masc.), and A'she'roth (fem.). The Hebrew form of the name of an Amorite or Canaanite goddess 'Ashirtu ('Ashratu), who is mentioned in the Amarna tablets. She appears in the Ras Shamra literature as Lady 'Asherat ('Athirat) and is known also as Lady of the Gods and Mistress of the Gods, being the mother of 70 elim (gods). Her most peculiar designation is 'Asherat, Lady of the Sea. In s. Arabia 'Athirat was a solar divinity.

A.V., following the LXX and the Vulgate, wrongly renders the word as grove. When not the name of a deity, Asherah refers to a wooden pole or mast which stood at Canaanite places of worship (Ex. 34:13); originally it was, perhaps, the trunk of a tree with the branches chopped off, and was regarded as the wooden symbol of the goddess Asherah, who like Ashtoreth, was the type of fertility (Ex. 34:13, R.V. marg.). It was erected beside the altar of Baal (Judg. 6:25, 28, R.V.). For the use of the word as the name of a goddess, see R.V., Judg. 3:7; I Kings 18:19; II Kings 21:7. The prophets of the Asherah in Ahab's time were, with those of Baal, slain by Elijah at the river Kishon (I Kings 16:33, R.V.). Women wore hangings for an Asherah in the Temple (II Kings 23:7, R.V.), and Josiah, as part of his religious reformation, brought out the idolatrous symbol and burned it at the Brook Kidron (v. 6).

Ash'e'rim (ă-shē'rīm). See ASHERAH.

Ash'er-ite (ăsh'ēr-īt). A member of the tribe of Asher (Judg. 1:32).

Ash'e'roth (ă-shē'rōth). See ASHERAH.

Ash'hur (ăsh'ēr), in A.V. Ash'ur (ăsh'ēr) [ety. uncertain; man of Horus; or blackness]. Son of Hezron by his wife Abiah. He was enrolled with the house of Caleb, was head or ancestor of the inhabitants of Tekoa, and had 2 wives and 7 children (I Chron. 2:24; 4:5-7).

Ash'ma (ă-shī'mă). A divinity worshipped by the people of Hamath (II Kings 17:30).

Ash'ke-lon (ăsh'kē-lōn), in A.V. sometimes As'ke-lon (ăs'kē-lōn). One of the 5 leading Philistine cities each ruled by a lord (Josh. 13:3); it is mentioned in the Tell el-Amarna correspondence. It was situated in a valley on the Mediterranean seashore (Jer. 47:5, 7), 12 miles n. of Gaza, and was the seat of the worship of Derceto, a goddess with the body of a fish, whose temple and lake lay to the e. of the city. It was captured by the tribe of Judah in the time of the Judges (Judg. 1:18), but soon reverted to its old rulers (Judg. 14:19; I Sam. 6:17). It was Philistine in the days of David (II Sam. 1:20), Amos (Amos 1:8), Zephaniah (Zeph. 2:4, 7), and Jeremiah (Jer. 25:20; 47:5, 7); cf. also Zech. 9:5. Ashkelon was twice taken by Jonathan Maccabaeus (I Macc. 10:86; 11:60). It was the birthplace of Herod the Great, and the residence of his sister Salome. In the conflicts during the procuratorship of Florus the city was attacked by the Jews and set on fire (Jos. War ii. 18, 1); but not long afterward the citizens retaliated and butchered 2,500 in their midst (War ii. 18, 5). Its site lies within a natural amphitheater formed by a ridge of rock, with the open side to the sea. The wall ran along the top of the ridge. The soil is fertile, producing large apples, sycamore figs, etc. The onion of Ascalon called scallion, shallot, or eschalot, came at first from Ashkelon; hence its name.

Ash'ke-lon-ite (ăsh'kē-lōn-īt), in A.V. Esh'ke-lon-ite. An inhabitant of Ashkelon (Josh. 12:3).

Ash'ke-naz (ăsh'kē-năz), in A.V. twice Ash'che-naz (ăsh'kē-năz). The eldest son of Gomer (Gen. 10:3; I Chron. 1:6). The name, whether originally that of a person or country or tribe, denoted a people of the race of Gomer. In the time of Jeremiah they dwelt in the neighborhood of Ararat and Minni, that is, near e. Armenia (Jer. 51:27).

Ash'nah (ăsh'nă) [hard, firm]. 1. A village in the lowland of Judah near Zorah (Josh. 15:33); probably 'Aslin, a village built upon its ruins at the foot of Deir Abu Kābūs near Eshtaol.

2. Another village of Judah, but farther s. (Josh. 15:43); identified with Idhna, a village on the way from Hebron to Eleutheropolis (Beit Jibrin).

Ash'pe-naz (ăsh'pē-năz). The master of the eunuchs at Babylon during Nebuchadnezzar's reign (Dan. 1:3).

Ash'ri-el (ăsh'rī-ēl). See ASRIEL.

Ash'ta-roth (ăsh'tă-rōth) [plural of Ashtoreth (q.v.)]. 1. In connection with the plural of Baal, a general designation for the female divinities of the Canaanites; or perhaps, to judge from Gen. 14:5 and I Sam. 31:10, the plural of majesty, whereby the goddess Ashtoreth was honorably spoken of in the plural number.

2. An ancient town of Bashan, seat of the worship of the goddess Astarte, and capital of Og (Deut. 1:4; Josh. 9:10). Some of the ancient inhabitants were giants, Og himself being of the number (Josh. 12:4; 13:12). The place fell to the lot of Machir, the son of Manasseh (Josh. 13:31), but became a Levitical city, inhabited by the children of Gershom (I Chron. 6:71). Uzzia, one of David's mighty men, was connected with the town (I Chron. 11:44). Its site is commonly identified with Tell 'Ashtarath, 21 miles e. of the Lake of Galilee. This tell stands on a hill in the midst of a well-watered, grassy plain. See ASHTEROTH-KARNAIM.

Ash'te-rath-ite (ăsh'tē-răth-īt). A native of Ashtaroth (I Chron. 11:44).

Ash'te-roth-kar-na'im (ăsh'tē-rōth-kār-nă'im) [two-northern Ashtaroth]. In A.V. written as two words. A place smitten by Chedorlaomer on his expedition against the cities of the plain (Gen. 14:5, R.V.). Its name suggests that perhaps there was an Ashtoreth represented with the horns of a cow or a sheep. Probably Ashteroth-karnaim is the full name of Ashtaroth, and it may be the place known centuries later as Karnaim (Carnaim), which is mentioned in connection with cities of Gilead and in which Atargatis was worshipped (I Macc. 5:26, 36, 43; II Macc. 12:26). However, the physical features ascribed to Carnion in II Macc. 12:21 do not agree with Tell 'Ashtarath, the commonly accepted site of Ashtaroth. It has accordingly been proposed to identify this place with Tell 'Ash'ari, which is 4 miles s. of Tell 'Ashtarath. The whole question is obscure.

Ash'to-reth (ăsh'tō-rēth) [S. Arab. 'athara, to be rich, to irrigate, whence, perhaps, the reflexive 'athtar, the self-waterer, a spring]. Astarte, a goddess of the Phoenicians and Canaanites. The name occurs in South Arabic as 'Athtar, a god identified with the planet Venus. In the Ras Shamra tablets are found the masculine 'Athtar and the feminine 'Athtart. In the Amarna letters this goddess is known as Ashtartu. In Babylonia Ishtar, whose name is cognate with Astarte (Ashtart), was identified with Venus. She was the goddess of sexual love, maternity, and fertility. Prostitution as a religious rite in the service of this goddess under various names is widely attested. The identification of 'Ashtart with Aphrodite is evidence of her sexual character. She also appears as a war-goddess in Assyria and Babylonia; cf. placing the armor of Saul as a trophy in the temple of the Philistine Ashtaroth (I Sam. 31:10). Her worship was early established at Sidon, hence she is called the goddess or the abomination of the Sidonians (I Kings 11:5, 33; II Kings 23:13). It was in vogue e. of the Jordan in the days of Abraham (Gen. 14:5). As early as the times of Judges it had spread to the Hebrews (Judg. 2:13; 10:6). Solomon in his old age gave it the support of his great name (I Kings 11:5; II Kings 23:13). The pronunciation of the name as Ashtoreth instead of Ashtareth is believed to express the loathing felt for idolatry, by conforming the sound to that of bōsheth (shame). See ISHBOSHETH.

Ash'ur (ăsh'ēr). See ASHUR.

Ash'ur-ite (ăsh'ēr-īt). A people belonging to the kingdom of Ishbosheth (II Sam. 2:3). They are enumerated between Gilead and Jezreel. Vulgate and Syriac have Gesurites.

Ash'vath (ăsh'văth). An Asherite, family of Heber, house of Japhlet (I Chron. 7:33).

A'sia (ă'zhă). The continent e. of Europe and Africa. The name was employed in a narrower sense for the kingdom of the Seleu-cidae (I Macc. 8:6; 11:13), which embraced Syria and extensive regions w. of the river Halys. When the Romans transferred most of these w. districts, Mysia, Lydia, and Phrygia, to Eumenes II, king of Pergamos, the name was used by them for the kingdom of Pergamos, and when this kingdom was appropriated by them in 133 B.C., they added Caria and a strip of coast to it and formed the province of Asia (Acts 6:9; 27:2; I Peter 1:1; Rev. 1:4, 11). Pliny, however, distinguishes between Phrygia and Asia (Hist. Nat. v. 28). So do Paul and others (Acts 2:9, 10; 16:6). The names of the incorporated districts were not abandoned; and Paul, who was traveling along but outside of the borders of Asia, mentions being at a point over against Mysia (Acts 16:7, R.V.), in which Pergamos was situated, one of the cities of Asia (Rev. 1:4, 11). The province was at first governed by propraetors, but in 27 B.C. it was made senatorial and so continued for 300 years, being governed by proconsuls (cf. Acts 19:38, R.V.). Its capital was Ephesus. In the N.T. Asia always denotes the Roman province (Acts 19:10, 22, 26, 27; 20:4, 16, 18; 21:27; 24:18; 27:2; I Cor. 16:19; II Cor. 1:8; II Tim. 1:15).

As'i-arch (ä'shī-ärk) [Gr., chief of Asia]. Member of a college of deputies who were annually appointed by various towns of the province of Asia to conduct a festival and games in honor of the Roman emperor. The festivities took place yearly at one of the several cities which had the honor in succession. The Asiarchs were chosen each year, but in time formed an influential body in the towns, and often secured the re-election of their members. The Asiarchs of Ephesus were friends to Paul (Acts 19:31, R.V. marg.).

As'i-de'ans (ä-sī-dē'ānz). See HASIDAEANS.

As'i-el (ä'sī-ēl) [God has made]. A Simeonite (I Chron. 4:35).

As'ke-lon (ä'skē-lōn). See ASHKELON.

As'mo-nae'an (äzmō-nē'ān). See HASMO-NAEAN and MACCABEE.

As'nah (ä'sná) [a bramble, thornbush]. One of the Nethinim, some of whose descendants returned from the Captivity at Babylon (Ezra 2:50).

As-nap'per (äs-nāp'ēr). See OSNAPPAR.

Asp. The rendering of Heb. pethen in Deut. 32:33; Job 20:14, 16; and Isa. 11:8, and of Gr. aspis in Rom. 3:13. With some inconsistency pethen is rendered not asp but adder in Ps. 58:4 and 91:13. Pethen is a species of snake (Ps. 58:4), venomous (Deut. 32:33), dwelling in holes (Isa. 11:8); probably Naja haje, which is found in Egypt and Palestine, is the asp of the Greeks and Romans, is of the same genus as the deadly cobra of India, and is generally used by the snake charmers in their performances. It has a hood which it dilates when about to strike its prey.

As-pa'tha (äs-pā'thá). A son of Haman (Esth. 9:7).

As'phar (ä'sfär). A pool in the wilderness of Tekoah (I Macc. 9:33).

As'ri-el (ä'srī-ēl), in A.V. once Ash'ri-el [ety. uncertain; perhaps, God striveth]. A descendant of Manasseh and founder of a family (Num. 26:31; Josh. 17:2).

Ass. The genus called by zoologists Asinus, containing the several species and varieties of asses, wild or domesticated. The ass genus belongs to the family Equidae or horses. Three asses are mentioned in Scripture. 1. The wild ass, called in Heb. 'arōd, the fugitive. It is poetically described in Job 39:5-8, where, however, there is mention also of the common wild ass of Syria, and is named also in Dan. 5:21. If distinct in species from the common wild ass, it is probably Asinus onager, which is found in the Sahara and in Arabia, where it was once common, but is now more rare. It occasionally visits the Hauran. It is the progenitor of the domestic ass.

2. The wild ass of Syria (Asinus hemippus); Heb. pere', the leaper, occurring in Job 24:5; 39:5; Ps. 104:11; Isa. 32:14, and Jer. 14:6. It is rather smaller than the onager. Tristram mentions that enormous herds of them often enter the Armenian mountains in summer. They are found at all times in n. Arabia, Mesopotamia, and Syria, occasionally entering n. Palestine. They are the species represented on the Ninevite sculptures.

3. The domestic ass (Equus asinus), Heb. hāmōr. It is a subspecies descended from the onager. It is obstinate and typical of stupidity. But on the other hand the ass is strong, easily fed, patient, and forgiving. Its faults are mainly produced by the cruel bondage imposed upon it by its human taskmaster. The ass was early domesticated. Abraham had asses (Gen. 12:16) on which he rode (ch. 22:3), so had Jacob (ch. 30:43). They were used also for burden-bearing (Gen. 49:14; Isa. 30:6), for plowing, etc. (Deut. 22:10). White asses were deemed fit for persons of rank (Judg. 5:10), as they still are in Palestine. Jesus showed his lowliness, and at the same time the spirit of the earlier kings, by rejecting horses and riding on an ass in his triumphal entry into Jerusalem (Zech. 9:9; Matt. 21:5).

As'sas'sins. Ruffians (Gr. sikarioi, dagger men) who terrorized Judea, A.D. 50-70. Their organization was formed in order to assert liberty from the Romans and recognize no master save God. They carried a small sword hidden beneath the cloak; and, mingling with the multitude at the festivals, stabbed those who were marked for destruction. They even formed bands and pillaged villages (Acts 21:38, R.V.; Jos. Antiq. xx. 8, 10; War vii. 10, 1). See ZEALOT.

As'shur (ä'shōōr), in A.V. twice As'sur [Heb. 'Ashshūr, Assyria; the land was named from the city of Ashur, which probably derived its name from the god Ashur, the chief deity of the Assyrian pantheon, the god of military prowess]. A people descended from Shem (Gen. 10:22), and the country which they inhabited (Ezra 4:2, A.V.; Ezek. 27:23). See ASSYRIA.

As-shu'rim (ä-shōō'rīm). A people, doubtless of Arabia, descended from Dedan, and more remotely from Abraham by Keturah (Gen. 25:13).

As'si-de'ans (ä'sī-dē'ānz). See HASIDAEANS.

As'sir (ä'sēr) [captive; sometimes derived from Egyptian wsyr, Osiris]. 1. A descendant of Levi through Korah, born in Egypt (Ex. 6:24; I Chron. 6:22).

2. A descendant of the preceding (I Chron. 6:23, 37).

3. A son of King Jeconiah (I Chron. 3:17). The name does not appear in the text of R.V., but is in the margin. The revisers regard it as an adjective descriptive of Jeconiah, and translate it "the captive"; but there is no definite article in the present Hebrew text, and there was none in the text used by the LXX. His name suggests that Assir was born in captivity. This accords with other indications. Jeconiah was 18 years old when carried off to Babylon, and in the enumeration of the members of his family deported with him, no children are mentioned (II Kings 24:8-15). Assir did not succeed to the royal title; the right to the throne passed to Shealtiel (q.v.).

As'sos (ä'sōs). A seaport town of Mysia, now called Behram, not far from Troas (Acts 20:13, 14).

As'sur (äs'ēr). See ASSHUR.

As'syri'a (ä-sir'i-ä) [Gr. Assyria from Heb. Ashshūr, Akkad. Ashshur]. A country e. of the middle Tigris between 35° and 37° n. latitude. The only town w. of the Tigris was the old capital Ashur (Assur, Asshur, Ashshur), from which the whole land takes its name. With the growth of the city's power, the name came to denote the region compassed by the mountains of Armenia on the n., the ranges of Media on the e., and the Lower Zab River on the s. Westward it extended a short distance from the Tigris into Mesopotamia. This district is the Assyria proper of history, but the name is often applied to the extensive empire conquered and ruled by the Assyrians. Since Assyria proper was a highland region, it had a more invigorating climate than that of Babylonia.

The population in the region n. of Babylonia was not purely Semitic, and the origin of the Assyrians themselves is still wrapped in mystery. Undoubtedly they were an amalgam of many stocks, among which the Hurrians are of special importance, but ultimately the Semitic element prevailed. By 2900 B.C. there was a settlement of Sumerians at Ashur. The name Nineveh also suggests Sumerian influence. Later Assyria became a part of the Akkadian empire. In fact the language of Ashur is closely related to that of Akkad, and was also written in cuneiform. The Assyrian culture was deeply indebted to that of the Babylonians, the Hittites, and the Hurrians. Colonies were established in e. Asia Minor in the 20th century B.C. by a dynasty of Akkadian princes of Ashur which rose to power after the fall of Ur (c. 2000). This brief Assyrian commercial expansion was made possible by the fact that the Amorite nomads had cut the old route from Babylonia up the Euphrates by way of Mari and Ibla and that the Assyrians developed a new one up the Tigris through Hurrian territory. From the descendants of the colonists have come thousands of business documents (the Cappadocian tablets, c. 1920-1870 B.C.).

From c. 1950 to c. 1850 Assyria was under Babylonian rule, but Shamshi-Adad at the end of that period made it independent and extended its territory. About 1800 Ashur was occupied by an Amorite chieftain. Assyria was hard-pressed (c. 1800-1380) by the Hittites, the Egyptians under Thutmose III, and the Hurrians of Mitanni, but Ashur-uballit (1380-1341) revived its former power. Through campaigns in all directions Assyria consolidated its position (1341-1232). During this period Shalmaneser I (1280-1260) was a great conqueror and builder, who made Calah (Kalhu) his capital, about 40 miles s. of Nineveh. His son Tukulti-Ninurta (1260-1232) ruled Babylonia for 7 years, but he lost his life in a revolt led by his own son. There followed a period of weakness; the fall of the Hittite kingdom seriously affected trade, and Babylonian power revived. Assyria, however, recovered and waxed strong under Ashur-dan I (1175-1140). During the reign of Tiglath-pileser I (c. 1115-1102) there was a great era of conquests and national improvements; through successful campaigns he gained control of the main trade routes of w. Asia. Ashur once more was the capital. Under his successors the kingdom greatly declined, and from c. 1100 to c. 900 Assyria suffered at the hand of Aramaean nomads. As the fortunes of Assyria were at such a low ebb, the time was favorable for the kingdoms of David and Solomon to reach their widest limits.

Around 900 Assyria once more embarked upon an era of conquests. Tukulti-Ninurta II (890-885) conducted brilliant campaigns, and was succeeded by his son Ashur-nasir-pal (885-860), who was a ruthless warrior and left a record of his cruelties. He rebuilt Calah. He campaigned successfully in the n. e. and the n. w. and reached the Mediterranean, where the Phoenician cities paid him tribute. His son Shalmaneser III (860-825) succeeded him. For 26 years he led every campaign in person. He is the first Assyrian king to come into contact with the Israelites. He waged war against Urartu (Armenia), captured Carchemish in 857, and in (854) 853 B.C. fought at Karkar a coalition of Ben-hadad, of Damascus, Ahab, of Israel, and their allies. In 842 he defeated Hazael, of Damascus, but did not take the city. In that year he received tribute from Tyre and Sidon and from Jehu, of Israel; he thus gained control of the Mediterranean trade routes. His son Shamshi-Adad V was married to Sammuramat (Semiramis), who became famous as queen mother during the reign of her son Adad-nirari III (812-782). After the latter's death until 746 Assyria was in a period of decay.

With the advent of Tiglath-pileser III (746/5-728/7) there is a restoration and the beginning of the 2d empire. His successors are Shalmaneser V (728/7-722); Sargon (722-705); Sennacherib (705-681); Esarhaddon (681-669); Ashurbanipal (669-626). See separate articles on the first 5 of these kings and on Nineveh.

Ashurbanipal was succeeded by his son Ashur-etil-ilani. At the latter's death Sinshum-lishir, an official of the king, seized the throne and held it for a few months. The last ruler was Sin-shar-ishkun, another son of Ashurbanipal. Nabopolassar, king of Babylonia, and his ally, Cyaxeres, king of the Medes, attacked Nineveh in 612 and destroyed it; the king perished in the flames. A few Assyrians under the leadership of Ashur-uballit escaped to Haran where they set up a government. This city was taken in 610 by Nabopolassar and Cyaxeres. After the battle of Carchemish (605) the Assyrians as a nation ceased to exist.

The Assyrian religion was borrowed from that of Babylon, except that Ashur, the presiding god of the city of Ashur, became the chief deity of Assyria. It was animistic nature worship. Every object and phenomenon in nature was believed to be animated by a spirit. The great gods, after Ashur, were the prominent objects of nature. They were 11 in number, in 2 triads and a pentad. Chief were Anu, heaven; Bel, the region inhabited by man, beast, and bird; and Ea, terrestrial and subterranean waters. Next in order were Sin, the moon; Shamash, the sun; and Ramman, god of the storm. Then came the 5 planets. There were innumerable other deities, some of whom were merely different aspects of the foregoing. Subordinate gods often attained eminence as patrons of important towns.

Excavations in the Assyrian palaces, begun by the Frenchman Botta in 1843, followed immediately by the Englishman Layard, and then, after a time, by George Smith of the British Museum, Rassam, and others, have made the Assyrian Empire, which was little more than a myth to the classic nations of antiquity, to us a great reality.

As'ta-rōth (ä'stá-rōth) [Deut. 1:4, A.V.]. See ASHTAROTH 2.

As'tar'te (äs-tär'té). See ASHTORETH.

As'trol'o-gers. 1. The rendering of the Heb. words hövērē shāmayim, dividers of the heavens. They are mentioned with stargazers (Isa. 47:13). There is no question that these were astrologers who divided the heavens into certain mansions, with the view of tracing the course of the planets through each of them, in the vain hope of being able to tell fortunes and predict future events. Though their failure was complete, yet the careful study of the heavens which astrologers found needful led to the gradual growth of the sublime science of astronomy.

2. The rendering in A.V. of the Heb. and Aram. words 'ashshāphim (Dan. 1:20), 'āshe-phim (ch. 2:27), and 'āshephayyā (chs. 4:7; 5:7), all translated in the R.V. "enchanters." See ENCHANTMENT and ENCHANTER.

A-sup'pim (ā-sūp'im) [collections, stores]. A building for storing Temple goods, which stood near the s. gate of the outer court (I Chron. 26:15, 17); hence R.V. renders the word by storehouse.

A-syn'cri-tus (ā-sīng'krī-tūs) [Gr., incomparable or unlike]. A Christian at Rome to whom Paul sent a salutation (Rom. 16:14).

A'tad (ā'tād) [thorn, bramble]. The great company which was bearing the body of Jacob from Egypt to the sepulcher at Hebron, after making a detour, perhaps to avoid the Philistines and Edomites, halted at the threshing floor of Atad, e. of the Jordan, and made a mourning for 7 days. The Canaanites saw and called the place Abel-mizraim, Meadow, or with slightly altered pronunciation, Mourning of Egypt. The procession afterward entered Canaan (Gen. 50:9-13).

At'a-rah (āt'ā-rā) [a crown, a diadem]. A wife of Jerahmeel (I Chron. 2:26).

A-tar-ga-tis (ā-tār'gā-tīs) [Gr. Atargatis from Aram. 'Atār or 'Attār (Astarte) + 'Atāh, 'Atēh (probably fem. form of Phrygian Attis, a god of vegetation)]. The great goddess of the Aramaeans, a goddess of fertility often confused with Astarte. The worship of this Syrian divinity is not mentioned in the canonical books, but in II Macc. 12:26 reference is made to her temple at Carnion in Gilead. In Palestine her principal seat of worship was at Ashkelon, where she was probably identified with the Heavenly Aphrodite. Another famous shrine of this goddess was at Hierapolis or Bambyce (Mabug) in Syria. According to Lucian's very full description of her cult (De Dea Syria), its general features were those found in the worship of the Semitic mother goddess.

At'a-roth (āt'ā-rōth) [crowns, diadems]. 1. A town e. of the Jordan, rebuilt by the tribe of Gad (Num. 32:3, 34). It was taken from the men of Gad by Mesha, king of Moab (Moabite Stone, 10, 11; see MOABITE STONE). Its name is generally supposed to be preserved in Khirbet 'Attārūs, on the w. slope of Jebel 'Attārūs, 3 miles n.e. of Machaerus, where John the Baptist was confined and murdered. The mountain is some miles s. of Heshbon, which is in the tribe of Reuben; but the territories of Reuben and Gad, like those of Judah and Simeon, were much commingled.

2. The same as Ataroth-addar (Josh. 16:2).

3. A town on the border of Ephraim, on the edge of the Jordan Valley. Apparently different from Ataroth-addar (Josh. 16:7). Tell Sheikh ed-Dhiab, n.e. of Phasaelis, has been proposed by Elliger.

4. A village, apparently in Judah (I Chron. 2:54), near Bethlehem. The name should include the 4 words that follow in A.V. and be written as in R.V., Atroth-beth-Joab.

At'a-roth-ad'dar (āt'ā-rōth-ā'dār), in A.V. once At'a-roth-a'dar (āt'ā-rōth-ā'dār) [crowns of Addar]. A village on the s. frontier of Ephraim (Josh. 16:5), on the boundary line between that tribe and Benjamin, w. of Luz and near the hill that lies on the s. side of the nether Beth-horon (ch. 18:13). Modern Tell en-Nasbeh, 7 miles n. of Jerusalem, is the most probable identification.

A'ter (ā'tēr) [probably, closing, a binder]. 1. A man called, by way of distinction, Ater of Hezekiah, 93 of whose descendants returned from Babylon after the Captivity (Ezra 2:16; Neh. 7:21).

2. A porter (Ezra 2:42; Neh. 7:45).

A'thach (ā'thāk) [a lodging place]. A village in the s. of Judah, to which David sent some of the spoil of Ziklag (I Sam. 30:30). Perhaps it is Ether (Josh. 15:42; 19:7), k (kaph) and r (resh) being confused by a scribe.

A'tha'lah (ā-thā'yā) [S. Arab., Jehovah is exalted; or perhaps, Jehovah has shown himself as surpassing; cf. Arab. 'atā, to be proud]. A man of Judah, son of Uzziiah, of the family of Perez (Neh. 11:4); by many identified with Uthai (I Chron. 9:4).

Ath'a-li'ah (āth'ā-lī'ā) [Jehovah is exalted; cf. Akkad. etlu, great, lofty; etelū, lord].

1. The wife of Jehoram, king of Judah, a daughter of Ahab and granddaughter of Omri (II Kings 8:18, 26; II Chron. 21:6; 22:2). She possessed the masculine courage of her mother Jezebel, and was equally unscrupulous in shedding blood. When her son, King Ahaziah, was slain by Jehu, she killed all the sons of the murdered monarch excepting one infant, Joash, who was stolen away by his aunt, Jehoshaba. Then seizing the throne, she reigned 6 years, at the end of which a priestly insurrection took place in favor of Joash. Attempting to quell it, she was dragged from the Temple courts and killed at the horses' entry to the king's house (II Kings 11:1-16; II Chron., chs. 22; 23).

2. A Benjamite of the house of Jeroham (I Chron. 8:26).

3. A man of the father's house of Elam (Ezra 8:7).

Ath'a-rim (āth'ā-rīm) [cf. Arab. 'athar, track]. The way of the Atharim was not far from the town of Arad, and was the route followed by the Israelites as they journeyed from Kadesh by way of Mount Hor in order to enter Canaan (Num. 21:1, R.V.).

Ath'e-no'bi-us (āth'ē-nō'bi-ūs). A commissioner sent by Antiochus Sidetes to Simon Maccabaeus. He belonged to the privileged class known as friends of the king (I Macc. 15:28).

Ath'ens (āth'ēnz) [named after the patron goddess Athene]. The capital of Attica, one of the Greek states. The city became the center of enlightenment in science, literature, and art for the ancient world. It grew up around the rocky hill called Acropolis (top or highest point of the city), and covered the smaller hills and intervening valleys on the n.e. side of the Gulf of Aegina, between the small river Ilissus on the e. and s., and the Cephissus a little to the w. Athens was about 4½ miles from the sea. Its commercial port was Piraeus, with which the city when in its glory was connected by long walls. The navy anchored close by at Phaleron. The early history of Athens is involved in obscurity. Tradition says that the city was founded by Cecrops about 1581 B.C., that it sent 50 ships to the Trojan War, and that it was ruled by kings until about 1068 B.C. The supreme authority was afterward vested in archons. Two celebrated legislators are spoken of: Draco, about 621 B.C., whose name has become proverbial for pitiless severity; and Solon, about 594 B.C., a wiser man, whose laws were more humane. In 490 B.C. the Athenians, supported by the Plataeans, gained the great victory at Marathon against the generals of Darius Hystaspis, king of Persia. In 480 Athens had to be abandoned to his son and successor, Xerxes, but the great naval battle at Salamis gained by the Greeks compelled the invader to withdraw. The city was, however, burned in 479 B.C. by his general, Mardonius. The glory gained by the Athenians in the Persian War led to the establishment of a small empire, with Athens for its capital and a powerful fleet rather than a large army for its support. From 459 to 431 B.C. the power of Pericles, an able democratic leader, was very great. The good feature of his enlightened government was the erection of many beautiful public buildings in Athens. Literature also greatly flourished under his administration. In 431, while he yet lived and ruled, the Peloponnesian War began, which ended by the surrender of Athens to the Spartans in 404. The city afterward went through various political vicissitudes, though the intellect and knowledge of its inhabitants rendered them influential, whatever changes took place. Four great schools of philosophy—Platonic, Peripatetic, Epicurean, and Stoic—flourished here and attracted numerous students, not only from Greece, but also later from Rome. The city was taken by the Roman general Sulla in 86 B.C., and was still subject to the Romans when Paul was there. Altars "to an Unknown God" were found in the city and at the harbor Phaleron (Acts 17:23; Pausanias i, 1, 4; Philostratus Vit. Apol. 6, 2). Mars' Hill, on which Paul delivered his celebrated discourse, was a short distance W. of the Acropolis (Acts 17:15 to 18:1; cf. also I Thess. 3:1). Athens subsequently came into the hands of the Goths, the Byzantines, and other temporarily dominant races, ending with the Turks. The modern Greek kingdom was established in A.D. 1830 and Athens became the capital in 1835.

Ath·la·i (äth'lä-i), probably contraction of Athaliah. A man who was induced by Ezra to divorce his foreign wife (Ezra 10:28).

A-tone·ment [Eng. at-one-ment, a setting at one of those who before were at variance]. 1. Reconciliation between persons or beings at variance (Rom. 5:11, A.V.). As applied to the relation between God and man, it was effected through the death of Jesus Christ upon the cross.

2. That which produces this reconciliation, as well as the satisfaction or propitiation effected through the expiatory sacrifice designed to have that effect (Ex. 30:16; Lev. 4:20, 26, 31, 35). This is the sense in which the word atonement is now commonly used.

A-tone·ment, Day of. The annual day of humiliation and expiation for the sins of the nation, when the high priest offered sacrifices as an atonement for the sanctuary, the priests, and the people (Lev., chs. 16; 23:26-32; Num. 29:7-11). It was observed on the 10th day of the 7th month by abstinence from daily labor, by a holy convocation, and by fasting. It was the only fast enjoined by the law. It was "the Fast" (Acts 27:9; Jos. Antiq. xiv. 4, 3). On that day the high priest laid aside his official ornaments, and clad in simple white linen sacrificed a bullock as a sin offering for himself and the priests. Taking a censer of live coals from off the altar, he entered the Holy of Holies and burned incense that the smoke might cover the mercy seat above the law. He then fetched the blood of the slain bullock and sprinkled it on the mercy seat and on the floor. This completed the atonement for the priesthood. He took the two goats provided by the nation and cast lots upon them. One he slew as a sin offering for the people, brought its blood within the veil, and sprinkled it as before to make atonement for the Holy of Holies. By similar rites he made atonement for the Holy Place and the altar of burnt offering. He now took the remaining goat, placed his hands on its head, and confessed over it the sins of the people. Typically the sins of the people were "laid on its head," it was made the sin bearer of the nation, and laden with guilt not its own was sent away into the wilderness; see AZAZEL. The high priest resumed his official raiment, offered his burnt offering and that of the people, and likewise the fat of the sin offering. The flesh of the bullock and the goat were carried without the camp and burned. The Epistle to the Hebrews points out that this entry of the high priest into the Most Holy Place, once a year, and not without blood, foreshadowed the entrance of Jesus, the great High Priest, once for all into heaven, having purchased for us eternal salvation (Heb. 9:1-12, 24-28).

At·roth (ät'rôth). See ATROTH-SHOPHAN.

At·roth-beth-jô'ab (ät'rôth-béth-jô'áb) [the crowns of the house of Joab]. A village, apparently in Judah (I Chron. 2:54, R.V.). In A.V. the name is rendered "Ataroth, the house of Joab."

At·roth-shô'phan (ät'rôth-shô'fän) [crowns of Shophan]. A town rebuilt by the Gadites (Num. 32:35, R.V.). Site unknown. In A.V. incorrectly represented as 2 towns.

At·tai (ät'ä-i) [perhaps, timely, opportune]. 1. A man of Judah whose descent through his mother was from Jerahmeel and Hezron, but whose father was an Egyptian slave (I Chron. 2:34-36).

2. A Gadite who came to David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:11).

3. A son of Rehoboam by his queen Maacah (II Chron. 11:20).

At·ta·li'a (ät'ä-lí'ä) [Gr., pertaining to Attalus]. A city on the seacoast of Pamphylia, built by Attalus Philadelphus, king of Pergamos, 159-138 B.C. Paul sailed thence to Antioch on his first Missionary Journey (Acts 14:25).

At·ta·lus (ät'ä-lūs). King of Pergamos, either Attalus II, Philadelphus, or his nephew Attalus III, Philometor (138-133 B.C.) (I Macc. 15:22).

Augus'tan Band, in A.V. Augus'tus' Band. A cohort of Roman soldiers, apparently named after the Roman emperor Augustus (Acts 27:1).

Augus'tus (ô-güs'tūs) [Lat., venerable, majestic]. An honorific title bestowed upon Octavian, the 1st Roman emperor, called Caesar Augustus (Luke 2:1). See CAESAR 1.

Ä'va (ä'vā). See AVVA.

Ä'ven (ä'vén) [emptiness, nothingness, an idol]. 1. The Egyptian city On, called by the Greeks Heliopolis (Ezek. 30:17). The Hebrew consonants of On and Aven are the same, though the vowels differ. The pronunciation has been intentionally modified by the prophet to express his contempt for the idolatries of the city.

2. A name applied by Hosea to Beth-el as no longer the house of God, but now a house of idolatry (Hos. 10:8); see BETH-AVEN 2.

3. A town which served to designate a valley in the kingdom of Damascus (Amos 1:5); probably Awaniyeh near Jerüd on the road to Palmyra.

Ä'veng'er of Blood. One who inflicts punishment on a murderer, thus vindicating the majesty of the law, "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed" (Gen. 9:5, 6; Num. 35:31). When civil life is regulated, this duty is undertaken by courts of justice. Of old, however, the Semitic nations, like the ancient Greeks, Germans, and Slavs, acted to a large extent on the system of each injured man being his own avenger. When murder or accidental homicide took place, the nearest relative of the victim was expected to avenge his death, and was called the avenger of blood. He slew the murderer or the unintentional homicide, without any preliminary trial to settle the actual facts of the case. Then, very probably, the nearest relative of the second man slain murdered the avenger of blood, and a blood feud was established. The Mosaic legislation introduced modifications into the system which destroyed its worst features. Cities of refuge were established, and anyone killing a man and fleeing to one of those cities was granted a fair trial, and was not put to death unless he had committed actual murder (Num. 35:19, 21, 24, 27; II Sam. 14:11). The A.V. reads, "Revenger of blood." See CITY OF REFUGE.

A'vim (ā'vīm) and A'vims (ā'vīmz). See AVVIM.

A'vith (ā'vith) [ruins]. An Edomite city, the native place of King Hadad (Gen. 36:35; I Chron. 1:46). Père Abel (1938) identifies it with Khirbet el-Jiththeh, between Ma'an and el-Basta.

A'va (ā'vā), in A.V. A'va. A city of the Assyrian Empire from which people were brought to help to colonize Samaria. Their gods were Nibhaz and Tartak (II Kings 17:24, 31). It is doubtless the place called Ivvah in II Kings 18:34; 19:13, R.V. It has been identified with Tell Kafr 'Aya on the Orontes, s.w. of Homs.

A'vim (ā'vīm), in A.V. A'vims and A'vites and, as name of the town, A'vim. 1. The aborigines of the Philistine country about Gaza. All save a small remnant were destroyed by the Caphtorim, afterward called Philistines (Deut. 2:23; Josh. 13:3).

2. A town of Benjamin (Josh. 18:23); identified with Khirbet Haiyān, s. of Ai.

A'vites (ā'vīts), in A.V. A'vites. 1. The same as Avvim (Josh. 13:3).

2. People of Avva (II Kings 17:31).

A'vin (ā'vīn), in A.V., A'in ['ayin, an eye, a spring]. 1. The 16th letter of the Hebrew alphabet, originally in outline an eye. Greek omi-cron, whence English o, comes from the same source, but is used as a vowel, whereas ayin is a consonant of peculiar guttural sound. In Anglicizing Hebrew names which contain ayin, the letter is sometimes not represented at all; at other times it appears as g, through the Greek as in Gaza. In the original, ayin stands at the beginning of the words Ai, Amalek, Eli, Gomorrah. It heads the 16th section of Psalm 119, in which section each verse of the Hebrew begins with this letter.

2. A place on the n. boundary line of Palestine w. of Riblah (Num. 34:11).

3. A town in the territory of Judah, toward Edom and near Rimmon (Josh. 15:32; I Chron. 4:32), and, as it were, forming one town with it (Neh. 11:29). It was transferred with Rimmon to Simeon, and assigned to the priests who resided with that tribe (Josh. 19:7; 21:16; but see ASHAN). It is generally identified with Umm er-Ramāmīn, 9 miles n.e. of Beer-sheba.

A'yah (ā'yā) [heap, ruin]. This reading occurs in the margin of I Chron. 7:28, R.V. and is found ('Ayyāh) in the Heb. text of the editions of Baer and Delitzsch, Kittel, and Ginsburg. The Bomberg Bible (1524-1525) and many MSS. have 'Azzāh. See GAZA 2. It is probably to be identified with Turmus 'Ayya, which lies in a small fertile plain between Sinjil and Seilūn (Shiloh).

A'zal (ā'zāl). See AZEL.

Az'a-lī'ah (āz'ā-lī'ā) [perhaps, Jehovah has shown himself distinguished; cf. Arab. 'aṣūla, to be rooted fast, to be excellent, of firm character]. Son of Meshullam and father of Shaphan the scribe (II Kings 22:3).

Az'a-nī'ah (āz'ā-nī'ā) [Jehovah has given ear]. A Levite, father of Jeshua (Neh. 10:9).

Az'a-re'l (āz'ā-rēl), in A.V. Az'a-reel (ā-zā-rē-ēl), once Az'a-ra-el (ā-zā-rā-ēl) (Neh. 12:36) [God has helped]. 1. A Levite who joined David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:6).

2. A singer in David's time (I Chron. 25:18). In v. 4 he is called Uzziel (as King Azariah was also known as Uziah), and is recorded as of the lineage of Heman.

3. A son of Jeroham, the chief of the tribe of Dan (I Chron. 27:22).

4. A man whom Ezra persuaded to divorce his foreign wife (Ezra 10:41).

5. A priest of the father's house of Immer (Neh. 11:13).

6. A musician of priestly descent (Neh. 12:36).

Az'a-rī'ah (āz'ā-rī'ā) [Jehovah has helped]. 1. A man of Judah, family of Zerach, house of Ethan (I Chron. 2:8).

2. A Levite, family of Kohath, line of Izhar, and an ancestor of Samuel the prophet and Heman the singer (I Chron. 6:36; perhaps, II Chron. 29:12).

3. One of Solomon's officials, son of the high priest Zadok (I Kings 4:2) and brother of Ahimaaz.

4. Grandson of Zadok and son of Ahimaaz. He was in the line of high-priestly succession (I Chron. 6:9).

5. Son of Nathan, and hence probably Solomon's nephew (II Sam. 5:14), who was over Solomon's 12 tax collectors (I Kings 4:5).

6. A prophet, son of Oded, who encouraged King Asa to persevere in national religious reformation (II Chron. 15:1-8).

7. Two sons of King Jehoshaphat (II Chron. 21:2). The recurrence of the same name in the family is surprising; but there is a slight difference of spelling of the names in Hebrew: āzaryāh and āzaryāhū. It may be due to an early corruption of the text; or, if the text is correct, to a difference of mother, the 2 boys being half brothers (cf. the Herods). It cannot be explained by the theory that the younger was named after a deceased elder brother, for the two seem to have been alive together and to have been put to death at the same time.

8. A man of Judah, family of Hezron, house of Jerahmeel (I Chron. 2:38, 39). His grandfather was Obed (v. 38); hence he was perhaps the captain Azariah, son of Obed, who assisted in overthrowing Athaliah and placing Joash on the throne (II Chron. 23:1).

9. Another captain, son of Jeroham, who aided in overthrowing Athaliah (II Chron. 23:1).

10. A prince of Ephraim, son of Johanan, who aided in persuading the soldiers of Pekah's army to release the captives of Judah (I Chron. 28:12).

11. A king of Judah, known also as Uziah (cf. II Kings 15:1 with II Chron. 26:1); see UZZIAH 3.

12. A high priest (I Chron. 6:10), probably he who rebuked Uziah for encroaching on the priest's office (II Chron. 26:17-20). Perhaps he was still officiating in Hezekiah's reign (II Chron. 31:10, 13), but probably the pontiff of the latter reign was another priest of the name Azariah. See HIGH PRIEST.

13. A Levite, family of Merari, who assisted in purifying the Temple in Hezekiah's reign (II Chron. 29:12).

14. A high priest, son of Hilkiah and father of Seraiah, not long before the Exile (I Chron. 6:13, 14; perhaps 9:11). See SERAIAH 11.

15. A son of Hoshaiiah and an opponent of the Prophet Jeremiah (Jer. 43:2).

16. The Hebrew and original name of Abed-nego (Dan. 1:7; I Macc. 2:59).

17. A prominent person, probably prince of Judah, who marched in the procession at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:32, 33).

18. A son of Maaseiah, who had a house at Jerusalem in Nehemiah's time, and repaired the wall in its immediate vicinity (Neh. 3:23, 24).

19. One of those, apparently Levites, who explained to the people the Law which Ezra read (Neh. 8:7).

20. A priest, doubtless head of a father's house, who in the days of Nehemiah sealed the covenant to keep separate from foreigners and observe the law of God (Neh. 10:2).

21. A descendant of Hilkiah who was ruler of the house of God after the Exile (I Chron. 9:11); see, however, SERAIAH 11.

Besides these, a king of Israel (not Uziah) is called Azariah in II Chron. 22:6, but this seems a copyist's error for Ahaziah, which is given in the next verse (II Chron. 22:6, 7; cf. II Kings 8:29).

Az'u-ri'as (äz'-ä-rí'äs) [Gr. form of Azariah]. One of 2 men appointed by Judas Maccabaeus to chief authority in Judea during his absence (I Macc. 5:18), but who were defeated by Gorgias (vs. 56-60).

A'zaz (äz'záz) [strong, perhaps contraction of Azaziah]. A Reubenite, line of Joel (I Chron. 5:8).

Aza'zel (ä-zä'zél) ['äzä'zél, probably for 'äzalzél, in the sense of entire removal; cf. Arab. 'azala, remove]. The word occurs in one passage only (Lev. 16:8, 10, 26, R.V.); see ATONEMENT, DAY OF. The data for determining its meaning are meager and insufficient. Numerous interpretations have been proposed, but they are conjectures more or less satisfactory. The word has been interpreted both impersonally and personally, as meaning: 1. Solitary desert place. 2. The departing goat (Jewish revisers of the LXX; capre emissarius, Vulgate); scapegoat, the goat that is allowed to escape (A.V.). 3. An abstract noun: removal (A.R.V. marg.) or dismissal (E.R.V. marg.). 4. A personal being: (a) some demon of the wilderness (Stade); (b) a fallen angel who seduces men to evil (Book of Enoch 8:1; 10:4); (c) an epithet applied to the Devil (Origen, Hengstenberg, Oehler, Kurtz, Keil; see Milton, Paradise Lost 1).

One of 3 interpretations is satisfactory: 1. To regard the word as the name of the spirit supposed to have his abode in the wilderness, remote from human habitation, to whom the goat laden with the sins of the people was sent. In Azazel may be the trace of illicit worship of demons or satyrs. If this be the case, the Pentateuch recognizes such a demon only as an evil spirit to whom belong the sins of the people. 2. To regard the word as an abstraction. "Aaron shall cast lots upon the two goats; one lot for Jehovah, and the other lot for Azazel [removal or dismissal]," and shall send the goat, upon which the latter lot falls, away as a removal (dismissal) "into the wilderness." The idea of the escaped goat is virtually preserved by this interpretation. 3. To regard the word as an epithet of the Devil, the Apostate One. Those who are laden with sin belong to the Devil. The objection to this interpretation is that Satan is nowhere mentioned in any part of the Pentateuch. The serpent indeed is, but it is not certain that the Devil was as yet recognized as the possessor and actuator of the serpent of the temptation.

Az'a-zí'ah (äz'-ä-zí'ä) [Jehovah is strong]. 1. A harper for religious service during the reign of David (I Chron. 15:21).

2. Father of a prince of Ephraim in David's reign (I Chron. 27:20).

3. An overseer of the Temple in the reign of Hezekiah (II Chron. 31:13).

Az'buk (äz'bük). Father of a certain Nehemiah, contemporary, but not identical with the celebrated governor of that name (Neh. 3:16).

Aze'kah (ä-zé'ká) [a place dug up with a hoe]. A town in the lowland, near Socoh, to which the kings besieging Gibeon were driven by Joshua (Josh. 10:10, 11). It was assigned to Judah (Josh. 15:35). Goliath and the Philistines encamped near it (I Sam. 17:1). It was fortified by Rehoboam (II Chron. 11:9), besieged by Nebuchadnezzar (Jer. 34:7), and it existed after the Exile (Neh. 11:30) between Eleutheropolis and Jerusalem, almost 9 miles from the former town, at Tell Zakariyeh.

A'zel (äz'zél); in A.V. once A'zal (Zech. 14:5), a Hebrew pronunciation sometimes employed when the word stands at a pause in the sentence (as in Heb. of I Chron. 8:38, and in the second occurrence in ch. 9:44) [perhaps, noble; cf. Arab. 'asil, well-rooted, noble. The name may be a contraction of Azaliah]. 1. A descendant of Jonathan, Saul's son (I Chron. 8:37, 38; 9:43, 44).

2. A place near Jerusalem (Zech. 14:5). LXX Isaol suggests Wadi Yaşül, a tributary of the Kidron.

A'zem (äz'zēm). See EZEM.

Az'gad (äz'gäd) [the god Gad is strong, or fate is hard]. Founder of a family, members of which returned from Babylonia with both Zerubbabel and Ezra (Ezra 2:12; 8:12). Its representative sealed the covenant (Neh. 10:15). The name appears as Astad (I Esdras 5:13), Astath (I Esdras 8:38).

A'zi-el (äz'zi-él). See JAAZIEL.

Azi'za (ä-zí'zä) [strong, robust]. A man whom Ezra induced to divorce his foreign wife (Ezra 10:27).

Az-ma'veth (äz-mä'vèth) [death is strong]. 1. A Barhumite, one of David's mighty men (II Sam. 23:31).

2. A Benjaminite, whose sons came to David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:3).

3. The son of Adiel. He was over David's treasures (I Chron. 27:25).

4. A son of Jehoaddah and descendant of Jonathan, Saul's son (I Chron. 8:36).

5. A village in the vicinity of Jerusalem. Forty-two of its inhabitants returned from the Babylonian Captivity (Ezra 2:24). Some singers resided on its fields (Neh. 12:29). Called also Beth-azmaveth (Neh. 7:28). Its site is perhaps Hizmeh, midway between Geba and Anathoth.

Az'mon (äz'mön) [strong, robust]. A place on the s. boundary of Canaan, to the w. of Kadesh-barnea and near the brook of Egypt (Num. 34:4, 5; Josh. 15:4, R.V.). Exact site unknown.

Az'noth-ta'bor (äz'nöth-tä'bör) [the ears, i.e., slopes or peaks, of Tabor]. A place on the boundary of Naphtali, evidently near Mount Tabor (Josh. 19:34).

A'zor (äz'zör). An ancestor of Christ who lived after the Exile (Matt. 1:13, 14).

Azo'tus (ä-zö'tūs). See ASHDOD.

Az'ri-el (äz'ri-él) [God is a help]. 1. A chief man of the half tribe of Manasseh, e. of the Jordan (I Chron. 5:24).

2. A Naphtalite of David's time, father of Jerimoth (I Chron. 27:19).

3. Father of Seraiah of Jeremiah's time (Jer. 36:26).

Az'ri-kam (äz'ri-käm) [my help has arisen]. 1. A son of Neariah (I Chron. 3:23).

2. A son of Azel, and descendant of Jonathan, Saul's son (I Chron. 8:38; 9:44).

3. A Levite, descended from Merari (I Chron. 9:14).

4. The governor of the palace under King Ahaz. He was killed by an Ephraimite, Zichri (II Chron. 28:7).

Azu'bah (ä-zü'bä) [forsaken]. 1. A wife of Caleb (I Chron. 2:13, 19).

2. A daughter of Shilhi and mother of Jehoshaphat (I Kings 22:42).

A'zur (ä'zür). See AZZUR.

Az'zah (äz'ä). See AYYAH and GAZA.

Az'zan (äz'an) [strong]. Father of Paltiel, prince of Issachar in the days of Moses (Num. 34:26).

Az'zur (äz'ür), in A.V. twice A'zur [helpful]. 1. Father of Hananiah the false prophet (Jer. 28:1).

2. Father of Jaazaniah (Ezek. 11:1).

3. One of those who, with Nehemiah, sealed the covenant (Neh. 10:17).

B

Ba'al (bä'äl) [lord, possessor, husband]. 1. Originally the word was not a proper noun, but later came to be so used, as is seen in the O.T. Baal worship apparently had its origin in the belief that every tract of ground owed its productivity to a supernatural being, or baal, that dwelt there. The farmers probably thought that from the Baalim, or fertility gods, of various regions came the increase of crops, fruits, and cattle. The name Baal occurs in the Hyksos period, and to the Egyptians of Dyn. XIX he was a well-known Semitic deity. In the Amarna letters Baal seems to be identical with Adad (Hadad). In the Ras Shamra texts the word is applied to gods as possessors of particular places, sanctuaries, or attributes; it is, however, also used as the name of a distinct god Baal.

Baal was adored on high places in Moab as early as the days of Balaam and Balak (Num. 22:41). In the time of the Judges he had altars in Palestine (Judg. 2:13; 6:28-32), and when Ahab married Jezebel, the daughter of Ethbaal, king of the Sidonians, the worship of Baal almost supplanted that of Jehovah. The struggle between the two religions culminated on Mount Carmel when the Prophet Elijah met the priests of Baal (I Kings 16:31, 32; 18:17-40). Though it ended in the slaughter of the priests of Baal, yet the cult soon recuperated until crushed by Jehu (II Kings 10:18-28). About this time, the worship of Baal received new impulse in Judah through Jezebel's daughter, Athaliah, wife of Jehoram (II Chron. 17:3; 21:6; 22:2). On her overthrow, the temple of Baal at Jerusalem was pulled down, the altars and images were destroyed, and Mattan, the chief priest, was slain before the altar (II Kings 11:18). After a time the worship of Baal was revived in both Israel (Hos. 2:8) and Judah. Ahaz made molten images for the Baalim (II Chron. 28:2). Hezekiah, indeed, wrought a reformation, but Manasseh erected altars to Baal (II Kings 21:3). Josiah removed from the Temple at Jerusalem and destroyed the vessels of Baal, and made the public worship of Baal for the time to cease (II Kings 23:4, 5). Jeremiah frequently denounced it, as did other prophets (Jer. 19:4, 5). The worship of Baal was accompanied with lascivious rites (cf. I Kings 14:24), the sacrifice of children in the fire by parents (Jer. 19:5), and kissing the image (I Kings 19:18; Hos. 13:2). Baal was often associated with the goddess Ashtoreth (Judg. 2:13), and in the vicinity of his altar there was often an Asherah (Judg. 6:30; I Kings 16:32, 33, R.V.). See BAALIM, BAALI, and ISHT, I.

Baal in compounds denoting place names implies the omission Beth (house of, abode of).

2. A Reubenite, house of Joel, who lived before the Captivity of the ten tribes (I Chron. 5:5, 6).

3. A Benjamite, son of King Saul's ancestor Jeiel (I Chron. 8:30; 9:35, 36, 39, R.V.).

4. A village of Simeon (I Chron. 4:33); the same as Baalath-beer (q.v.).

Ba'al-ah (bä'ä-lä) [mistress]. 1. A town better known as Kiriath-jearim (Josh. 15:9).

2. A hill in Judah, between Ekron and Jabneel (Josh. 15:11).

3. A town in the s. of Judah (Josh. 15:29); apparently the same as the Simeonite town Balah (Josh. 19:3) or Bilhah (I Chron. 4:29). Probably modern Tulul el-Medhbah near Khirbet el-Meshash.

Ba'al-ath (bä'äl-äth) [mistress]. A village of the original territory of Dan (Josh. 19:44), near Gezer (Jos. Antiq. viii. 6, 1). Solomon fortified it (I Kings 9:18; II Chron. 8:6).

Ba'al-ath-be'er (bä'ä-läth-bé'ér) [mistress of a well]. A town on the boundary line of the tribe of Simeon. Called simply Baal (I Chron. 4:33), and apparently known also as Ramah and Ramoth of the South (Josh. 19:8; I Sam. 30:27, R.V.). It may be located on the elevation between Khalaşa and Biyâr Aslûj.

Ba'al-be'rith (bä'äl-bé'rith) [lord of a covenant]. A designation under which in the time of the Judges Baal was worshiped at Shechem, where he had a temple (Judg. 8:33; 9:4). Sometimes he was spoken of as Elberith, the god of a covenant (Judg. 9:46, R.V.; where A.V. partly translates the name: "the god Berith").

Ba'al-be (bä'ä-lé). See BAAL-JUDAH.

Ba'al-be-ju'dah (bä'ä-lé-jö'ö'dä) [probably for Baalah of Judah]. A town of Judah, the same as Baalah and Kiriath-baal and Kiriath-jearim (II Sam. 6:2; cf. I Chron. 13:6; Josh. 18:14). See KIRIATH-JEARIM.

Ba'al-gad (bä'äl-gäd) [Gad is Baal]. A place at the foot of Mount Hermon, in the valley of Lebanon, where apparently Gad, the god of fortune, was worshiped. It constituted the extreme n. limit of Joshua's conquests (Josh. 11:17; 12:7; 13:5); perhaps it is Häsbeya in the couloir of the wadi et-Teim.

Ba'al-ha'mon (bä'äl-hä'mön) [Baal of Hamon (multitude)]. A place where Solomon had a vineyard (S. of Sol. 8:11). Its identity with Balamon, a town near Dothan (Judith 8:3), is extremely doubtful in view of the variant spellings in Greek: Belbain, Belmain, Bailmain, Abelmair (Judith 4:4; 7:3).

Ba'al-ha'nan (bä'äl-hä'nän) [Baal is gracious]. 1. Son of Achbor and king of Edom (Gen. 36:33; I Chron. 1:49).

2. Custodian of the olive and sycamore trees under King David (I Chron. 27:28).

Ba'al-ha'zor (bä'äl-hä'zör) [Baal of Hazor (enclosure)]. A place beside Ephraim (II Sam. 13:23). Gesenius suggested Hazor in Benjamin (Neh. 11:33). Probably it is Jebel el-'Asûr, 4½ miles n.e. of Beth-el and 15 miles n.n.e. of Jerusalem.

Ba'al-her'mon (bä'äl-hür'mön) [Baal of Hermon]. A place marking the n.w. limit of the half tribe of Manasseh e. of Jordan (Judg.

3:3; I Chron. 5:23). Baal-hermon denotes the sacred places of Mount Hermon, or is a place on its e. slope.

Ba'al-i (bā'ā-lī) [my lord, my master]. Hosea represents the relation of Jehovah to Israel as that of husband to wife. After the conquest of Canaan, Jehovah was often identified with Baal. To avoid this further degradation Hosea writes (Hos. 2:16): "[Thou] shalt call me no more Baali." See ISH, I.

Ba'al-im (bā'āl-īm) [Heb. pl. of Baal]. Baalim (or Baal under different aspects) were worshiped by the nations neighbor to Israel (Judg. 2:11; 3:7; 8:33; 10:10; I Sam. 7:4; 12:10). Often coupled with Ashtaroth or Asheroth. There were various Baalim, as Melkart, the Baal of Tyre; Baal-shāmim (lord of heaven) of Phoenicia and Palmyra; and Baal Sāphōn of the Ras Shamra texts. The O.T. also differentiates between Baalim, as Baal-berith, Baal-peor, and Baal-zebub.

Ba'a-lis (bā'ā-lis). A king of the Ammonites who reigned shortly after Nebuchadnezzar's capture of Jerusalem (Jer. 40:14).

Ba'al-me'on (bā'āl-mē'ōn) [Baal of Meon (habitation)]. An old Amorite city on the frontiers of Moab, known fully as Beth-baal-meon (Num. 32:38; Ezek. 25:9; both forms on Moabite Stone, 9, 30; see MOABITE STONE). It was assigned to the Reubenites and rebuilt by them (Num. 32:38; in v. 3 called Beon; Josh. 13:17; I Chron. 5:8). It was held by Mesha, king of Moab (Moabite Stone, 9, 30; see MOABITE STONE), and was in the possession of the same people in the 6th century B.C. (Ezek. 25:9; and Jer. 48:23, where it is abbreviated to Beth-meon). In Jerome's day it was still a considerable town, about 9½ miles from Heshbon. The ruins, now called Ma'in, lie in the n. Moabite territory, 4 miles s.w. of Medeba.

Ba'al-pe'or (bā'āl-pē'ōr) [Baal of Peor]. A Moabite deity, probably Chemosh, worshiped with immoral rites on the top of Mount Peor. The Israelites, when encamped at Shittim, felt attracted by it, and so sinned that a plague broke out among them, and was not stayed till a slaughter had been ordered of the chief transgressors (Num. 25:1-9; Ps. 106:28; Hos. 9:10). See PEOR 2.

Ba'al-pe'e-ra'zīm (bā'āl-pē-rā'zīm) [Baal of the burstings]. A place near the valley of Raphaim where David gained a victory over the Philistines (II Sam. 5:18-20; I Chron. 14:9-11; cf. Isa. 28:21); located at Rās en-Nādir.

Ba'al-shal'tshah (bā'āl-shāl'tshā), in A.V. Ba'al-shal'i'sha (bā'āl-shāl'i-shā) [Baal of Shalishah (a third part)]. A village from which bread and corn of the firstfruits were brought to Elisha when he was at Gilgal, on the mountains, 7½ miles n. of Beth-el (II Kings 4:42-44). The gift was brought to Gilgal because a school of the prophets was there. Conder locates it at the present village of Kefr Thilth on the lower hills of Ephraim, 16 miles n.e. of Lydda and 13½ miles n.w. of Gilgal (Jiljilia). Cf. I Sam. 9:4.

Ba'al-ta'mar (bā'āl-tā'mār) [Baal of the palm]. A place in Benjamin, near Gibeah and Beth-el, where the Israelite army took its stand when about to attack Gibeah (Judg. 20:33), identified with Rās et-Ṭawil, a peak n.e. of Tell el-Fūl.

Ba'al-ze'bub (bā'āl-zē'būb) [Baal (lord) of the fly]. The name under which Baal was worshiped at Ekron as the producer of flies, and consequently able to defend against this pest. Ahaziah, king of Judah, applied to him for a revelation (II Kings 1:6, 16). See BEEL-ZEBUB.

Ba'al-ze'phon (bā'āl-zē'fōn) [lord of the North, i.e., north point; or lord of the watch-tower: cf. Migdol (tower) which was near by]. A place which was over against the Israelites while they were encamped beside Pi-hahiroth, between Migdol and the sea, just before they crossed through the sea (Ex. 14:2, 9). So also in Num. 33:7 Pi-hahiroth is said to be before Baal-ze'phon. See MIGDOL 1.

Ba'a-na (bā'ā-nā); once Ba'anah (I Kings 4:16, A.V.) [perhaps derived from Baal]. 1. Solomon's purveyor for the s. district of the Plain of Jezreel from Megiddo to the Jordan. He was a son of Ahilud and probably brother of Jehoshaphat the recorder (I Kings 4:12; cf. v. 3).

2. Solomon's purveyor for Asher and vicinity. He was a son of Hushai, not unlikely of that Hushai who was the friend and adviser of David (I Kings 4:16).

3. A certain Zadok's father (Neh. 3:4).

Ba'anah (bā'ā-nā) [perhaps derived from Baal]. 1. A Benjamite, brother of Rechab, and leader of a predatory band. Although the brothers belonged to the tribe of Saul, they nevertheless murdered his son Ish-bosheth, and thus were partly instrumental in turning the kingdom to David. They carried the head of the murdered man to David at Hebron in expectation of a reward; but David had them put to death as criminals (II Sam., ch. 4).

2. A Netophathite, father of Heled, one of David's worthies (I Chron. 11:30).

3. One of Solomon's purveyors. See BAANA. 4. A Jew who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:2; Neh. 7:7). It was probably the representative of his family who sealed the covenant in Nehemiah's time (Neh. 10:27).

Ba'a-ra (bā'ā-rā). A wife of Shaharaim (I Chron. 8:8).

Ba'a-se'iah (bā'ā-sē'yā) [perhaps for Maaseiah, as is suggested by Maasai of Codex Vaticanus]. A Levite, descendant of Gershon and ancestor of Asaph the singer (I Chron. 6:40).

Ba'a-sha (bā'ā-shā) [perhaps a contraction of Baal-shemesh (the sun is Baal or lord)]. Son of Ahijah, of the tribe of Issachar, who conspired against Nadab, the son and successor of Jeroboam I, king of Israel. When Nadab was directing the siege of Gibbethon, then in the hands of the Philistines, Baasha murdered him and all Jeroboam's descendants, thus fulfilling the judgment pronounced against his house (I Kings 16:7). Then the assassin ascended the throne of Israel in the 3d year of Asa, king of Judah, and fixed his capital at Tirzah (I Kings 15:25 to 16:4). He carried on a long war with Asa. He began to fortify Ramah to blockade the n. frontier of Judah, but was diverted from his purpose by the invasion of his kingdom by Ben-hadad, king of Damascus, whom Asa hired (I Kings 15:16-21; II Chron. 16:1-6). Baasha continued the calf worship begun by Jeroboam, and the Prophet Jehu threatened him and his house with Jeroboam's fate. He died after a reign of 24 years, and was buried in Tirzah. His son Elah succeeded him (I Kings 15:34 to 16:6).

Ba'bel (bā'bēl) [Akkad. bāb-ilu, gate of God]. A city dating from prehistoric times in the plain of Shinar. It was the beginning of Nimrod's kingdom, i.e., probably the earliest and chief seat of his power (Gen. 10:10). In the English versions the word Babel occurs only in this passage and 11:9, being rendered Babylon in all other places.

While the phrase "Tower of Babel" is not used in the O.T., it has been applied to the structure built in the plain of Shinar, as recounted in Gen., ch. 11. The expression

'whose top may reach unto heaven" may be interpreted as signifying "a very high tower." The author of the chapter had an accurate knowledge of the building materials of Babylonia. There is neither building stone nor lime on the alluvial plain of Shinar, and so bricks were used for stone. Instead of mortar, slime (bitumen) was employed, of which abundant supplies were found in ancient times at Hit, about 140 miles up the Euphrates from Babylon. In connection with the incident of the unfinished tower, the Hebrew writer accounts for the origin of the various languages; here the original unity of the human race is taken for granted. By a popular etymology, the Hebrew author derives Babel from the root bālal (confuse, confound): "because Jehovah did there confound the language of all the earth." Here we have a play upon two words of similar sound, but this derivation should not be regarded as a scientific etymology. According to Gen. 11:9 this confusion of tongues was followed by the dispersion of mankind. Cf. Peleg (Gen. 10:25). Thus from the earliest times Babylon who did much for it, rendering it the largest and most splendid capital of his time (cf. Dan 4:30). The old palace, which stood on the e bank of the Euphrates, was repaired and enlarged by Nebuchadnezzar, who built a summer palace a mile and a half to the n. of the older one. The old palace consisted of a number of structures and courtyards connected with monumental gateways. At the n.e. corner was a vaulted building consisting of a series of arches, some of which were superimposed upon a lower tier. On this structure were the famous hanging gardens. Herodotus states that Babylon was a square, each side being 120 stades, or about 14 miles, in length. This measurement yields an area of nearly 200 square miles, and includes Borsippa in the city limits. Ctesias, also an eyewitness, who flourished in the 5th century, makes each side of the square about 90 stades, or the length of the 4 sides together 42 miles. The city was surrounded by a wall (Jer. 51:58), or rather double walls (Herod. i. 181). A deep and broad moat ran around the city, and beyond that was a great wall 200 royal cubits was conceived of as the emblem of human pride and ambition and was destined to fall.

The author of Gen., ch. 11, undoubtedly had in mind a Babylonian temple tower, or ziggurat. This type of structure is found in primitive Sumerian times. There was in Babylon an ancient ziggurat, which is known to have existed already in the 2d millennium B.C. It was called E-temen-ana-ki (house of the foundation stone of heaven and earth) and stood a short distance to the n. of E-sagila, the temple of Marduk. Including the foundation and the shrine on the top, this ziggurat had eight stories. It was like a step pyramid, 300 ft. square at the base and about 300 ft. high above the foundation. The top was reached by a stairway leading from terrace to terrace.

Bab'y-lon (bāb'ī-lōn) [Babel, Akkad. Bāb-īlu, with the Greek ending on]. 1. The capital of the Babylonian Empire. The city became the mistress of Babylonia under King Hammurabi and henceforth was the political and religious center of the country. See HAMMURABI. It reached the height of its glory in the 6th century B.C., under Nebuchadnezzar, (about 344 ft.) high and 50 royal cubits (about 86 ft.) wide. On top of this rampart was room enough for a 4-horse chariot to pass, and even to turn, in addition to space enough for chambers facing each other. There was also a strong inner wall. Quintus Curtius, about A.D. 40, gives the breadth at about 32 feet; and Clitarchus (as reported by Diodorus Siculus) and Strabo make the height 75 feet. These writers state the circuits variously, from 365 to 385 stades. The city had 100 gates of bronze, 25 on each side. From these there ran broad streets at right angles to the walls, thus dividing the whole area into squares. Procession Street began slightly n. of the Great Ishtar Gate, proceeded s., turned w. at a right angle to pass between E-sagila and E-temen-ana-ki, and continued to the bridge that crossed the Euphrates. The Euphrates flowed through the midst of the city, dividing it into 2 portions. Along each bank of the river there was a continuous quay. A wall separated the quay from the city; but it was pierced by 25 gateways, from each of which a sloping descent led to the water's edge. The walls, quays, palaces, temples, and private edifices were built of brick; the cement or mortar was bitumen (cf. Gen. 11:3). The timber of the houses, which were 2, 3, and 4 stories high, was of palm wood (Herod. i. 178-186).

In 521 B.C., and again in 514, Babylon revolted against Darius Hystaspis, but on both occasions it was subdued, and the last time was dismantled. Its decay was hastened by Seleucus Nicator, who conquered the city in 312 B.C., and made large use of its materials in building the new capital, Seleucia, on the banks of the Tigris.

The Scripture prophecies regarding Babylon have been fulfilled (Isa., chs. 13; 14:1-23; 21:1-10; 46:1, 2; 47:1-3; Jer., chs. 50; 51). Jeremiah (Jer. 51:37; cf. ch. 50:26) said that it should become heaps, and mounds are all that remain of it now. They commence about  $3\frac{1}{2}$  miles above the village of Hillah, and extend n. slightly above 3 miles, by 2 from e. to w., lying chiefly on the e. side of the river. The 3 most notable mounds are now called by the Arabs the Babil, the Kasr, and the Amran mounds. They lie e. of the river, and in a section of the old city which, at some period of history, was a triangular area bounded by the river and 2 walls. These walls were practically straight, met in almost a right angle toward the e., and measured 2 and 3 miles in length. The s. mound, Amran, marks the site of Marduk's temple. The central one, Kasr, covers the remains of the old palace and a temple of the goddess Ninmach, which stood farther to the e. and was separated from the palace by the Procession Street. The mound Babil, in the n., is the site of Nebuchadnezzar's summer palace.

2. The mystic Babylon of Rev. 14:8; 16:19; chs. 17; 18, is the city of Rome, which stood on 7 hills (cf. ch. 17:3, 5, 6, 9, 18).

Bab'y-lo'nī-a (bāb'ī-lō'nī-ā). A region of w. Asia at the e. end of the Fertile Crescent, which had Babylon for its capital. It is sometimes called, in whole or in part, Shinar (Gen. 10:10; 11:2; Isa. 11:11), and sometimes land of the Chaldeans (Jer. 24:5; 25:12; Ezek. 12:13). It was bounded on the n. by Mesopotamia, the dividing line between the two running from near Hit on the Euphrates to a little below Sāmarrā on the Tigris and corresponding roughly to the 34th parallel of latitude. The boundary is a natural one, separating the slightly elevated plain of secondary formation on the n. from the low-lying alluvium brought down by the Euphrates and the Tigris on the s. Babylonia is bounded on the e. by the mountains of Elam, on the s. by the Persian Gulf, and on the w. by the Arabian desert. It is rarely more than 40 miles wide and probably contained less than 8,000 square miles, roughly equal to the State of New Jersey or Wales. The deep, rich, alluvial soil, artificially irrigated, was of almost matchless fertility.

The land originally consisted of 2 political divisions, Sumer and Akkad. Sumer, the s. part, extended from the Persian Gulf to a line slightly n. of 32° latitude; Akkad occupied the rest of the land to 34° latitude. The principal cities of Akkad were Babylon, Borsippa, Dilbat, Kish, Kuthah, Opis, Sippar, and Agade (Accad); those of Sumer were Nippur, Adab, Lagash, Umma, Larsa, Erech (Uruk), Ur, and Eridu. Most of these cities were on or near the Euphrates.

Little is known of the earliest inhabitants of Babylonia that preceded the Sumerians and the Semites. During the 4th millennium B.C. the Sumerians were in Sumer and Semites occupied Akkad. The Sumerians spoke an agglutinative language, but their race and place of origin are unknown. They probably entered the Plain of Shinar before 4000 B.C. and developed a high civilization. Their sexagesimal system (soon combined with the decimal) still survives. Out of pictographs they developed cuneiform writing. Originally each city had its own god or goddess, but eventually there was developed a triad pantheon: Anu (sky), Enlil (atmosphere and earth), and Ea (waters).

At first the cities were independent kingdoms. Authorities differ a great deal about the dates of the age of the city-kingdoms, but approximate dates may be set (c. 3000-c. 2600 B.C.). In this period falls Dyn. I of Ur. Dynasty I of Lagash was founded (c. 2600) by Ur-Nanshe or Zur-Nanshe (Ur-Nina). Eannatum, his grandson, defeated the city of Umma. Urakagina (c. 2450), of this dynasty, instituted important social reforms, but was defeated by Lugalzaggisi, founder of Dyn. III of Erech. There was now a certain sense of unity in Sumer. About 2600 B.C. a Semitic dynasty was flourishing at Mari on the Middle Euphrates.

Now follows the Semitic Dyn. of Akkad (c. 2425-2245 B.C.), which represents the First Semitic Triumph in the land (another chronology begins this period at c. 2550). Sargon, a great Semitic leader, defeated Lugalzaggisi and conquered all the Sumerian cities. He founded Agade and created an empire in the true sense for the first time in history. It extended from Elam and Assyria as far w. as the Mediterranean. During the reign of Naram-Sin, his grandson, the empire was prosperous. Later the Semitic power began to decay and the barbaric Gutians coming from the e. hills (c. 2250) ruled Babylonia for 125 years. Lagash, however, flourished under Gudea (late 22d century B.C.).

The Gutian period was followed by a renaissance of the Sumerians, who remained in power from c. 2135 to c. 2025. Ur-Nammu or Zur-Nammu (Ur-Engur) is the 1st king of the brilliant Dyn. III of Ur. He was the founder of a Sumerian code of laws; his son Shulgi (Dungi) also codified the laws. Their domain extended from Ashur and Arbela to the Persian Gulf, from Susa to the Lebanon.

From c. 2025 on the Sumerians declined and lost their national identity. After the fall of Ur (c. 2025), Isin and Larsa were the dominant states and took over the heritage of Dyn. III of Ur. The Elamites furthermore invaded Sumer from the e., and the Amorites from the w. Dynasty I of Babylon, which was Amorite, was established c. 1894. This city became so important that it gave its name to the Plain of Shinar, which we may thenceforth properly call Babylonia. Now began a three-cornered fight involving Larsa, Isin, and Babylon, and the latter city became supreme. The 6th king of this dynasty was Hammurabi. In the past authorities have modified his dates from time to time, some placing him 2123-2081, 2067-2025, or 1955-1913, but according to the latest chronology his reign extended from 1792 to 1750 or 1749. He defeated Rim-Sin, an Elamite king of Larsa, and unified Sumer and Akkad. Now we can for the first time speak of Babylonia in a political sense; he conquered all Mesopotamia, carried out extensive public works, introduced an excellent administration, and made an extensive code of laws. See HAMMURABI.

Partly contemporary with the Dyn. I of Babylon was the Dyn. I of the Sea Country (c. 1880-c. 1513 B.C.) on the Persian Gulf. Hammurabi's dynasty came to an end in a raid (c. 1595) by the Hittites, who slew the last king, Samsu-ditāna. The Kassites (Cossaeans), who had been invading the land from the highlands to the e. and n.e. (c. 1746), made themselves masters of the country and remained dominant until c. 1169 B.C. During the 15th and 14th centuries there was extensive correspondence with Egypt, as is seen in the Tell el-Amarna letters.

Finally Tukulti-Ninurta, king of Assyria (1260-1232), invaded Babylonia and ruled the land for 7 years. In the end the Assyrians were driven out. With the fall of the Kassites, a new dynasty arose in Babylonia, the Dyn. II of Isin. The kings were all native Babylonians; among them Nebuchadrezzar I (1146-1123) is the most famous. He defeated the Elamites and the Hittites, but was routed by the Assyrians. This dynasty came to an end in 1039 B.C. During that period Aramaic tribes (c. 1100-900) invaded Babylonia. Assyria again began to interfere in Babylonian affairs. In 729 Tiglath-pileser III (under the name of Pul) became king of Babylon. The city revolted against Sennacherib, who in 689 sacked Babylon and burned it to the ground; it was rebuilt by Esarhaddon. Until 625 Babylonia remained a part of the Assyrian Empire.

A new nation, the Chaldeans, had been developing around the head of the Persian Gulf and working northward. Merodach-Baladan, one of their kings, secured the support of the Aramaean tribes and made an alliance with Elam. In 721 he proclaimed himself king of Babylon; he sent an embassy to Hezekiah, king of Judah, in 712, but was defeated by Sennacherib in 703. Thereupon he fled to Elam, where he died.

Ashurbanipal, of Assyria, died in 626, and the following year Nabopolassar became king of the Chaldeans and thus founded the Neo-Babylonian or Chaldean Empire. With his ally Cyaxares, king of the Medes, he destroyed Nineveh in 612. His son Nebuchadrezzar (Nebuchadrezzar) totally defeated Necho at Carchemish in 605 and pursued him to the border of Egypt, but was recalled on account of the death of his father. The Chaldeans were now in control of the whole Fertile Crescent. Nebuchadrezzar (605-562) had one of the longest and most brilliant reigns of human history. He took Jerusalem twice (597 and 586) and destroyed it. The buildings and city walls of Babylon, admired by Greek historians, were erected by Nebuchadrezzar. His son Amel-Marduk (Evil-merodach), who reigned from 562 to 560, befriended the captive Jehoiachin (II Kings 25:27). He was assassinated, and Nebuchadrezzar's son-in-law, Neriglissar (560-556), succeeded to the throne; the latter's son, Lābāshi-Marduk, reigned for 9 months and then was assassinated. A Babylonian, Nabonidus, became king in 556, who appointed his son, Belshazzar, as coregent. See BELSHAZZAR, NABONIDUS, CYRUS, DANIEL.

In 539 Gobryas, a general under Cyrus, king of Persia, took Babylon. The country remained under Persian rule from 539 to 332 B.C.; then it was under Alexander the Great until 323. The Seleucidae ruled Babylonia 312-171 B.C.; they were succeeded by the Parthians (Arsacid Dynasty), who ruled from 171 B.C. to A.D. 226. The Sassanian Dynasty remained in control from A.D. 226 to 641, when Babylonia was conquered by the Moslem Arabs.

After the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70 Babylonia became, and for centuries remained, a seat of Jewish schools devoted to the study and interpretation of the law.

Ba'ca (bā'ká) [a balsam tree, perhaps so named from its exuding tears of gum]. A valley in Palestine (Ps. 84:6), possibly so called from the balsam trees in it; cf. the valley of Rephaim, where such trees were found (II Sam. 5:22, 23, R.V. marg.). Perhaps, however, the expression is figurative, with a play upon bākāh (weep). Or by contrast with well, it may mean drought; cf. Arab. bakā'a (to have little water).

Bac'hī-deś (bāk'ī-dēz). A Syrian general sent by Demetrius I at the close of 162 B.C. to place Alcimus in the high priesthood, and to subjugate Judah (I Macc. 7:8-20). The next year he defeated Judas and Jonathan Macca-baeus; but his 3d campaign, undertaken in 157 B.C., failed (I Macc. 9:1-57, 59-72).

Bag'der. The rendering of Heb. tahash in the A.V. (Ex. 26:14; 35:7; Num. 4:25; Ezek. 16:10). The skin of the animal was used for the outer covering of the tabernacle, and for sandals. Tristram says that the common badger, Meles vulgaris, is not rare in the hilly and wooded parts of Palestine, but it does not seem to be alluded to in the Bible. See SEAL 1.

Bae'an (bē'ān). A tribe, otherwise unknown, which was destroyed by Judas Macca-baeus (I Macc. 5:4).

Bag'pipe. The rendering on the margin of R.V. of Aram. sūmpōnyā in Dan. 3:5, 10, 15. The texts of A.V. and R.V. translate it dulcimer. Sūmpōnyā is apparently from the Greek symphōnía, symphony, unison of sounds. The instrument is used also in Egypt and Arabia, where it consists of a leathern bag in which two pipes are inserted, one for inflating the bag, the other for playing upon with the fingers.

Ba'ha'rum-ite (bā-hā'rūm-īt). An inhabitant of Bahurim (I Chron. 11:33).

Ba'hu'rim (bā-hū'rīm) [young men]. A village near the Mount of Olives, on the road from Jerusalem to the Jordan (II Sam. 16:5). It is mentioned repeatedly in the history of David. Thence came Shimel, who cursed him, and in a well there Jonathan and Ahimaaz hid when pursued by the partisans of Absalom (II Sam. 3:16; 16:5; 17:18; 19:16; I Kings 2:8). It has been identified with Rās et-Tmim, e. of the Mount of Olives.

Ba'jith (bā'jith). See BAYITH.

Bak-bak'kar (bāk-bāk'ēr) [perhaps, investigator]. A Levite (I Chron. 9:15).

Bak'buk (bāk'būk) [a flask]. One of the Nethinim, and founder of a family, members of which returned from the Captivity (Ezra 2:51; Neh. 7:53).

Bak'buk-ki'ah (bāk'bū-kī'ā) [flask; or perhaps, Jehovah has poured out]. 1. A Levite resident of Jerusalem, and in high office immediately after the Exile (Neh. 11:17).

2. A Levite, who served as gatekeeper of the Temple in Nehemiah's time (Neh. 12:25).

Ba'laam (bā'lām) [perhaps, devouring]. A diviner (Josh. 13:22; cf. Num. 24:1), son of Beor, and resident at the town of Pethor, on the Euphrates (Num. 22:5), in Aram, in the hill country of the e. (ch. 23:7). The Hebrew text of Num. 22:5 describes Balak as sending to Balaam "to the land of the children of his people," meaning Balak's native land or, better, Balaam's. The Samaritan, Vulgate, and Syriac have "land of the children of Ammon"; but Balaam is nowhere else connected with the Ammonites, not even in Num. 31:8. This diviner recognized Jehovah as the God of Israel (Num. 23:21), and as one at least of his own gods (ch. 22:18; but the LXX reads merely "Lord God"). Balak, king of Moab, sent an embassy to him, consisting of elders of Moab and Midian, offering him reward to curse the Israelites (Num. 22:5-7). He answered that he could not do so without the consent of Jehovah. Balak dispatched more honorable negotiators, not elders, but princes. Balaam replied that not for a house full of gold and silver would he go beyond the word of Jehovah. He was allowed by God to go with the men, on condition of uttering only the words that God put into his mouth. On the way an angel of the Lord with drawn sword, visible to the ass on which Balaam rode, but not to its rider, thrice disputed his progress. The ass refused to go forward. When beaten it spoke (Num. 22:28-30; II Peter 2:15, 16). Finally, Balaam himself was permitted to see the angel, and learn the peril he was in. He offered to turn back, but was allowed to go forward, on the same stringent condition as before. Balak met him on the banks of the Arnon, and conducted him to Kiriath-huzoth, probably the same as Kiriathaim, on the conspicuous eminence near by, n. of the Arnon. The next morning the two, accompanied by the princes of Moab, went n. to the high places of Baal, from which lofty spot part of the camp of Israel at Shittim was visible (Num. 22:8-41). After sacrifices on 7 altars, Balaam went alone to a bare height. There the word of the Lord came to him. He returned to Balak, and under the irresistible power of God blessed the people he had been invited to curse (Num. 23:1-12). Balak was disappointed, but held to the idea that, as long as Balaam saw but a part of the camp, perhaps he might be able to curse the Israelites. He took Balaam to the top of Pisgah and sacrificed as before; but the only result was fresh blessing instead of cursing (vs. 13-26). A 3d attempt was made from the top of Peor, on the ridge n. of Nebo. Not merely was there blessing, but the utterance ended with the prophecy of a star out of Jacob, and a scepter out of Israel that should sway over Moab and Edom. Balak in anger dismissed Balaam without conferring on him the intended honor (Num. 23:27 to 24:25). Balaam, however, apparently before quitting the country, suggested that if the Israelites could be seduced into the idolatry and the impurity of the worship practiced at Baal-peor, they would come under Jehovah's curse (Num. 31:16). The evil counsel was followed. In the war waged by the Israelites to execute vengeance on the Midianites for this deed, Balaam was slain (Num. 31:8). Various other books of the Bible refer to Balaam's character and fate (Deut. 23:4, 5; Josh. 24:9, 10; Neh. 13:2; Micah 6:5; Jude 11; Rev. 2:14).

Ba'lac (bā'lāk). See BALAK.

Bal'a-dan (bāl'ā-dān) [Akkad., (Marduk) has given a son]. Father of Merodach-baladan (II Kings 20:12; Isa. 39:1).

Ba'lah (bā'lā). See BAALAH 3.

Ba'lak (bā'lāk), in A.V. of N.T. Ba'lac [perhaps, devastator]. A Moabite king, son of Zippor, who hired Balaam to curse Israel.

Bald Lo'cust. The rendering of Heb. sol'ām, a species of edible locust or grasshopper (Lev. 11:22). There is nothing in the Hebrew etymology to suggest a bald appearance.

Balm, Balm of Gil'ead. The rendering of Heb. šört, a resin perhaps obtained in Gilead (Gen. 37:25; Jer. 8:22; 46:11), and exported from Palestine (Gen. 37:25; Ezek. 27:17). It seems that Gilead was at least the entrepôt for it. It was used as an ointment for the healing of wounds (Jer. 51:8). It was once believed, and still is by many, that the balm of Gilead was opobalsamum, a greenish-yellow oily resin of the consistency of honey, to which wonderful healing virtues were attributed. It comes from a tree, Balsamodendron opobalsamum or gileadense, belonging to the order Myricaceae (Myricids). It is from 6 to 8 feet high. But the identification of the opobalsamum with the balm of Gilead is rendered doubtful by the fact that the tree producing it is not now found in Gilead, even in gardens, and there is no proof that it ever existed in that locality. It is a native of Arabia and Nubia, and its product is often called the balm of Mecca. In R.V. marg. (Gen. 37:25) the word is rendered by mastic, i.e., the resin yielded by the mastic tree, Pistacia lentiscus, a bushy evergreen tree, about 12 feet high, which grew in Palestine. The transparent, pale yellow, fragrant gum was used for incense and, when dissolved in water, as an ointment; while oil obtained from the bark, leaves, and berries was used as a medicine.

Bal'sam Tree. The rendering of Heb. bākā' in R.V. marg. of Ps. 84:6; II Sam. 5:22-24; I Chron. 14:14, 15. The Arabs apply the name to a bush which grows near Mecca, resembles the balsam, and has a white, acrid sap. See BACA, BALM, and MULBERRY TREE.

Ba'mah (bā'mā) [high place]. Ezekiel (Ezek. 20:29), in a contemptuous derivation, plays upon the two syllables, bā (go) and māh (what). See HIGH PLACES.

Ba'moth (bā'mōth) [high places]. An encampment of the Israelites n. of the Arnon, probably an abbreviation of Bamoth-baal (Num. 21:19).

Ba'moth-ba'al (bā'mōth-bā'āl) [high places of Baal]. A place n. of the Arnon, probably that at which the Israelites temporarily encamped, to which Balak took Balaam, and whence the plains of Moab were visible (Num. 21:19; 22:41, R.V. marg.). It is called Beth-bamoth on the Moabite Stone (27). See MOABITE STONE. It was within the limits of the tribe of Reuben (Josh. 13:17; where it is named between Dibon and Beth-baal-meon), and is probably to be identified with Khirbet el-Kueikiyeh, about 2½ miles s. of Mount Nebo.

Ba'ni (bā'nī) [builder, or perhaps a contraction of Benalah]. 1. A Gadite, one of David's mighty men (II Sam. 23:36); cf. I Chron. 11:38, which seems to have undergone textual corruption.

2. A descendant of Judah through Perez (I Chron. 9:4, R.V.).

3. Founder of a family, members of which returned from Babylonia with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:10). Some of them took foreign wives (Ezra 10:29). The family's representative sealed the covenant (Neh. 10:14). Called also Binnui (Neh. 7:15).

4. A Levite of the family of Merari (I Chron. 6:46).

5. A Levite who lived before the Return from Exile, of the sons of Asaph and hence of the family of Gershom (Neh. 11:22).

6. A Levite, father of Rehun (Neh. 3:17); perhaps he who took a prominent part at the feast of tabernacles in Ezra's time (Neh. 8:7; 9:4, 5), and in behalf of his house sealed the covenant (Neh. 10:13).

7. A Levite (Neh. 9:4). As the name is mentioned twice in v. 4 and only once in v. 5, it is perhaps once corrupt in v. 4.

8. Founder of house or family (Ezra 10:34), among whose descendants was a person also named Bani (Ezra 10:38).

Bank and Bank'er. Not only was money lent by a man to his neighbor as a private transaction, but money-lending was a regular business. The banker sat at his table (Luke 19:23), received money on deposit, allowed interest on it (ibid.; Matt. 25:27), and lent it to others on pledge or mortgage (cf. Neh. 5:3, 4). A branch of the banking business was money-changing. For a small commission the broker exchanged money of one denomination for that of another, as shekels for the half shekels needed to pay the Temple tax; or gave coins current in the country for foreign money, as a Hebrew shekel for Roman denarii and Greek drachmas (Mark 11:15; John 2:15). See LOAN.

Bap'tism. The rite of washing with water as a sign of religious purification and consecration. Among the Jews, as elsewhere, such washings were frequent; some prescribed in the O.T. (Ex. 29:4; 30:20; 40:12; Lev. chs. 15; 16:26, 28; 17:15; 22:4, 6; Num. 19:8) and others the product of later custom (Mark 7:3, 4; Heb. 6:2). Many believe also that in Christ's time, as certainly was the case later, proselytes to Judaism were baptized. Hence John, the Forerunner, when sent to call Israel to repentance, was directed by God (John tism the initiatory rite of his Church, one of the two sacraments to be observed by his followers. Hence we find it from the first required and administered by the apostles and their collaborators (Acts 2:38, 41; 8:12, 38; 9:18; 10:48; 1 Cor. 1:14, 16, etc.). It signifies and seals a believer's union with Christ through repentance and faith; the removal of his sins by Christ's death and the Spirit's operation in him; and his engagement to be the Lord's (Rom. 6:4; Gal. 3:27; Col. 2:11, 12; 1 Peter 3:21). Christians have differed, even from early times, as to the mode of baptism. While the word is derived from a verb, baptizō, which means, etymologically, to immerse, this does not prove that immersion was the mode always practiced, nor that it is necessary. In fact, instances occur where the word plainly does not mean immerse: (e.g., Luke 11:38, in A.V., wash [R.V., bathe], and probably Mark 7:4). The Scriptures nowhere describe, much less prescribe, the mode. In the postapostolic times both immersion and affusion were used. The Eastern Churches and the Protestant Baptists still practice immersion, the Latin Church generally uses affusion, while most Protestants use affusion or aspersion (sprinkling). Probably the mode varied even in apostolic times. According to Christ's command, it is to be administered in the name of the Trinity. Modern Baptists contend that baptism should be administered only to adult believers. The Church, however, from the earliest time has administered it also to children who have sponsors to care for their Christian nurture. It is certainly Scriptural to do this to children of believers, since Paul expressly teaches (Gal. 3:15-29) that believers in Christ are under the gracious provisions of the covenant which God made with Abraham. Under that covenant circumcision was administered to children as a sign of their participation in the relation in which their parents stood to God. The children of Christian believers have therefore a similar right to the ordinance which has replaced circumcision.

The phrase "baptized for the dead" (1 Cor. 15:29) is difficult to explain. It probably either means "baptized with a view to the world of the dead into which we are going," or refers to a custom of baptizing one person in place of another who has died, a custom which Paul might cite for his argument without approving.

Bar-ab'bas (bār-āb'ās) [Gr. from Aram., son of the father (master, teacher) or of Abba]. A robber who in an insurrection had committed murder. He was a notable prisoner when Jesus was arrested. Pilate, anxious to release Jesus, offered the Jews the option of releasing Jesus or Barabbas, and they chose Barabbas (Matt. 27:16-26).

Bar'a-chel (bār-ā-kēl) [God has blessed]. A Buzite, father of Elihu, Job's friend (Job 32:2, 6).

Bar'a-chi'ah (bār-ā-kī'ā) in A.V. Bar'a-chi'as (bār-ā-kī'ās), Gr. modification of Heb. name [Jehovah has blessed]. Father of that prophet, Zachariah, who was slain between the Temple and the altar (Matt. 23:35). See ZACHARIAH 3.

Bar'ak (bār'āk) [lightning]. An Israelite of the city of Kedesh-naphtali, who at the command of Deborah the prophetess, called together 10,000 men of Naphtali and Zebulun, with whom he routed Sisera, Jabin's commander in chief. (Judg., chs. 4; 5:1; 12; Heb. 11:32).

Bar-bar'i'an. 1. Originally one who did not speak Greek. "Greeks and . . . Barbarians" embraced all nations (cf. Rom. 1:14). There being nothing offensive in the word, the Romans and the Jews were content to be called barbarians.

Ancient Representation of the Baptism of Christ, from a Church in Ravenna

John stands on the riverbank, our Lord in the water. The river Jordan is symbolized by the sitting figure

1:33) to administer baptism to those who accepted his message. His rite is called "the baptism of repentance unto remission of sins" (Mark 1:4). Recipients of it thereby acknowledged their sins and professed their faith that through the coming Messiah they would be forgiven. Jesus sought baptism partly to express his sympathy with John's work, partly to dedicate himself to his own work, and partly to express his assumption of the sins of men. The mode of John's baptism is not described, but, as Jesus entered into the Jordan (Mark 1:9, 10), it was probably by affusion or by immersion. At first Christ's disciples continued to baptize the people as John had done (John 4:1, 2), thus carrying on John's work, but after Christ's Galilean ministry began, we read of this no more. But in his parting instructions (Matt. 28:19). Christ made bap-

2. Later, one who did not belong to the cultivated Hellenic race (cf. Col. 3:11).

3. One who spoke an unintelligible foreign tongue (I Cor. 14:11).

Bar-hu'mite (bār-hū'mīt). Probably a misreading of Baharumite (cf. II Sam. 23:31 with I Chron. 11:33).

Bar-ri'ah (bā-rī'ā) [fugitive]. Son of She-maiah, a descendant of David (I Chron. 3:22).

Bar-Je'sus (bār-jē'zūs) [Gr. from Aram., son of Jesus]. See ELYMAS.

Bar-Jo'nah (bār-jō'nā), in A.V. Bar'-jo'na (bār-jō'nā) [Aram.]. A surname of the Apostle Peter (Matt. 16:17); probably meaning "son of John" (John 1:42; 21:15-17, R.V.), for the Hebrew word from which John is derived is occasionally written in Greek in a form not distinguished from the Greek of Jonah (cf. various Greek texts of II Kings 25:23; I Chron. 6:9, 10; 12:12; 26:3; Ezra 8:12; I Esdras 9:1, 23).

Bar'kos (bār'kōs) [probably Aram., son of the Edomite god Kos]. One of the Nethinim, who founded a family, members of which returned from the Captivity (Ezra 2:53; Neh. 7:55); called Barchus in I Esdras 5:32.

Bar'ley. A cereal grain, called by the Hebrews šē'ōrāh, the hairy, bristling thing, and largely cultivated in Palestine (Ruth 1:22),

Head of Barley (Hordeum distichon)

Egypt (Ex. 9:31) and the adjacent regions, and made into cakes or loaves (Judg. 7:13; John 6:9). The several barleys belong to the genus Hordeum. For barley harvest see YEAR.

Bar-na-bas (bār-nā-bās) [Gr. from Aram. Explained in Acts 4:36b as son of exhortation or consolation, which favors Aram. Bar-nēb'āh, son of prophecy, especially as it takes the form of exhortation or consolation (cf. I Cor. 14:3); the name may have been originally Bar-Nēbō, son of (the Babylonian god) Nebo, and later by a popular etymology explained as above]. The surname of Joseph, a Levite of Cyprus, who, early converted to Christianity, sold his land and laid the price at the feet of the apostles in Jerusalem (Acts 4:36, 37). When the Christians of Jerusalem were afraid to receive the new convert Paul, Barnabas spoke in his behalf, and removed their apprehensions (Acts 9:27). When the report reached Jerusalem that Christians of Cyprus and Cyrene had been proclaiming the gospel with great success to Greeks as well as to Jews at Antioch of Syria, the Church sent Barnabas thither, and he aided in the work (Acts 11:19-24). From Antioch he went to Tarsus and brought back Saul (Acts 11:22-26). Later the two were dispatched to carry aims to their brethren at Jerusalem, who were suffering from famine (vs. 27-30). Returning with John Mark to Antioch (ch. 12:25), they were sent forth by the Church on a mission to the Gentiles (ch. 13:2). They visited Cyprus, and went thence to Perga, Antioch in Pisidia, Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe. At Lystra at Paul's command a cripple walked; and the inhabitants concluded that Barnabas was their supreme god Jupiter, and that Paul, since he was the chief speaker, was Mercury, the messenger of the gods (Acts 13:3 to 14:28). Having returned to Syria, they were sent by the church of Antioch to the council of Jerusalem. Barnabas spoke, as did Paul (ch. 15:1, 2, 12). At the close the two were commissioned to carry the decrees of the council to the churches in Syria and Asia Minor (vs. 22-31). After further labors at Antioch (v. 35), Paul proposed a 2d missionary journey. Barnabas desired to have with him his relative, John Mark (Col. 4:10). Paul objected, as John Mark had withdrawn from the work on the former tour. After sharp contention, the two evangelists separated and went different ways. Barnabas with Mark sailed again to Cyprus, while Paul went on to Asia Minor (Acts 15:36-41). But their mutual affection did not cease. Paul, in his epistles, speaks in a friendly way of Barnabas (I Cor. 9:6; Gal. 2:1, 9, 13; Col. 4:10), and yet more so of John Mark, about whom the quarrel arose (II Tim. 4:11).

Bar-sab'bas (bār-sāb'ās), in A.V. Bar'sab-bas (bār-sā-bās) [Gr. from Aram., son of Sabbas, Sabba (?); perhaps, son of, i.e., born on, the Sabbath]. 1. The surname of the Joseph who stood candidate for the apostleship against Matthias (Acts 1:23).

2. The surname of the Judas who was sent to Antioch as a delegate of the metropolitan church with Paul, Barnabas, and Silas (Acts 15:22).

Bar-thol'o-mew (bār-thōl'ō-mū) [Gr. from Aram., son of Tolmai; cf. Heb. telem, furrow]. One of the 12 apostles (Matt. 10:3; Mark 3:18; Luke 6:14; Acts 1:13). As in the first 3 of these passages the name of Bartholomew immediately follows that of Philip, and nearly does so in the 4th. Bartholomew was probably the surname of Nathanael, who was led to Christ by Philip (John 1:45, 46).

Bar'ti-mae'us (bār'ti-mā'ūs) [Lat. from Gr. from Aram., son of Timaeus]. A blind man healed by Jesus at Jericho (Mark 10:46).

Bar'uch (bār'ūk) [blessed]. 1. A scribe, son of Neriah, and a friend of Jeremiah (Jer. 36:26, 32; cf. Jos. Antiq. x. 9, 1). In the 4th year of Jehoiakim, he wrote from dictation the prophecies of Jeremiah (Jer. 36:1-8). In the following year he read them publicly on the fast day (Jer. 36:10), and afterward before the princes, who took the roll (vs. 14-20). The king, on hearing the opening sentences, burnt the roll and ordered the seizure of the prophet and the scribe, but they escaped (vs. 21-26). Baruch made a new copy with additions (vs. 27-32). In the 10th year of Zedekiah, during the siege of Jerusalem, Jeremiah bought a field at Anathoth from his uncle and, being at the time a prisoner, placed the deed in the charge of Baruch and testified that the land should again be possessed by Israel (Jer. 32:6-16, 43, 44). Baruch was taken with Jeremiah to Egypt (Jer. 43:1-7). For the book bearing the name of Baruch, see APOCRYPHA 8.

2. Son of Zabbai. He repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:20). He is perhaps the person of that name who sealed the covenant (Neh. 10:6).

3. A man of Judah, of the Shilonite family (Neh. 11:5).

Bar-zil'la'i (bār-zīl'ā-i) [made of iron]. 1. A wealthy Gileadite of Rogelim, e. of the Jordan. He showed David princely hospitality, sending him and his army food and other necessities while the fugitive king was at Mahanaim during Absalom's rebellion (II Sam. 17:27-29). After the victory, Barzillai escorted David over the Jordan, and was invited to become a member of the king's household and court at Jerusalem, but he excused himself on account of his great age—80 years. It was therefore arranged that his son Chimham should go in his stead (II Sam. 19:31-40).

2. A Meholahite, whose son Adriel married Saul's daughter Michal (II Sam. 21:8).

3. A priest who married a daughter of Barzillai the Gileadite, and assumed his father-in-law's name (Ezra 2:61; Neh. 7:63).

Bas'ca-ma (bās'kā-mā). A town in Gilead near which Jonathan Maccabaeus was put to death, and where for a time he was buried (I Macc. 13:23; and Jos. Antiq. xiii. 6, 6, where it is called Basca).

Bas'e-math (bās'ê-māth), in A.V. Bash'e-math, once Bas'math (I Kings 4:15) [fragrance; but cf. Arab. basama, to smile]. 1. One of Esau's wives, daughter of Elon the Hittite (Gen. 26:34); in Gen. 36:2 called Adah. See ADAM 2.

2. One of Esau's wives, a daughter of Ishmael and sister of Nebaioth (Gen. 36:3, 4, 13, 17); in Gen. 28:9 called Mahalath.

3. A daughter of Solomon and wife of his tax collector for Naphtali (I Kings 4:15).

Ba'shan (bā'shān) [even and smooth land]. A region e. of the Jordan. Its location and extent in O.T. times is best learned from its cities. Within its bounds were Golan, n. of the Yarmuk (Deut. 4:43), Edrei and Ashtaroth (Deut. 1:4), Salecah on the s. slope of the Jebel Hauran (Deut. 3:10; Josh. 13:11, R.V.). That is to say, it extended s.e. from the neighborhood of the upper Jordan to the border of the Arabian desert s. of the Hauran mountain. On the n. it bordered upon Geshur and Maacah (Josh. 12:5), and contained "the region of the Argob," famous for 60 cities high-walled (Deut. 3:4, 5; I Kings 4:13). Josephus identifies Bashan with Gaulonitis and Batanea (cf. Jos. Antiq. iv. 5, 3 with I Kings 4:13; and Antiq. ix. 8, 1 with II Kings 10:33). In the days of Abraham it was occupied by a people of especially large and powerful build, known as Rephaim (Gen. 14:5). The last king of this race was Og, who was defeated and slain at Edrei by the Israelites in the time of Moses (Num. 21:33-35; Deut. 3:1-7). Bashan was assigned to the half tribe of Manasseh (Deut. 3:13). It is a broad, fertile plateau, of volcanic formation, and well adapted for pasture. It was celebrated for its cattle (Ps. 22:12; Ezek. 39:18; Amos 4:1), and for its breed of sheep (Deut. 32:14). It was known also for its oak trees (Isa. 2:13; Ezek. 27:6; Zech. 11:2). Forests of evergreen oak still survive.

Ba'shan-ha'voth-jair (bā'shān-hā'vōth-jā'ir); rightly separated by R.V., which renders, "He called them, even Bashan, after his own name, Havvoth-jair" (Deut. 3:14). See HAVVOH-JAIR.

Bash'e-math (bāsh'ê-māth). See BASEMATH.

Ba'sin, formerly spelled Ba'son. A portable vessel for holding water for washing and other purposes (John 13:5). The word is used for bowls and dishes of various kinds, especially for:

1. A small vessel, in Heb. 'aggān (Isa. 22:24, rendered cup), used for wine (S. of Sol. 7:2, rendered goblet) and other liquids (Ez. 24:6).

2. A shallow vessel, in Heb. saph, used for domestic purposes (II Sam. 17:28) and to receive the blood of sacrifices (Ex. 12:22). They were employed in the Temple (Jer. 52:19, R.V. cups; II Kings 12:13, A.V. bowl, R.V. cup).

3. A large bowl, in Heb. mizkār, used in the tabernacle and Temple, especially in ministrations at the great altar (Num. 4:14), to hold the meal offering (Num. 7:13, rendered bowl), and to receive the blood of sacrifices (Zech. 9:15; 14:20, rendered bowl). It was made of gold, silver, or brass, and burnished (Ex. 27:3; Num. 7:84, rendered bowl; I Kings 7:45, 50). Revelers sometimes drank wine from such vessels (Amos 6:6, rendered bowl).

Bas'ket. Baskets of different sizes, shapes, and construction were in use, and various names were employed for them. As ancient sculptures and relics show, and as the etymology denotes, they were woven open or close, were made of the fiber or leaves of the palm tree or of rushes, reeds, twigs, or ropes, tapered at the top or at the bottom, were shallow or deep, ornamented with colors or plain, small enough to be carried in the hand, or so large that they were carried on the shoulder or head or borne on a pole between 2 men. They were employed for carrying fruit (Deut. 26:2; Jer. 6:9; 24:2; Amos 8:2, where in each passage a different Hebrew word is used); for carrying bread, cakes, and flesh (Gen. 40:17; Ex. 29:2, 3; Lev. 8:2; Judg. 6:19; Mark 8:19, 20, where still another Hebrew and 2 Greek names occur); for carrying clay to the brickyard and earth for the building of embankments (Ps. 81:6, R.V.).

Bas'math (bās'māth). See BASEMATH.

Bat. The rendering of Heb. 'ātallēph. It was classed with fowls, and was ceremonially unclean (Lev. 11:13, 19; Deut. 14:11, 12, 18). The bat is not a bird, but is a quadruped, covered with hair instead of feathers, having teeth instead of a bill, and suckling its young. Nor is its "wing" a flying apparatus of the bird type; it is an unfathered membrane connecting the fore and hind legs.

Bath. A Hebrew measure of capacity used for measuring liquids (I Kings 7:26, 38; II Chron. 2:10; 4:5; Ezra 7:22). It was  $\frac{1}{10}$  of a homer, and corresponds to the dry measure ephah in capacity (Ezek. 45:10, 11, 14); it equals about 9.8 gal. in the U.S.A. In the excavations at Lachish there were found 2 broken jars dating from the reign of Zedekiah, but both have been reconstructed. One bears a seal BTLMLK, which may be rendered, "Royal bath"; it contains 2,764.353 cubic inches, or 11.966 gals., U.S. standard. The other bears a private seal and has a capacity of 2,847.84 cubic inches, or 12.328 gals., U.S. standard. No doubt both jars were intended to hold the same quantity, and they give us an approximate idea of the bath in the 6th century B.C.

Bath'ing. In the warm climate of the East frequent bathing is a necessity. The daughter of Pharaoh bathed in the Nile (Ex. 2:5). The Egyptians wore linen garments, constantly fresh-washed, and their priests washed themselves in cold water twice every day and twice every night (Herod. ii. 37). Egyptians, Hebrews, and Syrians washed the dust of the road from their feet when they tarried at a house (Gen. 18:4; 19:2; 24:32; 43:24; John 13:10). If the Israelites contracted ceremonial defilement, they bathed the body and washed the raiment (Lev. 14:8; 15:5; 17:15; Num. 19:7, 8), either in running water (Lev. 15:13), at a fountain (Judith 12:7, 9; cf. John 9:7), in a river (II Kings 5:10), or at home in court or garden (II Sam. 11:2, 4; cf. Susanna 15). They washed and anointed themselves and put on their best garments for gala and court attire and on putting away mourning (Ex. 40:12, 13; Ruth 3:3; II Sam. 12:20; Judith 10:3; Matt. 6:17). The priests washed their hands and feet before entering the sanctuary or burning an offering on the altar (Ex. 30:19-21). The high priest bathed at his inauguration and on the day of atonement before each act of propitiation (Lev. 8:6; 16:4, 24). In the time of Christ, the Jews washed their hands before eating, and washed or sprinkled themselves on coming from the market (Mark 7:3, 4). At this time also, when Greek and Roman customs had gained entrance among the Jews, there were public baths. The warm springs at Tiberias, Gadara, and Callirrhoe, near the e. shore of the Dead Sea, were resorted to for health (Jos. Antiq. xvii. 6, 5; xviii, 2, 3). The fish ponds connected with the palace at Jericho were used for bathing and swimming (Jos. Antiq. xv, 3, 3).

Bath'-rab'bim (bāth'rāb'īm) [daughter of multitudes]. Probably one of the gates of Heshbon (S. of Sol. 7:4).

Bath-she'ba (bāth-shē'bā) [probably daughter of an oath; or, rather, daughter of the 7th day, i.e., of the Sabbath]. Daughter of Eliam, and wife of Uriah the Hittite. She is the woman with whom David so shamefully sinned, and who, after the removal of her husband, became the wife of David and mother of Solomon (II Sam. 11:3, 4; 12:24; I Kings 1:11). When Adonijah was preparing to usurp the kingdom, Bath-sheba, supported by the Prophet Nathan, appealed to David in favor of her own son Solomon; the result was that Adonijah's enterprise was thwarted (I Kings 1:11-53), and he himself was ultimately put to death (I Kings 2:13-25).

Bath'-shu'a (bāth'shō'ā) [daughter of opulence, or daughter of Shua]. 1. The daughter of Shua and wife of Judah (I Chron. 2:3, where E.R.V. reads Bath-shua; see Gen. 38:2, 12).

2. The text of I Chron. 3:5 calls the mother of Solomon Bath-shua, the daughter of Amiel. Bath-shua is probably a misreading of Bath-sheba, due to a partial effacement of the Heb. letter beth. The LXX has here the usual form for Bath-sheba.

Bav'va-i (bāv'ā-i), in A.V. Bav'a-i (bāv'ā-i). A son of Henadad, who superintended the repair of part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:18).

Ba'yith (bā'yīth), in A.V. Ba'jith [house]. The Heb. text has the definite article. A Moabite town or temple (Isa. 15:2).

Bay Tree. The rendering in the A.V. of Heb. 'ezrah in Ps. 37:35. The R.V. more plausibly renders 'ezrah "a green tree in its native soil," which, of course, tends to flourish better than a transplanted and, perhaps, a sickly exotic. The same Heb. word is used in Lev. 16:29; 18:26, for a native as distinguished from a man from another country.

Baz'lith (bāz'līth) or Baz'luth (bāz'lūth) [stripping]. One of the Nethinim and founder of a family, members of which returned from Captivity (Ezra 2:52; Neh. 7:54).

Bdel'li-um. The rendering of Heb. b'dōlah, a substance of the same color as manna (Num. 11:7), and found like gold and the onyx stone or the beryl in the land of Havilah (Gen. 2:12). The Greeks gave the name bdellion to a transparent, waxy, fragrant gum obtained from a tree in Arabia, Babylonia, India, and Media. The best came from Bactria. As gold, the onyx, and the beryl, belong to the mineral kingdom, b'dōlah may perhaps also. The LXX translates it in Gen. 2:12 anthrax, the carbuncle, ruby, and garnet; and in Num. 11:7, krystallos, rock crystal.

Be'al'iah (bē'ā-lī'ā) [Jehovah is Lord]. A Benjamite warrior who came to David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:5).

Be'a-loth (bē'ā-lōth) [mistresses, possessors]. 1. A village in the extreme s. of Judah (Josh. 15:24). See BAALATH-BEER.

2. A locality in the vicinity of the tribe of Asher, perhaps known by this name (I Kings 4:16, R.V.). See ALOTH. In Heb. bē'alōth it is uncertain whether we have one word or whether bē is the preposition in.

Bean. Beans were used for food (II Sam. 17:28), and occasionally, especially during famine, were mixed with grain and made into a coarse bread (Ezek. 4:9).

Bear. The Syrian bear is of a yellowish-brown color, and, unless pressed by necessity, lives chiefly on vegetable food. But all bears are dangerous when meddled with (Isa. 11:7; Amos 5:19), especially when robbed of their whelps (II Sam. 17:8; Prov. 17:12; Hos. 13:8). Though now almost confined to Lebanon, on the w. of the Jordan, and Hermon, Gilead, and Bashan, on the e. of the river, it anciently roamed over the land. David killed one in the vicinity of Bethlehem (I Sam. 17:34), and near Beth-el two she bears, which came out of the woods, tore in pieces 42 young persons who mocked Elisha (II Kings 2:24).

The bear of Dan. 7:5, commissioned to devour much flesh, probably was Media. The 4 beasts of Daniel are combined in one beast in Rev. 13:2, to symbolize all the power of the world. The feet are bear's feet.

For the constellation Bear, see ARCTURUS.

Beard. The beard was cherished as the badge of manly dignity. Its neglect was an outward sign of mental aberration (I Sam. 21:13) or of affliction (II Sam. 19:24). As a mark of mourning it was customary to pluck it out or cut it off (Ezra 9:3; Isa. 15:2; Jer. 41:5; Herod. ii. 36). The king of the Ammonites grievously insulted David's ambassadors when, among other acts, he shaved off one half of their beards (II Sam. 10:4, 5; cf. Herod. ii. 121, 4). The ancient Egyptians shaved the head and the face, but often wore a false beard. They let the hair and beard grow as a sign of mourning (Herod. ii. 36). Hence Joseph, when released from prison, shaved the beard in order to appear before Pharaoh (Gen. 41:14). The practice of shaving off the corners of the beard (Lev. 19:27; Jer. 9:26; 25:23, both R.V.) was probably a heathenish sign, as the Arabs shaved the side of the face between the ear and the eye in honor of their god Orotal (Herod. iii. 8).

Beast. 1. A mammal, not man, as distinguished from a fowl of the air and a creeping thing (Gen. 1:29, 30). The wild beasts are distinguished from domesticated animals (Lev. 26:22; Isa. 13:21, 22; 34:14; Jer. 50:39; Mark 1:13).

2. Any of the inferior animals, including reptiles and birds, as distinguished from man (Ps. 147:9; Eccl. 3:19; Acts 28:5). In this sense there was a distinction drawn under the Mosaic Law between ceremonially clean and unclean beasts.

3. Figuratively, a fierce destructive power. Four successive empires, beginning with Babylonia, are thus symbolized in Dan., ch. 7. The 4 beasts, combined into a composite monster, represent the power of the world in Rev. 13:1-10, with its seat transferred from Babylon to Rome, Rev. 17:3-18. A beast with lamb's horns represents false prophecy (Rev. 13:11-18), which is a ravaging wolf in sheep's clothing. The beasts of Rev. 4:6-9 of the A.V. are very properly altered to "living creatures" in the R.V.

Beatitudes [Lat. beatitudo, blessedness]. This word does not occur in the English Bible. The primary meaning of beatitude is blessedness, whence it developed into the signification of a declaration of blessedness. In the latter sense the term Beatitudes has been applied to the sayings of Jesus which introduce the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 5:3-12; Luke 6:20-23). In regard to the number in Matthew, opinions differ; if vs. 10-12 are counted as one beatitude, there are 8. Augustine speaks of a heptad of Beatitudes, with the 8th returning upon the 1st. Luke records 4, and adds 4 woes which are not given by Matthew. The Beatitudes in Matthew are in the 3d person, while those of Luke are in the 2d; the more spiritual words which occur in Matthew are omitted in Luke. The 8 Beatitudes are an analysis of perfect spiritual well-being and correct all low and carnal views of human happiness. They do not necessarily describe 8 different classes of people, but 8 different elements of excellence which may all be combined in the same individual.

Be'ba-i (bē'bā-i). The founder of a family, some of whose members returned from the Captivity (Ezra 2:11; 8:11; Neh. 7:16).

Be'cher (bē'kēr) [cf. Arab. bakr, young camel]. 1. A son of Benjamin (Gen. 46:21; I Chron. 7:6). His descendants were apparently too few at the beginning to form a tribal family, at least they found no place in the registry of families (Num. 26:38; I Chron. 8:1-6), but they ultimately increased to 9 fathers' houses, inhabiting Anathoth and other towns in the territory of Benjamin and mustering 20,200 men (I Chron. 7:8, 9).

2. A son of Ephraim, and founder of a family (Num. 26:35). In I Chron. 7:20 the name appears as Bered.

Be'co'rath (bē-kō'rāth), in A.V. Be'cho'rath (bē-kō'rāth) [primogeniture]. A Benjamite, an ancestor of King Saul (I Sam. 9:1).

Bed. An article of domestic furniture to sleep upon. The poor and travelers often slept on the ground, using their upper garment as a covering (Gen. 28:11; Ex. 22:26). A bed might be no more than a rug or mat, easily bundled up and carried away (Matt. 9:6). But beds raised from the ground were early in existence (II Kings 1:4, 6; 4:10), with bedsteads of wood, or of iron (Deut. 3:11), or among the wealthy of ivory (Amos 6:4), with silken cushions (Amos 3:12, R.V.) and rich coverings (Prov. 7:16; Judith 10:21).

Be'dad (bē'dād) [separation]. The father of Hadad, king of Edom (Gen. 36:35; I Chron. 1:46).

Be'dan. (bē'dān). Apparently a Hebrew judge, mentioned between Gideon and Jephthah, but the order cannot be pressed (I Sam. 12:11). He is not mentioned in The Book of Judges. Various theories have been proposed in explanation, but it is best to regard Bedan as an early misreading for Abdon (Judg. 12:13) or for Barak, which is found in the LXX and the Peshitta (I Sam. 12:11; cf. Heb. 11:32).

Be-de'iah (bē-dē'yā). A son of Bani, who was induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:35).

Bee. An insect which makes honey (Judg. 14:8, 18). It is compared to an army (Isa. 7:18) chasing man (Deut. 1:44), or surrounding him (Ps. 118:12). As Canaan was a land flowing with milk and honey (Ex. 3:8), bees must have been there in large numbers. Their nests were in rocks (Ps. 81:16) and in woods (I Sam. 14:25), especially in Judah (Ezek. 27:17; cf. Matt. 3:4).

Be'e'l'i'a-da (bē-ē-l'i'a-dā) [the Lord has known]. A son of King David, born at Jerusalem (I Chron. 14:7). During his lifetime he may also have been called by the alternate name Eliada (God has known); at any rate, when the word Baal became distasteful on account of idolatrous associations, the Hebrew historians wrote Eliada instead of Beeliada (II Sam. 5:16; I Chron. 3:8).

Be-el'zebub (bē-ē'l'zē-būb). The prince of the demons (Matt. 10:25; 12:24; Mark 3:22; Luke 11:15, 18, 19), whom Jesus identifies with Satan (Matt. 12:26; Mark 3:23; Luke 11:18). The spelling Beelzebub differs but slightly from Baalzebub, god of Ekron. The Gr. text, however, has Beelzebub. Heb. zēbūl means habitation, and Baalzebub signifies lord of the habitation, which is pertinent to the argument in Matt. 10:25; 12:29; Mark 3:27. In the Ras Shamra literature occurs zēbūl Ba'al (abode of Baal), where zēbūl may be personified as deity. Ras Shamra shows the antiquity of the form Beelzebub. In the component -zebūl may also be a play upon late Heb. zebel (dung) to show disdain for the heathen god.

Be'er (bē'ēr) [a well]. 1. A station of the Israelites on the confines of Moab, at which a well was dug by the leaders of Israel with their staves or under their official supervision (Num. 21:16-18); possibly the same as Beer-elim. A suggestion has been made that it be identified with eth-Thamad at the head of Wadi el-Wāleh.

2. A place to which Jotham fled from his brother Abimelech (Judg. 9:21). Site unknown, but often identified with Beeroth. Eusebius locates it about 7½ miles n. of Eleutheropolis. El-Bireh, n. of Beisan and s.e. of Mount Tabor, has also been accepted by some scholars. Josephus says that Jotham fled to the mountains (Jos. Antiq. v. 7, 2).

Be'e'ra (bē-ē'rā) [a well]. An Asherite, family of Heber (I Chron. 7:37).

Be'e'rah (bē-ē'rā) [a well]. A prince of the Reubenites, carried off by Tiglath-pileser (I Chron. 5:6).

Be'er-e'lim (bē-ēr-e'līm) [well of heroes or of terebinths]. A village of Moab (Isa. 15:8); see BEER 1.

Be'e'ri (bē-ē'ri) [belonging to the well]. 1. A Hittite, father of Judith, one of Esau's wives (Gen. 26:34).

2. Father of the Prophet Hosea (Hos. 1:1).

Be'er-lahai'-roi (bē-ēr-lā-hī'roi) [the well of the Living One who sees me]. A well in the wilderness, between Kadesh and Bered on the road to Shur, where Hagar learned that Jehovah watched over her (Gen. 16:7, 14). The Bedouins identify it with 'Ain Muweilah, about 12 miles n.w. of Kadesh ('Ain Kādais) and about 50 miles s.w. of Beer-sheba.

Be'e'roth (bē-ē'rōth) [wells]. 1. A Gibeonite town (Josh. 9:17), assigned to the Benjamites (Josh. 18:25). The inhabitants were Hivites (Josh. 9:7) or Horites (LXX), who fled to Gittaim and settled there (II Sam. 4:3). The murderers of Ish-bosheth, and an armor-bearer of Joab's, were Beerothites (II Sam. 4:2; 23:37); and men of Beeroth returned from Babylonia after the Exile (Ezra 2:25). The common identification is with el-Bireh, a village on a rocky hill with copious flowing water at its foot, about 9 miles n. of Jerusalem.

2. Beeroth Bene-jaakan (of the children of Jaakan); wells on the borders of Edom, belonging to the tribe of Jaakan (Deut. 10:6); probably to be identified with el-Birein, about 6¼ miles s. of el-'Aujā. See JAAKAN.

Be'e'roth-ite (bē-ē'rōth-it), once Be'roth-ite (bē'rōth-it). A native or inhabitant of Beeroth (II Sam. 4:2; 23:37; I Chron. 11:39).

Be'er-she'ba (bē-ēr-she'bā) [well of seven, or well of an oath]. A place in the wilderness of s. Judah, where Abraham dug a well and where he and Abimelech, the king of Gerar, made a covenant not to molest each other. This well had already been an object of strife between their respective herdsmen. Accordingly Abraham gave Abimelech 7 ewe lambs as a witness of the Hebrew title, and to preserve the memory of the transaction, he called the place Beer-sheba (Gen. 21:22-32). He also planted there a tamarisk tree, and called on the name of Jehovah, the everlasting God (Gen. 21:33). Abraham resided for many years at this place. Then he went to Hebron, and afterward sojourned at Beer-lahai-roi. During the absence of the Hebrews from this part of the wilderness, the Philistines filled up the wells; but when Isaac came into authority, he began to reopen them. While he was at Beer-sheba, Abimelech, the king of Gerar, came and made a covenant with him, as he or his predecessor had done with Abraham. That same day Isaac's servants announced that they had reached water. As in former like cases, Isaac piously revived the old name, calling the well Shibah, the feminine form of the numeral sheba', thus confirming and preserving the name Beer-sheba (Gen. 26:32, 33, R.V.). It was from this well that Jacob started on his journey to Haran (ch. 28:10), and there he sacrificed on his way to Egypt (ch. 46:1-5). A town ultimately rose in the vicinity of the well (Josh. 15:28). It was situated in the extreme s. of Judah (Josh. 15:28; II Sam. 24:7; II Kings 23:8), though allotted to the Simeonites (Josh. 19:1, 2; I Chron. 4:28), and was also the s. limit of Palestine, so that the expression became proverbial, "From Dan to Beer-sheba," i. e., from the extreme n. to the extreme s. of the Holy Land (Judg. 20:1 etc.). Samuel's sons were judges in Beer-sheba (I Sam. 8:2). Elijah passed through it on his way to Horeb (I Kings 19:3). It was a sanctuary in the 8th century and frequented by n. Israel (Amos 5:5; 8:14). It was inhabited after the Captivity (Neh. 11:27, 30). It is represented by the modern Bir es-Seba' (28 miles s.w. of Hebron) on the n. side of the wadi es-Seba'. Seven wells are at this place. The larger of the wells described by Robinson was found to be 12½ feet in diameter and 44½ deep, to the surface of the water, 16 feet at the lower part being cut through solid rock.

Beesh'te-rah (bē-ēsh'tē-rā) [house or temple of Astarte]. The same place as Ashteroth (cf. Josh. 21:27 with I Chron. 6:71). This contraction of Beth-ashterah is like that of Beth-shan to Beisan.

Beetle. See CRICKET.

Behemoth [pl. of Heb. bēhēmāh (beast), an intensive plural to denote magnitude]. A large animal described by Job which eats grass like an ox. It is amphibious, sometimes feeding with other beasts upon the mountains, and sometimes lying in fens, among reeds, or under willows, or apparently in flooded rivers (Job 40:15-24; R.V. marg., hippopotamus). It is probably the hippopotamus of the Nile (Hippopotamus amphibius). This has an unwieldy body 11 or 12 feet long, a large clumsy head, short stout legs, with 4 feet bearing toes. The gape of its mouth is enormous and the tusks of formidable size. It feeds on green corn, grass, and young shrubs. In ancient times it descended the Nile; but it was hunted for its valuable skin, teeth, and flesh, and it was also taken in considerable numbers to Rome for exhibition in the circus. Now, therefore, these animals are extinct in Egypt, though found on the Upper Nile.

Be'ka, in A.V. Be'kah [division, half]. Half a shekel (Ex. 38:26). It was used for weighing the precious metals (Gen. 24: 22). See WEIGHTS.

Bel (bāl) (Akkad. bēlu, cognate of Heb. bā'al [lord]). The patron god of Babylon (Isa. 46:1; Jer. 50:2; 51:44; Bel and Dragon 3-22), whose proper name was Marduk or, as called by the Hebrews, Merodach. He was a sun-god, the sun of early day and of spring; and he was regarded as the son of Ea, god of the ocean and other terrestrial waters. His festival was celebrated in the spring, at the beginning of the year. Because the sun in this aspect exerts such potent influence in nature, and because he was their tutelary divinity, the men of Babylon paid him supreme worship and ascribed to him the loftiest attributes. Marduk was not originally numbered among the chief gods by the people on the lower Tigris and Euphrates, but with the supremacy of Babylon (c. 1950) he became the head of the Babylonian pantheon.

Another Bel (En-lil), god of the region between earth and sky, and grouped in a triad with Anu, heaven, and Ea, was one of the 11 great gods.

Be'la (bē'lā), in A.V. once Be'lah (bē'lā) (Gen. 46:21) [devouring, destruction]. 1. A king of Edom, whose father's name was Beor (Gen. 36:32).

2. A Reubenite chief (I Chron. 5:8).

3. A son of Benjamin, and founder of a family (Gen. 46:21; Num. 26:38).

4. One of the cities of the plain, the same as Zoar (Gen. 14:2, 8).

Bel'ial (bē'lī-āl) [worthlessness, wickedness]. Ungodliness (Ps. 18:4, R.V.). The phrase "sons of belial" is an expression meaning vile scoundrels or ungodly men (Deut. 13:13; Judg. 19:22). A wicked woman is called in Hebrew a daughter of Belial (I Sam. 1:16). Belial is personified in II Cor. 6:15.

Bell. Small golden bells, alternating with ornaments in the form of pomegranates, were attached to the lower part of the official blue robe of the high priest in order to send forth a sound that might be heard when he went into the Holy Place before Jehovah (Ex. 28:33-35; Eccles. 45:9). A string of flat pieces of brass was hung around the neck of a horse, or a single bell was suspended from its throat (Zech. 14:20; cf. Judg. 8:21).

Bel'lows. An instrument for blowing the fire of a smelting furnace (Jer. 6:29). As used by the ancient Egyptians, the bellows consisted of a pair of leather bags, fitted into a frame, from each of which a pipe extended to the fire. They were worked by the feet, the operator standing upon them with one bag under each foot and pressing them alternately while he pulled up the exhausted skin with a string which he held in his hand. A double pair was used for each furnace.

Bel'mā'im (bēl'mā'im), Bel'men (bēl'mēn). See BILEAM, IBLEAM.

Bel-shaz'zar (bēl-shāz'ēr) [Akkad. Bēl-shar-uzur, Bel protect the king]. According to contemporary Babylonian records, the first-born son and coregent of Nabonidus, the last king of the Neo-Babylonian Empire. The Babylonian records in a remarkable manner supplement the Biblical references (Dan., chs. 5; 7:1; 8:1; and Baruch 1:11, where he is called Baltasar). He is referred to (Dan. 5:11, 13) as the son of Nebuchadnezzar; a reasonable interpretation of this statement is that his mother was the daughter of that king. He may have been the Belshazzar who in 560 performed the functions of a chief officer of the king. According to Babylonian records, he became coregent of Nabonidus in the 3d year of his reign (553) and continued in that capacity until 539. Even though Nabonidus was absent for long periods at Taïma, he never relinquished the kingship until Cyrus conquered Babylon. Whenever Nabonidus and Belshazzar are mentioned together, the former receives the precedence; in the cuneiform records Belshazzar is always called not the king, but the son of the king.

Several texts record the business transactions of Belshazzar in Babylon. He did not engage in minor financial activities, but was represented by subordinates who looked after his affairs. Apparently he was interested in business, but not dependent upon it for a livelihood. A number of texts dating from the 5th to the 13th year of the reign of Nabonidus show that Belshazzar made offerings of silver, gold, and sacrificial animals to Babylonian sanctuaries. In the 5th year of Nabonidus he donated 60 shekels of silver to the temple in Erech; in the 9th year he gave the same weight of gold to Shamash (the sun-god). On one occasion, in the 9th year of Nabonidus, he presented 35 animals to the temple of Shamash in Sippar. In that case the sheep were taken from the king's maintenance supply, which was brought to the palace. The following year he gave 27 animals to Shamash and the other gods in Sippar. From his generous attitude toward these sanctuaries it may be inferred that shrines in other Babylonian cities benefited from his devotion.

When Nabonidus set out, in the 3d year of his reign, on a campaign against Taima, he divided the rule with Belshazzar. After the place was taken, the father adorned the city with the glory of Babylon and made it his residence. Contact with the capital was maintained across the desert by means of camels.

In the 17th year of his reign, Nabonidus returned to Babylon, and the New Year's festival was celebrated. Cyrus entered Babylon on the 3d day of Marcheswan, and according to a broken tablet a certain Ugbaru died on the night of the 11th of that month; in the next line is mentioned the death of someone (the word is mutilated) "of the king." Probably it refers to the mother of Belshazzar. According to Dan., ch. 5, the death of Belshazzar occurred in connection with the actual capture of Babylon; this is also intimated by Xenophon (Cyropaedia vii, 5, 30). Belshazzar's feast, with the sacrilegious drinking of wine out of the holy vessels (Dan., ch. 5), must have preceded the fall of the city. See BABYLONIA, CYRUS, DANIEL, NABONIDUS.

Bel'te-shaz'zar (bēl'tē-shāz'ēr) [Akkad., Ba-lā-tu-u-ur, protect his life]. The name is abbreviated by omitting the name of the deity invoked. The name given by the prince of the Babylonian eunuchs to the Prophet Daniel (Dan. 1:7). The Hebrew vocalization in this name suggests the god Bel.

Ben (bēn) [son]. A Levite (I Chron. 15:18), but probably the name has erroneously crept into the text; cf. vs. 20, 21, where it is lacking.

Ben'-a-bin'-a-dab (bēn'-ā-bīn'-ā-dāb) [son of Abinadab]. Son-in-law of Solomon and his purveyor in the region of Dor (I Kings 4:11, R.V.).

Ben-na'iah (bē-nā'yā) [Jehovah has built]. 1. A Levite, the son of Jehoiada, of Kabeel, in Judah (II Sam. 23:20). His father was a priest (I Chron. 27:5). If the title here denotes a minister at the altar, Benaiah's father was probably the leader of the priests who joined the army which placed David on the throne (I Chron. 12:27). Benaiah was a valiant man, celebrated for having descended into a pit and killed a lion, for having slain two lionlike men of Moab, and, when armed only with a staff, for having met an Egyptian giant, wrestled away his spear, and killed him with his own weapon (II Sam. 23:20, 21; I Chron. 11:22, 23). He was over the Cherethites and Pelethites. David's bodyguard (II Sam. 8:18), and also commanded the military division for the 3d month (I Chron. 27:5, 6). He with the bodyguard remained faithful to David during Absalom's rebellion (cf. II Sam. 15:18; 20:23) and that of Adonijah (I Kings 1:10). By David's order he, at the head of the guard, escorted Solomon to Gihon, to be anointed king (I Kings 1:38), and as chief of the guard he executed Adonijah (I Kings 2:25), Joab (vs. 29-34), and Shimei (v. 46). The death of Joab left the office of commander in chief vacant, and Benaiah was promoted to the same (I Kings 2:35).

2. A Pirathonite, one of David's 30 mighty men of the 2d rank (II Sam. 23:30; I Chron. 11:31). He commanded the military division for the 11th month (I Chron. 27:14).

3. A Levite of the 2d degree who played the psaltery before the Ark when it was escorted to Jerusalem, and afterward in the tabernacle erected by David (I Chron. 15:18, 20; 16:5).

4. A priest who blew a trumpet in the company which escorted the Ark to Jerusalem and afterward in David's tabernacle (I Chron. 15:24; 16:6).

5. A Levite, descended from Asaph, and living before the reign of Jehoshaphat (II Chron. 20:14).

6. A Simeonite, possibly a contemporary of Hezekiah (I Chron. 4:36; cf. v. 41).

7. A Levite, an overseer of dedicated offerings in Hezekiah's reign (II Chron. 31:13).

8. Father of Ezekiel's contemporary, Prince Pelatiah (Ezek. 11:1, 13).

9-12. Four men, sons of Parosh, Pahath-moab, Bani, and Nebo, respectively, who were induced by Ezra to put away their strange wives (Ezra 10:25, 30, 35, 43).

Ben'-am'mi (bēn'ām'mī) [son of my kinsman]. Son of Lot's younger daughter, from whom sprang the Ammonite tribe (Gen. 19:38).

Ben'-de'ker (bēn'dē'kēr) [son of Deker]. Solomon's purveyor in Beth-shemesh and some other towns (I Kings 4:9, R.V.).

Ben'e-be'rak (bēn'ē-bērāk) [sons of Berak (lightning)]. A town of Dan (Josh. 19:45), now Ibn Ibrāk, 4 miles e. of Jaffa.

Ben'e-ja'a-kan (bēn'ē-jā'a-kān). See JAAKAN.

Ben'-ge'ber (bēn'gē'bēr) [son of Geber]. Solomon's purveyor in Ramoth-gilead (I Kings 4:13, R.V.).

Ben'-ha'dad (bēn'hā'dād) [Heb. form of Aram. Bar-Hadad (son of the god Hadad)]. 1. King of Damascus, son of Tabrimmon and grandson of Hezion (Rezon?). When Baasha built Ramah to blockade the entrance into Judah from the n., Asa, king of Judah, hired Ben-hadad to break his treaty with Baasha and invade the Kingdom of Israel. The army of Ben-hadad entered the territory of the 10 tribes, captured the cities of Ijon, Dan, and Abel-maacah, and ravaged the land w. of the lake of Gennesaret. The diversion caused Baasha to withdraw from Ramah and terminate the blockade of the Kingdom of Judah: Asa gave Ben-hadad costly treasures from the Temple and royal palace (I Kings 15:18-21; II Chron. 16:1-6).

2. King of Damascus. He besieged Samaria, but drove Ahab to desperation and forced him to battle by insulting demands, and was defeated. The next year Ben-hadad renewed the war, but sustained a still heavier defeat; but Ahab granted him conditions of peace (I Kings 20:1-34). The arrival of a common enemy, Shalmaneser III, king of Assyria (860-825), in the w. necessitated the preservation of peace, which continued 3 years (I Kings 22:1).

Ben-hadad's name was probably Ben-hadadezer, by the Israelites shortened to Ben-hadad, by the Assyrians to Adadidri (Hadadezer). Or else in 854 B.C. Ben-hadad was succeeded by Hadadezer, and the latter about 845 by another Ben-hadad. Hence the king of Syria in I Kings 22:2 to II Kings 6:23, where his personal name is not given, may be Hadadezer. In 853 the king of Syria (Damascus), aided by Ahab and other allies, stopped the Assyrian advance at Karkar. In the following year, as is probable, in early spring Ahab lost his life in an attempt to wrest Ramoth-gilead from the king of Syria (I Kings 22:1-36). For some time the Syrians waged predatory warfare with the Israelites (II Kings 5:2; 6:8-23). These hostilities were repeatedly interrupted by Shalmaneser's operations against Damascus in the years 850, 849, and 846.

If Hadadezer is Ben-hadad II, as is generally believed, he was a contemporary of Ahab's son Jehoram (Joram). Between 846 and 843 B.C., there being no Assyrians in the w. to harass him, he invaded the territory of Israel and laid siege to Samaria; but his army, hearing a noise as of troops on the march, became panic-stricken and fled (II Kings 6:24 to 7:20). Shortly afterward he was murdered and succeeded by Hazael (842) (II Kings 8:15).

3. A son of Hazael. In the reign of Jehoahaz, king of Israel, Hazael and then Ben-hadad oppressed the 10 tribes (II Kings 13:3-13). But Joash, son of Jehoahaz, thrice defeated Ben-hadad and recovered the cities which the king of Damascus had wrested from Israel (II Kings 13:22-25; cf. ch. 10:32, 33).

The palaces of Ben-hadad are the palaces of Damascus (Jer. 49:27; Amos 1:4).

Ben'-ha'il (bēn'hā'il) [son of strength]. One of the princes sent by Jehoshaphat to teach in the cities of Judah (II Chron. 17:7).

Ben'-ha'nan (bēn'hā'nān) [son of a gracious one]. A son of Shimon, registered with the tribe of Judah (I Chron. 4:20).

Ben'-he'sed (bēn'hē'sēd) [son of grace, loving-kindness]. Solomon's purveyor in Aruboth (I Kings 4:10, R.V.).

Ben'-hur (bēn'hūr) [son of Hur]. Solomon's purveyor in Mount Ephraim (I Kings 4:8, R.V.).

Ben-ni'nu (bē-nī'nū) [perhaps, our son]. A Levite who with Nehemiah and others sealed a covenant with Jehovah (Neh. 10:13).

Ben'-ja-min (bēn'jā-mīn) [son of the right hand (of happiness) or son of the South]. 1. The youngest of Jacob's 12 sons and full brother of Joseph. As Jacob was approaching Bethlehem, Rachel gave birth to Benjamin, but, dying, named him Benoni (son of my sorrow). Jacob called him Benjamin (Gen. 35:16-20); and was deeply attached to him, especially after losing Joseph, as son of his old age and child of beloved Rachel. Only reluctantly did he allow Benjamin to go to Egypt with the brothers; and Judah expressed the fear that if evil should befall Benjamin too, their father would die of grief (Gen. 43:1-17). Joseph also felt much affection for Benjamin (Gen. 43:29-34; 44:1-34). Ultimately Benjamin had, besides other descendants, 5 sons and 2 grandsons, through whom he became the founder of families and a tribe in Israel (Gen. 46:21; Num. 26:38-41; I Chron. 7:6-12; ch. 8).

2. The tribe to which Benjamin gave origin, and the territory that it obtained. In the distribution of land at Shiloh, after Judah and Ephraim had received territory, the first lot came to Benjamin, who was assigned the district lying between those of Judah and Ephraim. Its n. boundary ran from Jordan through Beth-el to Ataroth-addar, s. of nether Beth-horon. Its w. border ran from this point to Kiriath-jearim. Its s. boundary went thence through the valley of the son of Hin-nom, immediately s. of Jerusalem, to the n.

point of the Dead Sea. Its e. limit was the Jordan (Josh. 18:11-20). The territory thus marked out extended from w. to e. about 28 miles, and from n. to s. about 12 miles. It was a hilly country, but extremely fertile (Jos. Antiq. v. 1, 22) and it was studded with towns, the chief of which were Jerusalem, Jericho, Beth-el, Gibeon, Gibeath, and Mizpeh (Josh. 18:21-28). The tribe early furnished Israel with a deliverer from foreign oppression (Judg. 3:15). The tribe was nearly exterminated for protecting the guilty inhabitants of Gibeah (Judg., chs. 19 to 21). Later it gave the first king to Israel, and long clung to the house of Saul (II Sam. 2:9, 15; I Chron. 12:29). Even after David had become king of all Israel, Benjamites occasionally showed dissatisfaction (II Sam. 16:5; 20:1-22; Psalm 7, title); but a large part of the tribe remained true to the house of David when the 10 tribes separated under Jeroboam (I Kings 12:21), and shared the fortunes of Judah to the end (Ezra 4:1). From this tribe sprang the Apostle Paul (Phil. 3:5).

Two gates at Jerusalem bore the name of Benjamin. The upper or high gate of Benjamin was in the Temple (Jer. 20:2). For the other gate of Benjamin, see JERUSALEM, II. 3.

3. A Benjamite, a son of Bilhan, family of Jediel (I Chron. 7:10).

4. A son of Harim, who had taken a foreign wife (Ezra 10:18, 31, 32).

Be'no (bē'nō) [his son]. A descendant of Merari through Jaaziah (I Chron. 24:26, 27), if Beno is a proper name, as it seems to be in v. 27.

Ben'-o'ni (bēn'ō'nī) [son of my sorrow]. The name given by Rachel to the son at whose birth she died. Jacob changed it to Benjamin (Gen. 35:18).

Ben'-zo'heth (bēn'zō'hēth) [son of Zoheth]. A descendant of Ishi, registered with the tribe of Judah (I Chron. 4:20).

Be'on (bē'ōn). See BAAL-MEON.

Be'or (bē'ōr) [a burning]. 1. Father of Bela, king of Edom (Gen. 36:32; I Chron. 1:43).

2. Father of Balaam (Num. 22:5). Called in A.V. of II Peter 2:15 Bosor.

Be'ra (bē'rā) [cf. Arab. bara'a, ascend, excel]. A king of Sodom, defeated by Chedor-laomer and his confederates (Gen. 14:2).

Be'r'acah (bē'rā-kā), in A.V. Be'r'achah (bē'rā-kā) [blessing]. 1. A Benjamite who joined David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:3).

2. A valley in Judah near Tekoa. Jehoshaphat gave it its name because he and his army there returned thanks to God for a great victory over the Ammonites, Moabites, and Edomites (II Chron. 20:26). The name still lingers as Bereikūt, a ruin about 4 miles n.w. of Tekoa, 6 miles s.w. of Bethlehem, and a little e. of the road from the latter village to Hebron.

Be'r'ach'iah (bē'rā-kī'ā). See BERECHIAH.

Be'r'a'iah (bē'rā-ī'ā) [Jehovah has created]. A son of Shimei (I Chron. 8:21, R.V.), descendant of Shaharaim who had his registry with Benjamin (vs. 8, 11-13).

Be're'a (bē'rē-ā). A town in Judea near which Judas Maccabaeus was slain, 161 B.C. (I Macc. 9:4); probably modern el-Bireh, about 10 miles n. of Jerusalem.

For Be-re'a, a city of Macedonia (Acts 17:10, A.V.), see BEROEA.

Be'r'ech'iah (bē'rē-kī'ā), in A.V. once Be'r'ach'iah (I Chron. 6:39) [Jehovah has blessed]. 1. A Levite, the father of Asaph, descended from Gershom (I Chron. 6:39; 15:17).

2. A Levite, one of the 4 doorkeepers for the Ark in David's reign (I Chron. 15:23, 24).

3. One of the chief men of Ephraim in the reign of Pekah. He took the part of the captives from Judah. He was a son of Meshillemoth (II Chron. 28:12).

4. A son of Zerubbabel (I Chron. 3:20).

5. A Levite, descended from Elkanah of Netophah (I Chron. 9:16).

6. A son of Meshezabel. His son repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:4, 30).

7. Father of the Prophet Zechariah (Zech. 1:1, 7).

Bē'rad (bē'rād) [hail]. 1. A place in the wilderness of Shur, to the w. of Kadesh, and not far from Beer-lahai-roi (Gen. 16:7, 14).

2. An Ephraimite, of the family of Shuthelah (I Chron. 7:20).

Bē'ri (bē'rī) [belonging to a well]. An Asherite, son of Zophah, family of Heber (I Chron. 7:36).

Bē'rī'ah (bē-rī'ā) [perhaps, prominent; cf. Arab. bara'a, excell.]. 1. A son of Asher, and founder of a family (Gen. 46:17; Num. 26:44).

2. A son of Ephraim (I Chron. 7:23), with a play upon bē'rā'ah (with or in evil).

3. A Benjamite, head of a father's house among the inhabitants of Aijalon (I Chron. 8:13).

4. A Levite, a son of Shimei, the Gershonite (I Chron. 23:10). His sons were united with the children of his brother Jeush into one father's house (v. 11).

Bē'rite (bē'rīt). Apparently a people living near Abel-beth-maacah (II Sam. 20:14), but the text may be corrupt.

Bē'rīth (bē'rīth). See BAAL-BERITH.

Bēr-nī'ce (bēr-nī'sē) [Macedonian Berenikē for Gr. Pherenikē, victorious]. The eldest daughter of Herod Agrippa I. She was married to her uncle, Herod, ruler of Chalcis, who soon afterward died. She was so much with her brother Agrippa that scandal arose in consequence. She tried to allay it by a marriage with Polemo, king of Cilicia. She soon became tired of him, and, deserting him, returned to her brother Agrippa (Jos. Antiq. xx. 7, 3; War ii. 11, 5). She was with him when Paul made his defense before him (Acts 25:23; 26:30). She afterward became the mistress, first of Vespasian and then of Titus.

Bē-ro'dach-bāl'a-dan (bē-rō'dāk-bāl'ā-dān). See REMOACH-BALADAN.

Bē-ro'e'a (bē-rē'ā), in A.V. Bē-re'a. 1. A city of Macedonia, about 50 miles w. of Thessalonica and 23 or 24 miles from the sea, where Paul preached on his 1st journey to Europe (Acts 17:10-14; 20:4). It is now called Verria.

2. Modern Aleppo, a Syrian city between Antioch and Hierapolis (Bambyce), where Menelaus, the former high priest, was put to death (II Macc. 13:4). The designation Berea was given by Seleucus Nicator.

3. See BEREÄ.

Bē-ro'thah (bē-rō'thā) or Bē-ro'thal (bē-rō'thi) [wells]. Berothah was a town situated between Hamath and Damascus (Ezek. 47:16). It is probably identical with Berotai, a city which was once subject to Hadad-ezer, king of Zobah, but was captured by David and yielded him large booty in brass (II Sam. 8:8; in I Chron. 18:8 called Cun [A.V. Chun]). Identified with 'Ain Berdai or Bereitān, s. of Ba'albek.

Bēr'yl. 1. The rendering of Heb. tarshish, a precious stone (S. of Sol. 5:14; Ezek. 1:16; 10:9; 28:13; Dan. 10:6). It was the 1st stone of the 4th row on the Jewish high priest's breastplate (Ex. 28:20; 39:13). In R.V. marg., S. of Sol. 5:14, tarshish is rendered topaz, and in Ex. 28:20, chalcodony. The LXX renders the word by chrysolite in Ex. 28:20; 39:13; Ezek. 28:13; and by anthrax (carbuncle) in Ezek. 10:9.

2. Greek beryllos (Rev. 21:20), the 8th foundation of the wall of the New Jerusalem. The beryl is a silicate of beryllium and aluminum. It occurs in hexagonal prisms, commonly green or bluish green, but also yellow, pink, or white with varieties in aquamarine and emerald.

Bē'sai (bē'sī). One of the Nethinim and founder of a family (Ezra 2:49; Neh. 7:52).

Bēs'o-de'iah (bēs'ō-dē'yā) [in intimacy with Jehovah]. Father of Meshullam, who helped to repair a gate of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:6).

Bē'sor (bē'sōr). A brook s. of Ziklag (I Sam. 30:9, 10, 21), perhaps the wadi Ghazzeah, which rises near Beer-sheba and empties into the Mediterranean s.w. of Gaza.

Bē'tah (bē'tā) [trust, confidence]. A city of Aram-zobah (II Sam. 8:8) called Tibhath in I Chron. 18:8. See TEBAH.

Bē'ten (bē'tēn) [belly, valley]. A village of Asher (Josh. 19:25). Eusebius identified it with a village Beth-beten, about 7½ miles e. of Acre.

Beth (bēth) [house]. The second letter of the Hebrew alphabet. Originally it was a rude representation of a dwelling, whence it derives its name. It became Greek bēta and Latin and English B. As a Hebrew numeral it signifies 2.

Beth'ab'arah (bēth'āb'ā-rā), R.V. marg.; in A.V. Beth'ab'ara (bēth'āb'ā-rā) [house of the ford]. A place beyond Jordan at which John baptized (John 1:28, A.V.). The oldest MSS. have Bethany, as now the R.V.; but Origen, not being able to find a place of this name, decided in favor of the reading Bethabara. If the correct reading be Bethabara, then the site is evidently at one of the numerous fords of the Jordan, of which one is now called 'Abārah, about 12 miles s. of the outlet of the Sea of Galilee, n.e. of Beth-shean. The traditional site of the baptism of Jesus is Maḥādet el-Hajlah, near Beth-hoglah.

Beth'a'nath (bēth'a'nāth) [house of the goddess Anath]. An ancient fenced town in Naphtali (Josh. 19:35, 38), from which the Canaanites were not expelled (Judg. 1:33). Modern el-Ba'neh, about 12 miles e. of Acre on the way to Šafed.

Beth'a'noth (bēth'a'nōth) [house of the goddess Anath]. A town in the mountains of Judah (Josh. 15:59); Beit 'Ainūn, 1½ miles s.e. of Halhul.

Beth'a'ny (bēth'ā-nī) [Aram., house of the poor or afflicted one, or house of poverty; it may also mean house (place) of unripe figs]. 1. A small town on the Mount of Olives (Mark 11:1; Luke 19:29), about 1½ miles from Jerusalem (John 11:18) on the road to Jericho. Our Lord often lodged there (Matt. 21:17; 26:6; Mark 11:1, 11, 12; 14:3). It was the town of Lazarus, of Martha, and of Mary (John 11:1; 12:1), as well as of Simon the leper, in whose house one of the anointings of Jesus took place (Matt. 26:6-13; Mark 14:3). From near the town Jesus ascended to heaven (Luke 24:50, 51). It has been generally identified as the village of el-'Azariyeh (Lazarus' village) on the e. slope of the Mount of Olives, s.e. of Jerusalem. Today it is a small, wretched village, but its fig, olive, and almond trees give one at first a pleasant impression.

2. A place e. of the Jordan, where John was baptizing when Jesus returned from the temptation (John 1:28, R.V.; cf. ch. 10:40). See BETHABARAH.

Beth'ar'abah (bēth'ār'ā-bā) [house of the Arabah]. A village in the wilderness of Judah, on the boundary between Judah and Benjamin (Josh. 15:6, 61; 18:22). Called simply Arabah in ch. 18:18; unless the reading of the LXX be correct, Beth-arabah instead of "the side over against the Arabah." It is situated near 'Ain el-Gharba in the wadi el Kelt.

Beth-'a-ram (bēth-'ā-rām). See BETH-HARAN.

Beth-'ar-bel (bēth-'ār-bēl) [house of Arbēl]. A town destroyed by Shalman (Hos. 10:14). It has been identified with Arbela of Galilee (Jos. Antiq. xii. 11, 1; xiv. 15, 4; cf. I Macc. 9:2), now Irbid, 4 miles w.n.w. of Tiberias. The caverns of this place were the abode of robbers, whom Herod the Great rooted out (Jos. War i. 16, 2-4). Eusebius identified it with another Irbid (Arbela) in Gilead, 12 miles s.e. of Gadara.

Beth-'a-ven (bēth-'ā-vēn) [house of nothingness or idolatry]. 1. A town in the territory of Benjamin, near Ai, e. of Beth-el (Josh. 7:2), w. of Michmash (I Sam. 13:5; cf. ch. 14:23), and on the border of a wilderness (Josh. 18:12).

2. Applied contemptuously by Hosea probably to Beth-el after it had become a seat of idolatry (Hos. 4:15; 5:8; 10:5).

Beth-'az-ma'veth (bēth-'āz-mā-vēth). See AZMAVETH 5.

Beth-'ba'al-me'on (bēth-bā'āl-mē'ōn). See BAAL-MEON.

Beth-'bar'ah (bēth-bār'ā). A place on the Jordan, by some supposed to be the same as Bethabarrah; probably s. of Beth-shean facing the wadi Fār'a (Judg. 7:24).

Beth-'ba'si (bēth-bā'si). A place in the wilderness (I Macc. 9:62), probably the wilderness of Tekoa (v. 33). Josephus calls it Bethalaga (Jos. Antiq. xiii. 1, 5); it is the modern Khirbet Beit Basşa, e.s.e. of Beth-lehem.

Beth-'bir'i (bēth-bīr'i), in A.V. Beth-'bir'e'i (bēth-bīr'ē-i). A Simeonite town (I Chron. 4:31). The name may be a corruption of Beth-lebaoth (cf. Josh. 19:6).

Beth-'car' (bēth-kār') [house of a lamb]. A place, probably a height, to which the Philistines were pursued by the Israelites after the 2d and decisive battle of Ebenezer (I Sam. 7:11). 'Ain Kārim, 4½ miles w. of Jerusalem, is a possible site. See BETH-HACCHEREM.

Beth-'da'gon (bēth-dā'gōn) [house of Dagon]. 1. A village in the lowland of Judah (Josh. 15:33, 41). It has been identified with Khirbet Dajūn, but there may have been more than one Beth-dagon on the borders of Philistia.

2. A town of Asher, on the frontier toward Zebulun (Josh. 19:27). Probably Jelamet el-'Aṭīka, at the foot of Carmel.

Beth-'dib-la-tha'im (bēth-dīb-lā-thā'im) [house of fig cakes]. A town on the tableland of Moab, territory once in possession of Israel (Jer. 48:21, 22; Moabite Stone, 30). Probably the same as Almon-diblathaim, which has been identified with the double ruin Deilelet el-Gharbiyeh, 2½ miles n.e. of Khirbet Libb.

Beth-'e-den (bēth-'ē-dēn). See EDEN 2.

Beth-el (bēth-'ēl) [house of God]. 1. A town of Palestine, w. of Ai, s. of Shiloh (Gen. 12:8; Judg. 21:19), and near Michmash (I Sam. 13:2). Abraham on his 1st journey into Palestine, and subsequently, pitched his tent near it (Gen. 13:3). The town was called Luz by the Canaanites; but Jacob called the place close by, where he passed the night sleeping on the ground, Beth-el, on account of the vision which he saw there, and he erected a pillar to mark the spot (Gen. 28:18, 19; 31:13). The two are distinguished (Josh. 16:2); but the name Beth-el soon supplanted Luz as designation of the town. On the return of Jacob from Paddan-aram he went to Beth-el, built an altar, and reaffirmed the name (Gen. 35:1-15). The people of the town helped those of Ai in the 2d battle with Joshua (Josh. 8:9-17). Later it was taken and its king slain (Josh. 12:9, 16). It was assigned to Benjamin, and stood on the boundary line between that tribe and Ephraim (Josh. 16:1, 2; 18:11, 13, 21, 22). It was entered and its Canaanite inhabitants were slain by the men of Ephraim when they were engaged in securing their recently acquired territory (Judg. 1:22-26). Its villages on the n. of the boundary line belonged to Ephraim, and so perhaps did the town, as a result of this extermination of the Canaanites within its walls (I Chron. 7:20, 28). When the Israelites were gathered at Mizpah near Gibeah to war against Benjamin, the Ark was brought from Shiloh, 18 miles distant, to Beth-el, 8 miles off (Judg. 20:1, 26, 27). Thither the men of Israel repaired to ask counsel of God, and there they built a temporary altar and offered sacrifices (Judg. 20:18, 26, R.V.). At the end of the war they came again to Beth-el, sat there before the Lord, built a new altar or repaired the old one, and offered sacrifices (Judg. 21:2-4, R.V.). When the regular services of the sanctuary at Shiloh were suspended during the loss and seclusion of the Ark, Beth-el was one of the places where Samuel judged Israel, and whither men went for their offerings to God (I Sam. 7:16; 10:3). Jeroboam fixed one of his calves there (I Kings 12:29-33), and Beth-el became a great center of idolatry (I Kings 13:1-32; II Kings 10:29). It was taken and temporarily held by Abijah (II Chron. 13:19). Elijah passed through it (II Kings 2:1-3), and it was from Beth-el that the youths came who mocked Elisha (II Kings 2:23, 24). The prophets denounced it for its idolatries (Jer. 48:13; Hos. 10:15; Amos 3:14; 4:4; 5:5, 6), and called it Beth-aven, house of nought (Hos. 4:15; 5:8; 10:5). Amos was in danger in Beth-el for his bold preaching (Amos 7:10-13). Josiah broke down its altars and its high places, and, as foretold, burned the bones of the priests taken from its sepulchers (I Kings 13:1-3; II Kings 23:4, 15-20). Some of its inhabitants returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:28; Neh. 7:32), and the place again reverted to the Benjamites (Neh. 11:31). In Maccabean times it was fortified by the Syrian Bacchides (I Macc. 9:50). In the Jewish war it was captured by Vespasian, later Roman emperor (Jos. War iv. 9, 9). The ruins, called Beitin, lie on the watershed of Palestine, about 11 miles n. from Jerusalem. They are on the summit of a hill sloping to the s.e., and cover 3 or 4 acres. A range of hills trends to the s.e. (cf. I Sam. 13:2). The country around is of gray stone or white chalk, with scant vegetable mold.

2. A town in the territory of Simeon (I Sam. 30:27). See BETHUEL 2.

Beth-'e-mek (bēth-'ē-mēk) [house of the valley]. A town within the territory of Asher (Josh. 19:27). Probably Tell Mimās, near the village of 'Amkā, 6½ miles n.e. of Acre.

Be'ther (bē'thēr) [separation, division]. Probably a common noun, describing certain mountains as cleft and rugged (S. of Sol. 2:17; cf. chs. 4:6; 8:14); the LXX renders it, "Mountains of hollows or ravines." Not the town in Judah called Baithēr (Josh. 15:59, Codex Alexandrinus), now Bittir, 6 miles s.w. of Jerusalem, where on the height above the village the Jews under Bar-cocheba made their last stand against the Romans, 135 B.C.

Bethes'da (bê-thêz'dá) [Gr., from Aram. bêth hesda, house of grace, loving-kindness]. Earlier MSS. of the N.T. have other spellings, as Bêthsaida (house of fishing) and Bêth-zatha (house of the olive).

A pool at Jerusalem, which was near the sheep gate and had 5 porches, that were sufficiently ample to accommodate a great multitude (John 5:2, 3). Its waters were supposed to possess healing virtue. The 4th verse of the A.V., which mentions a periodic troubling of the waters wrought by an angel, is omitted in R.V. as being insufficiently supported by early texts. E. Robinson and Conder prefer to identify the pool with the Virgin's Fount (Gihon) at the foot of the Ophel slope, s.e. of the Temple; this spring is intermittent and is still credited with healing virtue. Tradition, however, located Bethesda at the Birket Israel, n. of the Temple, or at an adjacent pool. The tradition was well founded, even if it ultimately went astray. 1. In A.D. 333 the Bordeaux pilgrim stated that there were 2 pools and 5 porches. 2. Early MSS., e.g., the Sinaitic, have Bethzatha, abbreviated Bezatha, instead of Bethesda. These words suggest variations of Bezetha, the name of the quarter of the city n. of the Temple hill, and imply that the pool was in the Bezethan section of the city. 3. The pool was near the sheep gate, and the natural explanation of Neh., ch. 3, determines the location of this gate to have been n. of the Temple area. 4. In 1888 excavation in the n.e. part of Jerusalem, in connection with the repair of the church of Saint Anne, laid bare 100 feet n.w. of that building a pool with 5 porches. A faded fresco on the wall depicts an angel and water, and shows that in the early Christian ages this pool was regarded as Bethesda.

Beth'-e'zel (bêth'ê'zêl) [place near]. A town of s. Judah (Micah 1:11), identified with Deir el-'Asal, about 2 miles e. of Tell Beit Mirsim.

Beth'-ga'der (bêth'gâ'dêr) [house or place of a wall]. A town of Judah (I Chron. 2:51). See GEDER.

Beth'-ga'mul (bêth'gâ'mûl) [house of recompense]. A Moabite town (Jer. 48:23). Khirbet Jemeil, 6 miles e. of Dibon, between the Arnon and Umm er-Rasâs.

Beth'-gil'gal (bêth'gîl'gâl). See GILGAL 1.

Beth'-hae-che'rem (bêth'hâ-kê'rêm), in A.V. Beth'-hae'-cer'em (bêth'hâk'sê-rêm) [house of the vineyard]. A town of Judah (Neh. 3:14; Jer. 6:1), probably 'Ain Kârim, 4½ miles w. of Jerusalem. On top of Jebel 'Alî above this village are cairns which once may have served as beacons.

Beth'-ha-rân (bêth'hâ'rân) and Beth'-ha'ram (bêth'hâ'râm), in A.V. Beth'-a'ram. A town in the Jordan Valley, rebuilt by the children of Gad (Num. 32:36; Josh. 13:27). It is identified with Tell er-Râmeh at the mouth of Wadi Hesbân, 2½ miles w. of el-Hammam, the source of the celebrated warm springs, and 6 miles e. of the Jordan; also known as Beth-aramphtha, where Herod had a palace (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 2, 1; War ii. 4, 2; 9, 1); the place was called Livias by Herod Antipas in honor of the wife of Augustus.

Beth'-hog'lah (bêth'hôg'lâ), in A.V. Beth'-hog'la (bêth'hôg'lâ) [house of the part-ridge]. A village of Benjamin on the boundary line between that tribe and Judah, and near the River Jordan (Josh. 15:6; 18:19, 21). The name and site are found at 'Ain Hâjlah, 4 miles s.e. of Jericho.

Beth'-ho'ron (bêth'hô'rôn) [house or place of the hollow]. Upper and Lower Beth-horon, twin towns of Ephraim, with a difference of almost 800 feet in altitude, on the boundary between Ephraim and Benjamin, built by a woman of Ephraim called Sherah (Josh. 16:3, 5; 18:13; I Chron. 7:24). One of them was assigned as residence to the Levites of the family of Kohath (Josh. 21:22; I Chron. 6:68). The towns lay in a mountain pass on the highway between Jerusalem and the plain; the upper town is about 11 miles n.w. of the capital, while the lower one lies 1¼ miles farther n.w. They controlled the pass, and were fortified by Solomon (II Chron. 8:5); but especially did the upper town engage military attention, for it occupied the more strategic position (I Kings 9:17; I Macc. 9:50). The Amorites fled down this pass before Joshua (Josh. 10:10 seq.). The Philistines ascended it to make war with Saul (I Sam. 13:18). Judas Maccabaeus fought two battles here (I Macc. 3:15 seq.; 7:39 seq.), and the army of Cestius Gallus, governor of Syria, was almost annihilated here by the Jews (Jos. War ii. 19, 8). The towns still exist under the names Beit 'Ur et-Tahta and el-Fôka.

Beth'-jesh'i-moth (bêth'jêsh'i-môth), in A.V. once Beth'-jes'i-moth (bêth'jês'i-môth) [house of the wastes]. A town e. of the Jordan, near Pisgah and the Dead Sea (Josh. 12:3; 13:20). When the Israelites encamped at Shittim, it formed the s. limit of the camp (Num. 33:49). It was 9¼ miles s.e. of Jericho and is probably to be identified with Suweimeh near the n.e. end of the Dead Sea. It was assigned to the Reubenites, but in the time of Ezekiel was in the hands of the Moabites (Josh. 13:20; Ezek. 25:9).

Beth'-le-aph'rah (bêth'lê-âph'râ). See APH-RAH.

Beth'-le-ba'oth (bêth'lê-bâ'ôth) [house of lionesses]. A town in the s. of Judah, assigned to the Simeonites (Josh. 15:32; 19:6); see BETH-BIRI. Probably at the ruins between Wadi Shenek and Wadi Imleih, in the region dominated by Tell el-Fâr'ah, Biblical Sharuh-en.

Beth'-le-hem (bêth'lê-hêm) [house of bread; or perhaps, rather, house of the god Lahmu or of the goddess Lahamu]. 1. A town in the hill country of Judah, originally called Ephrath; hence, to distinguish it from a place of the same name in Zebulun, called also Beth-lehem-judah and Beth-lehem Ephrathah (Gen. 35:19; Judg. 17:7; Micah 5:2). Bethlehem is not mentioned among the cities assigned to Judah (Josh., ch. 15; but given in v. 59, LXX). As a village it existed as early as the time of Jacob. Rachel died and was buried in its vicinity (Gen. 35:16, 19; 48:7). Its citizens were hospitable to the Levites (Judg. 17:7; 19:1). A branch of Caleb's family settled in the town and attained to great influence (I Chron. 2:51, 54; cf. Ruth 4:20). It was the residence of Boaz, of Ruth (Ruth 1:19; 4:9-11), doubtless of Obed (Ruth 4:21, 22), and of Jesse, the father of David (Ruth 4:11, 17; I Sam. 16:1, 4). As the birthplace and ancestral home of David, it was the city of David (Luke 2:11). It was a walled town as early as the time of David. It fell temporarily into the hands of the Philistines (II Sam. 23:14, 15). Rehoboam strengthened its fortifications (II Chron. 11:6). Bethlehemiters returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:21; Neh. 7:26). It was looked to as the place where the Messiah should be born (Micah 5:2; Matt. 2:5), and accordingly when the fullness of time was come Jesus became incarnate at Bethlehem. In its vicinity the annunciation to the shepherds took place (Luke 2:1-20). Thither the Magi went to salute the newborn Babe, and it was the infants of Bethlehem "and in all the borders thereof, from two years old and under," who were murdered by Herod to make sure that among them he had cut off the future king (Matt. 2:1-18). There has never been any doubt as to its site. It is 5 miles s. of Jerusalem, at the modern village of Beit Lahm, on the e. and n.e. slope of a long ridge, which to the w. is higher than the village. A little e. of the town is the church built by Helena, the mother of Constantine, over the cave said to be the stable in which the Nativity took place. Half a mile to the n. of the town is the traditional tomb of Rachel. On the s. side of the town is a valley running to the Dead Sea, while almost at the walls on the e. a valley begins which joins the wadi es-Sur or vale of Sorek, and near by is also an upper branch of the wadi es-Sunt or vale of Elah (cf. I Sam. 17:2).

2. A town with dependent villages within the territory of Zebulun (Josh. 19:15). Probably this Bethlehem was the home of the judge Ibzan (Judg. 12:8-11). It is the modern Beit Lahm, a small village 7 miles n.w. of Nazareth.

Beth'-ma'a'-cah (bēth'mā'ā-kā), in A.V. Beth'-ma'a'-chah (bēth'mā'ā-kā) [house of Maacah]. A town (II Sam. 20:14, 15). See ABEL-BETH-MAACAH.

Beth'-mar'en'-both (bēth'mār'ēn'-bōth) [house of the chariots]. A town of the Simeonites (Josh. 19:5; I Chron. 4:31). Probably Madmannah (Josh. 15:31), modern Umm Deimneh, 1½ miles n.e. of Beer-sheba.

Beth'-me'on (bēth'mē'ōn). See BAAL-MEON.

Beth'-mer'hak (bēth'mēr'hāk) [house of removal]. Probably only a house beside the Brook Kidron, between Jerusalem and the Mount of Olives (II Sam. 15:17, R.V.). R.V. margin renders it the Far House; A.V., a place that was far off.

Beth'-nim'rah (bēth'nim'rá) [house of limpid fresh water, or house of leopardess]. A town in the valley e. of the Jordan, assigned to Gad and rebuilt by that tribe (Num. 32:36; Josh. 13:27). Eusebius and Jerome locate it 4½ miles to the n. of Livia, near Tell er-Rameh. The Bronze Age sites were at Tell Bileibil and Tell el-Mustah at the end of the gorge of the wadi Sha'ib; the later site was at Tell Nimrin, to the w. at the edge of the plain.

Beth'-pa'let (bēth'pā'lēt). See BETH-PELET.

Beth'-paz'zez (bēth'pāz'ēz) [house of dispersion]. A town within the territory of Issachar (Josh. 19:21), modern Kerm el-Hadeth.

Beth'-pe'let (bēth'pē'lēt); in A.V. Beth'-phe'let and Beth'-pa'let [house of escape]. A town in the most southerly part of Judah (Josh. 15:27; Neh. 11:26), probably el-Meshash.

Beth'-pe'or (bēth'pē'ōr) [house of Peor]. A town near Pisgah. In the valley opposite to it the Israelites had their main encampment, elsewhere referred to as in the mountains of Abarim, when their army was warring with Sihon and Og (cf. Deut. 3:29; 4:46 with Num. 21:20; 23:28; 33:47-49). In this valley Moses was afterward buried (Deut. 34:6). The town was assigned to the Reubenites (Josh. 13:20). According to Eusebius, it lay almost 6 miles above, that is, in the mountains e. of, Livia (near Tell er-Rameh); Khirbet esh-Sheikh Jāyel best corresponds to this description.

Beth'pha'ge (bēth'fā-jē) [Aram., house of unripe figs]. A village near Bethany, on or near the road from Jericho to Jerusalem (Mark 11:1; Luke 19:29). It probably stood between Bethany and Jerusalem, not far from the descent of the Mount of Olives (Matt. 21:1; John 12:1, 12), and near the old road that crosses the mountain at the summit.

Beth'-phe'let (bēth'fē'lēt). See BETH-PELET.

Beth'-ra'pha (bēth'rā'fā) [perhaps, house of Rapha, or of a giant]. A family of Judah, or a town whose inhabitants belonged to that tribe (I Chron. 4:12).

Beth'-re'hob (bēth'rē'hōb) [house of a street]. A town in the n. of Palestine, by the valley of the upper Jordan (Num. 13:21, where it is called simply Rehob; Judg. 18:28). It was inhabited by Aramaeans (Syrians), who joined the Ammonites in a great war with David (II Sam. 10:6). It gave its name to the hollow valley in which Laish (Dan) was located and may be the original settlement of Bāniyās.

Beth'sa'ī-da (bēth'sā'ī-dā) [Gr. from Aram. bēth saydā, house or place of fishing]. A town on the Lake of Gennesaret, near the Jordan, rebuilt by Philip the tetrarch, and named Julius in honor of the daughter of the emperor Augustus (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 2, 1; Life 72). To this town, which was on the other side of the sea (actually at the n. end), Jesus withdrew on receiving news of the murder of John the Baptist (Luke 9:10; cf. Matt. 14:13; John 6:1). Going forth to a desert grassy place, apparently about 2 miles down the e. side of the lake, he was followed by the multitude. In the evening he miraculously fed them. The disciples then entered into a boat to precede him "unto the other side to [or toward] Bethsaida" (Mark 6:45). During the evening and night, the disciples were in the midst of the sea distressed in rowing, for the wind was contrary unto them. Jesus came walking on the water, and was taken into the boat. When they had crossed over they came to the land unto Gennesaret (Mark 6:53). Do these statements, taken in connection with John's mention of "Bethsaida of Galilee" (John 12:21), imply another Bethsaida? Some scholars think so, and locate it, among other places, at 'Ain et-Tābighah, about 3 miles s.w. of the mouth of the Jordan. But the existence of 2 towns of the same name on the same lake, and at most only a few miles apart, is so improbable that the words of the Evangelists must be carefully considered to see whether they require this assumption; and: 1. The ultimate destination of the disciples was Capernaum (John 6:17); but it was determined that they should sail "toward Bethsaida," keeping nearer the shore than the direct course to Capernaum would require (Thomson). 2. Even if their purpose was to make a stop at Bethsaida, it was proper to speak of going "to the other side to Bethsaida," for Josephus uses a similar expression for proceeding by boat from Tiberias 3¼ miles to Taricheae, both of which were on the w. shore of the lake. He "sailed over to Taricheae" (Jos. Life 59). 3. Peter, Andrew, and Philip were Galileans and of Bethsaida (John 1:44; 12:21). Thomson suggests that any city built at the mouth of the narrow Jordan, as Bethsaida-Julias admittedly was, would almost necessarily have part of its houses or a suburb on the w. bank of the river, which would be in Galilee. He also suggests that probably the whole city on both banks of the river was ordinarily attached to Galilee. G. A. Smith affirms that "the province of Galilee ran right round the lake." His opinion is based on Josephus' mention of a certain Judas, who belonged to Gamala in Gaulanitis, as a Galilaean (Jos. War ii. 8, 1; Antiq. xviii. 1).

Beth'-she'an (bēth'shē'ān), Beth'-shan' (bēth'shān') [house of quiet; but rather of the Babylonian god Shahan (Phoenician Sha'an), the Sumerian serpent-god]. Tell el Huṣn near modern Beisān in the throat of the valley of Jezreel, situated on the s. side of the Nahr Jālūd that flows from the great spring near Jezreel and at the point where the valley drops down 300 feet to the level of the Jordan. The town was founded in the chalcolithic period, i.e., before 3000 B.C. After the Battle of Megiddo (c. 1482 B.C.) it fell into the hands of the Egyptians, who garrisoned it for almost 300 years. It commanded the important route running e. from the Plain of Esdraelon into Trans-Jordan. At Beisan were found two steles of Sethi I and one of Ramesses II. From the one dated in the 1st year of Seti (1318 B.C.) it is inferred that he made a campaign to strengthen Egyptian prestige and to restore order on account of the Hittite pressure from the n.

The inhabitants of town and valley made themselves formidable by the use of chariots of iron (Josh. 17:16). Beth-shean with its dependent villages fell within the area of Issachar, but was given to the Manassites (Josh. 17:11; I Chron. 7:29). They failed, however, to drive out the Canaanites, but were strong enough to make them pay tribute (Josh. 17:12-16; Judg. 1:27, 28). At the Battle of Gilboa the town apparently sided with the Philistines, for after the defeat of Israel, the Philistines fastened the bodies of Saul and his sons to the wall of Beth-shean (I Sam. 31:10-13; II Sam. 21:12-14). In the reign of Solomon the city gave its name to a district (I Kings 4:12). It was called Scythopolis as early as the time of Judas Maccabaeus. In several instances this name is written Skythôn polis, city of the Scythians (Judg. 1:27, LXX; Judith 3:10; II Macc. 12:29); and it has been supposed that a remnant of the Scythian hordes settled here, who are said to have advanced through Palestine against Egypt in the latter half of the 7th century B.C. (Herod. i. 103, 105; Pliny Hist. Nat. v. 16). It is very doubtful whether any historical conclusions can be deduced from this name.

In the 1st century A.D. the population of the city was predominantly Gentile (II Macc. 12:30; Jos. War ii. 18, 1, 3, 4; Life 6), and the Jews consequently sacked it during the war with the Romans. The citizens retaliated by massacring the Jewish residents. Josephus says that it was the largest of the 10 cities called Decapolis, apparently disregarding Damascus, possibly because the city on the Abana was not at this moment a member of the league (Jos. War iii. 9, 7). It was the only one of the 10 cities that lay w. of the Jordan. It figured in history as late as the crusades.

Beth'she'mesh (bēth'shē'mēsh) [house of the sun]. 1. A town in the vale of Sorek (Wadi es-Sārār), identified with Tell er-Rumeileh, near the Byzantine ruins of 'Ain Shems, on the main road from Ashkelon and Ashdod to Jerusalem, from which it is about 23¼ miles distant. The name indicates a seat of the worship of the sun. The ceramic finds in the funerary caverns under the rampart belong to all periods of the Bronze Age since the chalcolithic period. It was overthrown by the Hyksos about 1800 B.C., but enjoyed great prosperity in the 15th century, as is shown by the walls and the s. gate. The town was conquered by the Egyptians in the 15th century and flourished until the arrival of the Philistines, who seized and occupied it. From that time on it had a dull existence until its destruction by Nebuchadnezzar in 587 B.C.

It was allotted to Judah, and stood on the boundary line of Judah and Dan (Josh. 15:10; 19:41, where the synonymous name Irshemesh is used; cf. Mount Heres [Judg. 1:35], which is probably the same place). The Danites did not occupy it; and when provision was made for the tribe of Levi, it was given to the priests, the sons of Aaron, and reckoned as set apart from the tribe of Judah (Josh.

21:16, cf. v. 9; I Chron. 6:59). After the formation of the kingdom it was within Judah (II Kings 14:11). The people of Beth-shemesh, whither the kine brought the Ark from Ekron, were largely of priestly family, and offered sacrifice; but profanely looking into the Ark, they were smitten by a plague which carried off 70 persons (Jos. Antiq. vi. 1, 4). After the words "seventy men" there is the strange insertion in the Hebrew text, rendered suspicious by the absence of the conjunction, of the further words "fifty thousand men" (I Sam. 6:19, R.V.). At Beth-shemesh Joash, king of Israel, defeated Amaziah of Judah (II Kings 14:11; II Chron. 25:21). The Philistines took the town in the reign of Ahaz (II Chron. 28:18) during the Syro-Ephraimitic war.

2. A Canaanite city in Naphtali (Josh. 19:38; Judg. 1:33). It may be Hāris, s.w. of Tibnin, but if it is identical with the following (3), it must be sought on the borders of Issachar toward the Jordan.

3. A city in Issachar (Josh. 19:22) which by some was identified with 'Ain esh-Shemsieh. Modern scholars prefer Khirbet Shemsin or el-'Abdiyeh, on the Jordan a short distance s. of the Sea of Galilee.

4. An Egyptian city where the sun was worshiped (Jer. 43:13); probably Heliopolis, i.e., On.

Beth'she'mite (bēth'shē'mīt). A native of Beth-shemesh (I Sam. 6:14, 18).

Beth'shit'tah (bēth'shit'tā) [house of the acacia]. A town between the valley of Jezreel and Zererah in the Jordan Valley (Judg. 7:22, R.V.). The fact that it is coupled with Zererah, and not with Beth-shean, excludes its identification with Shutta.

Beth'sur'a (bēth'sūrā). See BETH-ZUR.

Beth'tāp'pu'ah (bēth'tāp'pū-ā) [house of aples]. A town in the hill country of Judah (Josh. 15:53), the modern village of Taftūh, about 5 miles w. of Hebron (cf. I Chron. 2:43).

Beth'ul (bē-thū'ēl) [perhaps, abode of God]. 1. Son of Nahor by his wife Milcah. He was the father of Laban and Rebekah, and nephew of Abraham (Gen. 22:20, 22, 23; 24:15, 29; 25:20; 28:2, 5).

2. A town of the Simeonites (I Chron. 4:30; in Josh. 19:4, Bethul). David sent thither part of the recaptured spoil of Ziklag (I Sam. 30:27). In this latter passage it is called Beth-el; it seems to be the Chesil of Josh. 15:30. Probably Khirbet er-Rās, between Beer-sheba and Khuweilfeh.

Beth'ul (bēth'ūl). See BETHUEL 2.

Beth'zach·ar'ias (bēth'zāch-ā-rī'ās) [house of Zechariah]. A town (I Macc. 6:32, 33, according to Josephus (Jos. Antiq. xii. 9, 4), 70 stades from Bethsura. It is identified with modern Beit Zakāriya, about 9 miles s. of Jerusalem and 6¼ n. of Beth-zur.

Beth'za'tha (bēth-zā'thā) [Aram. house or place of the olive tree]. R.V. marg. John 5:2 for Bethesda.

Beth'-zur' (bēth'zūr'), in Maccabees Beth'sur'a [house of a rock]. A town in the hill country of Judah (Josh. 15:58). It was fortified by Rehoboam (II Chron. 11:7). In Nehemiah's time half its district was subject to Azbuk (Neh. 3:16). In the Greek period the name was written Bethsura, and it was important as a frontier town toward Idumaea. Here Judas Maccabaeus gained a great victory over the Syrian general Lysias (I Macc. 4:29; II Macc. 11:5; 13:19, 22). The patriot leader afterward fortified it (I Macc. 4:61; 6:7, 26, 31). Want of food compelled the garrison to surrender it to the Syrians (I Macc. 6:49, 50). Its defenses were strengthened by Bacchides (ch. 9:52), but it was recaptured by Simon (chs. 11:65, 66; 14:7) and refortified (ch. 14:33). The name lingers in the ruins Beit Šūr, 4 miles n. of Hebron, but the ancient site was at Khirbet et-Ṭabeika.

Be'to'nim (bē'tō-nīm) [pistachio nuts]. A town of Gad (Josh. 13:26), probably Khirbet Baṭneh or Baṭana, 3 miles s.w. of es-Salt.

Be'u'lah (bū'lā) [married]. A name prophetically applied to the once forsaken land of Palestine when it was restored to God's favor and repopled after the Captivity (Isa. 62:4).

Be'za'a-nan'nim (bē-zā-ā-nān'im). This name occurs in Josh. 19:33, R.V. marg. The question is whether Heb. beth (b) is the preposition "in" ("in Zaanannim") or the first letter is a proper name "Bezaanannim." Many scholars accept the latter view. J.V., considering the oak (or, terebinth) as a part of the proper name, renders: "from Elon-bezaanannim." See ALLON, ZAAANANNIM.

Be'za'el (bē-zā-ēl). Founder of a family, some of whom returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:17; Neh. 7:23). A representative of the family signed the covenant of fidelity to Jehovah (Neh. 10:18).

Be'za'lel (bē-zā-ēlēl), in A.V. Be'zal'e-el (bē-zāl'ē-ēl) [in the shadow (protection) of God]. 1. A man of Judah, family of Hezron, house of Caleb, and a grandson of Hur (I Chron. 2:20); a skillful artificer raised up of God and appointed to work in gold, silver, copper, in the setting of precious stones, and the carving of wood; the chief architect of the tabernacle (Ex. 31:1-11; 35:30-35).

2. A son of Pahath-moab, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:30).

Be'zek (bē'zēk) [scattering, sowing]. A town in central Palestine, not a great distance from Jabesh-gilead (I Sam. 11:8-11). Twin villages of this name existed in Eusebius' time about 16 miles from Shechem toward Beth-shean; identified with Khirbet Izbik, 13 miles n.e. of Shechem. With this town may be identified Bezek mentioned in Judg. 1:4, 5, on the assumption that Adoni-bezek advanced s. with his forces to unite with the s. Canaanites, was met and repulsed by Judah and Simeon, and pursued to his capital; Ganeau proposes Khirbet Bezka, about 3 miles n.e. of Gezer, as the site of the latter Bezek.

Be'zer (bē'zēr) [fortress]. 1. An Asherite, son of Zophah (I Chron. 7:37).

2. A city within the territory of Reuben. It was given to the Levites, and was a city of refuge (Deut. 4:43; Josh. 20:8; 21:36). Later it was held by Moab, whose king, Mesha, fortified it (Moabite Stone, 27, see MOABITE STONE); probably Umm el-'Amad, about 5½ miles e. of Heshbon and 8¾ miles n.e. of Mādaba.

Be'zeth (bē'zēth) [Gr. Bēthzaith, Bēzeth, Baithzēth, from Heb., house of the olive]. A place where Bacchides pitched his camp (I Macc. 7:19); modern Beit Zeita, about 3 miles n. of Beit Šūr, near Khirbet Kūfin.

Bi'b'le [Old French from Lat. biblia from Gr. biblia, pl. of biblion, diminutive of biblos (book), from byblos (papyrus) after the Phoenician city Byblos (Jubayl), whence papyrus was exported]. The names used in the O.T. and the Apocrypha for the Scriptures are: "the books" (LXX bibloi, Dan. 9:2), "the holy biblia" (books, I Macc. 12:9), "the biblia of the law" (I Macc. 1:56; sing., biblion, in ch. 3:48), "biblion of the covenant" (I Macc. 1:57). In the Prologue to Ecclesiasticus, the translator of the book from Hebrew into Greek, the author's grandson, refers to "the law, the prophets, and the other biblia

Etymologically viewed, the Bible means "the Books," and that no qualifying adjective stands before the noun implies that these writings were regarded by those who used the term as forming a class by themselves and as superior to all other literary productions. They are uniquely and pre-eminently the books. The term Bible is absent from the sacred page; it is of ecclesiastical origin. The plural term Biblia marks the important fact that the Bible is not a single book, but a great many. The words Bible and Scripture, on the other hand, being both in the singular number, emphasize the fact that, under the diversity of human authorship, there lies a wonderful unity, pointing to the operation of one directing Mind, which acted during more than a thousand consecutive years when these writings were being produced.

The claims to divine authority made by Scripture are investigated by the science of apologetics. The word is used in a Greek rather than in an English sense, and must, therefore, not be misunderstood. It is related that when George III was told that Bishop Watson had published an Apology for the Bible, he dryly remarked that he did not know before that the Bible required an apology. The bishop used the word "Apology" like the Greek apologia, to mean defense; and the science of apologetics defends the Bible. A second science is that of Biblical criticism. This is divided into higher criticism, which inquires into the origin and character of the several books, and seeks to determine by whom, under what circumstances, and with what design they were written; and lower, or textual, criticism, which seeks, by the aid of the ancient manuscripts and versions, to bring the text of these books to the highest practicable level of accuracy. See APOCRYPHA, CANON. The science of hermeneutics investigates the principles of interpretation, while exegesis applies them. The contents of the Bible are then methodically arranged. It will be found when this is done that they touch language and philology, geography, history, science, philosophy, ethics—in fact, nearly every department of human thought. Further, Biblical theology investigates the doctrines of the Bible in their historical development, and dogmatic or systematic theology seeks to arrange the doctrines into the system which is contained in Scripture, show their relation to each other and to other truths, and to state them with precision.

The Bible embraces the Old and the New Testaments or covenants. The O.T. was written in Hebrew, except a few passages in Aramaic, and the N.T. in Greek. For the several books of the O.T. and N.T., see the articles which bear their names; and for the versions of the Scripture into other tongues, see SAMARITAN PENTATEUCH and VERSIONS.

The sacred books originally had no chapters. Formerly these divisions were ascribed to Hugues de St. Cher (Hugo a S. Caro), who died 1263, but the credit with more probabity goes to Stephen Langton, archbishop of Canterbury, who died 1228. The Jewish Masoretes, however, divided the O.T. into verses. The division of the N.T. into its present verses is due to Robert Stephens, who introduced them into the Greek and Latin N.T. which he published at Geneva in 1551; and they were adopted in the English version of the N.T. printed at Geneva in 1557. The whole Bible first appeared with its present chapters and verses in Stephens' edition of the Vulgate in 1555. The first English Bible to be thus divided was the Genevan edition of 1560 (see NEW TESTAMENT). The verses are indispensable for the purpose of reference, but they often tend to break the sense of the text. R.V. accordingly prints the text in paragraphs, but retains the chapter and verse numbers.

The Bible has already been translated, in its entirety or in part, into more than 1,000 languages or dialects.

Bieh'ri (bîk'ri) [first-born]. Father of the rebel Sheba (II Sam. 20:1).

Bid'kar (bîd'kâr) [probably Baal+Deker, q.v.]. A captain under Jehu (II Kings 9:25).

Big'tha (big'thâ) [Old Pers. baga+dh, gift of God or giving good luck]. A chamberlain who ministered in the presence of Xerxes (Esth. 1:10).

Big'than (big'thân) or Big'tha'na (big'thânâ) [Old Pers.; see BIGHA]. A chamberlain, keeper of the palace door, who conspired against King Xerxes (Esth. 2:21; 6:2).

Big'vai (big'vâ-i) [Old Pers., fortunate, happy, from baga, good luck; cf. Bagoi (I Esdras 5:14) and Bago (ch. 8:40)]. 1. One of the leaders of the exiles who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:2).

2. Founder of a family, of which some 2,000 returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:14; Neh. 7:19), and several score afterward with Ezra (Ezra 8:14).

Bil'dad (bîl'dād) [probably, Bel has loved]. A Shuhite, one of Job's friends (Job 2:11), who made three speeches to the patriarch (chs. 8; 18; 25).

Bil'e-am (bîl'ê-ām) [perhaps, greed, destruction]. A town of Manasseh, w. of the Jordan, assigned to the Levites of the family of Kohath (I Chron. 6:70); modern Bel'ameh, ½ mile s. of Jenin, some 13 miles n.e. of Samaria. See IBLEAM. In its stead there appears in the present Hebrew text of Josh. 21:25 Gath-rimmon, which probably is a scribal error from the preceding verse. The LXX favors this view.

Bil'gah (bîl'gâ) [brightness, cheerfulness]. 1. A descendant of Aaron. His family had grown to a father's house in the time of David, and was made the 15th course of the priests (I Chron. 24:1, 6, 14).

2. A chief of the priests, perhaps representing the priestly course of this name, who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:5, 7). In the next generation a father's house among the priests bore this name (v. 18); see BILGAL.

Bil'ga-i (bîl'gâ-i) [brightness, cheerfulness]. One of the priests who, doubtless in behalf of a father's house, sealed the covenant in the days of Nehemiah (Neh. 10:8); see under the similar name BILGAH.

Bil'hah (bîl'hâ) [foolish, simple; cf. Arab. balîha, to be unconcerned or stupid]. 1. Rachel's maid-servant, who, at her mistress's desire, became one of Jacob's secondary wives. She was the mother of Dan and Naphtali (Gen. 30:1-8; I Chron. 7:13). Ultimately she committed sin with Reuben (Gen. 35:22).

2. A Simeonite town (I Chron. 4:29). See BAALAH 3.

Bil'han (bîl'hân) [foolish, simple; cf. Arab. balîha]. 1. A Horite, son of Ezer (Gen. 36:27).

2. A Benjamite, family of Jediahel, and himself the ancestor of several father's houses (I Chron. 7:10).

Bil'shan (bîl'shân) [inquirer; or perhaps from Akkad. Bêlshun (their lord)]. One of the 12 chief men who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:2; Neh. 7:7).

Bim'hāl (bîm'hāl) [perhaps, with patience; cf. Arab. mahl (slowness, leisure)]. An Asherite, family of Beriah, house of Japhlet (I Chron. 7:33).

Bin'ea (bîn'ê-â). A son of Moza, a descendant of Jonathan, Saul's son (I Chron. 8:37; 9:43).

Bin'nu-i (bîn'û-i) [built]. 1. The head of a family, of which several hundred returned from the Captivity. His name is also pronounced Bani (Ezra 2:10; Neh. 7:15).

2 and 3. Two men, a son of Pahath-moab and a son of Bani, each of whom was induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:30, 38).

4. A Levite who went from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:8). He was a son of Henadad (Neh. 10:9). His son was one who received the silver and gold brought from Babylon to the Temple by Ezra (Ezra 8:33), and his family was represented at the building of the wall (Neh. 3:24), and its representative sealed the covenant (Neh. 10:9).

Birds. The Hebrews classed as birds all animals which fly, including the bat and winged insects. Tristram enumerates 348 species of birds as either indigenous or visitants to Palestine. Of these 271 belong to the Palaearctic zone of Sclater—that to which most of the European birds belong; 40 to the Ethiopian, and 7 to the Indian zone; while 30, as far as is known, are peculiar to Palestine itself. The Ethiopian and Indian types are almost exclusively confined to the Dead Sea basin, but it is so depressed beneath the level of the ocean that it is really a small tropical region located in the midst of the temperate zone. In the Mosaic Law 20 or 21 birds and, in the case of 4 of them, their kind are expressly named as unclean (Lev. 11:13-19; Deut. 14:11-20). The only birds used for sacrifice were turtledoves and young pigeons (Lev. 1:14). Doves were domesticated (Isa. 60:8), and later, chickens. The cock is mentioned (Matt. 26:34), and the hen (Matt. 23:37; Luke 13:34). Wild fowl were hunted, among other ways, by decoy birds (Ecclus. 11:30), with snares (Amos 3:5), and with nets (Prov. 1:17). The migration of birds is referred to (Jer. 8:7).

Bir'sha (bîr'shâ) [perhaps, with (or in) wickedness]. A king of Gomorrah who was defeated by Chedorlaomer and his confederates (Gen. 14:2, 8, 10).

Birth'day'. The birth of a child, especially of a son, was a glad occasion, and was often celebrated by a feast (Jer. 20:15; Jos. Antiq. xii. 4, 7). The anniversary of one's birth was celebrated by the Egyptians and Persians (Gen. 40:20; Herod. i. 133). Herod the tetrarch kept the anniversary of his birth (Matt. 14:6; Mark 6:21).

Birth'right'. A certain right or privilege considered to belong to the first-born son in a family, and not shared by his younger brothers. The eldest son ordinarily succeeded to his father's rank and position, as head of the family or tribe and as representative of its prerogatives. He also inherited a double portion of his father's property, a right guar-anted to the first-born even when his mother was the less loved of two wives (Deut. 21: 17; cf. II Kings 2:9). A birthright might be sold to a younger brother, as Esau sold his birthright to Jacob (Gen. 25:29, 34; Heb. 12: 16). It might also be forfeited on account of misconduct (I Chron. 5:1).

Birth'stool', in A.V. Stool. A chair of peculiar form, upon which the patient sat during parturition. It was denominated 'obnāyim', double stones, by the Hebrews (Ex. 1:16).

Bir-za'ith (bīr-zā'īth), in A.V. Bir-za'vith (bīr-zā'vith) [olive well]. The form in R.V. without v is favored by the Kere, the LXX, and the Vulgate. The Kethib has the letter waw which is represented by v in A.V.

An Asherite, family of Malchiel; or possibly a town (I Chron. 7:31), Birzeit, about 4½ miles n. of Ramallah.

Bish'lām (bīsh'lām) [perhaps, in peace]. A Persian who joined in the complaint to Artaxerxes that the Jews were rebuilding Jerusalem (Ezra 4:7); called Belemus in I Esdras 2:16.

Bish'op [Lat. episcopus, from Gr. episkopos, an overseer]. The Greek word is used in the LXX for an official overseer, whether civil or religious, as Eleazar the priest (Num. 4:16), and officers of the army (Num. 31:14). In the N.T. the word occurs first in the exhortation of Paul to the elders (marg., presbyters) of the church at Ephesus, when he said, "Take heed unto yourselves, and to all the flock, in which the Holy Spirit hath made you bishops [marg., overseers]" (Acts 20:17, 28). Here and elsewhere Paul identifies elders, presbyters, and bishops (Titus 1:5-7). The terms are different designations for the incumbent of the same office. Elsewhere he distinguishes simply between bishop and deacon (Phil. 1:1; I Tim. 3:1-8). Peter, using the verb episkopeō, exhorts the elders to tend the flock of God, "exercising the oversight, not of constraint, but willingly"; but some ancient authorities omit "exercising the oversight" (I Peter 5:2). In the Church of the N.T. the duties of the bishop were to care for the flock of God (Acts 20:28; I Peter 5:2). He was the shepherd, bearing rule and watching in behalf of souls, admonishing, encouraging, and supporting (I Thess. 5:14; Heb. 13:17), and some among them labored in the word and in teaching (I Tim. 5:17). His qualifications are enumerated in I Tim. 3:1-7 and Titus 1:7-9. A plurality of them existed in the church at Philippi, as in that of Ephesus (Phil. 1:1); and the college of presbyter-bishops ordained by the laying on of hands (I Tim. 4:14). In the church at Jerusalem the elders and apostles consulted together, and the decision of the council was given in the name of the apostles and elders (Acts 15:6, 22; 16:4; 21:18); see ELDER. The name is applied figuratively to Jesus (I Peter 2:25). A distinction, however, grew up very early in the Church between elder or presbyter and bishop. It appears in the 2d century in the epistles of Ignatius, who died between 107 and 117. According to the Roman Catholic Council of Trent in the 16th century, bishops, being the successors of the apostles, are placed by the Holy Spirit to govern the Church of God, and to be superior to their presbyters or priests. Roman Catholic opinion assumes that the apostles had a general supervision of the congregation, while the elders whom they had ordained had the local oversight; but as the congregations increased in number, the apostles ordained assistants whom they appointed their successors, to be overseers of the congregation in a district. According to one interpretation such were the angels of the 7 churches (Rev. 1:20); see ANGEL. High Anglicans find the institution implied in the position of Jesus' brother James in the church at Jerusalem, in the angels of the 7 churches, and in the work of Timothy and Titus. Paul did indeed exhort Timothy to tarry at Ephesus, order public worship, exhort and teach (I Tim. 1:3 seq.); and Titus, whom Paul had before employed as a messenger to the Corinthians (II Cor. 12:18), he left in Crete to set in order things that were wanting, and to appoint elders (bishops) in every city (Titus 1:5-7). But it is to be noted that Timothy was in the 1st instance ordained by presbytery (I Tim. 4:14), and there is not a trace in the N.T. of the apostles' appointing any man to succeed them.

Bi-thi'ah (bī-thī'ā) [daughter, i.e., worshiper, of Jehovah]. A daughter of Pharaoh and wife of Mered, a man of Judah (I Chron. 4:18). Her name indicates that she was a convert to the worship of Jehovah.

Bith'ron (bīth'rōn) [cut, ravine, gorge]. A region, doubtless a valley, n. of the Jabbok near Mahanaim (II Sam. 2:29).

Bi-thyn'ia (bī-thīn'ī-ā). A country in the n.w. part of Asia Minor, bounded on the n. by the Black Sea, on the s. by Phrygia and Galatia, on the e. by Paphlagonia, and on the w. by Mysia and Propontis. But its boundaries varied at different times. Under the Persian Empire it constituted a satrapy. Nicomedes III bequeathed it to the Romans in 74 B.C. Paul and Silas attempted to enter Bithynia, but the Spirit "suffered them not" (Acts 16:7). The gospel was carried thither by other means. Peter was able to address Christians of Bithynia in his 1st letter (I Peter 1:1), and at the beginning of the 2d century Pliny the younger reported numerous Christians there. Later still, in 2 of its towns, Nicaea and Chalcedon, great councils of the Church were held. It is a fertile country, in which the vine is largely cultivated. In various parts, especially in the chain of Mount Olympus, which runs along its s. boundary, there are forests of oak, interspersed with beech trees, chestnuts, and walnuts.

Bit'tern. The rendering in A.V. of Heb. kippōd, the one contracting or rolling itself together; an animal frequenting ruins (Isa. 14:23; 34:11), which ascended to the top of ruined doors or to window sills (perhaps fallen), and thence made its voice heard (Zeph. 2:14). The bittern (Botaurus stellaris) is a long-necked and long-legged wading bird, habitually frequenting pools of water. The R.V. considers the animal to be the porcupine and has the support of the LXX and the Vulgate (hedgehog).

Bit'u'men. Mineral pitch. There are 3 varieties of it: 1. earthy bitumen; 2. elastic bitumen (elaterite or mineral caoutchouc); 3. compact bitumen or asphalt, asphaltum, or Jew's pitch. It sinks in water, is easily melted, and is very inflammable. It has been described as petroleum hardened by evaporation and oxidation, and it may vary from a solid to a semiliquid condition. Bitumen or asphalt exists at or near the Dead Sea, called, in consequence, by the Greeks and Romans, Lake Asphaltitis. It is found also at Hit, on the Euphrates, above Babylon, and in other places. Bitumen was the slime with which the bricks used for the erection of the Tower of Babel were cemented (Gen. 11:3). The slime pits in which the defeated kings of Sodom and Gomorrah fell were bitumen pits (Gen. 14:10).

Biz'io-thi'ah (bīz'ī-ō-thī'ā), in A.V. Biz-joth'jah (bīz-jōth'jah) [contempt of Jehovah]. A town in the most s. portion of Judah (Josh. 15:28). The text is suspicious. Almost the same consonants (b'nōthehā) would mean "its daughters or suburbs" (LXX; cf. Neh. 11:27).

Biz'tha (bîz'thâ) [probably from Avestan *biz-dâ (double gift, giving double)]. A chamberlain at the court of Xerxes (Esth. 1:10).

Blain. The rendering of Heb. 'āba'w'ōth. It signifies a bleb, a bubble of matter, a blister full of serum arising upon the skin. Blains accompanied by boils is the disease which constituted the 6th of the 10 plagues of Egypt (Ex. 9:8-11).

Blas'phe-my [Gr. blasphēmia, abusive or scurrilous language]. Defamatory or other wicked language directed against God (Ps. 74:10-18; Isa. 52:5; Rev. 16:9, 11, 21). Under the Mosaic Law it was punished by stoning (Lev. 24:16). The charge of blasphemy was falsely brought against Naboth (I Kings 21:9-13), Stephen (Acts 6:11), and our Lord (Matt. 9:3; 26:65, 66; John 10:36).

Blasphemy against the Holy Spirit consisted in attributing the miracles of Christ, which were wrought by the Spirit of God, to satanic power (Matt. 12:22-32; Mark 3:22-30).

Blas'tus (blās'tūs) [Gr., a sprout or shoot]. A palace functionary who had charge of Herod Agrippa's bedchamber (Acts 12:20).

Bless. The three leading meanings which the verb bless has in Scripture are:

1. To bestow divine favor and confer divine benefits (Gen. 1:22; 2:3; 9:1-7).

2. To adore God for his goodness and return thanks (Ps. 103:1; Matt. 26:26; cf. Mark 14:22 with Luke 22:19 and I Cor. 11:24).

3. To invoke God's favor on a person (Gen. 27:4, 27-29; I Chron. 16:2; Ps. 129:8), including salutation and even the ordinary greeting, "Peace be to you" (I Sam. 25:5, 6, 14; II Kings 4:29).

Bless'ing. Any advantage conferred or wished for. Specially:

1. Favors, advantages, conferred by God, and bringing pleasure or happiness in their train (Gen. 39:5; Deut. 28:8; Prov. 10:22, etc.).

2. The invocation of God's favor upon a person (Gen. 27:12).

3. A present, a token of good will (Gen. 33:11; Josh. 15:19; II Kings 5:15).

Blind'ness. Blindness is extremely prevalent in the East. Its main causes are smallpox, and especially ophthalmia, aggravated by peculiar conditions, such as the perpetual glare of the sun, the quantity of fine dust in the air, and flies. Children are also sometimes born blind (John 9:1). Consequently blind beggars are frequent (Matt. 9:27; 12:22; 20:30; 21:14). Total or partial blindness may result from old age (Gen. 27:1; I Sam. 4:15; I Kings 14:4). The eyes of captives taken in war were frequently put out by barbarous victors, as by the Ammonites, Philistines, Assyrians, and Babylonians (Judg. 16:21; I Sam. 11:2; II Kings 25:7). In a few instances men were miraculously smitten with temporary blindness (Gen. 19:11; II Kings 6:18-22; Acts 9:9; 13:11). The Mosaic Law inculcated the exercise of humanity toward the blind (Lev. 19:14; Deut. 27:18).

Blood. The vital fluid circulating through the body. The life is in the blood (Lev. 17:11, 14); or the blood is the life (Deut. 12:23), though not exclusively (Ps. 104:29, 30). The blood represented the life, and so sacred is life before God that the blood of murdered Abel could be described as crying to God from the ground for vengeance (Gen. 4:10); and immediately after the Flood the eating of the blood of the lower animals was forbidden, although their slaughter for food was authorized (Gen. 9:3, 4; Acts 15:20, 29), and the law was laid down, "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed" (Gen. 9:6). The loss of life is the penalty for sin, and its typical vicarious surrender was necessary to remission (Heb. 9:22), and so, under the Mosaic Law, the blood of animals was used in all offerings for sin, and the blood of beasts killed on the hunt or slaughtered for food was poured out and covered with earth, because withheld by God from man's consumption and reserved for purposes of atonement (Lev. 17:10-14; Deut. 12:15, 16). The "blood of Jesus," the "blood of Christ," the "blood of Jesus Christ," or "the blood of the Lamb," are figurative expressions for his atoning death (I Cor. 10:16; Eph. 2:13; Heb. 9:14; 10:19; I Peter 1:2, 19; I John 1:7; Rev. 7:14; 12:11).

For revenger, or rather avenger, of blood, see AVENGER OF BLOOD.

Blood'y Flux. See DYSENTERY.

Blood'y Sweat. See SWEAT.

Bo'a-ner'ges (bō'ā-nūr'jēz) [Gr., from Aram., sons of thunder, or of tumult, wrath: cf. Aram. re'gōshā, noise; riggūshā (Syriac regshā), tumult; rugzā, anger; cf. also Arab. rajasa, to rumble (thunder)]. A name given by Jesus to James and John on account of their impetuosity (Mark 3:17; cf. Luke 9:54, 55).

Boar. The rendering of Heb. hāzîr, when it refers to wild swine, and especially to the male of wild swine (Ps. 80:13). When the reference is to the domesticated animal, it is rendered swine. The wild boar is 3 or more feet long, not counting the tail. The canine teeth project beyond the upper lip, constituting formidable tusks, with which it seeks to rip up its assailants. The animal is still found in Palestine, especially in the ravines e. of the Jordan, in the valley near Jericho, in the swamps of the waters of Merom, on Tabor, Lebanon, and Carmel, and in the Plain of Sharon.

Bo'az (bō'āz), in A.V. of N.T. Bo'oz [ety. uncertain; probably for Ba'al 'ōz, lord of strength. Another possibility is that it means quick-witted; cf. Arab. baghz, sprightliness]. 1. A wealthy and honorable Bethlehemite, kinsman to the husband of Ruth the Moabitess. He respected the memory of the dead by marrying Ruth after the decease of her husband, and became ancestor of David and of Christ (Ruth, chs. 2 to 4; Matt. 1:5).

2. [ety. uncertain; often interpreted as "In him (or in it) is strength." It may be an abbreviation of an inscription like: "In the strength of Jehovah shall the king rejoice."]. One of 2 pillars, the one on the left or n. side, set up in the porch of Solomon's Temple (I Kings 7:15-22).

Assyrian King Piercing the Eyes of Captives

Bo'che-ru (bō'kē-rōō) [first-born]. A son of Azel and a descendant of Jonathan, Saul's son (I Chron. 8:38).

Bo'chim (bō'kīm) [weepers]. A place near Gilgal, where the Israelites repented and wept under the rebuke of the angel of the Lord for their disobedience of God's commands (Judg. 2:1-5).

Bo'hān (bō'hān) [thumb]. 1. A son of Reuben (Josh. 15:6; 18:17), unless Bohan is a common noun in these passages.

2. The stone of Bohan, son of Reuben, or the stone known as the Reubenite's thumb, was a landmark on the boundary between Judah and Benjamin, not a great distance from the Jordan (Josh. 15:6; 18:17).

Boil. An inflamed ulcer. It was inflicted along with blains as the 6th plague of Egypt (Ex. 9:8-11; cf. Deut. 28:27, 35). It was a prominent symptom in leprosy (Lev. 13:18-20). It constituted the main feature of Hezekiah's disease, which brought his life into imminent danger (II Kings 20:7; Isa. 38:21). Job was smitten by Satan with boils from head to foot (Job 2:7). Ordinary boils are common, in the warmer parts of the East, during the rainy season. One type of boil, the carbuncle, may lead to pyemia and be fatal. This was probably Hezekiah's disease. The application of a poultice of figs would do it good, but the rapid cure was due to God.

Boł'ster. The word appears 6 times in A.V. (I Sam. 19:13, 16; 26:7, 11, 12, 16) and renders a Hebrew word meaning "the place at the head" or "head place." R.V. rightly translates "head" in all these cases. Jacob, sleeping in the open field, took a stone to support his head (Gen. 28:11, 18). Jesus probably placed the leather cushion of the steersman's seat under his head when he lay down to sleep in the stern of the boat (Mark 4:38). Michal put some article of goats' hair at the head of the teraphim which she laid in the bed to deceive the messengers who were sent to take David (I Sam. 19:13).

Bon'net. With the exception of Isa. 3:20, where it refers to female attire, this is the A.V. designation of the special headdress of the priests (Ex. 28:40; 29:9; 39:28; Lev. 8:13; Ezek. 44:18). In the last passage R.V. renders "tires," while in the others, "head-tires." See TIRE.

Book. At an early time records were inscribed on stone or clay. The Egyptians invented papyrus probably in predynastic times. Skin or parchment was also used in antiquity. When written on skin, a long document took the form of a roll with writing on one or both of its sides. Of this type of book there is a trace in the word volume, Lat. volumen (something rolled up) (Ps. 40:7; Jer. 36:2; Ezek. 2:9). Books are 1st mentioned as written by the Hebrews after the sojourn in Egypt, where written literature had existed for centuries (Ex. 17:14). The 39 books of the O.T. and the 27 of the N.T., which constitute the canon of Scripture, do not represent the entire literary activity of the Hebrews during the time embraced by the canon. There were, for example, the books of the Apocrypha. Later there were memoirs of Jesus (Luke 1:1). In the O.T. period there were 2 poetical books at least, the Book of the Wars of Jehovah and the Book of Jashar (Num. 21:14; Josh. 10:13). The events of the reigns of David and Solomon were recorded in the History of Samuel the Seer, the History of Nathan the Prophet, the History of Gad the Seer, and in the Prophecy of Ahijah (I Chron. 29:29; II Chron. 9:29), and also in the Chronicles of King David, which apparently mark the beginning of the custom of keeping royal annals (I Chron. 27:24). The reigns of Solomon and Jeroboam found record in the Visions of Iddo the Seer (II Chron. 9:29); and Rehoboam's reign in the History of Shemaiah the Prophet and in the History of Iddo the Seer (II Chron. 12:15). The Chronicles of the Kings of Israel and the Chronicles of the Kings of Judah recorded the history of the 2 kingdoms from the time of Rehoboam and Jeroboam, until as late as the reign of Jehoiahim (I Kings 14:19, 29; II Kings 24:5); see KINGS. In addition to these works, there was quite a library in existence at the time when the books of Chronicles were written, consisting largely of monographs, of which not a few titles are cited (II Chron. 13:22; 20:34; 24:27; 26:22; 32:32; 33:18, 19; 35:25; see also Prov. 25:1; I Kings 4:32, 33). See PAPYRUS.

Booth. A rude habitation designed in most cases for a longer occupation than a tent, but not for permanence like a house. It was often formed with branches of trees. Jacob made booths at Shechem for his cattle, the place in consequence being afterwards called Succoth (Gen. 33:17). The keeper of a vineyard occupied a booth (Job 27:18; Isa. 1:8, R.V.), which during the vintage sheltered the owner and his friends. The Israelites were required to form booths of branches of trees, palm leaves, etc., and dwell in them for 7 days at the feast of tabernacles. The booths at this harvest festival were a reminder of the vintage life; but with this recollection there was also to be associated the memory of their deliverance from Egypt, when they sojourned in the wilderness without permanent habitation (Lev. 23:39-43; Neh. 8:14).

Boo'ty. The plunder of a conquered district or town. It consisted of everything of value—household goods, gold, silver, cattle, and captives to be used as slaves (Gen. 14:11, 12, 16; Num. 31:9, 26-52; Josh. 7:21). At the conquest of Canaan the Israelites were required to slay everything that breathed and to destroy all idols and places of idolatrous worship, but in foreign conquests they were bidden to slay the men only, and were authorized to take the remaining spoil (Num. 33:52; Deut. 20:14-16). Exceptions were occasionally made when everything was devoted, the living to destruction, the goods to the treasury of the sanctuary, or when a certain portion of the spoil was dedicated to the Lord (Num. 31:26-47; Josh. 6:19; I Sam. 15:2, 3). David made a law that the troops detailed to guard the baggage should share equally with those who engaged in the battle (I Sam. 30:23-25).

Bo'oz (bō'ōz). See BOAZ.

Bo'r'row. To get in loan. Did the Israelites, when the Egyptians urged them to leave the country, borrow goods from the Egyptians or obtain them as gifts? Heb. shā'al, rendered borrow in A.V. (Ex. 3:22; 11:2; 12:35), means simply ask (R.V.) or request, whether the object desired was to be returned (II Kings 6:5) or not (Judg. 5:25; 8:24); and the word translated lend (Ex. 12:36, A.V.) is a form of the same verb, and means to grant a request or let one have what one asks (R.V.; cf. I Sam. 1:28).

Bo's'cath (bō's'kāth). See BOZKATH.

Bo's'or (bō's'ōr). 1. A town of Gilead, Gilead being doubtless used in a broad sense (I Macc. 5:26, 36); identified with Buṣr el-Hariri, 12½ miles E. of Sheikh Miskin.

2. See BEOR 2.

Bo's'ora (bō's'ō-rā). A town of Gilead (I Macc. 5:26, 28), Bostra in Hauran, at an important junction of caravan roads leading to the Mediterranean, Damascus, the Red Sea, and the Persian Gulf; modern Buṣra eski Shām.

BOTCH

Botch. The rendering in A.V. of Deut. 28: 27, 35 of Heb. sh'hin, elsewhere translated boil.

Bot'tle. 1. A hollow vessel of leather, or the hollow side of an animal, used for holding liquids (Job 32:19; Matt. 9:17); wine-skin in R.V. See BUTTER.

2. A small vessel of earthenware formed by potters, which was capable of being broken (Jer. 19:1, 10, 11).

Bow. A weapon used for shooting arrows (II Kings 6:22; I Chron. 12:2). It was made of a strip of elastic wood or metal (II Sam. 22:35; Job 20:24), with a cord stretched between its 2 ends (Ps. 11:2), and was held in the left hand (Ezek. 39:3). It was used both in hunting and in war (Gen. 27:3; 48:22). Its use was general among the nations of antiquity (I Sam. 31:3; I Kings 22:34; Jer. 46:9; 49:35). There were archers among the soldiers of Reuben, Gad, the half tribe of Manasseh, Ephraim, and especially Benjamin (I Chron. 5:18; II Chron. 14:8; Ps. 78:9). The bow was carried by officers and soldiers on foot, in chariots, or on horseback (II Kings 9:24). The archers carried the little shield and a sword (I Sam. 18:4; I Chron.

The Bow Used in Battle Between Assyrians and Their Foes]

5:18; II Chron. 14:8), and with the slingers constituted the light-armed troops.

The arrows were of cane or polished wood, and were carried in a quiver (Lam. 3:13; Isa. 49:2; Ezek. 39:9). Their heads were made of iron, copper, or stone, and were sometimes poisoned (Job 6:4).

Bowl. See BASIN 3.

Box. 1. A small case or vessel with a cover. In Scripture times boxes were used to hold oil, ointment, etc. (II Kings 9:1; Matt. 26:7, A.V.).

2. The rendering of Heb. te'ashshūr. Boat seats were made of it (Ezek. 27:6, R.V.), and writing tablets (II Esdras 14:24, A.V.). The box, fir, and pine were the glory of Lebanon (Isa. 60:13; cf. Isa. 41:19). The box tree of Lebanon is Buxus longifolia, a small evergreen tree about 20 ft. high.

Bo'zez (bō'zēz) [perhaps, shining; cf. Arab. bāda, to exceed in whiteness]. Of 2 crags near Gibeah, the northernmost, in front of Michmash (I Sam. 14:4, 5). It overlooked the wadi eš-Suweinit.

Boz'kath (bōz'kāth), in A.V. once Bos'eath [cf. Arab. baṣkah, elevated, stony ground]. A town in the extreme s. of Judah (Josh. 15:39). Josiah's maternal grandfather, Adahiah, was of the place (II Kings 22:1); near Lachish, perhaps at Dawā'imeh.

Boz'rah (bōz'rā) [fortified place, sheepfold]. 1. An important city of Edom (Gen. 36:33; I Chron. 1:44; Isa. 34:6; 63:1). Amos predicted that its palaces should be destroyed (Amos 1:12); and Jeremiah foretold its utter destruction (Jer. 49:13, 22). It was noted for its sheep (Micah 2:12). Identified with Buseirah, about 20 miles s.s.e. of the Dead Sea and about 35 miles n. of Petra.

2. A city of Moab mentioned with Kerioth, Beth-meon, Dibon, and other towns of the plateau (Jer. 48:24); probably the same as Bezer (in LXX, Bosor).

Brace'let. An ornament for the wrist or for the arm, worn by both sexes (Ezek. 16:11). One was put on Rebekah's wrist by Abraham's servant (Gen. 24:22). Bracelets were given by the Israelites in the wilderness to furnish gold or silver for the construction of the vessels of the tabernacle (Num. 31:50). Saul wore one, unless what he had on was rather an armlet (II Sam. 1:10). For bracelet in A.V. in Gen. 38:18, 25, R.V. substitutes cord; in Ex. 35:22, brooches; and in Isa. 3:19, marg., chains.

Bram'ble. The rendering of Heb. ʾatād in Judg. 9:14, 15. The plant is named from its firmness. R.V. marg. renders it by thorn, and both versions so translate the word in Ps. 58:9. It is doubtless a variety of Rhamnus. The LXX and Vulgate render it by Rhamnus. This thorn is quite common in the warmer parts of Palestine, especially in the vicinity of the Dead Sea, in the Jordan Valley, and about the Sea of Galilee. It is also found at Jerusalem. The Rhamnus is still called by the Arabs 'ataḍ or nabk, applying the name not only to Christ's Thorn (Zizyphus spina Christi), which takes its name from the tradition that the crown placed on Christ's head was made from its twigs, but apparently also to Rhamnus palturus.

Branch. A title applied to the Messiah as the offspring of David (Jer. 23:5; 33:15; Zech. 3:8; 6:12).

Brass. The rendering of Heb. nēhōsheth and Gr. chalkos. R.V. marg., however, at Gen. 4:22 gives copper as a constant alternative. Copper is supposed to have been discovered by the Egyptians at Sinai about 5000 B.C. It was smelted from the ore dug from the ground (Deut. 8:9; Job 28:2). Traces of ancient copper works exist in Lebanon and in Edom. It was obtained notably in the peninsula of Sinai, in Cyprus, and in Meshech and Tubal (Ezek. 27:13). Copper refineries of the time of Solomon have been discovered at Ezion-geber (Tell el-Kheleifeh). They are elaborate structures with many flues and depended for their draft upon the strong winds blowing constantly from the n.

Brass is an alloy of copper and zinc, the general use of which is comparatively modern. In ancient times its place was supplied by bronze, an alloy of copper and tin. Brass in the English Bible means either bronze or copper itself. From copper and its alloys utensils were made: pots, shovels, basins, pans, spoons, snuffers (Ex. 38:3; Lev. 6:28; Num. 16:39; Jer. 52:18); armor, such as helmets, coats of mail, greaves, shields, spear points, and even bows (II Sam. 21:16; 22:35, R.V.; II Chron. 12:10); fetters, mirrors, city gates, musical instruments, idols, and in later times coins (Ex. 38:8; II Kings 25:7, 13; Isa. 45:2; Matt. 10:9; I Cor. 13:1; Rev. 9:20). Where casting is spoken of, the metal was bronze. Thus were made the plating and railing for the altar, the lavers and the sea with its pedestal of oxen, and two magnificent pillars for the Temple (I Kings 7:41-46; II Chron. 4:1-17). See BRONZE.

Brazen Serpent. The figure of a serpent, made of bronze and erected by Moses on a pole in the wilderness, that the Israelites who were bitten by fiery serpents might look at it with faith in God's promise to heal those who looked (Num. 21:8, 9). In after years the Israelites began to use it as an idol, and Hezekiah had it broken into pieces, contemptuously calling it Nehushtan, i.e., only a piece of brass (II Kings 18:4). R.V. marg. and J.V., however, translate: "And it was called Nehushtan." This rendering, preferred by many commentators, can also be defended from the Hebrew and finds support in Lucian, the Peshitta, and the Targum, which have the verb in the plural. A statement regarding the real or popular name of the idol is more to be expected than one as to what Hezekiah called it in the act of destroying it. Nehushtan may be a play upon nāhāsh (serpent) and nēhōsheth (copper, bronze); cf. Num. 21:9, where the two words are used together. Jesus, in foretelling his crucifixion, explained its spiritual significance by comparing it with the rearing of the brazen serpent (John 3:14, 15).

Bread. The bread in use among the Israelites consisted generally of small flat cakes of wheat flour or, among the poor, of barley flour. The grain was ground daily in a hand mill, and fresh bread baked every day. When this bread was to be eaten at once, it was often unleavened (Gen. 19:3; I Sam. 28:24), but the art of making leavened bread was also understood. The showbread which was edible after eight days was evidently leavened. The flour was made into a paste or dough by mixing with water, and might be leavened some time after mixing; for example, at the 1st passover the dough was already mixed in the troughs, but not yet leavened, when the order came to march (Ex. 12:34).

The oven used by private families was a portable jar in which, after it had been heated, the loaves were laid or were stuck against the sides, the cakes baked in this fashion being very thin.

Besides the bread baked in the oven (Lev. 2:4), cakes something like pancakes (Lev. 2:5) were baked on a pan put over a fire.

A Baking Tray from Gezer

Bread was also baked on the heated hearth or on any hot stones after the ashes were swept aside (I Kings 19:6). This kind was made especially when food was wanted in a hurry (Gen. 18:6). The Bedouins at present commonly bake by placing their loaves in a hole in the ground which has previously held a fire and then been cleared out. The hole is carefully covered and the bread allowed to bake all night. This method was probably well known to the Israelites. Baking was ordinarily done by the women (Gen. 18:6; I Sam. 8:13; Lev. 26:26; cf. Judg. 6:19), and in large households by the slaves, but in the cities there were also bakers who sold bread (Jer. 37:21). In Lev., ch. 2, is given a list of the different kinds of bread which were acceptable as offerings. In some places the word is applied to all kinds of food (Luke 11:3).

Breastplate. 1. A sacred article of dress worn by the Jewish high priest (Ex. 28:15-30). See HIGH PRIEST.

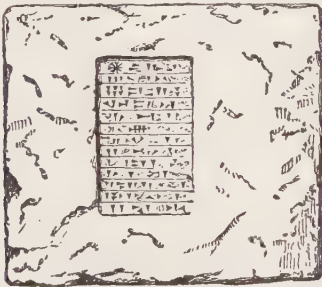

2. Armor designed to protect the body in battle (Rev. 9:9); see ARMOR. Figuratively, righteousness (Isa. 59:17; Eph. 6:14; Wisd. of Sol. 5:18), or faith and love, constitute a spiritual breastplate (I Thess. 5:8).

Brethren of the Lord. Their names are given in the Gospels as James, Joseph or Joses, Simon, and Judas (Matt. 13:55, R.V.; Mark 6:3). They appear in company with Mary (Matt. 12:47-50; Mark 3:31-35; Luke 8:19-21), moved to Capernaum with her and Jesus and the latter's disciples at the beginning of Christ's ministry (John 2:12), but are said not to have believed in Jesus even toward the close of his life (John 7:4, 5). After the resurrection, however, they are found united with the disciples (Acts 1:14), and are afterward mentioned as Christian workers (I Cor. 9:5). One of them, James (Gal. 1:19), became a distinguished leader of the Jerusalem church (Acts 12:17; 15:13; Gal. 2:9), and was the author of the epistle which goes by his name. In what sense they were Christ's "brethren" has been much disputed. In very early times they were regarded as the children of Joseph by a former marriage. The disappearance of Joseph from the Gospels suggests that he had died, and may have been much older than Mary, and may have been previously married. This view (Origen, 3d century and Epiphanius, 4th century) is a possible one, but, in view of Matt. 1:25 and Luke 2:7, not probable. In the 4th century Jerome proposed another view; viz., that they were Christ's cousins on his mother's side, the children of Alphaeus (or Clopas) and Mary's sister of the same name. This is inferred mainly from a combination of Mark 15:40 and John 19:25 (the latter being thought to mention but three women), and from the identity of the names Alphaeus and Clopas. On this view one (James the son of Alphaeus) and perhaps more (Simon and Judas) of the apostles were Christ's brethren. But the apostles are distinguished from his brethren; the latter did not believe in him, and it is unlikely that two sisters had the same name. Another very old view was that they were cousins on Joseph's side, and some have even supposed they were the children of the widow of Joseph's brother (Deut. 25:5-10). But all these theories appear to have originated from a wish to maintain the perpetual virginity of Mary. That they were the children of Joseph and Mary, born after Jesus, is the natural view, and that Mary had other children is implied in Matt. 1:25; Luke 2:7. This view (Tertullian, c. end of 2d century, and Helvidius, 4th century) explains also the constant association of "the brethren" with Mary.

Brick. A mass of clay made rectangular in shape and hardened either by burning in a kiln or by drying in the sun. Bricks were of course sun-dried when the clay was mixed with straw (Ex. 5:7). Both bricks and tiles are often found stamped with names and inscriptions, from which we have derived much of our knowledge of those ancient times, as well as from the tablets of burnt clay specially prepared as documents.

Brick-kiln'. A kiln for enclosing bricks while they are being burned (II Sam. 12:31 and Nahum 3:14, where R.V. marg. translates "brick-mould"; Jer. 43:9, in R.V. brickwork).

Brī'er. The rendering of 6 distinct Hebrew words and of one Greek word. 1. Barḳān (Judg. 8:7, 16).

2. Shāmīr, thorn, adamant, flint (Isa. 9:18; 10:17; 27:4; 32:13), such as springs up in abandoned vineyards (chs. 5:6; 7:23).

3. Sīrpad (Isa. 55:13). The LXX renders it fleabane, and the Vulgate, nettle.

4. Sārāb, refractory (Ezek. 2:6).

5. Sillōn (Ezek. 28:24; in ch. 2:6 rendered thorn).

6. Hēdek (Micah 7:4), used in hedges (Prov. 15:19, where it is rendered thorn).

7. Gr. tribolos, caltrop, burr, thistle (Heb. 6:8, brier, A.V.; thistle, R.V.). In Matt. 7:16 the same word is rendered thistle by A.V. and R.V.

Brig'an-dine. A coat of mail (so R.V.), composed of light, thin-jointed scales, or of thin, pliant plate armor (Jer. 45:4; 51:3).

Brim'stone'. Sulphur (Gen. 19:24; Deut. 29:23).

Bronze. See BRASS. In Palestinian archaeology we speak of these bronze periods:

Early Bronze I	Centuries 32-29 B.C.
Early Bronze II	Centuries 29-27 B.C.
Early Bronze III	Centuries 27-24 B.C.
Early Bronze IV	Centuries 24-22 B.C.
Middle Bronze I	Centuries 22-21 B.C.
Middle Bronze II	Centuries 21-16 B.C.
Late Bronze I	Centuries 16-14 B.C.
Late Bronze II	Centuries 14-13 B.C.

The Bronze Age is preceded by the Chalcolithic and followed by the Iron Age. The dates are all approximate.

Brook. A small perennial stream, as the Kishon (I Kings 18:40) and the Jabbok (Gen. 32:22, 23, A.V.). Generally, however, in Scripture the word is used for a stream (wadi) which flows in the rainy, winter season but is dry in summer, as the brook of Egypt (Num. 34:5, R.V.; see RIVER), the Zered (Deut. 2:13), and the Kidron (II Sam. 15:23; John 18:1, R.V.).

Broom. A much-branched bush, with twiggly, nearly leafless branches, and clusters of pinkish-white flowers, which grows in the Jordan Valley and Arabia, and is common in the peninsula of Sinai (Job 30:4; I Kings 19:4). Its large root stalk is made into charcoal (Ps. 120:4). In the text of the last 2 passages in the R.V., and in all the 3 in the A.V., it is rendered juniper, but Heb. rōthem corresponds to modern Arab. ratum (broom).

Broth'er. 1. A male person considered in his relation to another person or other persons of either sex born of the same parents (Gen. 27:6), or at least of the same father (Gen. 28:2) or the same mother (Judg. 8:19).

2. A man of the same near ancestry (as a nephew, Gen. 14:16), or of the same race or of a kindred nation (Deut. 23:7; Neh. 5:7; Jer. 34:9).

3. An ally (Amos 1:9) or coreligionist (Acts 9:17; I Cor. 6:6; II Cor. 2:13); often in the plural applied to Christian disciples (Matt. 23:8; Rom. 1:13).

4. One of the male sex greatly beloved or politely addressed by the person who calls him brother (II Sam. 1:26; I Kings 20:32).

5. Any man whatever, the common brotherhood of the human race being recognized (Gen. 9:5; Matt. 5:22; 18:35).

Buck'ler. See ARMOR.

Buk'ki (būk'i) [abbreviation of Bukkiah]. 1. Prince of the tribe of Dan and member of the commission for allotting the land (Num. 34:22).

2. A descendant of Aaron, in the high-priestly line of Phinehas (I Chron. 6:5, 51; Ezra 7:4).

Buk-ki'ah (bū-kī'ā) [perhaps, Jehovah has tested; cf. Aram. bēkād (try)]. A Levite, son of Heman, and head of the 6th of the 24 companies of 12 musicians each which David appointed for the service of the sanctuary (I Chron. 25:4, 13).

Bul (bōol) [probably, rain month]. The 8th month of the Jewish year (I Kings 6:38). See YEAR.

Bull. The male of the species called by naturalists Bos taurus (Job 21:10; Ps. 68:30; Isa. 34:7; Jer. 52:20); see OX.

The word te'o, rendered wild ox and wild bull in A.V. (Deut. 14:5; Isa. 51:20), is translated in R.V. by antelope (q.v.).

Bull'ock. A young bull, though the Heb. word is used once of an animal 7 years old (Judg. 6:25). Bullocks were used as draft animals bearing a yoke (Jer. 31:18, A.V.), and were offered in sacrifice (Ex. 29:1; I Chron. 29:21).

Bul'rush'. 1. Heb. gōme' (Ex. 2:3; Isa. 18:2, A.V.); papyrus (q.v.).
2. Heb. 'agmōn. The etymology suggests that it grows in swamps; it is a low plant (Isa. 9:14; 19:15), bows the head (ch. 58:5), and was twisted into ropes (Job 41:2, R.V. marg.).

Bu'nah (bū'ná) [intelligence]. A descendant of Judah through Jeremiah (I Chron. 2:25).

Bun'ni (bū'nī) [perhaps, built, erected].
1. A Levite who lived before the Exile (Neh. 11:15).
2. A Levite, contemporary of Nehemiah (Neh. 9:4).

3. Representative of a family or father's house who sealed the covenant (Neh. 10:15).

Bur'den. 1. A heavy load to be borne; used in a literal or a figurative sense (Ex. 23:5; Num. 11:11, etc.).

2. An utterance or prophecy, in almost every instance pronouncing heavy judgment on a place or people (Isa. 14:28; 15:1; Ezek. 12:10; Hos. 8:10; Nahum 1:1).

Bur'ial. Interment in Bible lands followed speedily after death. Among Oriental Jews at the present time burial takes place, if possible, within 24 hours after death. The rapidity of decomposition in that climate requires that the survivors immediately bury their dead out of their sight (Gen. 23:3, 4). With few exceptions the Hebrews did not cremate (cf. I Sam. 31:11-13; II Sam. 21:12-14; and Amos 6:10, an emergency). When a death occurred, friends, especially women, hurried to the house and made loud lamentation (Mark 5:38). Mourners were even hired (Jer. 9:17). The body was washed (Acts 9:37), and wrapped in a cloth or closely bound in bands (Matt. 27:59; John 11:44). The wealthy added spices and perfumes (John 12:7; 19:39) or burned fragrant materials (Jer. 34:5). The body was carried upon a bier to the grave (II Sam. 3:31; Luke 7:14). Burial was generally in a cave or in a sepulcher scooped horizontally in the rock (Gen. 25:9, 10; Matt. 27:60). See MOURNING and SEPULCHER.

Burnt Offer'ing. See OFFERINGS.

Burnt Sac'ri'fice, the same as burnt offering. See OFFERINGS.

Bush. 1. Heb. seneh and Gr. batos, a thorny bush (Luke 6:44), which Moses saw burning and from which Jehovah spoke (Ex. 3:2, 3; Deut. 33:16; Mark 12:26). Tristram believes it to have been the Acacia vera or nilotica, the Egyptian thorn. It is a withered-looking thorny tree, 12 feet high, with bipinnate leaves and white flowers. It grows throughout a large part of Africa, also in the Sinai Peninsula, and, in Palestine, on the shores of the Dead Sea. The identification, however, is not certain.

2. Heb. šīah (Job. 30:4, 7; and Gen. 2:5, where it is rendered plant); a shrub large enough to afford some shade (Gen. 21:15, where it is rendered shrub).

3. Heb. nahālōl (Isa. 7:19), rendered in the text of R.V. by pasture, and in A.V. marg. by commendable trees.

Bush'el. The rendering of Gr. modios, a dry measure containing almost 2 gallons (Matt. 5:15; Mark 4:21). See MEASURE, III.

But'ler. See CUPBEARER.

But'ter. Hem'āh, curdled milk or curds (Gen. 18:8; Deut. 32:14; Prov. 30:33; Isa. 7:15, 22). R.V. marg. of Isa. 7:15 translates curds. Thomson says that neither the ancient nor the modern Orientals have made butter in our sense of the word. The butter given to Sisera by Jael was sour milk, called in Arab. laban (Judg. 5:25). The butter of Prov. 30:33 is a production corresponding to the Arab. samn, which is made in the following manner: A bottle formed by stripping off the entire skin of a young buffalo is filled with milk and then perseveringly kneaded or shaken by women. Then the contents are taken out, boiled or melted, and put into bottles of goats' skins. In winter it resembles candied honey, and in summer is mere oil.

Buz (būz) [contempt; perhaps the same as Bāzu, a desert region and tribe, of the Assyrian inscriptions]. 1. An Aramaean tribe, descended from a son of Nahor (Gen. 22:20, 21), and probably dwelling in Jeremiah's time near Dedan and Tema in Arabia (Jer. 25:23).

2. A Gadite, founder of a tribal family or house (I Chron. 5:14).

Bu'zi (bū'zī) [descendant of Buz]. Father of the priest and prophet Ezekiel (Ezek. 1:3).

Buz'ite (bū'zīt). One belonging to the Arabian tribe of Buz (Job 32:2).

C

Cab'bon (kāb'ōn) [cf. Aram. kēban, wrap around, surround]. A village of Judah in the lowland (Josh. 15:40). Perhaps identical with Machbena (I Chron. 2:49).

Ca'bul (kā'būl) [perhaps, fettered land, i.e., hard, dry, unproductive land; cf. Heb. kebel, a fetter]. 1. A town of Asher (Josh. 19:27; Jos. Life 43, 45), still known as Kābūl, a village 9 miles s.e. of Acre.

2. A district of Galilee, that is, of the n. part of the territory of Naphtali. It contained 20 towns, which Solomon presented to Hiram, king of Tyre, in return for services rendered in the building of the Temple. Hiram was displeased with the gift, and therefore called the region Cabul (I Kings 9:13), perhaps intending a pun: Kābūl and kēbal (like not=good as nothing). Hiram thus rejected the proffered compensation and returned the district to Solomon, who thereupon fortified the cities and caused Israelites to dwell in them (II Chron. 8:2; Jos. Antiq. viii. 5, 3).

Caesar (sē'zēr). The family name of a branch of the Julian house or clan in Rome; its most illustrious representative was Gaius Julius Caesar, who was assassinated in 44 B.C. The name Caesar was assumed by his grandnephew Octavius, later the emperor Augustus. Tiberius, who succeeded Augustus, and Caligula, Claudius, and Nero, who followed in succession, were all entitled by relationship to the great dictator to bear the family name; the 6 succeeding emperors—Galba, Otho, Vitellius, Vespasian, Titus, and Domitian complete the number 12 in Suetonius' Lives of the Caesars. From having been the name of one mighty conqueror, and then of a series of emperors, the name Caesar became the type or symbol of the civil power in general, and it is continually used in this sense in discussions as to the relative domains of civil and ecclesiastical rulers (cf. Matt. 22:17, 21; Mark 12:14, 16, 17; Luke 20:22, 24, 25).

The name Caesar is applied in the N.T. to:
1. AUGUSTUS CAESAR (ō-gūs'tūs sē'zēr), the 1st Roman emperor (Luke 2:1). In 43 B.C. he was named one of the Second Triumvirate, Mark Antony and Lepidus being the other members. Lepidus was found incompetent and forced to retire; and after the defeat of Antony at Actium in 31 B.C. Augustus was sole ruler of the Roman world, and was given the title of emperor. It was in consequence of a decree of Augustus that Joseph and Mary went to Bethlehem to be taxed, at the time of Christ's birth. Although Augustus was not fond of the Jews, he favored them from policy, and caused sacrifices to be made daily in the Temple at Jerusalem at his expense. He was friendly to Herod, recognizing that in him he had a valuable ally. Caesarea Philippi and Caesarea by the Sea were built in his honor by Herod. Augustus died A.D. 14, in the 67th year of his age.

2. TIBER'IUS CAE'SAR (ti-bēr'ī-ūs sē'zēr), the 2d Roman emperor (Matt. 22:17; Mark 12:14; Luke 3:1; 20:22; John 19:12), born 42 B.C., the adopted son, also stepson and son-in-law, of Augustus. During his reign Judea was governed by Valerius Gratus and Pontius Pilate. At one time he banished the Jews from Rome, but later recalled the edict, and gave them redress for the severity of the provincial governors. Tiberias, on the Sea of Galilee, was built in his honor by Herod Antipas. His death (A.D. 37) was hastened by Caligula, who succeeded him and reigned until 41.

3. CLAU'DI'US (klō'dī-ūs), the 4th Roman emperor, a weak, vacillating man, a nephew of Tiberius. He became emperor in A.D. 41, but left the real power in the hands of unprincipled favorites. Herod Agrippa I had been in Rome, and had assisted in his coronation, and in consequence was given the whole of Palestine as a mark of favor. In the beginning of his reign Claudius favored the Jews, and reinstated the Alexandrian Jews in their former privileges, but later he banished all Jews from Rome (Acts 18:2). He died A.D. 54, in the 14th year of his reign.

4. NE'RO (nērō), the 5th Roman emperor (Acts 25:12, 21; 26:32; Phil. 4:22), the adopted son of his predecessor Claudius, who secured his own position by poisoning his stepbrother Britannicus. Nero was a monster of lust and cruelty, though, perhaps, his crimes have been exaggerated. In the 10th year of his reign, A.D. 64, a great fire broke out at Rome, in large measure destroying 3 of the 14 districts into which the city was divided. The emperor was believed, apparently on insufficient evidence, to have been himself the incendiary, and was in consequence in danger of his life. To screen himself, he falsely accused the Christians of having caused the fire, and put many of them to cruel deaths, tradition adding that both Paul and Peter were among the sufferers. Finding that he was deserted by his troops, and that he would soon be put to death, he anticipated his fate. Like Saul, he attempted suicide, and, failing, induced one of his supporters to complete the act of slaughter. He died A.D. 68, in the 32d year of his age and the 14th of his reign.

5. TITUS (tītūs), son of Vespasian, and 10th Roman emperor. In A.D. 66, Vespasian was sent to Palestine to quell a revolt of the Jews, and Titus accompanied him. In 69, when Vespasian hurried from Judea to Rome to secure the imperial office for himself, he left Titus in command of the army, and Titus conducted the siege of Jerusalem in A.D. 70 (Jos. War iii. 1, 3 to vii. 3, 1). Titus became emperor in 79, and died in 81, in the 40th year of his age.

Caes'a-re'a (sēs'ā-rē'ā) [pertaining to Caesar]. A city on the coast of Palestine, about 23 miles s. of Mount Carmel and 64 from Jerusalem. It was built by Herod the Great, on the site of a town called Straton's Tower. Twelve years, from 25 to 13 B.C., were spent in its erection. A sea mole was built of huge stones; it was 200 feet wide, stood in 20 fathoms of water, and enclosed a harbor as large as that at Athens. The entrance to the artificial port was on the n., where there was a tower. The city was provided with a temple, a theater, and an amphitheater, and had a complete system of drainage. Herod named the place Caesarea, after his patron Augustus Caesar (Jos. Antiq. xv. 9, 6; War i. 21, 5, seq.). It was sometimes called Caesarea of Palestine, or Caesarea by the Sea, to distinguish it from Caesarea Philippi. It became the Roman capital of Palestine. The gospel was carried thither by Philip the evangelist, who made it his residence (Acts 8:40; 21:8). When Paul, soon after his conversion, was in danger of being murdered by the Jews of Jerusalem, his Christian brethren brought him down to Caesarea, whence he sailed to his birthplace, Tarsus, in Asia Minor (Acts 9:30). It was at Caesarea that the Roman centurion Cornelius lived, to whom Peter preached Christ, and the calling of the Gentiles took place (Acts 10:1, 24; 11:11). Herod Agrippa died at Caesarea in A.D. 44 (Acts 12:19, 23; Jos. Antiq. xix. 8, 2). Paul twice revisited the city, and found a church existing (Acts 18:22; 21:8, 16). He was afterward taken thither as a prisoner (Acts 23:23, 33), and it was there that his trial before Festus and Agrippa took place (ch. 25:1-4, 6-13). The population of the city was mixed, and race jealousies existed to such an extent that in the reign of Nero the Syrians made a wholesale massacre of the Jews, commencing the troubles which culminated in A.D. 70 in the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus (Jos. War ii. 18, 1). In the 2d century A.D. Caesarea became the residence of a bishop, who down to 451 was metropolitan of Palaestina Prima. In 195 a council was held there. A Christian school was established in the city, in which Origen taught and where Eusebius, afterward bishop of Caesarea, was educated. In 548 the Jews and Samaritans joined in assaulting the Christians. In 640 the city was captured by the Mohammedans. In 1101 it was taken by the crusaders, led by Baldwin I. Saladin retook it from them in 1189; the crusaders recovered it in 1191, but lost it to the sultan Baybars in 1265. Caesarea is still called Kaysariyeh.

Caes'are'a Phi-lip'pi (sēs'á-rē'á fī-líp'i) [Caesarea of Philip]. A city at the foot of Mount Hermon, at the main source of the Jordan, and in the angle of a small plain, with hills on all sides except on the w. No spot in Palestine can compare with this in romantic beauty. The worship of the Roman god Pan long prevailed here, and, Herod the Great having built a temple of fine marble near the sacred spot, the place was called Paneas (Jos. Antiq. xv. 10, 3). The town was afterward enlarged and adorned by Philip the tetrarch, and its name altered to Caesarea in honor of the Roman emperor Tiberius Caesar (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 2, 1; War ii. 9, 1). Jesus and his disciples visited it at least once, and it was there that the remarkable conversation took place between him and Peter arising out of the question, "Who do men say that I am?" (Matt. 16:13; Mark 8:27). Agrippa II still further embellished it, and changed the name to Neronias, to compliment the emperor Nero; but on the emperor's death the name speedily lapsed (Jos. Antiq. xx. 9, 4). After the destruction of Jerusalem, Titus exhibited gladiatorial shows in this town also, one part of the spectacle being Jewish captives thrown to the wild beasts, or compelled to encounter each other in deadly warfare (Jos. War vii. 2, 1; 3, 1). The town has dwindled to a small village called Bāniās, an alteration of its early name Paneas.

Cage. A box or basket, Heb. kēlūb, in which birds were kept, especially for purposes of decoy (Jer. 5:27; Ecclus. 11:30). Sennacherib boasts of having shut up Hezekiah in Jerusalem like a bird in a cage.

Ca'ia-phas (kā'yá-fās) [Gr. from Aram.; probably, physiognomist]. Joseph Caiaphas, who was appointed to the high priesthood c. A.D. 18 by Valerius Gratus, the Roman procurator and immediate predecessor of Pontius Pilate (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 2, 2). Caiaphas and his father-in-law Annas (John 18:13) were high priests when John the Baptist began his ministry (Luke 3:2). Caiaphas proposed the death of Jesus, and, speaking of its import more significantly than he was aware, said, "It is expedient for you that one man should die for the people, and that the whole nation perish not" (John 11:49-53; 18:14). At his palace the council of chief priests, scribes, and elders was held to devise measures for the arrest of our Lord (Matt. 26:3-5). When Jesus was apprehended, he was taken first to the palace of Annas, who sent him bound to Caiaphas (John 18:24), whence he was led to the praetorium of Pilate (v. 28). Deeply responsible for the judicial murder of the innocent prisoner, Caiaphas afterward took part in the trial of Peter and John (Acts 4:6). In A.D. 36 he was deposed by Vitellius, the Roman president of Syria (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 4, 2).

Cain (kān) [smith, spear]. 1. The elder brother of Abel, a farmer by occupation. He brought of the fruits of the ground an offering to God, an implied acknowledgment of gratitude to God for the produce of the earth. But the heart of Cain was not right, and his offering was rejected. Then his character was revealed. He showed envy and anger, refused the exhortation to strive against sin, committed murder, denied his guilt; and when judgment was pronounced, gave no evidence of repentance for his sin, but only of fear of the punishment. Sent into exile, he lived in the land of Nod, eastward of Eden. He had a wife, one of the unnamed daughters or granddaughters of Adam. In early ages no impropriety existed or was felt in such a marriage (cf. Gen. 11:27, 29; 20:12). In his exile Cain built a fortified hamlet, and became the progenitor of a race which made considerable progress in the mechanical arts (Gen. 4:1-25).

2. The progenitor of the Kenites. See KAIN 2.

3. A village in the mountains of Judah (Josh. 15:57, A.V.), Khirbet Yaḳīn, 3 miles s.e. of Hebron.

Ca'i-nan (kā-ī'nān). See KENAN.

Ca'lah (kā'lá). A city of Assyria, built by Nimrod or by people from his country (Gen. 10:11, 12). According to Ashurnasirpal (885-860 B.C.) it was built or rebuilt, embellished, and fortified by Shalmaneser I. (1280-1260 B.C.). Early in the 9th century B.C. it had fallen into decay, but was restored by Ashurnasirpal, who erected a palace and made the city the place of royal residence. Calah remained the favorite dwelling place of the Assyrian kings for more than 150 years. Its ruins, now called Nimrūd, lie about 20 miles s. of Nineveh.

Cal'a-mus [Gr. kalamos, a reed]. The rendering of Heb. kāneh bōsem, reed of fragrance, and kaneh, cane, reed, when an odorous variety is intended. The plant was sweet-smelling (S. of Sol. 4:14), a constituent of the anointing oil (Ex. 30:23), and used in connection with sacrifice (Isa. 43:24 and Jer. 6:20, R.V. marg.). It was brought from a far country (Jer. 6:20). The Tyrians obtained it apparently from Javan, the regions of w. Asia Minor, and Greece (Ezek. 27:19). What came from Europe was probably the Acorus calamus, or common sweet sedge. The rhizome, or underground stem, is aromatic. If an Indian plant is permissible, then the calamus was probably the Andropogon calamus aromaticus, a genuine grass, which, like its near ally, the lemon grass, A. schoenanthus, is highly scented.

Cal'col (kā'l'kōl), in A.V. once Chal'col [cf. Arab. kulkul, short and nimble]. One of 3 sons of Mahol, each of whom was celebrated for wisdom (I Kings 4:31; I Chron. 2:6).

Cal'dron. See Por.

Ca'leb (kā'lēb) [dog]. 1. Son of Hezron, and brother of Jerahmeel (I Chron. 2:18, 42). A variant form of the name is Chelubai (I Chron. 2:9). In tribal registration, his posterity constituted a subdivision of the house of Hezron, family of Perez, tribe of Judah (I Sam. 25:3; I Chron. 2:3 seq., R.V.). Among his more immediate descendants were Hur, Aaron's associate, and Hur's grandson, the skilled artificer Bezalel (I Chron. 2:19, 20, R.V.).

2. Son of Jephunneh the Kenizzite and an elder brother of Othniel (Num. 32:12, R.V.; Josh. 15:17; I Chron. 4:15, cf. v. 13). He was the head of a father's house of the tribe of Judah; was one of the 12 men sent to spy out the land of Canaan; was one of the 2 members of this commission who kept their faith in Jehovah, and 40 years later took part in the conquest of Canaan; was, in fact, the first to speak for this minority of 2 (Num., chs. 13; 14; Josh. 14:6-14). He was on the commission appointed by Moses before the conquest to distribute the land, and he represented, as before, the tribe of Judah (Num. 34:19). He was 85 years old when the conquest was completed (Josh. 14:7, 10). He received as his portion the town of Hebron (Josh. 14:14), from which he expelled the Anakim by whom it had been previously occupied (ch. 15:13, 14); see HEBRON 2. He had also to do with the taking of the adjacent town of Kiriath-sepher, or Debir (Josh. 15:15-19). The s. of Caleb mentioned in I Sam. 30:14 was probably the s. of the Hebron district or the vicinity of Debir.

In I Chron. 2:49 (cf. vs. 19, 42, 46) Achsah, the well-known daughter of Caleb the spy, is registered as daughter or descendant of Caleb the brother of Jerahmeel. To judge from this register, Caleb the son of Jephunneh and father of Achsah was descended from the elder Caleb, and perhaps his concubine Maacah, and hence through Hezron and Perez from Judah. There are many details to be accounted for, and the ordinary difficulty of interpreting an ancient Hebrew genealogy is in this case greatly increased by the imperfect state of the text in I Chron., chs. 2; 4. The general explanation probably is that a member of the tribe of Kenizzites became identified with the Israelites by taking service with Judah before the Israelites went into Egypt, and he or his descendant married a woman descended from Judah through Perez. Various modifications of this general theory are possible. All genealogical and historical references and the peculiarities of the register are satisfied by the assumption that shortly before the Exodus Jephunneh the Kenizzite married a woman of the household of Caleb the brother of Jerahmeel and by her had a first-born son to whom was given the family name Caleb. This youth inherited the prerogatives of the family, and in time became head of the house and a chief of Judah. Jephunneh the Kenizzite took a 2d wife, by whom he had Othniel and Seraiah. Hence they are called sons of Kenez or Kenizzites, and are enrolled loosely with the tribe of Judah, and reckoned like Jephunneh as Kenizzites.

Ca'leb-eph'ra'thah (kā'lēb-ēf'rā-thā), in A.V. Ca'leb-eph'ra'tah (kā'lēb-ēf'rā-tā). Named in I Chron. 2:24 as the place where Hezron died, but the accuracy of the Masoretic text has been doubted in this passage. The Vulgate, which except for the proper names follows the LXX, reads: "Now when Hezron was dead, Caleb went in unto Ephrath. Hezron also had Abijah to wife, who bore him Ashhur, the father of Tekoa." On the basis of the LXX some commentators have emended the Hebrew text to read: "And after Hezron was dead, Caleb went in to Ephrath [v. 19] his father Hezron's wife, and she bare him," etc. The taking of a father's wife signified a claim to the father's possessions (cf. II Sam. 16:22; I Kings 2:13-25), and thus, according to this interpretation, was expressed the legitimacy of Caleb's residence in n. Judah (cf. I Chron. 2:18-24 with vs. 42-55).

Ca'en'dar. See YEAR.

Calf. A young bull or cow, Bos taurus. Calves were killed for food and for sacrifice. Aaron made a golden image of a male calf that the people might worship Jehovah under this form (Ex. 32:4; cf. Neh. 9:18). The young bull symbolized vigor, strength, and endurance (cf. Num. 23:22); and the choice of this animal rather than another to represent God was favored also by the pomp of the bull worship in Egypt. On the division of the kingdom, Jeroboam instituted the calf worship anew, setting up 2 calves, one at Beth-el and one at Dan (I Kings 12:29). He probably had seen the bull Apis worshiped in Egypt while he was a refugee at the court of Shishak (I Kings 11:40), but he was influenced more by the desire to adhere to ancient traditions, for in recommending the calves he quoted the words of Ex. 32:4. Among the Canaanites, Aramaeans, and Hittites we find gods nearly always represented as standing on the back of an animal or as seated on a throne borne by animals. It is better, therefore, to suppose that Jeroboam represented Jehovah as an invisible figure standing on a young bull of gold.

Cal'neh (kā'l'nē). 1. A city of Babylonia, belonging to the kingdom of Nimrod (Gen. 10:10), not identified. Kulunu, the early name of an important city near Babylon, may be meant. Nippur has also been suggested. It may be that Calneh stands for -kalama in Hursagkalama, a twin city of Kish.

2. Calneh, linked with Hamath and Gath (Amos 6:2), is probably Kullani, modern Kullanhu, 6 miles from Arpad.

Cal'no (kāl'nō). A city which the Assyrians cited as an example of the futility of offering resistance to Assyria (Isa. 10:9), probably same as Calneh 2.

Cal'va-ry (kāl'vá-rī) [Lat. calvaria, skull]. A place close to Jerusalem, but outside the city walls, where Christ was crucified, and in the vicinity of which he was buried (John 19:17, 20, 41; Heb. 13:11-13). It appears to have been a conspicuous spot (Mark 15:40; Luke 23:49), and was perhaps near a highway (Matt. 27:39). The name is derived from Lat. calvaria, (Luke 23:33), translating Gr. kranion, skull, which is the rendering of Golgotha (Aram. Gulgultā; Heb. Gulgōleth, skull). (Matt. 27:33; Mark 15:22; John 19:17, 41.) Jerome supposed that the name arose from uncovered or unburied skulls; others have thought rather of a place of execution. The common explanation is that the name was due to the cranial shape of the rock or hillock, although the expression "Mount Calvary" is modern.

The question of the site of the crucifixion is involved with that of the location of the sepulcher. Two sites contend for acceptance: 1. The Church of the Holy Sepulcher, within the walls of the modern city. 2. The Green Hill, or Gordon's Calvary, in which is Jeremiah's Grotto, about 250 yards n.e. of the Damascus Gate. The Church of the Holy Sepulcher has ancient tradition in its favor. Eusebius, born in Caesarea about A.D. 264, is the earliest historian who gives any information on the subject. He states that impious men had covered the sepulcher with earth and built a temple to the goddess Venus over it, and that the place had long been given over to forgetfulness and oblivion. Constantine erected a church where the temple of Venus stood, and the site of Constantine's building is occupied by the present Church of the Holy Sepulcher. While this site has the support of tradition, we cannot tell definitely whether the 2d wall ran n. or s. of the spot on which this church stands. Josephus (Jos. War v. 4, 2) has been interpreted as implying that the n. wall ran to the s. of this site. The whole region lies under the modern city where excavation has been impossible.

The theory that the hill above Jeremiah's Grotto marks the site of Calvary was suggested by Otto Thenius in 1849 and has been adopted or independently reached by other scholars, and greatly elaborated. According to modern Jewish tradition, criminals were here stoned to death. The hill in which is Jeremiah's Grotto admittedly rises beyond the course of the 2d wall. The rounded summit of the hill, and the 2 hollow cave entrances beneath, present a striking resemblance to a skull. Its commanding position renders it visible from a distance. Near it was the great highway to the n. In the neighborhood are gardens and rock-hewn tombs. But no ancient tradition connects the crucifixion with this place, and the arguments are not conclusive.

Cam'el [Lat. camelus, from Gr. kamēlos, from Heb. and Phoenician gāmāl]. The one-humped camel, the dromedary, has two well-marked varieties: the camel properly so called, which is a slow-going draft animal (II Kings 8:9), and the dromedary in the restricted sense, which is swift of foot (cf. Isa. 66:20, R.V.) and can cover 8 to 10 miles an hour and keep going for 18 hours out of the 24. The Bactrian or two-humped camel comes from the plateau of central Asia. The camel has been called the ship of the desert, and its whole organization fits it to cross sandy wastes. It is a ruminating animal, but does not have a cloven hoof; the foot is enveloped in a hardened skin, enclosing the cushionlike soles, which are adapted to walking over the sand without sinking deeply. Another adaptation is that in the walls of the paunch or 1st stomach there are 2 collections of water cells on which the animal can draw when no other water is procurable. Yet another adaptation is its ability to subsist on the poorest food. Even the hump is another adaptation. It is a storehouse of food, and becomes larger or smaller according as the animal is in good or in bad condition. The camel is stupid, ill-tempered, and sometimes vindictive; but its passive obedience and power of endurance render it very valuable. It is not now anywhere found wild, nor has it been known wild in historical times. Abraham and Jacob had camels (Gen. 12:16; 30:43), and so had later nomads in the s. of Palestine (I Sam. 27:9; II Chron. 14:15). The Ishmaelites who bought Joseph also had camels (Gen. 37:25). The camel was not, however, so much at home in Palestine, which is a hilly country, as in the Arabian and the African deserts (Ex. 9:3; Judg. 6:5; I Kings 10:2; I Chron. 5:18-21). But it is still bred abundantly on the plains of Moab and in the s. of Judea. The milk was used (cf. Gen. 32:15), but the animal was ceremonially unclean (Lev. 11:4). From its hair a coarse cloth was woven, which was sometimes made into clothing (Matt. 3:4) and used for tents. The burden was borne on the hump (Isa. 30:6). When the camel is ridden, a saddle is commonly used, and sometimes a palanquin (cf. Gen. 31:34). The Arabs commonly deck their camels' necks with ornaments (cf. Judg. 8:21, 26).

Camel

Ca'mon (kā'mōn). See KAMON.

Camp. The station of an army or other body of people, where temporary structures are erected for their accommodation (Ex. 14:19; I Sam. 4:5; 17:4; II Kings 7:7). Strict regulations were prescribed for the army of Israel in order to secure cleanliness in their camp (Deut. 23:9-14). The arrangement of the camp of the migrating Hebrew nation, which was adopted for the journey through the wilderness, is described in Num. 1:47 to 2:34; 3:14-39; cf. ch. 10:11-28, and see SHITTIM 1. It was, of course, absolutely regular only when the people were encamped on a broad, level plain. For the encampments of Israel during the journey through the wilderness, see WILDERNESS OF THE WANDERING.

Cam'phire [variant of English camphor; Fr. camphre, from Medieval Lat. camphora, from Arab. kāfir, from Malay kāpir]. The rendering of Heb. kōpher in S. of Sol. 1:14; 4:13, A.V. See HENNA.

Ca'na (kā'nā) [Gr. Kana, probably from Heb. Kānāh, place of reeds; cf. Heb. kāneh, reed]. A village, more fully named Cana of Galilee, where Jesus wrought his first miracle, making water wine (John 2:1-11), and healed the nobleman's son at Capernaum (ch. 4:46). Nathanael was of Cana (John 21:2). Possibly the words, "Of Galilee," are added to this Cana to distinguish it from another in Colesyria (Jos. Antiq. xv. 5, 1). Josephus also mentions Cana of Galilee (Jos. Life 16, 71). The traditional site is Kefr Kenna, a village about  $3\frac{1}{4}$  miles n.e. of Nazareth, on the road to Tiberias. It is more probably to be identified with Khirbet Kānā or Kānā el-Jelī, about 8 miles n. of Nazareth.

Canaan (kā'nān), in A.V. of N.T. twice Cha'naan [Heb., probably from Hurrian, belonging to (the land of) Purple]. 1. Son of Ham and grandson of Noah; or better, the descendants of Ham who occupied Canaan and took their name from that country (Gen. 9:18, 22; 10:6). This expresses the domination of Egypt over the land, as was the case especially during Dyns. XVIII and XIX; the Egyptians, however, had penetrated the land long before that time.

which is found a fully developed ceramic art of definitely Chalcolithic type. The Neolithic period is dated approximately in the 6th and 5th millenniums B.C.; the Sub-Chalcolithic probably falls in the late 5th millennium, while the Lower Chalcolithic begins about the 1st quarter of the 4th millennium, and the Upper Chalcolithic about the 3d quarter of that millennium. The Early Bronze period begins about the 32d century B.C. and continues to the 22d. Middle Bronze extends from this period to the 16th century. The Late Bronze periods continue from this point to the 13th century B.C. and are followed by the Iron Age. See BRONZE.

The political situation in Syria and Palestine during the 3d millennium B.C. is still very obscure. There were contacts with Babylonia in the days of Lugal-zaggisi and Sargon; Gudea secured building material from Syria. See BABYLONIA. During the 3d Dyn. of Egypt, Zoser and Snefru procured cedars from Lebanon. In the 12th Dyn., Sinuhe fled from Egypt to Palestine and gave an excel-

2. Canaan, the old and native name of Palestine, is of doubtful origin. In the Amarna correspondence of the 14th century B.C., "Land of Canaan" is applied to the Phoenician coast; the Egyptians called all W. Syria by this name. According to Josh. 11:3, Canaanites dwelt both in the e. and w. part of the land; according to Judg. 1:9, 10, they were everywhere, in the hill country, the Negeb, the Shephelah, and Hebron. The language of Canaan (Isa. 19:18) refers to the group of W. Semitic languages of which Hebrew, Phoenician, and Moabite were dialects.

The land of Canaan formed the geographical center of the great Egypto-Mesopotamian civilization, within whose domain there was always an active movement of cultural elements which tended to create an almost imperceptible synthesis. Remains of the Paleolithic Age are found in Canaan, and we can trace the principal steps in the evolution of human culture from degenerate Mesolithic through an Early Neolithic stage without pottery to a Late Neolithic phase in which the first crude pottery was made. During the Neolithic period men dwelt in caves, which in the Bronze Age became tombs or were converted into storehouses or cisterns. After the Neolithic Age comes a period in lent account of the country. He found a home with Ammi-enshi, an Amorite, and met other Egyptians, who were either exiles or traders. He maintains that he urged submission to Sesostriis I. Both Sesostriis II (1906-1887) and III (1887-1849) invaded Syria.

The most important historical problem connected with the Middle Bronze period is that of the Hyksos, who seem to have been Canaanites. Although they were Semites, some of them may have been Hittites, Luvians, and Hurrians. The Hyksos names, for the most part, are Semitic. The Hyksos were loosely organized in a kind of feudal state with an aristocracy of equestrian knights. After their expulsion from Egypt, Syria and Canaan were included in the Empire of Egypt, which was founded by Thutmose III (alone, 1482-1450). Amenhotep III (1412-1375) had a long and peaceful reign, but the Egyptian power in Canaan began to wane. Under Amenhotep IV (Akhnaton, 1387-1366), long a coregent with his father, the decay set in when the Hittites came in from the n. and the Habiru invaded the whole e. border of Syria. See HEBREW.

The Hebrews conquered Canaan under the leadership of Joshua after the death of Moses.

The date of the Israelite conquest still remains obscure and from the present available data cannot be fixed precisely. According to the view of some archaeologists, the main wave of destruction fell in the 13th century; thus Canaanite Lachish fell about 1230 B.C. Garstang dates the fall of Jericho c. 1400, while others favor between c. 1360 and c. 1320. The plan of the campaign included the establishment of a fixed camp at Gilgal. The site was on the e. of Jericho, in the plain (Josh. 4:19; 5:10). From it the Israelites went up to Ai and Gibeon (Josh. 7:3; 8:1, 3; 10:9). The advantages of this location for the camp of Israel were great. At Gilgal, Joshua had no enemies in his rear, had water in abundance for the people, could draw supplies from the 2½ tribes which had settled in the country e. of the Jordan, and had a safe place for hoarding spoil. The characteristic objects in this camp were the tabernacle (Josh. 6:24; cf. 9:23; 18:1; 22:19); the Ark (chs. 3:17; 6:11, etc.; 7:6); the altar (ch. 9:27; cf. ch. 22:19, 28, 29); Eleazar the priest (ch. 14:1), besides other priests (chs. 6:6, 12, etc.; 8:33); 12 stones which had been taken out of the bed of the Jordan and set up as a memorial of the passage of the river (ch. 4:20). Joshua's plan further included a preliminary campaign for the overthrow of the enemies which threatened the camp. He took Jericho, the outpost of Canaan, and then he marched into the mountain, directly to the w., and overthrew Ai. This town lay at the head of the valley which emerged opposite Gilgal, and from it troops might be poured down against the camp. After this preliminary campaign he fulfilled the injunction of Moses to erect an altar on Ebal (Josh. 8:30-35; Deut., ch. 27). According to Josephus, this solemnity was performed after the conquest of the entire country (Jos. Antiq. v. 1, 19). At this juncture ambassadors from the town of Gibeon appeared, with whom Joshua made a treaty without asking counsel of the Lord. It was an unfortunate step, as will be shown presently. Having obtained secure foothold in the country, Joshua proceeded to conquer Canaan in 2 campaigns. The alliance of the 5 kings determined the s. expedition (Josh., ch. 10). The king of Jerusalem summoned the kings of Hebron, Lachish, Eglon, and Jarmuth to war against Gibeon; and Joshua was obliged to help those with whom he was in treaty. The 5 kings were routed, and fled down the pass of Beth-horon. Following up the victory, Joshua captured Makkedah, in or near the maritime plain, and pitched a temporary camp there; took Libnah, which was likewise in the plain; Lachish, where the king of Gezer also was defeated; Eglon, where another temporary camp was fixed; and Hebron. From Hebron he turned and smote Debir, in the hill country. Thus the entire region included between Gibeon, Gaza, and Kadesh-barnea was smitten, and Joshua returned to Gilgal.

It was during this campaign that Joshua bade the sun stand still (Josh. 10:12-15). This event is cited from the Book of Jashar, a book of poems or songs. See SUN.

Having conquered the central region and the s., Joshua determined as a matter of expediency, or under compulsion of the n. confederacy, to neglect the inconsiderable towns on the coast n. of the Philistine country, and to strike at the populous and powerful n. (Josh., ch. 11). With this end in view, he undertook a n. campaign. The king of Hazor was head of a confederacy of petty monarchs, and on hearing of the Israelitish victories in the s. he summoned the remaining kings of the country to a united attempt to crush Joshua. The allied armies met at the waters of Merom. Joshua had reached the same neighborhood, and he attacked them. He routed them, pursued the fugitives as far as Sidon toward the n.w. and e. to Mizpeh. He then returned, captured and burned the town of Hazor, and took the capitals of the other petty kingdoms which had been in alliance. In Josh. 11:16 to 12:24 a summary of the conquest is given.

The power of the Canaanites was broken by these campaigns, but the inhabitants were not wholly exterminated. Many of the natives remained. Important towns were left in the possession of the Canaanitish population (Josh. 11:13; 15:63; 16:10, etc.); and even where the destruction was most complete, not a few of the people had escaped by flight or hiding and, when the army of Israel withdrew (ch. 10:43), they returned, rebuilt ruined towns, and placed the wasted fields once more under cultivation. Years afterward, when the tribes of Israel scattered over the country in order to settle, they met with sporadic resistance (Judg., ch. 2; see HEBRON 2, JOSHUA 1).

The time occupied in the conquest of Canaan was long, because not a city made peace with Israel save the 5 cities of the Gibeonites (Josh. 11:18, 19). It may be calculated with a considerable degree of accuracy. From the sending forth of the spies in the 2d year (Num. 13:17-20) to the time of assigning the reconquest of Hebron to Caleb when the land was about to be distributed was 45 years (Josh. 14:7, 10); from the sending forth of the spies to the crossing of the Zered was 38 years (Deut. 2:14); leaving for the conquest of the country, both e. and w. of the Jordan, about 6 or 7 years. From this is to be deducted the time consumed in the conquest of the e. country and by the events at Shittim. The death of Aaron (Num. 33:38) occurred in the 40th year, 5th month, 1st day, and the crossing of Jordan (Josh. 4:19) in the 1st month, 10th day; leaving for the conquest of the country of Sihon and Og, and for the events at Shittim, nearly 8 months, 9 days, of which period the events at Shittim occupied about 2 months (cf. Deut. 1:3, 4, with Josh. 4:19; Deut. 34:8; Josh. 2:22, etc.; Jos. Antiq. iv. 8, 49 and iv. 8, 1), leaving for the conquest of w. Palestine 5 or 6 years. Josephus assigns 5 years to this conquest (Jos. Antiq. v. 1, 19).

Three political blunders were committed by Joshua: making a treaty with the Gibeonites; allowing the Jebusites to hold Jerusalem (Josh. 15:63); and failing to dispossess the Philistines and control the country to the sea. A study of the map shows that, as a result of these mistakes, Judah and Simeon were isolated from the rest of the nation. The main road from Judah to the n. was commanded by the Jebusite stronghold at Jerusalem, and was skirted for 10 miles on the w. by the settlements of the Gibeonites. Between Jerusalem and Jericho on the e. was a tract of wild, rocky, uninhabited mountain land crossed e. and w. by impassable gorges. From Jerusalem to the Mediterranean Sea stretched a strip of country which was occupied by foreigners: first Gibeonites, next Canaanites in Dan, then Philistines as far as the sea. The consequences of this isolation of Judah and Simeon were serious, distinctly affecting the course of history in the years that followed.

Was the extermination of the Canaanites by the Israelites a justifiable act? The mere matter of their dispossessing the Canaanites presents no moral difficulties. This procedure accorded with the spirit of the age. The Israelites doubtless had as much right to Canaan as had the inhabitants whom they drove out. Nor does the manner of warfare present moral difficulties, for the conduct of the Hebrews in war compares favorably with the practices of the time. Judged by the standards of their own age, they were not blood-thirsty or cruel. The Assyrians have pictured their own wars. It was not infrequent for them to decapitate the inhabitants of captured cities, and pile the heads in heaps; to crucify or impale prisoners, pierce their eyeballs with a spear, or flay them alive. In the battles of Israel with the Canaanites there is record of death, but not of torture. The moral difficulty connected with the extermination of the Canaanites is that God commanded it. God's character is involved. But it is to be remembered that God had a twofold end in view in the utter extermination by death and expulsion which he commanded. It was punitive (Gen. 15:16; Lev. 18:25; Deut. 9:3, 4; 18:12) and preventive (Ex. 23:31-33; 34:12-16; Deut. 7:2-4). It was to punish the Canaanites for their outrageous wickedness, and to prevent them from contaminating the people of God. It is not asserted that the Canaanites were sinners above all men that ever lived. Their personal morals were perhaps not worse than those of other heathen as described in Rom., ch. 1. The Canaanites were idolaters, they indulged in shameful and abominable vice, they went beyond other nations in practicing human sacrifice. God holds nations as well as individuals responsible, and deals with them accordingly. He doomed the nations of Canaan to extermination as a punishment for their wickedness, and to prevent them from seducing the people of God. He had exterminated the wicked race of men in the days of Noah by the Flood; he had swept away the iniquitous cities of the Plain by an eruption, it would seem, of burning naphtha; he had overthrown Pharaoh and his host in the Red Sea; he had destroyed Korah and his rebellious crew by an earthquake and by fire. Now, instead of using the forces of nature to effect his punitive ends, he employed the Israelites as the ministers of his justice, as the public executioner, employed by the civil tribunal, is the minister of human justice. This truth was taught to the Israelites. They were informed that they were the instruments of divine justice. For these reasons the extermination of the Canaanites by the Israelites was just; the employment of the Israelites for the purpose was right; and in connection with the righteous judgment was an intention to benefit the world. The failure of the Israelites to carry out God's command fully was one of the great blunders which they committed, as well as a sin, and it resulted in lasting injury to the nation.

The distribution of the conquered territory on the w. of the Jordan was made partly at Gilgal and partly at Shiloh, whither the tabernacle was removed (Josh. 14:1, 2, 6; 18:1, 2). It was conducted by Eleazar the priest, Joshua, and 10 heads of fathers' houses (Josh. 17:4; cf. Num. 34:17, 18), and was made by lot (Josh. 18:6). The law to govern the distribution had already been enacted; namely, to the more numerous a larger inheritance, and whosoever the lot fell to any man (Num. 26:52-56; 33:54). The rabbis state that 2 urns were used: in one were placed tickets with the names of the tribes, and in the other were tickets with the names of the districts. A tribe was drawn and the district which it should possess. The size of the territory was then determined by the populousness of the tribe. Probably, however, the commission selected a district without narrowly defining its boundaries, and merely determined by lot what tribe should possess it; for: 1. Compare the form of the question in Judg. 1:1. 2. This theory satisfies

Num. 33:54. 3. Compare Josh. 18:1-10, where the land is first described in 7 portions, and Joshua then cast lots for the tribes. 4. This theory also satisfies Josh. 19:1, etc., where it is stated that at the final allotment the 2d lot came out for Simeon, the 3d for Zebulun, etc. 5. The districts were assigned for occupation, not as though determined by lot, but in regular order, building up the nation compactly as the allotment proceeded, and not leaping hither and thither. 6. Much was evidently left to the discretion of the supervisors. Caleb must have Hebron whether the lot of the main body of the tribe of Judah allowed it to settle in that neighborhood or not. Jacob's last wishes would be observed so far as the lot permitted (Gen., ch. 49), though the lot did not permit Zebulun to possess the seacoast, but his possession was doubtless adjusted as nearly as possible to the patriarch's desire. Mistakes were made and rectified. Before the allotment was completed—and it was not carried out in a day or a week—Judah reported that it had been granted too much territory. The surplus was accordingly added to the undistributed domain. The children of Joseph, on the other hand, informed Joshua that they had received too little land, and they asked for and received more. It was intended, in accordance with Jacob's wish, that Ephraim and Manasseh should dwell side by side; hence the lot was not cast for them separately, but for them unitedly as the children of Joseph (Josh. 16:1, 4). In this manner the nation was compactly built up, the territory which lay nearest the camp being distributed first.

Can'naan-ite (kā'nān-īt). 1. An inhabitant of Canaan, of Semitic stock. On account of the long domination of the land of Canaan by Egypt, Canaan is called a son of Ham (cf. Gen. 10:6, 15-20). The Canaanites were doomed to destruction on account of their sins (Deut. 20:17). But the Israelites to a certain extent failed to carry out the injunction. They in many cases contented themselves with putting the Canaanite inhabitants to tribute (Judg. 1:27-36). Solomon levied on them a tribute of bond service; in other words, he made them perform forced labor (1 Kings 9:20, 21). The Canaanites eventually devoted themselves extensively to trade, and their name became synonymous with trader (Isa. 23:8).

2. A member of a Jewish patriotic party. See CANANAEAN.

Ca'naan-it'ess (kā'nān-it'ēs). A woman of Canaan (I Chron. 2:3).

Ca'na-nae'an (kā'nā-nē'ān), in A.V. Ca'naan-ite [Lat. from Gr. Kananaïos, prob. for Kannaïos, from Aram. kanā'āh, kan'ānā, kanay, zealot, zealous; but it may be from Aram. Kānānay, one from Cana (of Galilee)]. A member of a Jewish patriotic party, also known by the synonymous Greek name Zealot (q.v.). Simon the apostle bore this epithet to distinguish him from Simon Peter (Matt. 10:4; cf. Mark 3:18; cf. Luke 6:15; Acts 1:13).

Can'dace (kā'n'dō-sē). A queen of Ethiopia, probably of Meroë, in s. Nubia. A eunuch of great authority at her court, when returning home from a visit to Jerusalem, where he had gone to worship, was converted to Christianity through the instrumentality of Philip the evangelist (Acts 8:26-39). Strabo, Dion Cassius, and Pliny, all concur in stating that Meroë in the first century of the Christian era was governed by a succession of queens, each called Candace.

Can'dle. See LAMP.

Can'dle-stick'. A stand for a candle. That in the tabernacle was for lamps. It consisted of a base and a shaft with 6 branches, beaten out of solid gold, and it supported 7 lamps. It stood on the s. side of the sanctuary (Ex. 25:31-40; 40:24; Lev. 24:2-4). Pure olive oil was used in the lamps, and the light burned from evening to morning (Ex. 27:20, 21; 30:7, 8; I Sam. 3:3). According to Josephus, 3 of the lamps were allowed to burn by day (Jos. Antiq. iii. 8, 3). This continuous burning apparently symbolized the uninterrupted worship, even by night, and the unceasing emission of light, by the people of God (cf. Zech., ch. 4). This candelabrum was perhaps deposited in the Temple (I Kings 8:4). Solomon made 10 candlesticks, 5 for the right and 5 for the left of the oracle (I Kings 7:49; II Chron. 4:7). They were carried away to Babylon (Jer. 52:19). Zerubbabel had but one; this was carried off by Antiochus Epiphanes (I Macc. 1:20, 21). Replaced (I Macc. 4:49), it continued in use till the capture of Jerusalem by Titus, when it was taken to Rome, figured in Titus' triumph, and was sculptured on his arch (Jos. War vii. 5, 5).

Cane [Lat., canna, from Gr. kanna, of Semitic origin; cf. Heb. kāneh, reed]. The rendering of Heb. kāneh in Isa. 43:24 and Jer. 6:20. In both places R.V. marg. renders it "calamus," and so it is elsewhere translated in both versions, where a specific odorous cane is intended.

Can'ker-worm'. The rendering of Hebrew yelek in Joel and Nahum, and in R.V. of Jer. 51:27; also in E.R.V. Ps. 105:34. In the two latter passages A.V. has "caterpillars." It is very destructive to growing crops. As it is mentioned with the typical locust (Joel 1:4; Nahum 3:15), which it resembles also in the numbers in which it appears (Joel 2:25), it is probably a locust of some species or the locust in the larva or pupa stage of development.

Can'neh (kā'n'ē). A place, evidently in Mesopotamia, perhaps the same as Calneh (Ezek. 27:23).

Can'on [Gr. kanōn, from Phoenician kānā' or Heb. kāneh, stalk, reed]. The meaning of the word was extended to denote: 1. any straight rod, such as a measuring rod or rule used in building; 2. figuratively, a norm or standard which serves to regulate or determine other things, especially classical books; a guide or model (II Cor. 10:13-16; Gal. 6:16); 3. a type of Christian doctrine, the orthodox as opposed to the heterodox; 4. the Scriptures viewed as a rule of faith and conduct. The word is Greek and was first used in this 4th sense by the early fathers, but the idea denoted was ancient. A book entitled to a place in the Bible is called canonical; one not so entitled, uncanonical; and title to a place, canonicity.

The Old Testament canon. Authoritative literature grew up by degrees and was carefully preserved. The Ten Commandments, written on tables of stone, Israel's constitution, were deposited in the Ark (Ex. 40:20). The statutes were recorded in the Book of the Covenant (Ex. 20:23 to 23:33; 24:7). The Book of the Law, written by Moses, was put by the side of the Ark (Deut. 31:24-26). Joshua made his addition to the collection (Josh. 24:26). Samuel wrote "the manner of the kingdom . . . in a book, and laid it up before Jehovah" (I Sam. 10:25). In the days of Josiah the Book of the Law of Jehovah was found in the Temple and recognized by king, priests, prophets, and people, as authoritative and ancient (II Kings 22:8-20). Copies of the Law were made (Deut. 17:18-20). Prophets committed their words to writing (e.g., Jer. 36:32), and they were acquainted with each other's writings and quoted them as authority (cf. Isa. 2:2-4 with Micah 4:1-3). The Law and the words of the prophets were recognized as authoritative, inspired by the Spirit of God, and jealously guarded by Jehovah (Zech. 1:4; 7:7, 12).

Eventually there were three parts of the O.T.: the Tōrah (Law or Pentateuch); the Nēb'im (Prophets); and the Kethūbim (Writings, or Hagiographa). These divisions are fixed in the Hebrew canon, and no book may be transferred from one section to another. In the Hebrew canon the Pentateuch has the same order of books as in the English Bible. The Prophets are divided into the Former and the Latter. The Former, according to the Hebrew order, contain 4 books: Joshua, Judges, I and II Samuel, I and II Kings. The Latter consist of the Major (3 books: Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel) and the Twelve or the Minor, which follow directly after Ezekiel and have the same order as in the English Bible. The Major Prophets are so called because their books are larger than those of the Minor. In reckoning the number of books in the Hebrew Bible, the Twelve are counted as one book. The Prophets are followed by the Writings, the 11 books of which have the following order: Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Song of Solomon, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel, Ezra-Nehemiah, I and II Chronicles. This gives a total of 24 books in the Hebrew canon.

The canon of the O.T. in the English Bible contains the same books as the Hebrew Bible, but by counting each of the double books as 2 instead of one and the Twelve as actually 12 separate books, the number is raised to 39. Ruth (1:1) follows Judges, and Lamentations, which is ascribed to Jeremiah, is put after that prophet's book. It is especially noteworthy that Daniel is reckoned with the Prophets, and placed directly after Ezekiel. With the exclusion of the Apocryphal works, the order of books in the English Bible follows that of the Vulgate, which in turn was influenced by the LXX. The O.T. canon in the English Bible accordingly may be divided into 4 parts: the Pentateuch, historical books (Joshua to Esther); poetical books (Job to Song of Solomon, of which 3, Job, Proverbs, and Ecclesiastes, are wisdom literature); and the Prophets (Isaiah to Malachi). Daniel here occupies a place between the Major and the Minor Prophets.

The Law of Moses, comprising the five books of Moses, circulated as a distinct portion of the sacred literature in the time of Ezra. It was in Ezra's hand (Ezra 7:14), and he was a ready scribe in it (vs. 6, 11). At the request of the people, he read the book publicly to them (Neh. 8:1, 5, 8). About this time also, before the schism between the Jews and Samaritans had become final, the Pentateuch was taken to Samaria. The arrangement of the Minor Prophets into a group of 12 is attested by Jesus, son of Sirach, as in vogue c. 200 B.C. (Ecclus. 49:10). His language further suggests the great group of books—Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the Twelve—which constitute the 2d division of the Hebrew canon. The existence of the threefold division of all the Scriptures into "the law, the prophets, and the others that have followed in their steps," or "the law, the prophets, and the other books," or, "the law, the prophecies, and the rest of the books," is attested as early as 132 B.C., by the grandson of Jesus, son of Sirach (Ecclus. Prologue). Reference is made in a passage which dates from c. 100 B.C. to "the sacred books which are now in our hands" (I Macc. 12:9). Philo Judaeus, who was born at Alexandria c. 20 B.C., and died there in the reign of Claudius, had the present canon, and quotes from nearly all the books while he cites nothing from the Apocrypha.

The N.T. refers to "the Scriptures" as a body of authoritative writings (Matt. 21:42; 26:56; Mark 14:49; John 10:35; II Tim. 3:16), as holy (Rom. 1:2; II Tim. 3:15), and as the oracles of God (Rom. 3:2; Heb. 5:12; I Peter 4:11); mentions a threefold division into "the law of Moses, and the prophets, and the psalms" (Luke 24:44); and quotes from or refers to all the books except Obadiah and Nahum, Ezra and Nehemiah, Esther, Song of Solomon, and Ecclesiastes. Josephus, a contemporary of the Apostle Paul, writing about A.D. 100, and speaking for his nation, says in substance: "We have but twenty-two books, containing the history of all time, books that are justly believed in," or, according to the usual reading, "believed to be divine," and he speaks in the strongest terms of the exclusive authority of these writings, continuing: "From the days of Artaxerxes to our own times every event has indeed been recorded; but these recent records have not been deemed worthy of equal credit with those which preceded them, on account of the failure of the exact succession of the prophets. There is practical proof of the spirit in which we treat our Scriptures; for although so great an interval of time has now passed, not a soul has ventured either to add or to remove or to alter a syllable, and it is the instinct of every Jew, from the day of his birth, to consider these Scriptures as the teaching of God, and to abide by them and, if need be, cheerfully to lay down his life in their behalf" (Jos. Apion i. 8). Josephus states the contents of Scripture under three heads: 1. "Five belong to Moses, which contain his laws and the traditions of the origin of mankind till his death." 2. "From the death of Moses to Artaxerxes, the prophets who were after Moses wrote down what was done in their time in thirteen books." Josephus probably followed the arrangement of LXX and the enumeration of the Alexandrians. The 13 books are probably Joshua, Judges with Ruth, Samuel, Kings, Chronicles, Ezra with Nehemiah, Esther, Job, Daniel, Isaiah, Jeremiah with Lamentations, Ezekiel, the Twelve, or the Minor, Prophets. 3. "The remaining four books contain hymns to God and precepts for the conduct of human life." These were doubtless Psalms, Song of Solomon, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes.

So far facts. There was also a tradition current that the canon was arranged in the time of Ezra and Nehemiah. Josephus, as already cited, expresses the universal or traditional belief of his countrymen that no books had been added since the time of Artaxerxes—that is, since the time of Ezra and Nehemiah. An extravagant legend of the latter part of the 1st century of the Christian Era (II Esdras, ch. 14) grew out of the current tradition that Ezra restored the Law and even the entire O.T. (vs. 21, 22, 40), of which the Temple copies had been lost. It attests that the Jews of Palestine in that age reckoned the canonical books at 24 (24+70=94; vs. 44-46, R.V. The 70 were not published). A passage of doubtful date and authenticity, perhaps penned about 100 B.C. (II Macc. 2:13), alludes to Nehemiah's activity in connection with the 2d and 3d divisions of the canon. Irenaeus transmits the tradition thus: "After the sacred writings had been destroyed in the Exile under Nebuchadnezzar, when the Jews after seventy years had returned to their own country, he [i.e., God] in the days of Artaxerxes inspired Ezra the priest, of the tribe of Levi, to rearrange all the words of the prophets who had gone before, and to restore to the people the legislation of Moses." Elias Levita, writing in 1538, states the belief of his people in this wise: "In Ezra's time the twenty-four books were not yet united in a single volume. Ezra and his associates united them together and divided them into three parts, the Law, the Prophets, and the Hagiographa." This tradition contains truth. Whether it can be accepted in toto depends on the settlement of the date when certain books were written, such as Nehemiah and Chronicles; a number of critical problems in other books must also be considered.

The Pentateuch as the work of Moses, and as embodying the fundamental law of the nation, formed one division of the canon, and with chronological fitness occupied the first place in the collection. To the 2d division were assigned the Prophets, as noted above. For Joshua, regarded as a prophet, see Ecclus. 46:1. It is erroneous to suppose that all the writings included in the 3d division were composed after the 2d, or prophetic, collection had been closed. The books of this section form a group distinct in subject matter from those of the Law and the Prophets; its nucleus consists of the books of wisdom and poetry. These works attracted to themselves other authoritative literature, especially books late in composition or different in content from the Law and the Prophets. Although the distinction between lawgiver, priest, prophet, and wise man is ancient and the tripartite division of Scripture is logical and early, it must be admitted that the 3d division may have been longest in closing.

Lamentations, though ascribed to a prophet, yet being poetry, found its place in the 3d division of the Hebrew canon. An additional reason existed for separating it from Jeremiah. It was read on the anniversary of the destruction of both Temples, and hence was put with 4 other short books which were read on 4 other anniversaries, Song of Solomon, Ruth, Ecclesiastes, and Esther. They constitute the 5 rolls or Megilloth. Daniel was placed here because written by a man who, although gifted with prophecy, was not by office a prophet. In all probability Chronicles was written, not by a prophet, but by a priest; hence it belonged in the 3d division of the canon. The mere fact of its late authorship does not account for its place in this division, for books and sections of books in this division were in existence before Zechariah and Malachi, which were put in the 2d division. It is proper to add that while the contents of the several divisions of the canon were fixed, the order of the books in the 3d section varied from time to time; and even in the 2d part the Talmud knew Isaiah as standing between Ezekiel and the Minor Prophets.

It may be concluded that the Law was canonized c. 444 B.C.; the Prophets, c. 200 B.C.; and the Writings, c. 100 B.C. The canon, however, was determined by long and approved usage of books and not by the formal action of an assembly. As late as the close of the 1st century A.D., and even later, the right of several books (such as Ezekiel, Proverbs, Song of Solomon, Ecclesiastes, Esther) to remain in the canon was discussed. The books were in the canon—none questioned that. The discussions concerned the contents of the books and difficulties in reconciling them with other books; but the debates were probably merely academic. By the time of the Council of Jamnia (A.D. 90) the canon without doubt was in its present form and approved by the rabbis. J. D. D. (rev. and rewritten, H. S. G.)

Canon of the New Testament. The Apostolic Church received from the Jewish the belief in a written rule of faith. Christ himself confirmed this belief by appealing to the O.T. as the written word of God (e.g., John 5:37-47; Matt. 5:17, 18; Mark 12:36, 37), and by instructing his disciples out of it (Luke 24:45); and the apostles habitually refer to the O.T. as authoritative (e.g., Rom. 3:2, 21; 15:4; I Cor. 4:6; II Tim. 3:15-17; II Peter 1:21). In the next place, the apostles claimed for their own teaching, oral and written, like authority with the O.T. (I Cor. 2:7-13; 14:37; I Thess. 2:13; Rev. 1:3), and directed the public reading of their epistles (I Thess. 5:27; Col. 4:16; II Thess. 2:15; II Peter 1:15; 3:1, 2), while revelations, given to the Church through inspired prophets (Acts 11:27, 28; 15:32; cf. I Cor., ch. 14), were considered to form, with apostolic instruction, the foundation of the Church (Eph. 2:20). It was therefore both natural and right that the N.T. literature should be added to the O.T., and thus the written canon of faith be enlarged. In the N.T. itself we may perhaps see the beginning of this process (I Tim. 5: 18; II Peter 3:1, 2, 16), and in the generations which followed the Apostles, the writings which were known to have apostolic authority were gradually collected into the second half of the Church's canon, and finally called the New Testament.

In discussing the history of the N.T., it is important, however, to observe the distinction between authorship and circulation of writings and their ultimate reception into the canon. At first the Christians regarded the O.T. as an authoritative book, while the words of Jesus were the teaching of an authoritative person. It is not known precisely when the teachings of our Lord were collected into book form, but probably no step had been taken before the end of the 1st century to transfer the authority of our Lord and his teaching to documents describing him and his work. Such an assignment of authority to writings, or canonization, began to be made in the subapostolic period, but proceeded very slowly. The evidence for the existence of several books and the authority attached to them near the end of the 1st century and the first half of the 2d is found in the Epistle of Clement of Rome to the Corinthians, the Epistles of Ignatius and Polycarp, the Didache (Teaching of the Apostles), the Epistle of Barnabas, the Shepherd of Hermas, Papias, Justin Martyr, and Tatian's Diatessaron (Harmony of the Four Gospels). The four Gospels were everywhere received from the beginning of the 2d century, while II Peter 3:16 shows that its readers were already familiar with a collection of Paul's Epistles. The heretic Marcion (c. 140) undertook to restore what he thought was the simplicity of Christianity on the basis of Paul, whom he regarded as the only true apostle. He rejected the O.T., and of the N.T. he retained only Luke in mutilated form and the 10 Epistles of Paul, omitting the Pastoral Epistles. The idea of a new canon is found from 180 to 200 in the works of 3 great representatives: Irenaeus, of Asia Minor and Gaul; Tertullian, of N. Africa; and Clement of Alexandria, in Egypt. The Church at that time was fully conscious that it had documents of the Apostolic Age, and regarded the teaching of the apostles as the rule of faith. The Muratorian fragment gives us the canon of the Church of Rome about 200. At this time seven books still lacked general recognition: Hebrews, James, II Peter, II and III John, Jude, and Revelation. Other books, as the Epistle of Barnabas, the Shepherd of Hermas, and the Didache, were on the fringe of the canon.

The second period of the canon may be reckoned from c. 200 to 325, during which the work of Origen and Eusebius is of special importance. There was a sifting of books on the fringe, and Origen classified the literature which laid claim to apostolic authority into genuine, rejected, and doubtful. He considered James, II Peter, II and III John, and Jude doubtful, but accepted Revelation. Eusebius followed closely in Origen's footsteps.

The third period begins in 325 and is marked by authoritative pronouncements, first by bishops of provincial Churches and later by councils or synods. In 367 Athanasius put forth a list of 27 N.T. books, which corresponds to the present canon. At the synods of Hippo Regius (393) and Carthage (397, 419), our N.T. of 27 books was accepted. Augustine supported this canon, which through the Vulgate eventually came into vogue throughout the West. The canon of the Eastern Church was ultimately the same as that of the Western. The Syrian Church, however, accepted only 22 books; II Peter, II and III John, Jude, and Revelation were tacking. With the separation of the Nestorians at the Council of Ephesus (431), the Eastern Syriac Church lost contact with the rest of the Church, and so in some Nestorian circles the 5 remaining books probably were never adopted. In W. Syria acceptance of these books was slow, although they were included in Bibles of the 6th and 7th centuries.

In view of these facts it should be noted: 1. That while the collection of the N.T. into one volume was slow, the belief in a written rule of faith was primitive and apostolic. The history of the formation of the collection should not be thought to give the rise into authority of a written rule of faith. It only shows the stages by which the books rightly belonging to the canon were recognized and brought together. 2. Differences of opinion and usage, as to what books were canonical, and as to the degree of certainty with which a book could be received, appear in the writers and Churches even of the 2d century. This fact, however, again only marks the stages by which the evidence for the books was gradually accepted by the Church as a whole, and the carefulness of the primitive Christians in receiving books as apostolic. In like manner the occasional acceptance of spurious writings was corrected in due time. 3. The proof on which we should accept the several N.T. books as canonical is historical evidence. As to this, the judgment of the Early Church that our 27 books are apostolic is entitled to acceptance unless it can be proved false. We should not, however, receive them merely because ecclesiastical councils decreed them canonical; nor, on the other hand, because of their contents. The question is one of historical evidence alone. 4. Finally, we note that the name "canon" is not known to have been applied to the collection of sacred books until the 4th century, when it was employed by Amphilochius (c. 380). But while this term, now universal, was not at first used, the thing denoted by it—viz., that the sacred books were the rule of faith—was, as we have seen, an apostolic doctrine.

Cant'icles. See SONG OF SOLOMON.

Cap'er-na-um (ká-pŭr'nâ-ŭm) [Gr. from Heb. kēsar Nahūm, village of Nahum]. A town on the n.w. shore of the Sea of Galilee, in the region of Zebulun and Naphtali (Matt. 4:13-16; cf. Luke 4:31; John 6:17-24). It was the seat of a tax collector (Mark 2:1, 14), and was apparently a Roman military post (Matt. 8:5-13; Luke 7:1-10). Our Lord at an early period of his ministry removed thither from Nazareth and made it so continually his headquarters that it came to be called his own city (Matt. 9:1; cf. Mark 2:1). It was there that he healed the centurion's palsied servant (Matt. 8:5-13; Luke 7:1-10), Peter's wife's mother when she was prostrate with fever (Matt. 8:14-17; Mark 1:29-31), a demoniac (Mark 1:21-28; Luke 4:31-37), a man sick of the palsy borne of four (Mark 2:1-13; cf. Matt. 9:1-8), a nobleman's son (John 4:46-54), and a number of other diseased people (Matt. 8:16, 17; Mark 1:32-34; Luke 4:23, 40, 41). The discourse recorded in John 6:24-71, which followed on the feeding of the 5,000, with many other addresses, was delivered at Capernaum (Mark 9:33-50). It was here also that Jesus called to the apostleship Matthew, or Levi, as he was sitting at the receipt of custom (Matt. 9:9-13; Mark 2:14-17; Luke 5:27-32; cf. Matt. 17:24). Notwithstanding the teaching and works of Jesus, its people did not repent, and Jesus predicted the utter ruin of the place (Matt. 11:23, 24; Luke 10:15).

Capernaum is not mentioned in the O.T., and perhaps did not arise till after the Captivity. Josephus was carried with bruised wrist from near Julias (not far from the spot where the Jordan enters the Sea of Galilee) into a village named Cepharnome, or Capernaum (Jos. Life 72).

Two spots, about 2½ miles apart, contend for the distinction of being the site. The more northerly is called Tell Hūm, which is about 2½ miles s.w. of the mouth of the Jordan and 2 miles s. of Chorazin; the more southerly is Khān Minyeh. Each of them marks the site of a former town. The fountain of Capernaum, from which the plain of Gennesaret was in part irrigated, and where coracine are found (Jos. War iii. 10, 8) was doubtless the abundant 'Ain et-Tābigah, midway between Khān Minyeh and Tell Hūm. While the site has not been definitely determined, the present trend of opinion is in favor of Tell Hūm.

Caph (kāf), A.R.V. Kaph [kaph, palm of hand]. The 11th letter of the Hebrew alphabet, which through the Greek kappa became Latin and English K. In anglicized Hebrew names kaph is represented by C, except final and before e and i, where Ch is employed. Caph stands at the head of the 11th section of Psalm 119; here each verse begins with this letter in the original.

Caph'arsa'a-ma (kāf'ār-sāl'ā-mā) [village of Salem]. A town (I Macc. 7:31; Jos. Antiq. xii. 10, 4), perhaps the later Carvasalim, near Ramleh, or Selmeh, 3 miles e. of Joppa.

Cap'hena'-tha (ká-fēn'ā-thā). See CHAPHENATHA.

Caph'tor (kāf'tōr). An isle or seacoast, from which the Philistines originally came (Jer. 47:4; Amos 9:7). By one theory Caphtor was W. and S. Asia Minor from Lydia to Cilicia; support for this may be found in LXX's Cappadocia for Caphtor in Deut. 2:23 and Amos 9:7. Egyptian Keftiu and Caphtor, however, have been generally identified with Crete, and the Kefti(u)ans accordingly with the Minoan Cretans. This identification is not without its difficulties, and so the designation Caphtor must be extended to mean Crete and, in general, the other islands and lands in its vicinity, Caria and Lycia included. It should also be noted that the Cherethites are mentioned in synonymous parallelism with the Philistines in Ezek. 25:16 and Zeph. 2:5, where LXX renders the former word Cretans. Cf. also I Sam. 30:14. Genesis 10:14 lists Caphtorim as a descendant of Mizraim (Egypt), but this statement probably must be interpreted in a political, not racial, sense.

Caph'to-rim (kāf'tō-rīm); in A.V. once Caph'torims (kāf'tō-rīmz) and once Caph'tho-rim (kāf'thō-rīm). People from Caphtor (Deut. 2:23); in Gen. 10:14 (cf. I Chron. 1:12), "whence went forth the Philistines" probably should follow Caphtorim. (Cf. Amos 9:7 and Jer. 47:4.)

Cap'i-tal, in A.V. Chap'i-ter. The head or uppermost part of a column, pillar, or pilaster (I Kings 7:16). It can be varied in form and ornamentation, according to the order of architecture used in the building (Ex. 36:38; 38:17, 19; I Kings 7:19, 20).

Cap'pa-do'ci-a (kāp'ā-dō'shī-ā). A highland province in the e. of Asia Minor; it was formed into a Roman province by Tiberius in A.D. 17 on the death of King Archelaus. In A.D. 70 Vespasian united it with Armenia Minor as one of the great frontier provinces of the empire. It produced excellent wheat and horses. Worshipers from Cappadocia were at the feast of Pentecost, rendered memorable by the descent of the Holy Spirit (Acts 2:9). Some of the Dispersion, to whom Peter wrote, lived in Cappadocia (I Peter 1:1).

Cap'tain. As a military title, captain is generally in O.T. the rendering of Heb. sar. It is a broad designation for an official, whether he be commander in chief (Gen. 21:22; Judg. 4:2; I Sam. 14:50; II Sam. 10:16), or the commander of a division of the army (II Sam. 18:2, 5), or part of a division (I Kings 16:9); an officer over 1,000 men or 100 men or 50 men (Num. 31:14, 48; I Sam. 8:12; 17:18; 18:13; 22:7; II Sam. 18:1; II Kings 1:9; Isa. 3:3); the commander of the king's body guard (Gen. 37:36; II Kings 25:8; Dan. 2:14, where the word is rab), or of a post of sentries (Jer. 37:13, in Heb. ba'al). The word rendered captain in A.V. of Num., ch. 2 is nāsi', and denotes a tribal prince. Kāsin is thrice rendered captain in A.V. (Josh. 10:24; Judg. 11:6, 11), where it refers to leaders of the host; but the word is a general term for one with whom decision rests, and it is applied to civil rulers (Isa. 3:7; Micah 3:1, 9), whose duties included that of judging (Isa. 1:10; 3:6; Prov. 6:7; 25:15, R.V. marg.).

In N.T. the chief captain was a chiliarchos, a term which originally denoted the commander of 1,000 men, but was used broadly for the commandant of a garrison, and as the equivalent of the Roman military tribune (John 18:12, R.V. marg.). He was one of the general officers of a legion, and higher in rank than a centurion (Acts 21:31, 32, R.V. marg.; 22:25, 26). The captain of the Temple was not a military officer, but the priest in command of the guard of Levites who kept watch at the Temple (Acts 4:1; 5:24, 26; cf. Jos. Antiq. xx. 6, 2 with War ii. 12, 6; vi. 5, 3). Under him were subordinate officers of the several divisions of the guard (Luke 22:4, 52).

Captivity. The state of being in bondage to enemies, especially in a foreign land. In O.T. times the Assyrians introduced, and the Chaldeans adopted, the practice of making a wholesale deportation of at least the leading men belonging to each country which they conquered, and locating them in districts where they would be removed from familiar associations and patriotic memories, and would be under the eye of the central government. Deportation was generally resorted to as an extreme measure when other means failed. The stronger state was usually content with imposing tribute. The withholding of the customary tribute was treated as rebellion, and was punished by a military invasion and pillage of the country. If these harsh measures proved ineffective, resort was had to deportation.

Two principal captivities are mentioned in the Bible:

I. THE CAPTIVITY OF THE TEN TRIBES

As early as 842 B.C. Jehu paid tribute to Shalmaneser, king of Assyria. It was not until the reign of Tiglath-pileser, 746/5-728/7, that the Assyrians began emptying the land of the Ten Tribes of Israel of its inhabitants. That king received tribute from Menahem. In the reign of Pekah he captured cities of Naphtali and carried off the inhabitants to Assyria (II Kings 15:29). He overran the country e. of the Jordan and deported the Reubenites, Gadites, and half-tribe of Manasseh to Mesopotamia (I Chron. 5:26). By his connivance Pekah was slain and Hoshea placed on the throne. His successor, Shalmaneser, besieged Samaria; the city was taken in the accession year of Sargon, 722 (721) B.C.; a large number of the inhabitants were deported to Mesopotamia and Media (II Kings 17:5, 6, 18); the rest were placed under tribute. The gaps in the population were filled with colonists from other regions who brought in their own religious beliefs. Jehovah worship was once more introduced, but a mixed religion resulted. The later Samaritans descended from this heterogeneous people (II Kings 17:19-41). Some of the Israelites eventually returned to Jerusalem (Luke 2:36), but most of them remained in the countries whither they had been carried, preserving their racial distinctions and religious observances and visiting Jerusalem from time to time (Acts 2:9; 26:7).

II. THE CAPTIVITY OF JUDAH

Sennacherib recorded that he removed 200,-150 captives from Judah (cf. II Kings 18:13). But by the captivity of Judah is meant the deportation of the people to Babylonia. Judah's captivity was predicted a century and a half before its occurrence (Isa. 6:11, 12; 11:12), and Babylonia as the place was foretold by Micah (Micah 4:10) and Isaiah (Isa. 11:11; 39:6). The Prophet Jeremiah announced that it should continue 70 years (Jer. 25:1, 11, 12). It was effected by Nebuchadnezzar. In 605 B.C., in the 3d or 4th year of Jehoiakim, according to the method of reckoning which one adopts, he came unto Jerusalem, took the vessels of the Temple to Babylon, and carried off certain of the seed royal as captives (II Chron. 36:2-7; Jer. 45:1; Dan. 1:1-3). In 597 he carried off Jehoiachin and his mother and wives, and 3,000 princes, 7,000 men of might, and 1,000 artisans (II Kings 24:14-16). Eleven years later (586) his army burned the Temple, destroyed Jerusalem, and carried off the residue of the people, leaving only the poorest of the land to be vinedressers and husbandmen (II Kings 25:2-21). Five years after the destruction of the city, another group was deported to Babylonia (Jer. 52:30). In their exile the Jews enjoyed many privileges. They were permitted to build and occupy houses, keep servants, and engage in business (Jer. 29:5-7; Ezra 2:65), and there was nothing to hinder them from rising to the highest positions in the state (Dan. 2:48; Neh. 1:11). Their priests and teachers were with them (Jer. 29:1; Ezra 1:5), and they had the instructions and encouragement of Ezekiel (Ezek. 1:1). In 539 B.C. Babylon fell into the hands of Cyrus the Great, who issued a decree authorizing the Jews to return to the land of their fathers and rebuild the Temple (Ezra 1:1-4). In c. 538 about 43,000 of them embraced the opportunity (Ezra 2:64). Many, however, preferred to remain in Babylonia and the e., and with the Israelites in Mesopotamia and Media formed part of what became known as the Diaspora (Zech. 6:10; Acts 2:9). See DISPERSION.

Car'bun-cle. 1. The rendering of Heb. bāre-keth and bār-kath, shining like lightning. It denotes a gem (Ezek. 28:13), and was the 3d stone in the 1st row of the high priest's breastplate (Ex. 28:17). In both cases R.V. marg., following the LXX, the Vulgate, and Josephus, makes it an emerald.

2. The rendering of Heb. 'ekdāh, a precious stone (Isa. 54:12).

Car'cas (kār'kās). One of 7 chamberlains who served in the presence of King Ahasuerus (Esth. 1:10).

Car'chem-ish (kār'kē-mish), in A.V. once Char'chem-ish (II Chron. 35:20). The e. capital of the Hittites, w. of the Euphrates, at a ford of the river, and n. of the confluence with the Sājūr. Admirably situated for commercial purposes, it became very wealthy. The Assyrian king, Ashur-nasir-pal (885-860 B.C.)

received from it rich tribute. In 717 B.C. it was captured by Sargon, and with it fell the Hittite empire (Isa. 10:9). Necho, king of Egypt, was decisively defeated at Carchemish by Nebuchadnezzar in 605 B.C. (II Chron. 35:20; Jer. 46:2). Its site is called Jerābis or Jerabus.

Car-re'ah (kā-rē'ā). See KAREAH.

Car-ri-a (kā-rī-ā). A country at the s.w. point of Asia Minor. It was part of the territory which the Romans took from Antiochus the Great. The Roman senate bestowed it on the Rhodians, but released it again in 168 B.C. It was still a separate district in 139 B.C. (I Macc. 15:23), but it was finally incorporated in the province of Asia.

Car'ites (kār'its). See CHERETHITES.

Car'mel (kā'r'mēl) [garden land]. 1. A range of hills, about 15 miles long, connected by a chain of lower hills with the mountainous region of central Palestine and terminating in a promontory which juts into the Mediterranean (Jer. 46:18), and constitutes the s. boundary of the bay of Acre. Near its s.e. end it is 1,742 feet high, a little farther onward it is 1,715, and it gradually falls more and more, until at the n.w. top, which constitutes the promontory, it is only 556 feet high. The range constitutes the s.w. boundary of the valley of Esdraelon, through which the Kishon runs, and at one place that brook washes the n. slope of Carmel (I Kings 18:20, 40). The summit of the range consists of a series of eminences with tablelands on their tops, sometimes bare and rocky, and sometimes covered with shrubs, especially the prickly oak and the juniper. The strata are of limestone, and there are caves on the sides of the mountain chain, though not on its summit. The view from its higher parts is fine. Carmel, now called Jebel Kurnul, was on the s. boundary of Asher (Josh. 19:26), within the limits of that tribe. On the top of Carmel, Elijah brought to a decisive issue the question between Jehovah and the worship of Baal (I Kings 18:17-40), and from the top of the same range his servant saw the ascent from the Mediterranean of the little cloud like a man's hand which heralded the rainstorm and the termination of the drought (I Kings 18:41-46). Carmel was visited by Elisha (II Kings 2:25; 4:25). It is believed to have been anciently cultivated to the summit, with fruit trees in orchards or gardens, as its name imports, and as the fruitfulness ascribed to it indicates (Isa. 33:9; 35:2; Jer. 50:19). A forest, probably consisting chiefly of fruit trees, was in its midst (Micah 7:14). When in S. of Sol. 7:5 the lover says to the object of his affection, "Thy head upon thee is like Carmel," he probably means covered with luxuriant hair, as Carmel is with fruit trees. Amos prophesied, "The top of Carmel shall wither" (Amos 1:2). There has long been a convent on Mount Carmel, after which the Carmelite monks are named.

2. A town in the mountainous part of Judah (Josh. 15:55; cf. I Sam. 15:12; 25:2). The churlish Nabal's possessions lay in the vicinity (I Sam. 25:2-40). The name is still retained in the modern Kermel, a ruin about 7 miles s.s.e. of Hebron. From this town one of David's wives hailed (I Sam. 30:5), and also one of his mighty men (II Sam. 23:35).

Car'mi (kā'r'mī) [vinedresser]. 1. A son of Reuben, and founder of a tribal family (Gen. 46:9; Ex. 6:14; Num. 26:6).

2. A descendant of Judah and father of Achan (Josh. 7:1; I Chron. 2:6, 7).

Car'nā-im (kā'r'nā-im). See ASHTEROTH-KARNAIM.

Car'pen-ter. The first mention of carpentry in the Bible as a distinct occupation is on the occasion when carpenters were brought from Tyre to build David a palace (II Sam. 5:11). Among the carpenters' tools were the ax, saw (Isa. 10:15), measuring line, plane, compass (Isa. 44:13), iron nails, hammers (Jer. 10:4; I Chron. 22:3). Joseph, husband of Mary, was a carpenter (Matt. 13:55), and Jesus in his youth worked at the same calling (Mark 6:3).

Car'pus (kā'r'pūs) [Gr., fruit; wrist]. A resident at Troas, with whom Paul left his cloak, for which he afterward sent (II Tim. 4:13).

Car'riage. That which is carried; baggage (I Sam. 17:22; Isa. 10:28; I Macc. 9:35, 39; Acts 21:15), heavy matters or goods (Judg. 18:21), a burden (Isa. 46:1). The place of the carriage (I Sam. 17:20; 26:5, 7, A.V. marg.) was the enclosure formed by the carts which were used to transport goods for the army, and which were drawn up in a circle around the camp. In all passages R.V. has abandoned this obsolete sense of carriage and substituted the appropriate modern word.

Car'she-na (kā'r'shē-nā) [probably Old Persian, plowman]. A prince of Persia at the court of King Ahasuerus (Esth. 1:14). See PRINCE.

Cart. A wheeled vehicle employed in peaceful occupations, and distinguished from the chariot, which was used for state and war. It was made of wood (I Sam. 6:14), was either covered or uncovered (Num. 7:3, where the Hebrew word is rendered wagon), was drawn by cattle (Num. 7:7; I Sam. 6:7; II Sam. 6:6), though horses occasionally dragged the threshing cart, it would seem (Isa. 28:28), and was used in threshing in lieu of a sledge (Isa. 28:27), for transporting goods (II Sam. 6:3), hauling grain (Amos 2:13), and conveying persons (Gen. 45:19, rendered wagon). In Egypt a cart was used like that which is now employed universally in western Asia, with 2 wheels of solid wood. Asiatic carts, including the one in which Jewish captive women of Lachish are riding on sacks of grain, are represented in Assyrian bas-reliefs as having two wheels with 8, 6, or 4 spokes each and drawn by oxen. They are also depicted as drawn by mules, or by 2 men.

Car'ving. The art of cutting letters, images, or ornamental designs in wood, stone, ivory, or other material. Bezalel, a man of Judah, and Ohollab, a Danite, were gifted for this work, and wrought the carving for the tabernacle (Ex. 31:1-7; 35:30-35). There was carved work in Solomon's Temple—flowers, palm trees, and cherubim (I Kings 6:18, 29); and in the superior kind of domestic architecture (Prov. 7:16, A.V.).

Case'ment. A sash which moves on a hinge; or part of a window, made movable by a hinge, so that it may be opened while the rest of the window remains shut (Prov. 7:6, A.V.). But in Judg. 5:28, A.V., and in R.V. of both passages, the Hebrew word is rendered "latitude."

Ca-siph'i-a (kâ-sîf'i-â). A place not far from the route between Babylon and Jerusalem, and in or near Babylonia (Ezra 8:17).

Ca'su-him (kâs'û-hîm). A people descended from the Egyptians (or possibly only conquered and incorporated with them), and standing somewhere in the ancestral line of the Philistines (Gen. 10:14; I Chron. 1:12). See CAPHTORIM.

Ca'sphor (kâs'fôr). A fortified town e. of the Jordan, captured by Judas Maccabaeus (I Macc. 5:26, 36). In the latter verse A.V. gives the name as Casphon. Josephus calls it Casphoma (Caspom) (Jos. Antiq. xii. 8, 3).

Ca'ssia. 1. The rendering of the Hebrew word kiddâh (Ezek. 27:19). It denotes an aromatic wood, and was an ingredient of the anointing oil (Ex. 30:24). The translation "cassia" is supported by the Syriac version, the Targum, and the Vulgate. If correct, the word probably denotes a species of the wood. R.V. marg. has "costus."

2. The rendering of Heb. kešivâh. It is fragrant (Ps. 45:8). Cassia bark is derived from various species of Cinnamomum. See CINNAMOM.

Ca'sta-net'. In the plural the rendering of Heb. mena'anem, moving to and fro (II Sam. 6:5), a musical instrument which David and his subjects played. R.V. marg., following the Vulgate, has "sistra," and the A.V. "cornets." Castanets are a pair of small spoon-shaped cymbals fastened to the thumb and beaten together by the middle finger. The word castanets is derived from castanea, a chestnut, two of these fruits being anciently attached to the fingers and beaten together. Castanets were employed in Greece and Rome as an accompaniment to hymns in honor of the goddess Artemis or Diana.

Ca'stle. A fortified building or stronghold (Prov. 18:19). David took the Jebusite castle and converted it into his residence; and it was afterward called the city of David (I Chron. 11:5, 7, A.V.). Jehoshaphat built castles in the cities of Judah (II Chron. 17:12; A.V. marg., palaces), and Jotham in its forests (II Chron. 27:4). The habitations of the descendants of Aaron (I Chron. 6:54), and probably those of the Ishmaelite chieftains and of the Midianites (Gen. 25:16; Num. 31:10), were encampments (R.V.) and not castles (A.V.).

The castle which Nehemiah erected was presumably succeeded by the stronghold eventually known as Antonia, and in which Paul was confined at Jerusalem. See ANTONIA, TOWER OF.

Ca'stor (kâs'têr) and Pol'lux (pôl'ûks). Two Greek and Roman divinities, born of the same mother, Leda, but by different fathers. Castor's father was Tyndareus, a Spartan king, while that of Pollux was Zeus, the Greek supreme god. By another account, however, Castor was also the son of Zeus. Castor was a great charioteer and horse master, who was eventually killed in a fight. Pollux was a highly distinguished pugilist. His father Zeus offered him immortality, but he begged to be allowed to share it day and day about with the deceased Castor. The request was granted, and both brothers were worshiped, especially at Sparta, under the name of the Dioscuri (Gr. Dioskouroi). They were regarded as the special protectors of distressed mariners. The Alexandrian vessel in which Paul sailed from Melita to Puteoli had for its sign or figurehead Dioskouroi. This the R.V. renders "The Twin Brothers" and the A.V., with more latitude, "Castor and Pollux" (Acts 28:11). The constellation Gemini (the Twins) is called after the affectionate brothers, and its two leading stars are named Castor and Pollux.

Cat'er-pil'lar. The rendering of Heb. hâsîl, devourer. It is associated with the locust, and is a destroyer of vegetation (I Kings 8:37; II Chron. 6:28; Ps. 78:46; Isa. 33:4; Joel 1:4; 2:25). Probably a species of locust, or the common migratory locust in one stage of development (cf. Joel 1:4; 2:25, R.V. marg.). For Ps. 105:34, E.R.V., and Jer. 51:27 of A.V., see CANKERWORM.

Cat'tle. A comprehensive term used in the O.T. for domestic animals, large and small, for camels, horses, sheep, goats, oxen, and asses (Gen. 13:2; 26:13, 14; 30:32, A.V.; 31:9; 47:16-18).

Cau'da (kô'dâ). See CLAUDA.

Caul. 1. A net worn over the hair by Hebrew women (Isa. 3:18); rendered "networks" on the margin of both R.V. and A.V.

2. The lesser omentum, a layer of the inner lining of the cavity of the belly, partly enveloping the liver, as the greater omentum does the stomach (Ex. 29:13, 22; Lev. 3:4, 10, 15).

Cave. A hollow place or cavern in the side of a hill or cliff. Caves are most numerous and largest in limestone countries, of which Palestine is one. They served as dwelling places in the Neolithic period; in the Bronze Age they became tombs or were converted into storehouses or cisterns. Even in later times they were used as temporary abodes, as by Lot and his daughters after the destruction of Sodom (Gen. 19:30), and by Elijah (I Kings 19:9). They often served as stables for cattle. They were natural tombs, and were constantly employed for burial purposes; for example, the cave of Machpelah (Gen., chs. 23; 49:29) and the tomb of Lazarus (John 11:38). In times of war and oppression they afforded a place of refuge (Judg. 6:2; I Sam. 13:6; 24:3-10; II Macc. 6:11), the most noted being the caves at Makkedah (Josh. 10:16-27) and Adullam (I Sam. 22:1; II Sam. 23:13).

Ce'dar. A famous tree of Lebanon (I Kings 5:6), tall and stately (Isa. 2:13; Ezek. 17:22; 31:3). It furnished a timber much prized in the construction of palaces and temples (II Sam. 5:11; I Kings 5:5, 6; 7:1-12; Ezra 3:7). From its pillars, beams, and planks were cut (I Kings 6:9, 10, 18; 7:2, 7); idols were hewn (Isa. 44:14); masts were made for ships (Ezek. 27:5). It is fragrant (S. of Sol. 4:11), and it was used in ceremonial purifications (Lev. 14:4; Num. 19:6). The tree is evidently the cedar of Lebanon (Abies cedrus or Cedrus libani), called 'erez in Hebrew. It is a large tree of dome-shaped form, with long, spreading, contorted branches, evergreen leaves, and cones 3" to 5" long. The Cedrus libani still survives in the mountains of Syria and flourishes in much greater numbers in the Taurus Mountains.

Ce'dron (sê'drôn). See KIDRON.

Ce'lo-syr'i-a (sê'lô-sîr'i-â). See COELESYRIA.

Cen'chre-ae (sên'krê-â), in A.V. Cen'chre-a (sên'krê-â) [Gr., millet]. A harbor of Corinth, about 7 miles e. of the city, on the Saronic Gulf. It was visited by Paul (Acts 18:18); and it possessed a Christian church, of which Phoebe was a servant or deaconess. (Rom. 16:1).

Cen'de-bae'us (sĕn'dĕ-bĕ'ūs), in A.V. Cen' de-be'us (sĕn'dĕ-bĕ'ūs). A general placed in command of the seacoast of Judea by Antiochus VII (I Macc. 15:38). He was routed by Judas and John, sons of Simon Maccabaeus (ch. 16:1-10).

Cen'ser. A vessel for holding incense while it is being burned (Num. 16:6, 7, 39). The censers of the tabernacle were of brass (Lev. 16:12; cf. Ex. 27:3, fire pans); those of the Temple were of gold (I Kings 7:50; II Chron. 4:22; Heb. 9:4). The censers of the book of Revelation (ch. 8:3, 5) were also of gold.

Cen'sus. An enumeration and registration of a people, conveniently made among the Hebrews according to tribe, family, and house (Num. 1:18), and in the wilderness probably based on the reports of the officers over thousands, hundreds, fifties, and tens (Ex. 18:25; cf. round numbers, Num. 1:21, 23, etc.). Besides enumerations of classes of the people, like that of the first-born (Num. 3:43), a formal census of all the Israelites of military age is recorded in the O.T. as having been taken on three different occasions. The first was taken at Mount Sinai in the 2d month of the 2d year after they had left Egypt (Num., ch. 1). Omitting the Levites (vs. 47-54), there were of males above 20 years of age, and capable of bearing arms, 603,550 (chs. 1:45-47; 11:21). The records of those who had recently paid tribute were probably used in making up the lists (Ex. 38:26). The Levites from one month old and upward were counted separately, and numbered 22,000 (Num. 3:39). The 2d census was taken 38 years later at the camp at Shittim in the Moabite country near the close of the 40 years' wandering. The number of men had altered but slightly and now was 601,730 (Num. 26:1-51), Levites 23,000 (v. 62). The 3d census was made by order of David, who found that there were of fighting men in Israel 800,000, in Judah 500,000 (II Sam. 24:1-9; cf. I Chron. 21:1-6). About the same time the Levites, from 30 years old and upward, numbered 38,000 (I Chron. 23:3). An enumeration was made of the exiles who returned to Jerusalem from Babylonia with Zerubbabel (Ezra, ch. 2), and an enrollment was ordered by the emperor Augustus for the Roman Empire shortly before the birth of Christ (Luke 2:1; see QUIRINIUS and THOUSAND).

Cen-tu'ri-on [from Lat. centum, 100]. An officer in the Roman army (Acts 21:32; 22:26), who at first commanded 100 soldiers and afterward about that number (cf. Acts 23:23). Two are mentioned by name in the N.T.: Cornelius, stationed at Caesarea, through whom it was made evident that the Holy Spirit is given to Gentile believers no less than to Jewish (Acts, ch. 10), and Julius, who conducted Paul and other prisoners to Rome and treated Paul kindly (Acts 27:1, 3, 43). Two centurions, besides Cornelius, believed—one at Capernaum (Matt. 8:5-13), the other at the cross (Matt. 27:54).

Ce'phas (sĕ'fās) [Gr. Kēphās, from Aram. Kēphā, rock or stone]. An appellation given by Jesus to the Apostle Simon (John 1:42; I Cor. 1:12; 3:22; 9:5; 15:5; Gal. 2:9); Peter is the Greek equivalent of Cephas.

Chal'ced'o'ny [from Gr. Chalkēdōn, a town in Asia Minor]. A precious stone, the 3d foundation of the wall of the New Jerusalem (Rev. 21:19). Chalcedony is a variety of quartz. It is hard, its largest ingredient being silica. It is of a waxy luster, and therefore much duller than typical quartz. It is white-gray, brown, blue, etc. It is not perfectly crystallized, but often coats crystals of quartz. It occurs in massive form in veins, in nodules of botryoidal form (i.e., resembling a cluster of grapes), or in stalactites. This stone, however, did not receive the name chalcedony, it is believed, until the Middle Ages, so that John, it would seem, had a different stone of Chalcedon in mind, perhaps the Chalcedonian emerald or the Chalcedonian jasper which are mentioned by Pliny (Hist. Nat. xxxvii. 18, 37).

Chal'col (kāl'kōl). See CALCOL.

Chal'de'a (kāl-dĕ'ā) [Gr. Chaldaia from Akkad. Kaldū; cf. Heb. Kašdīm, Chaldeans, Chaldeae]. Originally the s. portion of Babylonia, at the head of the Persian Gulf, but the designation was ultimately extended to the whole of the alluvial plain stretching from above Hit to the gulf. See BABYLONIA.

The people called Chaldeans in the mountains of Kurdistan during the retreat of the 10,000 under Xenophon (Anabasis iv. 3, 4, etc.), and others in Pontus mentioned by Strabo (549) are non-Semitic and are the Haldians (Khaldians), the inhabitants of Urartu (Ararat, Armenia).

Roman Centurion of the Time of Christ

Chal'de'an (kāl-dĕ'ān), in N.T. Chal'dae'an (kāl-dĕ'ān). A native or inhabitant of Chaldea. See BABYLONIA. In the Neo-Babylonian Empire the Chaldeans were the dominant race, and doubtless possessed themselves of all offices of influence. So exclusively did they fill ecclesiastical positions at the capital that at Babylon their name became synonymous with priests of Bel-marduk (Herod. i. 181, 183). These priests were esteemed as possessors of wisdom and equated with magicians, enchanters, sorcerers, and diviners (Dan. 1:4; 2:2, 4).

Chal'dees' (kāl-dĕ'z'). A variant form of Chaldeans used in the expression "Ur of the Chaldees" (Gen. 11:31; Neh. 9:7), and also sometimes in A.V. when there is no mention of Ur (II Kings 24:2; 25:4-26; II Chron. 36:17; Isa. 13:19).

Chalk'stone. A stone taken from the limestone rocks which constitute a marked feature of Palestine (Isa. 27:9).

Chal'phi (kāl'fī), in A.V. Cal'phi (kāl'fī). Father of Judas, one of the two captains who stood by Jonathan Maccabaeus at Hazor (I Macc. 11:70).

Cham'ber-lain. One who looks after the private chambers of a palace or mansion; as Blastus, who was over Herod's bedchamber (Acts 12:20); or one who has charge of the treasure chamber, as Erastus, the treasurer of the city of Corinth (Rom. 16:23, A.V.; in R.V. "treasurer"). In the O.T. the word rendered "chamberlain" signifies eunuch, and is often translated so; see EUNUCH.

Cha-me'leon [Gr. chamaileōn, on the ground, dwarf, + lion]. A reptile which belongs to the same order as lizards (Lev. 11:30). In R.V. the name is the rendering of Heb. tinshemeth, breathing (A.V. mole), whereas in A.V. it represents Heb. kōph (R.V. land crocodile; see LIZARD). The lungs of the lizard are very large and, when expanded, render it semi-transparent. Its eyeballs protrude from the head, and are independent in their action, so that it can turn one eye up and the other down, or look in different directions and at different objects at the same time. It has also the faculty of changing its hue in accordance with the color of the objects about it or with its temper when disturbed. This power is due to the presence of clear or pigment-bearing cells in the skin, their contractions and dilations being controlled by the nervous system. It lives in trees. Its feet are fitted for use as hands and its tail is prehensile, so that it is able to cling to the branches. It feeds upon insects which it captures by means of its long tongue covered at the end with a viscous substance.

Cham'ois. The rendering of Heb. semer. The animal is ruminant (Deut. 14:5). It is not the real chamois, which is a native of the European mountains from the Pyrenees to the Caucasus, but does not occur in Palestine.

Cham-pain'. In Deut. 11:30, A.V., meaning open country. R.V. has Arabah (q.v.).

Cha'naan (kā'nān). See CANAAN.

Cha-phen'a-tha (kā-fēn'á-thá), in A.V. Cap-hen'a-tha. Apparently a portion of the e. wall of Jerusalem, perhaps one of the towers or other mural fortifications (I Macc. 12:37).

Chap'i-ter. See CAPITAL.

Chap'man (A.V.). Originally a merchant; then a peddler (II Chron. 9:14, A.V.); in A.R.V. trader. In I Kings 10:15, A.V. renders the same expression by "merchantmen."

Char'a-shim (kār'á-shīm). See GE-HARA-SHIM.

Char'che-mish (kār'kē-mīsh). See CARCHE-MISH.

Charg'er. The word is used in A.V. for the dish (platter, A.R.V.) on which the head of John the Baptist was brought to Herodias' daughter (Matt. 14:8), and for the silver dishes of 130 shekels' weight presented by the tribal princes at the dedication of the altar (Num. 7:13). Hebrew kē'ārāh, rendered "charger" in the last passage, denotes the golden dishes which stood on the table of showbread (Ex. 25:29; 37:16; Num. 4:7).

Char'i-ot. A two-wheeled vehicle, of various forms, drawn by horses (II Sam. 8:4), and used for military (Ex. 14:9; I Sam. 13:5), state (Gen. 41:43; II Sam. 15:1; I Kings 1:5), and private purposes (Gen. 46:29; II Kings 5:9; Acts 8:28). The bed was open behind, and rested on the axle without springs. The wheels were not clumsy, but consisted of felloes, spokes, and naves, and were often of metal (I Kings 7:33). Chariots were but poorly adapted to the hills of Palestine, and were not much used, but they were common among the Canaanites in the valley (Josh. 17:16; Judg. 4:3), and among the Egyptians (Isa. 31:1), Ethiopians (II Chron. 16:8), Syrians (II Kings 5:9), Hittites (II Kings 7:6), and Assyrians (Nahum 2:3, 4; 3:2). The war chariots commonly carried a driver (II Chron. 18:33), and occasionally a shield-bearer, besides the warrior himself. Probably among the Hebrews a 3d person, perhaps shield-bearer, sometimes occupied the chariot (II Kings 9:25). The war chariot was at times constructed of iron or covered with iron plates (Josh. 17:16, 18; Judg. 1:19; 4:3). The Persians armed the axles and sometimes the tongue with scythes; chariots of this sort were seen in Palestine in the Seleucidian period (II Macc. 13:2). A four-wheeled vehicle (Gr. redē) is intended in Rev. 18:13, A.V.

Royal Assyrian Chariot

Char'l-ty. Love, often manifested by almsgiving. The charity described in I Cor., ch. 13 is not almsgiving, as is evident from v. 3; it is love, charity in the broad sense, love toward all. It is so rendered by the R.V.

Char'ran (kār'ān). See HARAN, II.

Che'bar (kē'bār). A river in the land of the Chaldeans, on the banks of which some of the Jewish exiles, including the Prophet Ezekiel, were settled. It was there that the prophet saw several of his visions (Ezek. 1:1, 3; 3:15, 23; 10:15, 20). It is not the river Khabor, called by the Greeks Chaboras, which rises near Nisibis in upper Mesopotamia, and flows into the Euphrates. The Chebar was a great canal, s.e. of Babylon. These streams were known by the name nāru, river.

Ched'or-la-omer (kēd'ōr-lā-ō'mēr) [Elamite, servant of the god Lagamar]. A king of Elam, who evidently held the sovereignty over Babylonia. In the days of Abraham, in alliance with Amraphel, king of Shinar; Arioch, king of Ellasar; and Tidal, king of Goini, he made an expedition to the w. and subjugated the country about the Dead Sea. The people of the plain served him 12 years and then revolted. The next year Chedorlaomer came with his allies and smote the region e. of the Jordan from Bashan southward, the land of Edom to the head of the Red Sea, the country afterward inhabited by the Amalekites, and the plain about the Dead Sea. This conquest gave him control of the caravan routes from Arabia past the head of the Red Sea to Egypt, Canaan, and the n. But he carried off Lot from Sodom. This induced Abraham to lead his numerous servants and his allied chieftains in pursuit. They fell upon Chedorlaomer by night at Dan, put him and his followers to flight, and recovered the captives and the spoil (Gen. 14:1-16). It was not strange, even in those early days, for a Babylonian monarch to make an expedition to the countries on the Mediterranean Sea. See ABRAHAM, IV.

Cheese. The curd of milk, coagulated, separated from the whey, and pressed (Job 10:10; cf. I Sam. 17:18; II Sam. 17:29). A valley at Jerusalem bore the name Tyropoeon (Jos. War v. 4, 1), which in Greek means the Valley of the Cheese Makers.

Che'lal (kē'lāl) [completion, perfection]. A son of Pahath-moab, whom Ezra induced to divorce his foreign wife (Ezra 10:30).

Che'lub (kē'lūb) [basket; bird's cage]. 1. A brother of Shuah, whose lineage is not traced, but who was entitled to registry in the tribe of Judah (I Chron. 4:11).

2. The father of David's officer over the cultivators (I Chron. 27:26).

Che-lu'bai (kē-lō'bi). See CALEB 1.

Che-lu'hi (kē-lō'hī), in A.V. Che'lul (kē'lū). A son of Bani, whom Ezra induced to divorce his foreign wife (Ezra 10:35); R.V. marg., Cheluhu.

Chem'a-rim (kēm'ā-rīm), in the text of A.V. Chem'a-rims (kēm'ā-rīmz). Priests of the high places (II Kings 23:5, marg.), of the calves at Beth-el (Hos. 10:5, marg.), and of Baal (Zeph. 1:4).

Che'mosh (kēm'mōsh). The god of the Moabites (Num. 21:29; Jer. 48:46; Moabite Stone, 3), worshipped in the same manner as was Molech, by the sacrifice of children as burnt offerings (II Kings 3:27). His identity with Molech, god of the Ammonites (I Kings 11:7), has been assumed by some on the basis of Judg. 11:24, but here the historical argument applies to Moab, whom the speaker has in mind. Solomon erected a high place for him near Jerusalem (I Kings 11:7), which was afterward defiled by Josiah (II Kings 23:13).

Che-na'anah (kē-nā'ā-nā) [toward Canaan; or fem. of Canaan in tribal sense]. 1. A Benjamite, family of Jediahel (I Chron. 7:10).

2. The father of the false prophet Zedekiah, who deluded Ahab (I Kings 22:11; II Chron. 18:10).

Che-na'ni (kē-nā'nī) [contraction of Chen-aniah]. A Levite who assisted in bringing the returned exiles to such a frame of mind that they agreed to enter into a covenant to worship Jehovah (Neh. 9:4).

Chen'a-ni'ah (kēn'ā-nī'ā) [Jehovah has established]. A chief of the Levites in David's reign, of the house of Izhar, who was appointed superintendent of the outward business, such as judging (I Chron. 26:29), and the transportation of the Ark (ch. 15:22, 27, marg.; in text, song).

Che'phar-am'mo-ni (kē'fār-ām'ō-nī), in A.V. Che'phar-ha-am'mo-nai (kē'fār-hā-ām'ō-nī) [village of the Ammonite]. A village of Benjamin (Josh. 18:24), probably Khirbet Kafr 'Ana.

Che-phī'rah (kē-fī'rā) [village]. A city of the Gibeonites (Josh. 9:17), allotted to the Benjamites (ch. 18:26). It continued to exist after the Captivity (Ezra 2:25; Neh. 7:29). Its site is Kefireh, 8 miles w.n.w. of Jerusalem.

Che'ran (kē'rān) [cf. kar, lamb]. A Horite, a son of Dishon (Gen. 36:26; I Chron. 1:41).

Che'r-eth-ites (kēr'ē-thīts), in A.V. once Che'r-eth-ims (kēr'ē-thīmz) [probably Cretans]. A nation or tribe inhabiting the Philistine country or its s. portion (I Sam. 30:14; cf. Ezek. 25:16; Zeph. 2:5, where LXX renders the word by Cretans). They may be identical with the Philistines who came from Caphtor (q.v.), or may represent a direct emigration from Crete. Some of them were members of David's bodyguard (cf. II Sam. 8:18 with chs. 23:23; 15:18). In 3 places the name Carites appears instead (II Sam. 20:23, marg.; II Kings 11:4, 19, both R.V.).

Che'rith (kē'rith) [cut, gorge]. A brook before Jordan, by which Elijah sojourned (I Kings 17:3, 5), probably in Gilead, e. of the Jordan.

Cher'ub, plural Cher'u-bim; in A.V. Cher'u-bims. 1. Guardians placed e. of the Garden of Eden to prevent the approach of our first parents to the tree of life after their expulsion from the garden (Gen. 3:24). When the Ark was constructed for the tabernacle, cherubim wrought of gold were placed facing each other, one at each side of the mercy seat, overshadowing it with their wings (Ex. 25:18-20; 37:7-9). They symbolized the presence and unapproachability of Jehovah, whose glory was manifested between them (Lev. 16:2), who thus dwelt in the midst of his people, and was present in the tabernacle to receive worship (Ex. 25:22; Lev. 1:1). Frequent reference is made to Jehovah's dwelling between or above the cherubim (Num. 7:89; I Sam. 4:4; II Sam. 6:2; II Kings 19:15; Ps. 80:1; 99:1; Isa. 37:16). The conception underlying this designation is well illustrated by representations of a king seated on a throne supported on each side by cherubim, which have been found at Byblos, Hamath, and Megiddo, all dating between 1200 and 800 B.C. King Hiram of Byblos is represented as seated on a cherub throne. Cherubim were also embroidered on the hangings of the tabernacle (Ex. 26:1). For the grander Temple Solomon had two gigantic cherubim made. Their height was 10 cubits, or about 15 feet, and the expansion of their wings as many more. They were of olive wood, and were overlaid with gold (I Kings 6:23-28; 8:7; II Chron. 3:10-13; 5:7, 8; Heb. 9:5). Cherubim, with palm trees and open flowers, were also carved all round the walls of the Temple (I Kings 6:29). In a poem David represented Jehovah as riding upon a cherub and flying (II Sam. 22:11; Ps. 18:10). Ezekiel had a vision of cherubim by the river Chebar. Each had 4 faces and 4 wings (Ezek., ch. 10; cf. 9:3), and since they seem to be identical with the 4 living creatures previously seen by the prophet, these 4 faces were those of a man, a lion, an ox, and an eagle (cf. ch. 1:5-12 with ch. 10:20, 21). They carried the throne of Jehovah (chs. 1:26-28; 9:3). Finally the Apostle John in the Apocalypse describes 4 living creatures, who had faces like those of the same 4 animals (Rev. 4:6, 7).

The winged, man-headed bulls of Babylonia and Assyria have a certain external physical resemblance to cherubim as sometimes described in the Hebrew Scriptures; and they performed the same function, being placed at the entrance of palaces and temples where majesty dwelt. Archaeological discoveries have shown that in Syria and Palestine the winged sphinx is dominant in art and religious symbolism.

The varying forms assumed by the cherubim in art and poetic imagery show that they were symbols. The flaming sword (Gen. 3:24), and the darkness under Him who rode upon a cherub and flew upon the wings of the wind (Ps. 18:10), have been cited as the main support of the theory that the cherub is in ultimate analysis the storm cloud. It is true that the cherubim might represent some power of nature, or all the powers of nature, as the servants of Jehovah and guardians of his abode. But the Biblical writers represent the cherubim, symbolically at least, as animate beings with the intelligence of man, the strength of an ox, the courage of the lion, and the free motion of the eagle through the air. The facts at present obtainable indicate an order of angels.

2. A place in Babylonia, from which certain persons came who could not prove their Israelite descent (Ezra 2:59; Neh. 7:61). Situation unknown. Pronounced kē'rūb.

Ches'a-lon (kēs'ā-lōn) [trust, hope]. A town on the boundary line of Judah, on Mount Jearim (Josh. 15:10), commonly identified with the village of Keslā, 10 miles w. of Jerusalem.

Ches'ed (kēs'sēd) [sing. of Kasdim, Chaldeans]. A son of Nahor by his wife Milcah (Gen. 22:22).

Ches'il (kēs'sīl) [a fool]. A village, probably Khirbet er-Rās, in the most southerly region of Judah (Josh. 15:30); apparently called also Bethul and Bethul (Josh. 19:4; I Chron. 4:30).

Chest'nut. See PLANE.

Ches-sul'loth (kē-sūl'ōth) [loins or slopes]. A town on the boundary line of Issachar (Josh. 19:18), the same as Chislothabor (q.v.), modern Iksal, about 3¼ miles s.e. of Nazareth.

Cheth (kāth), in R.V. Heth, Hheth (hāth) [Hēth]. The 8th letter of the Hebrew alphabet. English H, descended from hēth, and Ch, though neither is pronounced with the guttural sound of hēth, represent it in Anglicized Hebrew names, as Haran, Chezib. It stands at the beginning of the 8th section of Psalm 119 in which section each verse (in the Hebrew) begins with this letter.

Ches'zib (kēs'zīb). See ASCHIZ.

Chī'don (kī'dōn) [a javelin]. A name for the threshing floor at which Uzza was struck dead for touching the Ark (I Chron. 13:9), in II Sam. 6:6 called Nachon. Exact site unknown.

Chil'e-ab (kīl'ē-āb). David's 2d son (II Sam. 3:3; cf. the LXX, Dalouia), born at Hebron. His mother was Abigail. In I Chron. 3:1 he is called Daniel.

Chil'-on (kīl'-ōn) [wasting away]. The younger son of Elimelech and Naomi (Ruth 1:2, 5).

Chil'mad (kīl'mād). A place which traded with Tyre, mentioned in connection with Sheba and Asshur (Ezek. 27:3, 23).

Chim'hām (kīm'hām) [of a livid countenance or blind; cf. Arab. kamiha, to be blind, dim, dark, to become pallid]. The son of Barzillai the Gileadite. When the father was invited by David to Jerusalem, and declined the honor on account of his advanced age, Chimham was sent in his place (II Sam. 19:37, 38). He seems to have settled near Bethlehem and erected a caravansary (Jer. 41:17, R.V. marg.).

Chin'ne-reth (kīn'ē-rēth) and Chin'ne-roth (kīn'ē-rōth), in A.V. once Cin'ne-roth (I Kings 15:20) [lute, harp]. 1. A fortified city of Naphtali (Josh. 19:35; Deut. 3:17), at Tell el-Oreimeh on n.w. shore of the Lake of Gennesaret.

2. The region around the city of Chinnereth (I Kings 15:20; cf. also Josh. 11:2), commonly identified with the plain of Gennesaret (Matt. 14:34).

3. The sheet of water adjacent to the fortified city and region of Chinnereth (Num. 34:11; Josh. 12:3; 13:27; I Kings 15:20). In later times known as the Lake of Gennesaret (Luke 5:1) and Sea of Galilee or Tiberias (John 6:1).

Chī'os (kī'ōs). An island in the Greek Archipelago, at the entrance of the Gulf of Smyrna, s. of Lesbos. Paul's vessel passed it on his last voyage to Palestine (Acts 20:15).

Chis'lev (kīs'lēv), in A.V. Chis'leu (kīs'lū) [Heb. kislēw from Akkad. kis(i)limu]. The 9th month of the Hebrew year (Neh. 1:1; Zech. 7:1; I Macc. 1:54). See YEAR.

Chis'lon (kīs'lōn) [trust, hope]. Father of the prince of Benjamin in the time of Moses (Num. 34:21).

Chis'loth'a-bor (kīs'lōth-tā'bēr) [the flanks of Tabor]. A locality hard by Mount Tabor, and a landmark on the boundary of Zebulun (Josh. 19:12); probably the same as Chesuloth, a town on the border of Issachar (v. 18). The two names have the same Hebrew consonants and differ only in the vocalization. See CHESULLOTH.

Chith'lish (kīth'līsh), in A.V. Kith'lish. A village in the lowland of Judah (Josh. 15:40). Maachōs of Codex Vaticanus suggests modern Khirbet el-Mak-haz, e. of Tell en-Nejileh.

Chit'tim (kīt'im). See KITTIM.

Ch'i'un (kī'ūn) [Kiyyūn]. A word occurring but once in the Hebrew Bible (Amos 5:26). It should probably be vocalized Kaiwān or Kēwān, for Akkad. Kaiwānu (Ninib or Saturn). It seems that the Masoretes gave the consonants kyn the vocalization of shikkūs (a detestable thing), whence Kiyyūn. A.R.V. translates it shrine. See REPHAN; SICCURH.

Chlō'e (klō'ē) [Gr., first shoot of green grass]. A Christian woman, apparently of Corinth (I Cor. 1:11).

Chor'-ash'an (kōr'āsh'ān). See ASHAN.

Cho-ra'zin (kō-rā'zīn). A town mentioned along with Bethsaida and Capernaum, and probably, like them, near the Sea of Galilee. Like the two other places, Chorazin had at times been the scene of the Saviour's preaching and beneficent miracles; but it failed to turn its spiritual privileges to account, and was doomed to suffer the penalty of its neglect (Matt. 11:21; Luke 10:13). Eusebius, in the 4th century, said that it was 2 Roman miles from Capernaum. It is identified with Kerāzeh (or Kerāzieh), n. of Tell Hūm. It is a little inland, in a side valley branching off from another one which goes down to the lake. The spot is marked by extensive ruins, including a synagogue.

Cho'sen Peo'ple. A term applied to the Israelites as the people to whom God made a special revelation and through whom he made his purposes known to man (Deut. 14:2; I Kings 3:8; I Chron. 16:13; Ps. 33:12; 105:6, 42-45; 106:5; Isa. 41:8, 9; 43:10, 20; Amos 3:2). The conception starts with the call of Abraham and the covenant made with him (Neh. 9:7, 8; Acts 13:17). The choice of this nation was an act of grace on the part of God (Deut. 4:37, 38; 7:6-8; 10:15) and implied no immunity from hardships; on the contrary, through suffering the nation was visibly disciplined. The position of the chosen people was an exalted one in the spiritual realm (John 4:22); there was laid upon them moral responsibility and leadership. In knowing the one true God they enjoyed a unique religious privilege in antiquity. Genesis begins with creation, but in the choice of Israel in accordance with God's eternal purposes there is a gradual narrowing down of the line in the genealogies: Shem, Terah, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob (Israel) who begets twelve sons, who in turn become the founders of twelve tribes, which together constitute the nation of Israel. In the fullness of time Jesus Christ was born from the line of David in the tribe of Judah.

Cho'ze'ba (kō-zē'bā). See COZEBA.

Christ (krīst) [Gr., anointed]. The Anointed One, a title corresponding to Heb. and Aram. Messiah, which denoted the anointed king of Israel, and, after Saul's reign, the royal son of David. The term was borrowed from the LXX, especially from Ps. 2:2; Dan. 9:25 (Theodotion). When used in the N.T. it generally has the word "the" prefixed, and means the Messiah of O.T. prophecy (Matt. 16:16, 20; 26:63; Mark. 8:29; Luke 3:15; A.V., John 1:41). Sometimes the word the is omitted (Matt. 26:68; John 4:25).

Christ, though really used in the primary sense, is so constantly appended to Jesus, the distinctive personal name of our Lord, given from his birth, as virtually to constitute part of the proper name (John 1:17; Acts 11:17; Rom. 1:1; 5:1; A.V., Philemon 1, etc.).

Christ'ian (kris'chūn). A follower of the Lord Jesus Christ. The name was first given at Antioch, about A.D. 43, and apparently by foes rather than friends (Acts 11:26). Though destined ultimately to become universal, yet it took root so slowly that it is found only twice again in the N.T., once in the mouth of Agrippa II, when Paul preached repentance and remission of sins through Jesus and testified to the resurrection of Christ (Acts 26:28), and once in a letter from Peter to comfort the faithful whose adherence to Christ brought persecution upon them (I Peter 4:16).

Chron'icles, The Books of the. Two historical books of the O.T. They are evidently the work of a single author, generally called the Chronicler; they have unity of plan and purpose, and formed one book in the old Hebrew canon. The LXX translators divided them into two, and this division was finally admitted into printed editions of the Hebrew canon. The Hebrew name of the books is Acts of the Days, i.e., Annals. The LXX calls them paraleipomena (things left over). This title implies that the book was intended as a supplement to Samuel and Kings, but in reality it has an independent aim. The name Chronicles is derived from the title Chronicon applied to these writings by Jerome, who describes them as "a chronicle of the whole of sacred history."

The work naturally divides itself into 4 parts: (1) Introductory genealogies (I Chron., chs. 1-9); (2) Death of Saul, the kingdom under David (chs. 10-29); (3) Solomon (II Chron., chs. 1-9); (4) Division of the Kingdom, Kings of Judah to the Exile, edict of Cyrus (chs. 10-36).

Many parts of Chronicles are in close or literal agreement with the corresponding sections of the earlier historical books from Genesis to Kings, thus showing that the Chronicler extensively used these books as sources. The lists in I Chron., chs. 1-9, are mainly derived from these Biblical authorities, while I Chron., ch. 10, to II Chron., ch. 36, follows for the most part I Sam., ch. 31, to II Kings, ch. 24. The Chronicler, however, goes beyond Samuel-Kings (cf. I Chron. 11:10-47 with II Sam. 23:8-39; II Chron. 11:5-12, 18-23; 26:5-10); apparently he had access to other documents now lost. He quotes under various titles what appears to be one work, a history of both kingdoms (II Chron. 16:11; 20:34; 25:26; 27:7; 28:26; 33:18; 35:27; 36:8), which was not the canonical Book of Kings. Whether "the commentary [midrash] of the book of the kings" (II Chron. 24:27) is the same as the book of the kings of Judah and Israel remains uncertain. The Chronicler also quotes the works of seers and prophets (I Chron. 29:29; II Chron. 9:29; 12:15; 13:22; 20:34; 26:22; 32:32; 33:19). For other authorities, see I Chron. 5:17; 27:24; 28:19; II Chron. 35:25; much material from various documents accordingly was interwoven into what was taken from Samuel-Kings.

The Books of Samuel-Kings are written from the prophetic point of view; Chronicles, from the priestly. Great prominence is naturally given to genealogies. Events are presented with a didactic purpose and referred to moral and religious causes (I Chron. 10:13, 14; II Chron. 12:1-12; 16:7-12; 20:35-37; 24:17-25; 25:14-28; 26:16-23; ch. 33). The Chronicler believes in direct divine intervention in human affairs (II Chron. 13:13-20; 14:8-14; 20:1-30). In dealing with the history of the kings, the priestly Chronicler omits the history of Saul and the Northern Kingdom as not germane to his purpose. The death of Saul and his sons is introduced as a transition from the genealogies to David; the history of the Northern Kingdom offered no material for the development of the true worship of Jehovah at Jerusalem. The Chronicler, however, gives a fuller account than do The Books of the Kings of all those matters pertaining to the organization of public worship, religious ceremonies, the part taken by Levites and singers, and the relation of the kings of David's dynasty to the worship of Jehovah in Jerusalem. This priestly character of the book, however, does not lessen its historical value.

Ancient opinion was that Chronicles was written by Ezra. This tradition cannot be proved, and it is not vital that it should be. Chronicles, with Ezra-Nehemiah, forms a historical unit which embraces the history of the Kingdom of Judah, beginning with Adam and concluding with the re-establishment of the kingdom by Ezra and Nehemiah. II Chron. 36:22, 23 agrees almost verbatim with Ezra 1:1-3, and this has been adduced as evidence that originally Ezra-Nehemiah followed Chronicles. Some critics maintain that Ezra and Nehemiah are a compilation made by an author identical with the Chronicler; linguistically Chronicles and Ezra-Nehemiah belong to the late period of Biblical Hebrew, and they are similar in diction and ideas. As an explanation of the present Hebrew order of the books, it has been suggested that Ezra-Nehemiah was accepted as canonical before Chronicles, because the latter duplicated much of Samuel-Kings; when Chronicles found a place in the canon, the original and logical order of the books was not restored. Others have supposed that the opening of Ezra-Nehemiah was repeated at the end of Chronicles to ensure the connection of the former with the latter. It may also be that II Chron. 36:22, 23 was added to the book to avoid closing it with the desolation of Jerusalem; similarly, Kings ends with a gleam of hope (II Kings 25:27-30). The order—Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah—of the English Bible goes back to the LXX.

It is evident that the Chronicler was acquainted with the Pentateuch. On account of the connections with Ezra-Nehemiah, c. 450-425 B.C. has been accepted by some as the date of the Chronicler. As a terminus a quo c. 432 B.C., Nehemiah's 2d visit to Jerusalem, has been suggested (Neh. 13:6). Eliashib (ch. 12:10) was a contemporary of Nehemiah (chs. 3:1; 13:4, 7, 28). It is more difficult to find a terminus ad quem. Jaddua (ch. 12:11), the 5th generation from Jeshua, was high priest at Jerusalem in 332 B.C. Although there are difficulties in the Hebrew text in v. 21, I Chron. 3:19-24 is generally interpreted as citing 6 generations after Zerubbabel; reckoning 25 years to a generation, this would bring Anani (v. 24) to c. 400 B.C., or, calculating a generation at 30 years, the date would come to c. 350 B.C. On the other hand, the LXX, which is followed in this passage by the Vulgate, places Anani in the 11th generation; this rendering would give c. 250 B.C. as the terminus ad quem. In view of the Hebrew text of this passage, the Chronicler can be dated c. 400 B.C.

Chronicles stands among the Hagiographa. In the printed editions of the Hebrew Bible, it follows Ezra-Nehemiah, and is the last book in the canon. This position it probably occupied at the time of Christ, for Zechariah is cited as the last [named] prophet who suffered a violent death (Matt. 23:35; Luke 11:51; cf. II Chron. 24:20-22).

Chronology. The nations of antiquity did not have a uniform system of chronology; nor did they entertain the same notions and feel the same need of an exact and unvarying chronological method as does the modern world. The Assyrians and Babylonians appear to have been confident of their ability to date events of remote antiquity; but, so far as known, they did not have an era serving as a fixed standard from which to reckon all occurrences, but named each year after a public official (eponym or limmu). A list of these annual eponyms was kept. When an event had been dated by the eponym in which it happened, its remoteness was readily ascertained by counting on the list, or canon, the number of eponyms that had intervened. In Babylonia, Assyria, Palestine, and Egypt, documents were frequently dated by the regnal year of the reigning monarch. Unfortunately the scribes did not always reckon uniformly; but under the same king some regarded the accession year as the 1st regnal year, while others considered the civil twelve-month which followed the accession as the 1st year of the reign. Furthermore, a son was not infrequently associated with his father on the throne, and some scribes treated the 1st year of association with the father, and others the 1st year of sole reign, as the 1st regnal year. The deficient sense of chronology, estimated by modern conceptions, is seen in the fact that Josephus determines the duration of the Kingdom of Israel by simply adding together the number of years that each king ruled, regardless of the fact that the reigns regularly overlapped one year, since the death of a king and the accession of his successor fell in the same year, and this year was apt to be reckoned to both reigns. Pursuing this method, he states that the Kingdom of Israel lasted 240 years, 7 months, and 7 days (Jos. Antiq. ix. 14, 1); yet by other calculations, which he makes on the basis of the reigns of the kings of Judah, he implies that the period was 263 years (cf. Jos. Antiq. x. 8, 5; viii. 7, 8; x. 9, 7). The same lack of a nice chronological sense appears in the fact that Josephus estimates the number of years that elapsed from the Exodus to the founding of the Temple at 592 (Jos. Antiq. viii. 3, 1), at other times at 612 (Jos. Antiq. xx. 10; Apion ii. 2), the Hebrew writer at 480 (I Kings 6:1), and Paul apparently at about 574 (Acts 13:18-21 and I Kings 2:11; 6:1). These diverse statements appear contradictory to the modern reader who lacks a historical sense and cannot divest himself of modern chronological conceptions; but they are accurate in the sense in which they were intended, and in which they were understood.

The era, as it is used in modern chronology, came into use at a comparatively late date. The Exodus served the Hebrews for a brief time as a point from which to reckon (Ex. 16:1; Num. 9:1; 10:11; 33:38). The Romans dated all documents by the name of the consul in office, and later they added the regnal year of the emperor. Their historians began to date from the foundation of the city of Rome (A. U. C.), but the custom did not arise until some centuries after the event. Varro's date for the founding of the city, 753 B.C., is generally accepted as the commencement of this era. The Greeks reckoned by periods of 4 years called Olympiads, the 1st of which began in 776 B.C. The Syrians used the Seleucid era, beginning with October 312 B.C. It was used by the Jews in Maccabean times (I Macc. 1:10). The era of Diocletian, known also as that of the Martyrs, begins A.D. 284. The Mohammedans date from the Hegira, or flight of Mohammed from Mecca, A.D. 622. The Jews since the 15th century A.D. have used a mundane era, dating from creation, which they place in the year 3760-3761 B.C. The Christian era is computed from the birth of Christ. At the beginning of the 6th century, the Roman abbot Dionysius in his Easter tables counted from the incarnation of the Lord; he erred in his calculation of the date of Christ's birth, but the year which he fixed upon, A. U. C. 754, has been accepted as the commencement of the Christian era. The actual year of the Nativity is supposed to be 4 B.C. The Christian era began, not with no year, but with a 1st year. Events which occurred within the civil year which included Christ's birth are dated in the 1st year.

Dates were placed in the margin of A.V. in 1701. They represent the chronological scheme of Ussher, archbishop of Armagh, which he published in his Annales Veteris et Novi Testamenti in 1650-1654. His work was careful and scholarly, and served a useful purpose for 2½ centuries. It gives only one of several possible arrangements. It is based in crucial points on Ussher's private interpretation of disputed passages, in some of which he clearly erred, as has been proved in recent years. His system was worked out from the standpoint of modern chronological conceptions, and fails to do justice to the different notions which prevailed in antiquity. It was constructed without the invaluable aid of data which have been brought to light by modern research. But although Ussher's system is obsolete, it cannot as yet be superseded by a complete and final scheme. A few dates are fixed, and the chronology of certain periods is established. Other dates are still under investigation or are awaiting further definite evidence. Much is tentative and is useful only for observing the sequence of events.

I. FROM THE CREATION OF THE WORLD TO THE BIRTH OF ABRAHAM.

The data are furnished by the Hebrew records in Gen., chs. 5; 7:11; 11:10-26. There are several possible methods of interpreting them, among which may be mentioned:

I. 1. The genealogy was constructed by the ancient writers in the same manner as it would be framed by people of the present day.

Adam,	having lived 130 years, begat
Seth,	who, " " 105 " "
Enosh,	" " " 90 " "
Kenan,	" " " 70 " "
Mahalalel,	" " " 65 " "
Jared,	" " " 162 " "
Enoch,	" " " 65 " "
Methuselah,	" " " 187 " "
Lamech,	" " " 182 " "
Noah, in whose	600th year the Flood
From the Creation to	came.
the Flood,	1,656 years.

Noah,	having lived 500 years, begat
Shem,	who, " " 100 " "
Arpachshad,	" " " 35 " "
Shelah,	" " " 30 " "
Eber,	" " " 34 " "
Peleg,	" " " 30 " "
Reu,	" " " 32 " "
Serug,	" " " 30 " "
Nahor,	" " " 29 " "
Terah,	" " " 70 " "
Abram, Nahor, and
Haran,	890 years after birth of Noah.
	290 " after the Flood.
	1,946 " after the Creation.

The 2 years of Gen. 11:10 are added to this result by Ussher, according to whom Terah begat his sons 1,948 years after the Creation. On this interpretation Shem was not the eldest son of Noah, as is generally believed, born when his father was 500 years old (Gen. 5:32). But ch. 11:10 has another explanation. Interpreting the data of the genealogy as before, Noah, having lived 500 years, begat Shem, who, having lived 100 years, begat Arpachshad. Arpachshad was thus born in the 601st year of Noah's life. He was born in the 2d civil year after the Flood year, counting it the 1st. The Flood year was the 600th of Noah's life (ch. 7:6, 11), the flood itself prevailing during 5 months of that year. Noah lived 350 full years after the Flood year, counting it the 1st (ch. 9:28). In the Flood year he was 599 years and some months old. As he lived 350 years longer, he died when he was 949 years and some months old, in the 950th year of his age (ch. 9:29). There are discrepancies between the Hebrew and the LXX, and the Samaritan Pentateuch. The Hebrew (Masoretic) text is evidently the most accurate one with respect to dates. The LXX, probably on the ground that the long-lived antediluvians were not likely to beget sons while they were less than 150 years old, took the liberty of adding a century to the Hebrew date, where it was said that they had done so, as in the case of Adam, Seth, Enosh, Kenan, Mahalalel, and Enoch. The minor variations are that to Lamech the LXX assigns 188+565=753 years; Lucian divides Methuselah's life into 167+802=969 years. The Samaritan Pentateuch, on the contrary, apparently on the ground that an antediluvian was not likely to have lived 150 years without begetting his 1st son, finding by the Hebrew text that Jared did so at 162, Methuselah at 187 and Lamech at 182, cut the figures down to 62, 67, and 53. This reduced the total length of their lives, whereas the LXX had carefully balanced its additions to the 1st part of the lives by corresponding subtractions from the later part, so that the total length of each life was the same in that version as in the Hebrew original, except in the case of Lamech. Similarly, in the case of the postdiluvian patriarchs who preceded Abraham, the LXX hesitates to allow them to beget a son until they are 100 years old. It adds 100 years to the ages at which sons were begotten by Arpachshad, Shelah, Eber, Peleg, Reu, and Serug, and 50 to the time of life when Nahor begat Terah. After Arpachshad it inserts Kenan, and states that he begat Shelah when 130 years old. The Samaritan Pentateuch allows them to beget a son after 50; and in the case of Arpachshad, Shelah, Eber, Peleg, Reu, and Serug adds 100 years to the age assigned by the Hebrew text, and 50 years in the case of Nahor.

I. 2. Or many links are omitted. As in other Hebrew genealogies, each member is said to have begotten his successor, although the latter may be a grandson or even remoter descendant; as in the royal genealogy given in Matthew, the 3 kings, Ahaziah, Joash, and Amaziah are passed over and Joram is said to have begotten Uzziah, his great-great-grandson (Matt. 1:8, R.V.; cf. the use of the verb "bare" in Gen. 46:15, 18). Only prominent members of the line are enumerated, or else, as an aid to memory, a definite number is chosen: in Matthew groups of twice 7, in Genesis groups of 10.

Adam at the age of 130 begat
Seth, who at the age of 105 begat
Ancestor of Enosh or Enosh himself.
Enosh at the age of 90 begat
Ancestor of Kenan or Kenan himself.
Kenan at the age of 70 begat

Ancestor of Mahalalel or Mahalalel himself.

According to this theory, the Hebrew records afford no basis for a chronology from Adam to Abraham. It assumes furthermore that the age assigned to the patriarchs is that of their natural life. Adam lived 930 years. This extraordinary longevity is accounted for by the fact that sin, which has a physical effect and works disease and death, had only begun its malign influence on the race, and had not reached its normal hereditary power. The balance between man in a sinless state and man in the condition of sinner had not been attained.

I. 3. Or the names denote an individual and his family spoken of collectively; as Israel denotes a patriarch and his descendants, Kain is used for the Kenites (Num. 24:22, R.V.), David for the royal house (I Kings 12:16). Sometimes the family takes its name from its progenitor or later leading member of the tribe; sometimes the name of the tribe or of the country it inhabits is applied to its chief representative, as today men are constantly addressed by their family name, and nobles are called by the name of their duchy or county. In Gen., ch. 10, the names in the genealogy are sometimes individuals, sometimes peoples, sometimes cities, sometimes countries; and in the pedigree of Abraham given in this chapter Arpachshad, whom Shem begat (Gen. 10:22), is apparently a country whose inhabitants were descendants of Shem, and this country produced Shelah (cf. bear, beget, first-born in Gen. 25:2, 3, 12-16). The longevity is the period during which the family had prominence and leadership.

Hence the years from the creation of Adam to the flood were 8,225, and from Adam to the death of Terah may have been 11,571. This outline exhibits one application of the theory; but it must be remembered that at different points in the genealogy various interpretations are possible.

II. FROM THE BIRTH OF ABRAHAM TO THE EXODUS.

How long after the Flood Abraham was born cannot be determined from the Biblical record, not even by the 1st method enumerated above and employed by Ussher in interpreting the genealogy from Adam to Abraham, for the age of Terah at the birth of Abraham is not so stated in Gen. 11:26, 32 as to be unquestionable; see ABRAHAM. According to Ussher, Abraham's birth occurred in 1996 B.C. The period from the birth of Abraham to the descent into Egypt can be measured:

Birth of Abraham to—
 " " Isaac 100 years (Gen. 21:5).
 " " Jacob 60 years (Gen. 25:26).
 Jacob's age at descent into Egypt 130 years (Gen. 47:9).
 290 years.

The sojourn of the Children of Israel in Egypt was 430 years (Ex. 12:40, 41). But from what initial date is this period reckoned? From the covenant with Abraham (Gen., ch. 15), when he was between 75 and 85 years old (chs. 12:4; 16:3), as Ussher and many others believe, or from the descent into Egypt? Probably from the latter event. See EGYPT, III. 3; 8.

III. FROM THE EXODUS TO THE FOUNDATION OF SOLOMON'S TEMPLE.

This interval was doubtless reckoned as 12 periods of 40 years each (I Kings 6:1), of which the 1st covered the sojourn in the wilderness (Ex. 16:35; Num. 14:33), 6 certainly, and probably 8, were allowed for the time of the Judges proper, the oppression and rest being frequently included in the statement (Judg. 3:11, 30—double period; 5:31; 8:28; 13:1; and probably 10:1-4 and 12:7-14), the high priesthood of Eli counted as one (I Sam. 4:18), Saul's reign probably as another (Acts 13:21), while David's reign made the 12th (I Kings 2:11). But the 40 years are a round number, and not always exact. The periods enumerated were sometimes in whole or in part contemporary; see JUDGE. Jephthah speaks of the Israelites' having occupied the country about Heshbon for 300 years (Judg. 11:26), some 7 periods of 40 years. Josephus, reckoning in a different manner, estimates the time from the Exodus to the Temple at 592 or 612 years (Jos. Antiq. viii. 3, 1; xx. 10). For the difference of 20 years, cf. I Kings 6:38 to 7:1, 7+13 years. Paul, according to the received text (used by A.V.), refers to the period of the Judges as lasting about 450 years (Acts 13:19, 20); the text of R.V., which follows the better MSS., apparently reckons from the promise to Abraham up to the Judges. As already pointed out, these diverse results do not contradict each other, although they do not agree. The variations are due to the different methods employed in calculating. The sum was not supposed to represent the exact duration of the period, as would a modern chronological statement. The exact length of the period cannot be determined until new data come to light.

IV. FROM THE FOUNDATION OF THE TEMPLE TO THE EXILE AND RETURN.

The Temple was founded in the 4th year of Solomon (I Kings 6:1). Solomon reigned 40 years, and was succeeded by Rehoboam, on whose ascension to the throne ten tribes revolted. The data obtained from both Hebrew and other sources may be arranged according to the following scheme. In general it may be remarked that this scheme recognizes the existence of coreigns. They were common in the neighboring monarchies, and are proved in individual cases for the Hebrews. David, when incapacitated by age for government, and in danger of having his throne usurped, had Solomon made king (I Kings, ch. 1). When Uzziah was compelled to seclude himself because he had become a leper, Jotham assumed the duties of royalty (II Kings 15:5). The scheme further recognizes that among the Hebrews, as among neighboring nations, no fixed rule existed as to whether the accession year of a king or the civil year which followed should be counted as the first regnal year. Some recorders followed one method, others another. Examples might be multiplied; one will suffice. In Ptolemy's canon 604, the civil year following accession, is treated as the 1st regnal year of Nebuchadnezzar. So it is by Josephus, Daniel, and Babylonian scribes, and in the record whence Jer. 52:28-30 is taken. But Jeremiah himself and other Palestinian writers of the day numbered the accession year of Nebuchadnezzar his 1st year, synchronizing Jehoiakim 4 with Nebuchadnezzar 1, and Zedekiah 11 with Nebuchadnezzar 19. It will be observed, finally, that 2 events, the slaughter of Ahaziah of Judah and Jehoram of Israel by Jehu and the fall of Samaria, divide the history of the divided monarchy into 3 periods, each chronologically complete in itself. The dates of these 2 events are established. The chronology, therefore, of each of these periods must be settled by itself. Difficulties which arise in matters of adjustment affect only their own period, not the others.

This scheme is not offered as final in every particular, but it can be used as a working basis for the dates of the kings of Israel and Judah. Many of these dates must be considered merely as approximate. Slightly different arrangements of the data are possible at several points, but they do not affect the chronology as a whole. It would be very desirable to have a scheme consistent in all details, but with our present knowledge that is impossible. The unqualified figures in parentheses after a king's name denote the length of his reign in years.

†The dates 35th and 36th yr. of the reign of Asa given in these vs. in the Heb. text were explained by the older commentators as reckoned from the commencement of the Kingdom of Judah. The numbers are then correct. Modern interpreters generally regard the Heb. text as corrupt, and read 15 or 25 and 16 or 26 for 35 and 36 respectively. They are doubtless right in doing so, for the text of Chronicles has not been transmitted so carefully as it should have been, and the phrase "year of Asa," or other king, always refers to his regnal yr., and Baasha died in the 26th yr. of Asa (I Kings 16:8-10). The 15th and 16th yrs. of Asa correspond respectively to the 35th and 36th yrs. of the division of the kingdom.

† Ussher and the older chronologists assumed that anarchy prevailed for several yrs. between the death of Pekah and the accession of Hoshea. Both the Hebrew and the Assyrian records, however, clearly indicate that no interregnum occurred, but that Hoshea slew Pekah and succeeded him on the throne. For the 20 yrs. assigned to the reign of Pekah, see PEKAH.

‡ Dated by many authorities in the early months of 721 B.C.

*According to a widely held view, Sheshbazzar is identical with Zerubbabel. Many historians, however, regard them as two different persons; in that case Zerubbabel, in accordance with a decree of Darius, returned to Jerusalem in 521.

**190 B.C., however, is the date generally given for the battle of Magnesia.

VI. FROM THE DEATH OF HEROD TO THE DESTRUCTION OF JERUSALEM.

The chronology of the life of Christ and of Paul is treated under the respective articles. The chronology of Paul's life hinges on the date of Festus' appointment to the procuratorship.

Ruler and Events	Date B.C.	Ruler and Events
On the death of Herod the Great his kingdom is divided among his 3 sons: Archelaus becomes king of Judea; Herod Antipas, tetrarch of Galilee and Perea; Philip, tetrarch of Ituraea and Trachonitis	4
Deposition of Archelaus; Judea and Samaria incorporated with the province of Syria, and placed under procurators. Coponius procurator	A.D. 6
Marcus Ambivius procurator	10
	13	Tiberius associated with Augustus, receiving from the senate imperium proconsulare in all provinces
Valerius Gratus 4th procurator	14	Augustus dies Aug. 19, and Tiberius is emperor
Pontius Pilate procurator	26
Jesus begins his public ministry (Luke 3:1, 23; cf. John 2:20) probably early in	27
Death of Philip the tetrarch. His tetrarchy is annexed to Syria	33
Pontius Pilate deposed by Vitellius, governor of Syria, and sent to Rome	36
Herod Antipas attends passover at Jerusalem; Caligula appoints Herod Agrippa to be king of the tetrarchies of Philip and Lysanias, and sends Marullus to be procurator	37	Tiberius smothered March 16, and Caligula is emperor
Herod Antipas banished to Gaul, and his tetrarchy given to King Herod Agrippa	39
Claudius makes Herod Agrippa king of Judea and Samaria	41	Caligula assassinated Jan. 24, and Claudius becomes emperor
Death of Herod Agrippa. Judea again placed under procurators. Cuspius Fadus procurator	44
Tiberius Alexander, apostate Jew of Alexandria, procurator	46
Ventidius Cumanus procurator, probably jointly with Felix	48
Antonius Felix procurator	52	Claudius expels the Jews and sorcerers and astrologers from Rome
	54	Claudius dies of poison Oct. 13, and Nero becomes emperor
Porcius Festus succeeds Felix; but if the procuratorship of Felix be reckoned from A.D. 48, it is possible to date Festus' appointment in 55 or 56	59 or 60
Albinus procurator	62
Gessius Florus procurator (64–66)	64	Persecutions under Nero begin
Outbreak of the Jewish war	66
	68	Nero ends his life. Galba and Otho become emperors successively and die violent deaths
	69	Vitellius obtains the empire and is slain
	70	Vespasian becomes emperor
Destruction of Jerusalem

Chrys'o-lite, in A.V. Chrys'o-lyte [Gr. gold stone]. A magnesium, iron silicate, usually olive-green. It is disputed whether the chrysolite of Pliny and of the N.T. was a gold-colored chrysolite or a topaz. It constitutes the 7th foundation of the New Jerusalem (Rev. 21:20).

Chry's-op-prase, in A.V. Chrys-op'ra-sus [Gr. golden-green stone]. An apple-green chromium-colored variety of chalcedony. It constitutes the 10th foundation of the New Jerusalem (Rev. 21:20). See AGATE 1.

Chub (kûb). See CUB.

Chun (kûn). See BEROETHAH.

Church [Mid. Eng. chirche, from Anglo-Saxon circe, from Gr. kyriakon, the Lord's house]. The rendering in the N.T. of the Greek ekklesia, which in the states of Greece meant the assembly of citizens summoned for legislative or other purposes (Acts 19:32, 41, assembly). The sacred writers use the word ekklesia to denote an organized community acknowledging the Lord Jesus Christ as their supreme ruler, and meeting statedly, or as opportunities offered for religious worship (Matt. 16:18; 18:17; Acts 2:47, A.V.; 5:11; Eph. 5:23, 25). As followers of Jesus arose in many different cities, the plural, "churches," began to be employed, the Christian community in each separate locality being considered a church (Acts 9:31; 15:41; Rom. 16:4; I Cor. 7:17; I Thess. 2:14). Church is nowhere unequivocally used in the N.T. for the building in which any particular Christian community met. The Protestant doctrine of the Church is that the Church may exist without a visible form, because it is both invisible and visible. The invisible Church is composed of all who are really united to Christ (I Cor. 1:2; 12:12, 13, 27, 28; Col. 1:24; I Peter 2:9, 10). The visible Church consists of all who profess to be united to Christ.

The apostles occupied a peculiar position of authority (Acts 5:2; 6:6; I Cor. 12:28; Eph. 2:20; II Peter 3:2); but they were not the sole governing body: the elders or bishops also exercised rule (Acts 15:2, 4, 6, 22, 23; I Tim. 4:14; 5:17; I Peter 5:1). The officers of the local churches were elders or bishops and deacons (Acts 6:3; 14:23; 20:17; I Tim. 3:1, 8; Titus 1:5-9). The apostles sometimes appointed commissioners for special work (I Tim. 1:3; Titus 1:5).

The public worship of the church was engrafted upon the synagogue service. It consisted of preaching (Matt. 28:20; Acts 20:7; I Cor. 14:19, 26-36), reading of Scripture (James 1:22; Col. 4:16; I Thess. 5:27; cf. Acts 13:15), prayer (I Cor. 14:14-16), singing (Eph. 5:19; Col. 3:16; and cf. the hymns Eph. 5:14; I Tim. 3:16), administration of the sacraments of baptism and the Lord's Supper (Matt. 28:19; Acts 2:41; I Cor. 11:18-34), and almsgiving (I Cor. 16:1, 2). When the spiritual gift was present, there were also prophesyings and tongues.

Chu'shan-rish'a-tha'im (kû'shân-rîsh'â-thâ'im). See CUSHAN-RISHATHAIM.

Chu'zas (kû'zās), in A.V. Chu'za (kû'zā) [perhaps Aram. kūzā, jug]. Herod the tetrarch's steward, whose wife Joanna ministered to the wants of Jesus (Luke 8:3).

Ci-li'ia (sî-lîsh'î-â). A district in the s.e. corner of Asia Minor, separated on the n. by the Taurus Mountains from Cappadocia, Lycaonia, and Isauria, and on the e. by Mount Amanus from Syria; bounded on the s. by the Mediterranean, and on the w. by Pamphylia. It was anciently divided into two portions, the western one, which was mountainous, called the Rugged, and the eastern one, which was level, the Plain Cilicia. The chief town in the latter was Tarsus, the birthplace of Paul (Acts 21:39; 22:3; 23:34). Cilicia formed part of the kingdom of Syria; and when in 148-147 B.C. Demetrius II landed on its shores and set himself up as king of Syria, the bulk of its inhabitants supported him (I Macc. 11:14; Jos. Antiq. xiii. 4, 3). Jews from Cilicia disputed with Stephen (Acts 6:9). The gospel reached it very early (ch. 15:23), planted apparently by Paul (ch. 9:30; Gal. 1:21). Afterward, passing through it, he confirmed the churches which had been founded (Acts 15:41). Subsequently on his voyage as a prisoner to Rome he sailed over the sea of Cilicia (ch. 27:5).

Cin'na'mon. A fragrant wood (S. of Sol. 4:14; Rev. 18:13). It was an ingredient in the sacred anointing oil used in the consecration of Aaron and his successors (Ex. 30:23). It was used in after times to perfume beds (Prov. 7:17). It is the aromatic bark of a tree, Cinnamomum zeylanicum, belonging to the laurel order, and cultivated in Ceylon, of which it is a native. The bark of the tree yields an oil, which is a golden-yellow color, has an agreeable smell, and is used in perfumery. The tree has been grown in Arabia.

Cin'ne-roth (sîn'ê-rôth). See CHINNERETH.

Cir'cum-ci'sion [Lat., a cutting around]. The initiatory rite into the covenant privileges of the family of God represented by Abraham and his descendants through Isaac, and the token of the covenant (Gen. 17:1-10, 21). As a rite of the religion of this people, it was instituted by God and enjoined upon Abraham, who was himself to be circumcised, as were all his male children and his male slaves, whether born in his house or bought with money. The act consists in removing the foreskin, and it was performed on the child by the father of the house or some other Israelite, and even by the mother (Ex. 4:25; I Macc. 1:60). The proper time to carry out the rite was when the boy was 8 days old, but those born before the institution of the ordinance were to be circumcised at any time of life. Abraham was circumcised when he was 99, and Ishmael when 13 (Gen. 17:11-27). The rite was observed during the bondage in Egypt, but was neglected in the wilderness. Before the entry into Canaan, however, Joshua made knives of flint and circumcised the people (Josh. 5:2-9). By this time metal was known, but there is a strong conservatism in religion, and antique arrangements tend to remain after the necessity for them has passed away; so flint held its own against metal for centuries after the time that the former might have been superseded (cf. Ex. 4:25). Foreigners who wished to become members of the commonwealth of Israel were required to submit to the rite, whatever their age might be (Gen. 34:14-17, 22; Ex. 12:48). Shortly before the Christian era, the conquered Edomites and Ituraeans were by force added thus to the Jewish nation (Jos. Antiq. xiii. 9, 1; 11, 3).

Circumcision seems to have been a primitive Semitic institution. From an early time Egyptian priests also were circumcised, and in prehistoric times it was known in Egypt and its environs (Herod. ii. 36-37; 104; Jos. Antiq. viii. 10, 3; Apon i. 22; ii. 13). The Philistines were not circumcised, and the word "uncircumcised," as a term of reproach, meant almost practically (not etymologically) the same as heathen (Gen. 34:14; Judg. 14:3; 15:18; I Sam. 17:26, 36; 31:4; II Sam. 1:20; I Chron. 10:4; Ezek. 28:10; 31:18; 32:19-32). "The circumcision," on the contrary, used in the N.T. meant the Jewish Church and nation (Gal. 2:3; Col. 4:11). Circumcision in its full significance betokened the putting away of carnal lust (Col. 2:11). To circumcise the heart is so to regenerate it that its irreligious obstinacy will disappear (Deut. 10:16; Jer. 4:4; 9:25, 26), and it will be able and willing to love God with all its powers (Deut. 30:6; Rom. 2:28, 29). Circumcision is universal among the Mohammedans as well as the Jews.

Cis (sīs). See KISH.

Cis'tern. A small artificial reservoir dug in the earth and enclosed by stone or brick work, or scooped in a rock to collect and retain rain water (Deut. 6:11; Jer. 2:13). Cisterns were very numerous in Palestine, as the populace was largely dependent upon rain water. In the cities they were constructed on the top of the towers of the city wall (Jos. War v. 4, 3). They were also excavated under the houses and in the courtyards (cf. II Sam. 17:18; Jer. 38:6), and supplied with water conducted to them from the roof; some were supplied with water by a conduit from a spring at a distance. In the open country the mouth is closed with a large stone and frequently, especially in the wilderness, is covered with earth to conceal it.

Cit'y. In Hebrew usage a collection of permanent human habitations, whether few or numerous, especially if surrounded by a wall (Gen. 4:17; 18:26; 19:20; Num. 13:19; Josh. 10:39; 13:17; Judg. 20:15; Luke 2:4; 23:51). Walled and unwalled cities are distinguished (Deut. 3:5; Esth. 9:19). Cities were built on hills (I Kings 16:24; Matt. 5:14), where the situation rendered defense easy; and in fertile spots, where water and soil invited man to dwell. They were usually fenced with high walls, gates and bars (Num. 13:28; Deut. 3:5; Josh. 2:5, 15; 6:5; Neh. 3:3; Acts 9:24, 25), and further defended by towers (Neh. 3:1, 11, 25). Walls of the thickness of 20 to 30 feet were not unusual. The gate was a massive structure, with a room over the gateway (II Sam. 18:33). In time of need a guard was posted at the gate (II Kings 7:10; Neh. 13:19), and a watchman was stationed on the roof of gatehouse or tower (II Sam. 18:24; II Kings 9:17). In open places at the gate public business was transacted, cases at law adjudicated, and markets held (Gen. 23:10; Ruth 4:1-11; II Sam. 15:2; I Kings 22:10; II Kings 7:1; Neh. 8:1). The streets were as a rule narrow (Jos. Antiq. xx. 5, 3; War ii. 14, 9; 15, 5; v. 8, 1), but not always (S. of Sol. 3:2; Nahum 2:4); some streets were devoted to bazaars (I Kings 20:34; Jer. 37:21).

Cit'y of Da'vid (dā'vīd). See DAVID, CITY OF.

Cit'y of Mo'ab (mō'āb) (Num. 22:36) [Heb. Ir-Mō'āb]. See AR.

Cit'y of Ref'uge. Six Levitical cities were designed to shelter one who had accidentally committed manslaughter from the pursuit of the avenger of blood (Num. 35:9-14; Ex. 21:13); see AVENGER OF BLOOD. Moses appointed the 3 e. of the Jordan: Bezer in Reuben, Ramoth-gilead in Gad, and Golan in Bashan in the tribe of Manasseh (Deut. 4:41-43). After the conquest of Canaan, Joshua and the heads of the tribes designated the 3 w. of the river, setting apart Kedesh in Naphtali, Shechem in Ephraim, and Kirjath-arba (Hebron) in the mountain of Judah (Josh. 20:7). No part of Palestine was far from a city of refuge. To the nearest the manslayer fled. He might be overtaken on the way and slain by the avenger; but if he reached a city of refuge he was received into it and obtained a fair trial. If guilty of willful murder he was delivered to death. If he had slain a fellow creature by accident or in self-defense, actual or constructive, he was granted asylum in the city. If he left the city before the death of the high priest, he did so at his own risk. On the death of the high priest he was at liberty to return to his home and enjoy the protection of the authorities (Num., ch. 35; Deut., ch. 19; Josh., ch. 20). The matter was between man and God; and the death of the high priest, who represented the people before God, closed a period of theocratic life (cf. the release at the year of jubilee).

Clau'da (klō'dā). A small island off the s.w. coast of Crete. Paul's ship ran under its lee when caught by the tempest off Crete (Acts 27:16). It was also called Cauda (R.V. text) and Gaudos (Pliny Hist. Nat. iv. 42).

Clau'di-a (klō'dī-ā). A Christian woman who joined Paul in sending a salutation to Timothy (II Tim. 4:21).

Clau'di-us (klō'dī-ūs). See CAESAR 3.

Clau'di-us Lys'i-as (klō'dī-ūs līs'i-ās). A chiliarch (commander of 1,000 men), who seems to have been the military tribune in charge of the whole garrison at Jerusalem. His 2d name shows him to have been a Greek, but he had bought Roman citizenship (Acts 22:28). He resided in the Castle of Antonia, and sent soldiers to rescue Paul from fanatical Jewish rioters. He gave orders that this unknown Jew be examined by scourging, but had him unbound on being informed of his Roman citizenship. Soon afterward he frustrated a plot against Paul's life by sending him by night under military escort to Caesarea to Felix, the Roman procurator (Acts 22:24 to 23:35).

Clean. See UNCLEAN ANIMALS, UNCLEANNES.

Clem'ent (klēm'ēnt) [Lat. clemens, mild, merciful]. A Christian who labored along with Paul, apparently at Philippi (Phil. 4:3).

Cle'opas (klē'ō-pās) [probably contraction of Gr. Kleopatros]. One of the 2 disciples who journeyed to and from Emmaus on the evening of the resurrection day (Luke 24:18). Apparently not the same as Clopas or Cleophas, though some Christian fathers, not of early date, assumed the identity of the two.

Cle'op'a'tra (klē'ō-pā'trā). A name borne by many Egyptian princesses. One was daughter of Ptolemy VI and wife of Alexander Balas (I Macc. 10:57, 58). Her father afterward took her from Balas and married her to Demetrius Nicator when he invaded Syria (ch. 11:12; Jos. Antiq. xiii. 4, 7). During the captivity of Demetrius in Parthia, she married his brother Antiochus VII (Jos. Antiq. xiii. 7, 1; 9, 3; 10, 1). She had two sons by Demetrius; the elder she murdered, and then raised to the throne the younger, Antiochus VIII, called Grypus. As he was unwilling to gratify her ambitious designs, she attempted to make away with him by offering him a cup of poison, but was compelled to drink it herself, 120 B.C.

Cle'opas (klē'ō-pās), in A. V. Cle'o-phas (klē'ō-fās) [cf. Palmyrene Klōpā']. Often identified with Alphaeus. See ALPHAEUS 1. According to Hegesippus this name was borne by a brother of Joseph, the husband of the Virgin Mary.

Cloth'ing. Man at first went naked (Gen. 2:25). The first clothing consisted of the skins of beasts (ch. 3:21). Subsequently the materials used for clothing were wool (Gen. 31:19; Lev. 13:47), linen (Ex. 9:31; Lev. 16:4), byssus, a fabric made of cotton or flax (Gen. 41:42; Luke 16:19), silk (Ezek. 16:10, 13), and camel's hair (Matt. 3:4). The essential articles of the apparel of men and women were 2: 1. An undergarment or tunic, commonly called coat, less frequently garment, in the English versions. † usually had short sleeves and reached nearly to the knees, though a longer form, with sleeves of full length, was in use (Gen. 37:3; II Sam. 13:18, R.V. marg.). This tunic was sometimes woven without seam (John 19:23, 24). It was confined at the waist by a girdle. 2. An upper garment or mantle (Ruth 3:15, R.V.; I Kings 11:39; Acts 9:39), a large, square piece of cloth, provided with tassels (Num. 15:38; Matt. 23:5). It was thrown over the left shoulder and brought over or under the right arm. The pendant ends were called skirts (Hag. 2:12; Zech. 8:23). The garment of hair worn by prophets (II Kings 1:8; Zech. 13:4) may have consisted of a sheepskin or goatskin (cf. Heb. 11:37), but was more probably made of coarse camel's hair (cf. Matt. 3:4). The girdles, which confined the undergarments at the waist to prevent them as far as possible from impeding the action of the limbs, were made of leather, linen, or byssus (II Kings 1:8; Jer. 13:1; Ezek. 16:10); often elaborately wrought and richly decorated (Ex. 28:39; 39:29; Dan. 10:5; Rev. 1:13). The sword was worn in the girdle and money was carried there (Judg. 3:16; I Sam. 25:13; Matt. 10:9, R.V. marg.). When outside a room people wore sandals, an imperfect shoe consisting of a sole of wood or leather (Ezek. 16:10), fastened to the bare foot by straps passing over the instep and around the ankle (Gen. 14:23; Isa. 5:27; Acts 12:8). Probably people commonly went bareheaded; still turbans were on occasion worn by both sexes (Job. 29:14, R.V. marg.; Isa. 3:20; Ezek. 23:15). The veil was worn by women in the presence of strangers (Gen. 24:65; S. of Sol. 5:7); but it was not uncommon for them to go with face unveiled (Gen. 24:16; Judith 10:7, 14). By the Mosaic Law a man was forbidden to wear a garment that pertains to a woman, and a woman to wear that belonging to a man (Deut. 22:5; cf. I Cor. 11:6, 14).

Cloud. As agents in connection with rain, clouds are the bearers of moisture (II Sam. 22:12; Job 26:8; 37:11; Eccl. 11:3), and discharge it upon the earth (Judg. 5:4; Ps. 77:17). A cloud in the w. was a harbinger of rain (I Kings 18:44; Luke 12:54).

The pillar of cloud was a miraculous cloud taking the form of a pillar, which moved in front of the Israelites in the wilderness to indicate to them the way along which God wished them to advance (Ex. 13:21, 22). When the evening was too far advanced for it to be seen, it shone with light as a pillar of fire. When God designed to show his presence to the Israelites he did it in the pillar of cloud (Num. 12:5; Deut. 31:15), and when he designed to discomfit the Egyptians at the Red Sea he looked at them through the pillar of cloud (Ex. 14:24).

Cni'dus (nī'dūs). A city of Caria, on the s.w. coast of Asia Minor, over against the isle of Cos, which is about 10 miles away. It was a Dorian colony. Paul's vessel passed near it during the voyage to Rome (Acts 27:7). It had Jewish inhabitants as early as the 2d century B.C. (I Macc. 15:23) and was a free city.

Coal. In Scripture this refers to charcoal made by burning wood. Hence we read of coals of juniper (Ps. 120:4). It was used to furnish warmth in winter (Isa. 47:14; John 18:18), for culinary purposes (Isa. 44:19; John 21:9), and by the smith (Isa. 44:12; 54:16). In 2 cases (Isa. 6:6; I Kings 19:6) the Hebrew word denotes a hot stone (cf. R.V. marg.).

Coat. See CLOTHING and HIGH PRIEST.

Coat of Mail. See ARMOR.

Cock. The male of the well-known domestic fowl Gallus domesticus. The cock is mentioned in the N.T. (Matt. 26:34, 74, 75). Cock-crow, as a portion of time, is the 3d watch of the night, just before the dawn (Mark 13:35). See NIGHT.

Cockatrice. A fabulous monster with deadly glance, reputed to be hatched by a serpent from a cock's egg. The A.V. so renders Heb. šiph'ōni (Isa. 11:8; 59:5; Jer. 8:17), and sepha' (Isa. 14:29); but in Prov. 23:32 it translates the word by adder. In all these passages A.R.V. reads "adder"; in the first 3, E.R.V. has basilisk in the text and adder in the marg., but interchanges these words in the last case.

Cockle. The rendering of Heb. bo'shāh, malodorous plant (Job 31:40). The margin has "noisome weeds," which is a more exact rendering.

Coel's-syr'i'a (sēl'-sīr'i-ā), in A.V. Ce'l'o'syr'i'a [Gr., hollow Syria]. The valley between the Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon Mountains. It is watered by the 2 streams Orontes and Litany, which rise in the vicinity of Baalbek and flow in opposite directions. The term had, however, a wider application (I Macc. 10:69). It included the w. side of the Jordan Valley as far as Beth-shean (Jos. Antiq. xiii. 13, 2) and the region extending from Damascus s. through Trachonitis, Perea, and Idumaea to include Moab and Ammon (cf. Jos. Antiq. i. 11, 5). It was distinct from Phoenicia (I Esdras 2:17; II Macc. 3:5) and extended from the Euphrates to Egypt (Jos. Antiq. xiv. 4, 5).

Col-ho'zeh (kōl-hō'zē) [all-seeing one]. Father of Shallun and perhaps one with the father of Baruch (Neh. 3:15; 11:5).

Col'lege. A mistranslation of Heb. mishneh in A.V. of II Kings 22:14, and II Chron. 34:22. The word is correctly rendered "the second" in Zeph. 1:10. In these passages R.V. has "the second quarter."

Col'o'ny. A settlement of Roman citizens authorized by the senate, in conquered territory. They retained their Roman citizenship, and formed the aristocracy of every town in which they were located. Under the Empire the colonists generally were Roman citizen-soldiers, settled on a military road to hold the enemies of the Roman Empire in check. Their constitution was on the model of Rome. Philippi was a colony (Acts 16:12).

Col'ors. In Biblical Hebrew there are few real color terms; the words denote rather a contrast between light and darkness, brightness and dimness. The abstract idea of color is expressed in Hebrew by 'ayin (eye, with a derived sense of appearance). In Babylonia different clays were employed to produce orange, red, and yellow bricks. Bricks of blue were obtained by vitrification. The ancient Egyptians prepared colors from various metallic and earthy substances. The Hebrews dyed skins in various colors (Ex. 25:5), and wove and embroidered cloth out of threads of various hues (Ex. 27:16). A reddish-purple dye (I Macc. 4:23; Acts 16:14) was obtained from the secretion of a species of shellfish, Murex trunculus, found in the Mediterranean. Blue (Num. 4:7; Ezek. 23:6) was obtained from another shellfish, Helix ianthina. Scarlet or crimson was made from an insect (Ex. 25:4; Isa. 1:18). They used a vermilion pigment for decorating walls, beams, idols, and the like (Jer. 22:14; Ezek. 23:14). In addition to these artificial coloring matters, allusion is made in the Bible to white (Gen. 49:12; Isa. 1:18), black, including brown (Gen. 30:32; S. of Sol. 1:6; Micah 3:6, R.V.), red (Gen. 25:25, 30; II Kings 3:22; Prov. 23:31), reddish (Lev. 13:19), sorrel (Zech. 1:8; in A.V., speckled; marg., bay), greenish (Ps. 68:13, E.R.V., yellow; Lev. 13:49).

Symbolism was connected with colors. In the Scripture white is the constant emblem of purity (Mark 16:5; Rev. 3:4; 19:11, 14) and joy (Eccl. 9:8). The white horse signifies victory in Rev. 6:2. The black horse is typical of famine and death (vs. 5, 6). Red commonly typifies blood, in which is life, or war and carnage (v. 4). Blue is the familiar color of the sky, and purple was worn by princes and the rich in their magnificence (Judg. 8:26; Esth. 8:15; Luke 16:19).

Col-os'sae (kô-lôs'sê), in A.V. Co-lôs'se (kô-lôs'sê). A city of s.w. Phrygia, in Asia Minor, lying on the river Lycos not far e. of its confluence with the Meander. It was originally on the trade route from w. to e. and was a place of much importance (Herod. vii. 30; Xen. Anabasis i. 2, 6). But the road system was changed, and the neighboring cities of Laodicea and Hierapolis (Col. 2:1; 4:13), distant 10 and 13 miles respectively, surpassed it in position and wealth, and the importance of Colossae declined. It was, however, like Laodicea, famous for its fine wool, and it retained municipal independence under the Romans. A Christian community grew up at Colossae under the ministrations of Epaphras and later of Archippus (Col. 1:7; 4:17; Philemon 2). Of this church Philemon was an active member, and also Onesimus (Col. 4:9).

Col-os'sians (kô-lôsh'ânz), The Epis'tle of Paul to the. An epistle written when the Apostle Paul was a prisoner (Col. 4:3, 10, 18) probably at Rome during the 2 years of his 1st imprisonment there (Acts 28:30, 31), though some believe that it was written from Caesarea (Acts 23:35; 24:27) or even Ephesus. From Col. 2:1 it appears evident that he had never himself preached at Colossae; and ch. 1:7 seems to imply that Epaphras had been the founder, or at least had assisted in the establishment of the Colossian church. The church may have been founded while Paul was laboring in Ephesus (Acts 19:1, 10). Epaphras had recently joined the apostle (ch. 1:8), and his report of the condition of the church prompted the writing of the letter. It was sent by the hand of a certain Tychicus (ch. 4:7, 8), who was also entrusted with the letter to the Ephesians (Eph. 6:21), probably written at the same time. With him went Onesimus (Col. 4:9), who also bore the letter to Philemon, a resident of Colossae, whose slave Onesimus had formerly been. The Archippus mentioned in Philemon 2, probably Philemon's son, is also mentioned in Col. 4:17. The salutations which the letter contains (ch. 4:10-17) indicate that while Paul had not labored in Colossae his friends had, and that he himself was well acquainted with some of the Colossians. In fact, Philemon was one of his converts (Philemon 19), made, perhaps, in Ephesus. The reports of Epaphras had shown that the Colossian Christians were threatened by false teachers, who seemed to have combined ritualistic, ascetic, and speculative tendencies. That they were Jewish appears from Col. 2:11, 16. But they were also ascetic (vs. 16, 20-23), a feature which may have come from the Jewish sect of Essenes. With this they united a mystic philosophy (v. 8), which seems to have claimed superior knowledge of divine things (v. 18) and to have introduced the worship of angels (v. 18), thus infringing on the all-sufficiency and the supremacy of Christ. These false teachers, therefore, were different from the Judaizers whom Paul opposed in The Epistle to the Galatians. They represent a new form of error, that of religious syncretism with pagan cultus, and in certain respects appear as the forerunners of the Gnostics. They united with ritualism that theosophical tendency which was almost characteristic of Oriental thought, and therefore demanded an immediate refutation by the apostle.

The epistle naturally falls into 4 parts: 1. the introduction and thanksgiving (ch. 1:1-8); 2. the doctrinal section (chs. 1:9 to 3:4); 3. practical exhortations (chs. 3:5 to 4:6); 4. concluding salutations (ch. 4:7-18). The doctrinal section is of great importance. Beginning with a prayer for their growth in knowledge and holiness, Paul rises to a description of the pre-eminence of Christ in his relation to God, the universe, and the Church. Then in ch. 2 he sets forth Christ's pre-eminence as against the errorists, assuring believers of their completeness in him, since he has once for all triumphed over their spiritual foes, and nothing but union with him by faith is requisite for the full experience of salvation. As against asceticism he further urges, in his practical exhortations, to a spiritual morality and to social order. The epistle is, therefore, Christological in character. It assumes the doctrines of salvation taught in previous epistles, but more explicitly states the pre-eminence of Christ's person and the sufficiency of his work. This epistle, together with Philemon and Ephesians, was probably written toward the middle or end of Paul's Roman imprisonment, perhaps in A.D. 62. The Epistle to the Ephesians has many remarkable coincidences of language and thought with that to the Colossians, though their differences are equally noteworthy; see EPHESIANS. While evidently written at the same time, Ephesians presents a further unfolding of the truths which the specific needs of his Colossian readers led Paul to write to them. G. T. P. (rev., H. S. G.)

Com-men'tar'y. Translation of Heb. midrash, from root dārašh (search out, investigate, and so discover or develop a thought not apparent on the surface). A midrash denotes a didactic or homiletic exposition or an edifying religious story such as that of Tobit. It may also be applied to a religious interpretation of history, as the Prophet Iddo's commentary on the acts, ways, and sayings of King Abijah (II Chron. 13:22, R.V.), and the commentary of the Book of the Kings, in which were set forth the burdens laid upon King Joash and his rebuilding of the Temple (II Chron. 24:27, R.V.).

Com-mun'ion. See LORD'S SUPPER.

Con'an'i'ah (kôn'a-ni'ô), in A.V. twice Con'o-ni'ah [Jehovah has established]. 1. A Levite who had charge of the tithes and offerings in Hezekiah's reign (II Chron. 31:12, 13).

2. A Levite of high station in the reign of Josiah (II Chron. 35:9).

Con'cu-bine. A secondary wife under the system of polygamy. Concubines were commonly taken from among the purchased slaves or captives; as Hagar (Gen. 16:2, 3), Bilhah (ch. 29:29), Gideon's concubine (Judg. 8:31). They could be more easily put away than a wife (Gen. 21:10-14), yet their rights were recognized and guarded by the Mosaic Law (Ex. 21:7-11; Deut. 21:10-14).

Co'ney. The coney of England is the rabbit; that of Scripture is probably the rock badger (Lev. 11:5, R.V. marg.). See ROCK BADGER.

Con'gre-ga'tion. In Scripture the word is used mainly for: 1. The body politic of Israel, including men, women, and children (Ex. 12:3, 19, 47; 16:1, 22; Lev. 4:13; 24:14; Num. 1:2; Judg. 20:1).

2. An assemblage of the people, especially for religious purposes (A.R.V., assembly, I Kings 8:14, 65; II Chron. 30:2, 4; Ps. 22:22, 25), or the community regarded as ever summoned and assembled for worship. A.R.V. and E.R.V. often agree in using the word assembly (Num. 10:7; 16:3; 19:20; 20:4; Josh.

8:35; also sometimes in A.V., Judg. 20:2); in Acts 13:43 synagogue has the same meaning.

3. In A.V. the tabernacle of the congregation designates the tent of meeting (1.V.), the appointed place where Jehovah and his people met (Ex. 27:21; cf. 28:22; 29:42; 30:36).

Co-ni'ah (kō-ni'a). See JECONIAH.

Con'o-ni'ah (kōn'ō-ni'ā). See CONANIAH.

Con'quest. See CANAAN.

Con'secra'tion. The act whereby a person or thing is dedicated to the service and worship of God. It includes ordination to a sacred office (Ex. 29:9), ordination to sacred service (Lev. 8:33; 1 Chron. 29:5; 11 Chron. 29:31), and the setting apart of things from a common to a sacred use (Josh. 6:19; 11 Chron. 31:6).

Con'versa'tion. The word conversation in its archaic sense denotes manner of life. 1. The rendering in the A.V. of the Greek words politeuō and politeuma (Phil. 1:27; 3:20). The words refer to civil life, as is recognized by R.V. Christians are citizens of the heavenly Kingdom and their daily civil conduct should correspond with the teachings of the gospel of the Kingdom.

2. The rendering, in many passages of the A.V., of various words, especially of the Greek anastrophē. It means conduct, or mode of life, especially with respect to morals (Ps. 37:14; Eph. 4:22; Heb. 13:5; 1 Peter 1:15).

Con'vo-ca'tion. A festival on which the Israelites were summoned to assemble together and when no servile work was allowed to be done. The holy convocations were every Sabbath (Lev. 23:1-3, the 1st and 7th days of the feast of unleavened bread (Ex. 12:16; Lev. 23:6, 7; Num. 28:18, 25), Pentecost (Lev. 23:15-21), the 1st and 7th days of the 7th month, the latter being the great Day of Atonement (Lev. 23:24-28; Num. 29:1), and the 1st and 8th days of the feast of tabernacles, which began on the 15th of the 7th month (Lev. 23:34-36; Neh. 8:18).

Co'os (kō'ōs). See COS.

Cop'per. See BRASS.

Cor. See MEASURE, III.

Cor'al. A rendering of Hebrew rā'mōth. It was highly prized (Job 28:18), and was brought to the markets of Tyre by Aramaean traders (Ezek. 27:16). It was obtained in the Mediterranean and Red Seas, and was made into beads and charms. Coral is properly the calcareous skeleton of certain animals of low organization, popularly but erroneously called coral insects. They are radiated animals, with a central mouth surrounded by fleshy limbs; and are either attached singly to a rock, or so bud from parents as to make a compound being of many half-distinct, half-united individuals. The carbonate of lime of which the coral skeleton is made is obtained from the sea water. The coral is often beautifully branched like a tree or shrub, whence these animals are often called zoophytes (plant animals). Some species form great reefs.

Coral is also a rendering (R.V. marg.) of Hebrew p'ninim, rendered "rubies" in the text (Lam. 4:7; Job 28:18; Prov. 3:15).

Cor'-a'shan (kōr'ā'shān). See ASHAN.

Cor'ban [Heb. korbān, offering]. An offering or oblation, either of a bloody or an unbloody sacrifice, given to God (Lev. 1:2, 3; 2:1; 3:1; Num. 7:12-17; where the word occurs in the Hebrew text). An Aramaic word korbanās, from the same root, is rendered in Matt. 27:6 "treasury," and on the margin of the R.V. "sacred treasury." Corban is used for money or service dedicated to God (Mark 7:11). The reprehensible practice arose of children's giving no aid to parents needing their support, on the pretense that the money or service which would otherwise have been available for the parents had been dedicated to God and that it would be sacrilege to divert it from this sacred purpose. Josephus (War ii. 9, 4) relates that a clamorous mob beset the tribunal of Pontius Pilate when he took the sacred money called corban and expended it on aqueducts designed to improve the water supply of Jerusalem. This doubtless was a public benefit, but the Jews evidently thought that money once dedicated to God could never again be lawfully used for a secular purpose, however conducive to the public welfare.

Co're (kō'rē). See KORAH.

Co'ri-an'der. A plant, called in Hebrew gad, which had white seeds (Ex. 16:31; Num. 11:7). It was the Coriandrum sativum, a branched annual, with cut leaves, umbels of pink or white flowers, and a small globular fruit used to season dishes. It has a carminative action upon the stomach.

Cor'inth (kōr'inth). A city of Greece, on the narrow isthmus between the Peloponnesus and the mainland. At an early date a town grew up at the s. end of this neck of land on the plateau at the n. foot of the Acro-Corinthus. This mountain is 1,800 feet high, and its summit served as a citadel and as the site for a temple. The land traffic between the peninsula and the mainland was obliged to pass the town, and much of the commerce between Asia and the w. was brought to its harbors, Cenchreae, 3½ miles to the e. on the Saronic Gulf, and Lechaenum, 1½ miles to the w. on the Corinthian Gulf. The latter city was connected with Corinth by the Long Walls. Another harbor on the e. is Schoenus. Small ships and the cargoes of larger ones were hauled across the isthmus on a made track called the diolkos. The town attracted Phoenician settlers, who made a purple dye from fish of the neighboring waters, introduced the manufacture of cloth, pottery, and armor, and established the impure worship of the Phoenician deities. At a later time emigrants from Attica became dominant. About 1074 B.C. the political supremacy passed to the Dorians. But the character of the inhabitants remained unchanged; they were commercial in spirit, unwarlike, luxurious, and licentious. Their immoral life gave rise and meaning to a verb "to corinthianize."

Except during the years 243-222 B.C., the Macedonians held the citadel from 335-197 B.C., when in 196 B.C. Greece was declared independent by the Romans. In 146 B.C., in consequence of rebellion against Rome, the Roman consul Mummius burned the city to ashes. The city was rebuilt by Julius Caesar in 44 B.C., became the capital of the Roman province of Achaia, and was ruled by a proconsul. Paul reached Corinth probably in A.D. 52 and labored there for a year and a half. He lodged with Aquila and Priscilla, supported himself by tentmaking, and preached Christ, first in the synagogue and then in the house of Justus. At length he was dragged before the tribunal of the proconsul Gallio, but was dismissed (Acts 18:1-18). After Paul's departure, Apollos continued the work (vs. 24-28). On 4 several occasions later the apostle sent letters to the Corinthian church (1 Cor. 5:9). The 3 months (Acts 20:3) when Paul was in Greece were doubtless spent at Corinth, probably during the winter of 57-58. The Christian community continued to increase; and by the 2d century its bishop possessed great influence in the Church.

Co-rin'thi'ans (kō-rin'thī-ānz), The Epistles of Paul to the. The First Epistle of Paul to the Corinthians was written during the apostle's long sojourn in Ephesus (I Cor. 16:8, 9, 19; Acts, ch. 19), probably early in A.D. 57. He had had much anxiety over the state of the Corinthian church, which he had founded a few years before.

Because of disquieting news from Corinth, Paul wrote a letter, no longer extant, in which he warned the Corinthians against associating with immoral persons (I Cor. 5:9 seq.). Scholars call this epistle "the previous letter" and believe that a fragment of it is preserved in II Cor. 6:14 to 7:1, a section which interrupts the thought of the passage in which it now stands. This hypothesis may be correct, since these verses would fit very well into the context of "the previous letter."

The evidence as to the circumstances under which Paul wrote I Corinthians is contained within the epistle itself. While at Ephesus, he was informed about the condition of the church at Corinth by those of the household of Chloe (I Cor. 1:11); by a deputation from Corinth, Stephanas, Fortunatus, and Achaicus (ch. 16:17); and in a letter from the church asking Paul's judgment on various questions (ch. 7:1). Sometime before this, Paul had sent Timothy to Corinth by way of Macedonia, and he was anxious about the reception he would receive there (I Cor. 4:17; 16:10; Acts 19:22), but the later news moved him immediately to write this epistle. It is generally accepted that Paul himself made a brief unrecorded visit to Corinth from Ephesus for the purpose of exercising discipline in the church. This is inferred from II Cor. 2:1; 12:14; 13:1, where he speaks of being about to visit the Corinthians a 3d time; Acts (ch. 18:1) speaks of only one previous visit. The unrecorded visit should be placed between I and II Corinthians.

In I Corinthians he takes up in order the practical and doctrinal points on which they needed instruction. The epistle combines cogent doctrinal discussion and skillful dealing with moral and ecclesiastical problems, clearly reflecting the conditions of the churches among the Gentiles. In chs. 1:12 to 6:20 Paul deals mainly with matters of which he had heard oral reports, while in ch. 7:1 he begins to answer the letter he had received from Corinth. The subjects discussed are, after the introductory salutation (I Cor. 1:1-9):

1. The divisions in the church (chs. 1:10 to 4:21). Factions had arisen, claiming to follow particular leaders, and doubtless characterized by special theological tendencies. He mentions a Paul party, an Apollos party, a Cephas party, and a Christ party. Against them all he sets forth the dependence of all believers on Christ crucified, the inspired authority with which the gospel had first been preached to them, and the subordinate character of every one by whom it was administered, even though he were an apostle; so that none should be made the head of a party, but glory given to God in Christ alone.

2. The duty of exercising and honoring church discipline (chs. 5; 6), especially in the case of offenders against purity, of which there had been one conspicuous example.

3. Directions on the subject of marriage and divorce (ch. 7).

4. Directions concerning practical questions arising from contact with heathen society (chs. 8:1 to 11:1). These pertained especially to the eating of food which had been offered to idols; in regard to which self-denial should control their liberty (ch. 8), even as he sought to have it do in his own life (ch. 9). While not needlessly inquiring as to the origin of the food they bought or ate, they should be careful not to seem to participate in recognition of the idol (ch. 10).

5. Warnings against certain abuses in public worship (ch. 11:2-34) with respect to the propheying of women and the administration of the Lord's Supper.

6. Directions as to the estimate, exercise, and regulation of miraculous gifts (chs. 12 to 14).

7. Instruction concerning the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead, which some were disposed to doubt (ch. 15).

8. Directions about the collections being made for the saints in Judea, and concluding remarks about his own movements and other personal matters (ch. 16).

Apparently Timothy's mission was unsuccessful, and I Corinthians did not have the desired effect. I Cor. 1:14 seq. and ch. 4 show premonitory signs of a definite refusal to accept Paul's authority. Seemingly his unrecorded visit was so distressing that he returned to Ephesus much troubled. Evidence is present (II Cor. 2:4; 7:8) that he wrote a "severe" or "sorrowful" letter, of which II Cor., chs. 10 to 13, is regarded by many scholars as a fragment. Probably Titus was the bearer of this epistle. Then, after Paul had left Ephesus (Acts 20:1) and was met in Macedonia by Titus, who gave a good account of affairs at Corinth (II Cor. 2:12-17; 7:5-7), the apostle in a cheerful spirit wrote what is now II Cor., chs. 1 to 9, his 4th letter to the Corinthians. In support of this proposed reconstruction there should be noticed three pairs of parallel passages (chs. 10:6 and 2:9; 13:2 and 1:23; 13:10 and 2:3), which exhibit a phenomenon that is strange on the supposition that II Corinthians is a literary unit. In each pair the same thing is referred to twice; the verses from the section chs. 10 to 13 have the present or future tense, while those from the section chs. 1 to 9 have the past tense. This was in the summer or early autumn of A.D. 57. Timothy was now with Paul again (ch. 1:1). Titus and another had recently been sent from Ephesus to Corinth (chs. 2:13; 7:6, 7, 13, 15; 12:18) with directions to have the church immediately discipline an offender, perhaps the incestuous person of I Cor. 5:1, who had openly defied the apostle's authority and whose continued sin threatened the very stability of the church. Titus was to rejoin Paul at Troas, but the apostle, not finding him there, had gone on to Macedonia in great distress of mind. At last, however, Titus came with the good news that the Corinthians had disciplined the offender, and that the latter had humbly acknowledged his sin. Thereupon this epistle (or, according to the critical view, chs. 1 to 9 minus chs. 6:14 to 7:1) was written, and Titus, with 2 others (ch. 8:16-24), was sent back with it to Corinth. It is the least methodical and most personal of Paul's epistles.

It falls into three main divisions: 1. Chs. 1 to 7, in which, after grateful recognition of God's goodness to him even amid trial (ch. 1:1-14), he vindicates himself from the charge of vacillation (chs. 1:15 to 2:4), bids them not carry too far their zeal against the offender (ch. 2:5-11), and describes the spiritual (ch. 3), honest (ch. 4:1-6), suffering (vs. 7-18), hopeful (ch. 5:1-9), solemn (vs. 10, 11), Christ-impelled (vs. 12-17) ministry of reconciliation (vs. 18-21) with which, as a co-worker with God, he had been intrusted (chs. 5:18 to 6:2), in which he had appeared himself (ch. 6:3-10), on the ground of which he appealed to them (vs. 11-18), and in their acknowledgment of which he found boldness and joy (ch. 7). 2. Chs. 8; 9, in which he treats of the collections for the Judean saints and urges liberality. 3. Chs. 10 to 13, in which he gives a pathetic but confident testimony to his apostolic office and authority. The epistle closes with a renewed warning against their besetting sins, and declares that if, when he comes to them, he find these sins uncorrected, he will exercise his authority unsparingly.

The problem of literary analysis does not affect the genuineness of the Pauline authorship or the inspiration of the documents. It suggests, however, that Paul's correspondence with Corinth was more voluminous than has previously been supposed. The view which segregates II Cor. 6:14 to 7:1 and regards chs. 10 to 13 as earlier than chs. 1 to 9 is a hypothesis. Some scholars still maintain that II Corinthians is a unit in the form in which we now have it.

G. T. P. (rev., H. S. G.)

Cor'mo-rant. 1. The rendering of Heb. shālāk, plunger; a bird ceremonially unclean (Lev. 11:17; Deut. 14:17). It is probably the common cormorant (Phalacrocorax carbo), a large swimming bird of the pelican family, but distinguished from the pelican by not having a pouch below the lower mandible. The common cormorant is widely distributed. In Palestine it lives on the Mediterranean coast and on the Sea of Galilee. Its appetite is proverbial; and Tristram describes it as sitting on the snag of a tree where the Jordan enters the Dead Sea, and catching the fish while they are stupefied by being carried into the briny water. Another species, Phalacrocorax pigmaeus, the pygmy cormorant, is found sparingly on the streams which flow through Palestine to the Mediterranean.

2. The rendering of Heb. kā'āth in text of A.V. (Isa. 34:11; Zeph. 2:14); see PELICAN.

Corn. The generic name for the several cereal grasses cultivated in Palestine, and so staple that corn and wine stand figuratively for the entire vegetable produce of the fields (Gen. 27:28; Deut. 7:13, etc.). In this sense A.R.V. almost invariably substitutes "grain" for "corn." The chief were wheat, barley, spelt, and millet (Deut. 8:8; and R.V. of Isa. 28:25 and Ezek. 4:9).

Cor-nel'i-us (kōr-nēl'yūs) [Lat.]. A centurion of the Roman cohort called the Italian band. He lived at Caesarea; and was a devout, charitable, God-fearing Gentile. On the ground of visions received by him and Peter, and the descent of the Holy Spirit upon him and his household when they believed, Peter baptized him. The descent of the Holy Spirit upon him was an event of prime importance in the Early Church. It marked the beginning of the calling of the Gentiles and revealed that the Spirit is given to believers irrespective of nationality (Acts, ch. 10).

Cor'ner-stone'. A stone placed at the angle where two walls of a building meet, and helping to bind them together. Any stone in this position, from the foundation (Job 38:6; Isa. 28:16) to the roof (Ps. 118:22; Zech. 4:7), is a cornerstone. Figuratively, Christ is the chief cornerstone at the foundation (Rom. 9:33; Eph. 2:20; I Peter 2:6) and also the head of the corner (Matt. 21:42; I Peter 2:7).

Cor'net. 1. The rendering of Heb. shōphār in I Chron. 15:28; II Chron. 15:14; Ps. 98:6; Hos. 5:8. Elsewhere, as in Lev. 25:9, it is translated trumpet (q.v.).

2. The rendering of Heb. mēnā'ane'im in II Sam. 6:5, A.V. R.V. renders it "castanets" (q.v.).

3. The rendering of Aram. karṇā', corresponding to Heb. keren in Dan. 3:5, 7, 10, 15. It means a horn, and is so rendered in ch. 8:20. This instrument originally consisted of the hollow horn of some mammal; but later it was generally made of metal, and was curved, like many animals' horns.

Cor'rup'tion, Mount of. A hill to the e. of Jerusalem (II Kings 23:13; cf. I Kings 11:7). Solomon built altars on its s. side to the gods worshiped by his heathen wives. By common consent it is the s. portion of the Mount of Olives and is known in tradition as the Mount of Offense.

Cos (kōs), in A.V. Co'os. An island in the archipelago off the coast of Caria in Asia Minor, in a gulf between Cnidus and Halicarnassus. It lies between Miletus and Rhodes, about a day's sail from the latter city (Acts 21:1). It is about 21 miles long by 6 broad. The Jews there were favored by the Romans in 139-138 B.C. (I Macc. 15:23). Cos was celebrated for its wines, its ointments, and its purple dyes.

Co'sam (kō'sām). A descendant of David through Nathan and an ancestor of Zerubabel and Christ (Luke 3:28).

Cot'ton. The correct rendering of Heb. karpas in R.V. marg., Esth. 1:6. In the court of the royal palace at Shushan were hangings of fine cotton. Heb. karpas goes back to Sans. karpāsa (cotton tree, cotton); Indian cotton (Gossypium herbaceum) was early cultivated in Persia, and was probably that of The Book of Esther.

Coun'cil. 1. The Jewish governing body. The Persians granted to the Jews jurisdiction over their own affairs (Ezra 7:25, 26; 10:14). After the fall of the Persian Empire similar privileges were enjoyed by the Jews. A governing body arose and became known as gerousia or senate (Jos. Antiq. xii. 3, 3), and more fully as the senate of the nation (I Macc. 12:6). It was composed of elders (cf. ch. 14:20). It represented the nation (ch. 12:3), and united with Jonathan, the high priest and leader, in making offensive and defensive alliance with the Spartans. Jonathan also called the elders of the people together and consulted with them about building strongholds in Judea and increasing the height of the walls of Jerusalem (v. 35; cf. also chs. 13:36; 14:20, 28, 47). Under Gabinius, proconsul of Syria, 57-55 B.C., Judea was divided into 5 districts, each under a synedrion or synodos—i.e., assembly or sanhedrin (Jos. Antiq. xiv. 5, 4; War i. 8, 5). Henceforth the highest body at Jerusalem was called synedrion, though not to the exclusion of gerousia or boulē. The arrangement, however, did not last long. In 47 B.C., Caesar extended the jurisdiction of the sanhedrin of Jerusalem once more over all Judea (cf. Jos. Antiq. xiv. 9, 3-5; War i. 10, 7). Under the Roman procurators, A.D. 6-66, its powers were extensive. According to Jewish authorities, it was composed of 71 members (cf. the mock council, Jos. War iv. 5, 4), and only Israelites whose descent was above question were eligible to membership. The 70 ordinary members corresponded, probably, to the 70 elders appointed by Moses to assist him as judges. The 71st member was the high priest, the official president of the body. It was the highest court, with power of life and death (Jos. Antiq. xiv. 9, 3 and 4; Matt. 26:3, 57; Acts 4:5, 6, 15; 5:21, 27, 34, 41; 6:12, 15; 7:11; 23:2), though apparently it had no recognized authority to execute its sentence of death, but had to submit its action to the review of the Roman authorities. It had the general administration of the government and of justice, so far as this was not exercised by the procurator and subordinate officials (cf. Acts 22:30). In the time of Florus, at least, the revenue was collected by the rulers and councilors, who dispersed themselves among the villages for that purpose (Jos. War ii. 17, 1). It had police at command and could make arrests on its own authority (Matt. 26:47; Mark 14:43). Jesus was tried before the council (Matt. 26:59; Mark 14:55; 15:1; Luke 22:66; John 11:47). It was before the council that Peter, John, and the other apostles were brought (Acts 4:5, 6, 15; 5:21, 27, 34, 41). Stephen was taken before the council (ch. 6:12), so also was Paul (ch. 22:30; 23:15; 24:20). The sanhedrin was swept away at the destruction of Jerusalem (A.D. 70).

2. A body of advisers selected by the highest Roman official of a province, in Judea the procurator, to assist him in the administration of justice, before whom, with the official as president, cases were tried (Acts 25:12; Jos. Antiq. xvi. 11, 1 seq.; War ii. 16, 1).

Council House. A building in Jerusalem w. of the Temple, near the gymnasium and adjoining the innermost city wall (Jos. War v. 4, 2). It was burned by the Romans under Titus in the course of their struggle for the possession of the city (Jos. War vi. 6, 3). The council house was probably the place where the sanhedrin met, for: (1) Its name in Greek was bouleuterion, and a member of the sanhedrin was called boulētēs (Luke 23:50, 51; cf. Jos. War ii. 17, 1). (2) The council is called by Josephus synedrion—i.e., sanhedrin—and boulē indifferently (cf. Jos. Antiq. xiv. 9, 3 and 4, with xx. 1, 2; War ii. 15, 6). (3) According to Jewish authorities, the sanhedrin met in the lishkath haggāzith, or chamber of the gāzith, which probably denoted a chamber by the gymnasium. According to the Mishnah, it is true, the lishkath haggāzith was situated at the e. corner of the court of the Temple. But gāzith means hewn, especially hewn stone (Ex. 20:25; I Kings 6:36); and as the chambers of the Temple were largely constructed in this manner, the name gāzith could not distinguish one from another. Now the council house stood near or adjoined the xystos or gymnasium; but xystos is the Greek equivalent of gāzith, and is one of the words used in the LXX to translate gāzith (I Chron. 22:2; Amos 5:11). It can scarcely be doubted, therefore, that the xystos was called the gāzith by one who chanced to be speaking Hebrew, and that the name lishkath haggāzith meant the hall by the xystos.

Probably, as the Mishnah states, the meetings originally were held in one of the chambers of the inner court of the Temple in order that the discussions might have more religious authority. The account of Josephus refers to the last years of the Jewish state, and by that time conditions were changed. It may be that at that time the Pharisees would not permit the secular sanhedrin to hold its sessions in the sanctuary.

Coun'se-lor. The 7 counselors of Artaxerxes (Ezra 7:14) were probably the 7 princes of Media and Persia "who saw the king's face, and sat first in the kingdom," and from whom the king sought advice (Esth. 1:14).

Court. An enclosed but uncovered area either connected with a private house and often containing a well (II Sam. 17:18; Neh. 8:16); or in a palace (I Kings 7:8, 9, 12; Jer. 32:2), in front of the royal apartments (Esth. 4:11; 5:1; 6:4) and sometimes containing a garden (ch. 1:5); or around the tabernacle and Temple (Ex. 27:9; 40:8; I Kings 6:36). As the area about the Temple was divided (II Kings 21:5), the word is generally used in the plural (Ps. 65:4; 84:2).

Coven'ant. An agreement between 2 or more persons. Various covenants between man and man are mentioned in Scripture (Gen. 21:27, 32; I Sam. 18:3; 23:18; I Kings 20:34). More important are those in which God condescended to be a covenanting party. His covenant with man is a free promise on his part, generally based upon the fulfillment of certain conditions by man. He made a promise of continued life and favor to man on condition of obedience, coupled with a penalty for disobedience (Gen. 2:16, 17). He established a covenant with Noah, that Noah should be saved when the old world perished (Gen. 6:18), and that there should be no other great deluge, the rainbow being the token of the covenant (Gen. 9:12, 15, 16); with Abraham and his posterity, of which circumcision was to be the sign, to be their God and to give them the land of Canaan for an inheritance (Gen. 13:17; 15:18; 17:2, 4, 7, 11, 13, 14, 19; II Kings 13:23; I Chron. 16:15-18; Ps. 105:9-11; Acts 7:8; Rom. 4:13, 17); with the Israelites as a nation, to continue to be their God and to grant national protection, of which a sign was to be the Sabbath (Ex. 31:16), and the keeping of the Ten Commandments its condition (Deut. 4:13, 23). This covenant was made at Horeb (Deut. 5:2; 29:1) and was renewed with the next generation on the plains of Moab (Deut. 29:1). There was a covenant with the Levites (Mal. 2:4, 8), and one specially with Phinehas to give him and his descendants an everlasting priesthood (Num. 25:12, 13). There was a covenant with David that his posterity should forever occupy his throne (Ps. 89:20-28, 34; cf. II Sam., ch. 7 and I Chron., ch. 17; II Chron. 7:18; Jer. 33:21). In contrast with the covenant at Sinai, there was to be a new covenant, also with the Israelites, which was to be of a more spiritual character than its predecessors (Jer. 31:31-34; Heb. 8:8-11), administered by the Spirit (John 7:39; Acts 2:32, 33; II Cor. 3:6-9), based on faith (Gal. 4:21-31), and designed for all nations (Matt. 28:19, 20; Acts 10:44-47). Of this Christ is the Mediator (Heb. 8:6 to 9:1; 10:15-17; 12:24). With reference to it the Old and New Testaments would, perhaps, better have been called the Old and New Covenants.

The 2 tablets of stone on which were engraved the Ten Commandments, which were the fundamental law of God's covenant with Israel, were called the Tables of the Covenant (Deut. 9:11), and the Ark, in which these tables were deposited, was designated the Ark of the Covenant (Num. 10:33). The Book of the Covenant, prefaced perhaps by the Ten Commandments, consisted of the ordinances contained in Ex. 20:22 to 23:33, which were written by Moses in a book, formally accepted by the Israelites, and ratified as a covenant between the Lord and his people (Ex. 24:

3-8); see THEOCRACY. Later the term is used as synonymous with the Book of the Law (cf. 11 Kings 23:2 with 22:8, 11) and included Deuteronomy (Deut. 31:9, 26; cf. 11 Kings 14:6 with Deut. 24:16).

Cow. Cows were early domesticated. Egypt, Philistia, and Palestine afforded excellent pasturage, and cows were kept in these lands (Gen. 41:2; Deut. 7:13; 1 Sam. 6:7). Cows were herded by Abraham and his descendants (Gen. 12:16; 32:15). Their milk served for food (11 Sam. 17:29). They were used in concluding a covenant (Gen. 15:9), in the ceremony attending the profession of innocence of a death caused by an undiscoverable murderer (Deut. 21:1-9), for a peace offering (Lev. 3:1), for a sin offering for uncleanness arising from contact with the dead (Num. 19:2, 9; Heb. 9:13), and in exceptional cases for a burnt offering (1 Sam. 6:14).

Coz (kōz). See HAKKOZ.

Coz'bi (kōz'bi) [untruthful]. A daughter of Zur, prince of Midian. In the idolatrous rites to which the Midianites seduced Israel the woman was publicly taken by a prince of the Simeonites. Both were thrust through by Phinehas, son of the high priest, and shortly afterward her father also was slain (Num. 25: 6-8, 14, 15, 18; 31:8).

Coze'ba (kō-zē'bā), in A.V. Choze'ba [untruthful]. A village in Judah, peopled chiefly by descendants of Shelah (1 Chron. 4:22). It is generally believed to be the same as Achzib and Chezib.

Crane. Hebrew āgūr, a migratory bird which has a note like a chatter (Isa. 38:14; Jer. 8:7). The crane is the type of a family of long-legged wading birds. It is a large and elegant bird, breeding in the n. of Europe and of Asia, and migrating s. at the approach of winter. On these flights cranes go in large flocks of wedge-shaped form or in long lines. See SWALLOW 3.

Creation. The act or operation of God whereby he calls into existence what did not before exist. The verb always has God for its subject, and the result is an entirely new thing. God created the heavens and the earth (Gen. 1:1), aquatic and aerial life (v. 21), man (v. 27), the stars (Isa. 40:26), the wind (Amos 4:13). He creates the clean heart (Ps. 51:10). Jehovah commanded, and the heavens, with all their hosts, angels, sun, moon, and stars, and the waters that be above the heavens, were created (Ps. 148:5). He spoke and it was done. Upon him all living creatures depend; his hand provides for them, his look preserves them, the hiding of his face destroys them, and his creative breath renews animate life on earth (Ps. 104:27-30). God created the worlds by the Word, who is the Son (John 1:3; Eph. 3:9; Col. 1:16; Heb. 1:2).

The designation "Creation" is used specially for the original formation of the universe by God. In Genesis a general account of the creation of the universe is first given (chs. 1:1 to 2:3), which is followed by a particular account of the formation of man and his surroundings (ch. 2:4-25). These two accounts are not contradictory, but supplementary. All Hebrew history is written from a theistic point of view. God controls human affairs, and everything is so, because it is a part of his divine plan. In Genesis we find an attempt to glorify God and to set Hebrew history into the scheme of the universe. The author of Genesis begins with creation, proceeds to man, and gradually narrows down the narrative to his main theme, viz., Israel.

The recital of the facts of creation is obviously not a literal historical record, but rather a series of general statements written by an inspired writer. The Babylonian parallels show a resemblance to the O.T. account and a common Semitic background. Gen., chs. 1; 2, is distinguished by reasonableness and dignity; the Babylonian account is often offensive, childish, and grossly materialistic. In the description of the various stages of creation according to Gen., ch. 1, a remarkable though superficial agreement with the conclusions of modern scientific research may be detected. But it must be borne in mind that the author of Genesis had no intention of furnishing us with a textbook on geology or biology; his purpose was not scientific. His views are general and written from the point of view of his age; but when we consider the theological and philosophical aspects of Gen., chs. 1; 2, we are dealing with inspired insight. No discovery has yet been made which invalidates the belief that the world was created by a personal God. The existence of God is taken for granted, and his creative power is represented as active "in the beginning."

Before the Reformation scholars were uncertain whether the days of Gen., ch. 1, denote succession of time or are merely the distribution into logical groups of things created by one divine fiat (Augustine De Civitate Dei xi. 6, 7). During the next 300 years the narrative was understood to mean that God created the universe in one week of 7 consecutive days of 24 hours each. But geologists and astronomers alike became convinced that myriads of years had been required to produce the solar system and bring about the changes which the earth itself had undergone. When it became apparent that the geological claim for extended time rested on substantial grounds, Dr. Thomas Chalmers adopted the result and publicly declared in 1804 that "the writings of Moses do not fix the antiquity of the globe." Afterward, in his Evidences of Christianity, published in 1813, he explained that many ages may have elapsed between the 1st act of creation described in Gen. 1:1, and the others commencing with v. 2. But was not a long period involved in the work of the 6 days themselves?

The order in which the various kinds of animals are described as having been created corresponds roughly to that in which by the evidence of geology they actually appeared on the earth. Accordingly some have assumed that day means a geological period. In 1857 Hugh Miller in his Testimony of the Rocks interpreted the six days, as Cuvier of Paris had already interpreted them in 1798 in the preliminary discourse to his Osséments Fossiles, as being six geological ages; and traced the correspondence between the successive stages of creation as told in Gen., ch. 1, and as written in the rocks. But such a view creates more difficulties than it solves. Nothing is gained by making a desperate attempt to force science into the Bible. Nor does Ps. 90:4 assist in the matter:

"For a thousand years in thy sight
Are but as yesterday when it is past."

God rested on "the sabbath day" and "halloed" it (cf. also Ex. 20:8-11). Obviously the author was thinking of literal days; he also uses the terms evening and morning. Furthermore in Gen. 1:16 the word day is used in a literal sense. It is far more logical to assume that the author of Genesis refers to 6 literal days than that in some cryptic manner he is hinting at geological periods.

There is no conflict between genuine science and the Bible, nor between science and religion. If science does not seek the truth impartially, it is no longer science. Scientists admit that many of their hypotheses are tentative, subjective, and liable to change. It is unreasonable to expect the sacred writer to give us in 2 chapters all the facts of astronomy, geology, and biology. If we turn to Gen., chs. 1; 2, for a confirmation of science, we do not understand the purpose of Scripture, for which see II Tim. 3:16, 17. It is a mistake to go to science for religion or to the Bible for science; their spheres and purposes are different. Men err when they refuse to listen to the scientific affirmations of nature because they seem to disagree with what is found in the Bible; on the other hand, it is just as serious an error to suppose that nature and science can tell us all we need to know about ourselves, the world, and God. Gen., chs. 1; 2, is not written from the scientific point of view of any age or period; on account of the continual growth of scientific studies and changes in scientific theories, any scientific description in the course of time would have become antiquated. The sacred writer does not commit himself to any definite limits of time; but simply speaks of creation as taking place in the beginning, and this phrase is elastic enough to cover the modern scientific position. His scientific knowledge may be bounded by the horizon of the age in which he lived, but the religious truths he teaches are irrefutable and eternal. Gen., chs. 1; 2, accordingly will never become out of date; this religious account has remained as true today as it was in antiquity.

Science observes natural phenomena and discovers or deduces from them the laws of nature; it cannot create life or establish new laws of nature. It is limited to study and observation and may form hypotheses and theories, but it cannot answer the question how the universe was created. Genesis gives a better answer.

In view of various interpretations of Gen., chs. 1; 2, shall we consider it literally, as an allegory, or as symbolism? It may also be regarded as a grand epic of creation, the culmination of which is the creation of man in the image of God, who breathed into man the breath of life. Whatever view we take, God is a person; God created the world and all that is in it; God is the author of everything; God works according to definite plans and laws. Our faith in a transcendent God goes beyond the limitations of science. Throughout this narrative we find the truths of divine personality, divine unity, and divine goodness. All belief in creation involves a belief in God's personality. Creation is not impersonal, nor spontaneous, nor the result of an accident; it is the work of an intelligent, almighty personality. God speaks, creation follows. We have monotheism, not polytheism, in Gen., chs. 1; 2. There is anthropomorphism in Gen. 2:7, 8, 15-22, but it is never grotesque. God is the Creator; he is interested in his work; he establishes laws that govern the universe; and he is an ethical being. We may grant that the description of creation in Genesis is only general and does not attempt to be scientific. Yet the scientist in the end must come to the same conclusion as does the author of Gen., chs. 1; 2: God is a personality and the source of all life and physical laws. This inspired writer has solved a problem which is beyond the limits of the scientist.

The Hebrew narrative is marked by a symmetry and grouping, which may be plausibly explained as intentional arrangement. The chronological order has been observed in the main at least, but it remains to be discovered whether it has been followed in every detail. At any rate the works of the 6 days were more than 6 acts; God spoke, to use a significant Biblical term, 8 times (Gen. 1:3, 6, 9, 11, 14, 20, 24, 26), and on the 3d day the command went forth for both dry land and vegetation, on the 5th day for fish and for fowl, and on the 6th day for beast and for man. Moreover, the 6 days form 2 interrelated groups: the 1st day saw light, and the 4th day, the 1st of the 2d group, saw the luminaries; on the 2d day the waters were divided and the sky appeared, and on the 2d day of the other group fish were divinely willed in the waters and fowl to fly in the expanse of the sky; on the 3d day dry land and vegetation were decreed, and on the corresponding day of the 2d group land animals, including man, were made, and vegetation was granted them for food.

The Babylonian epic known as the Enuma elish, from the first 2 words of the poem, was found written on 7 tablets in Ashurbanipal's library, but the original goes back to a much earlier period. The poem begins with a period:

"When above the heaven was not named,
And beneath, the earth bore no name."

Apsu (the abyss) and Tiāmat (the salt sea) are mentioned, but none of the gods had been born. Tiāmat corresponds etymologically to Hebrew tēhōm ("deep," Gen. 1:2). Then gods were created; apparently they descended from chaos. Ea killed Apsu, whom Tiāmat determined to avenge. Mother Khubur (world-circling stream of salt water) spawned various monsters whose bodies were filled with poison instead of blood; among them was Kingu. All the gods except Marduk were afraid to attack Tiāmat and her allies. In the ensuing conflict he slew Tiāmat and took Kingu prisoner. With the death of Tiāmat creation began. In the words of the epic,

"The flesh of the monster he [Marduk] divided;
he formed a cunning plan,
He split her open like a flat fish into two halves,
One half of her he established and made a covering of the heavens,
He drew a bolt, he established a guard,
And not to let her waters come out, he commanded."

Cf. the "firmament" in Gen. 1:6-8. We may assume that the other half of Tiāmat became the earth, although the poem does not expressly say so. Then Marduk ordained the stations of the great gods: "The stars, their images, as the stars of the zodiac he fixed." He ordained the year and the 12 months. "The moon-god he caused to shine; the night he entrusted to him." No creation of the sun is mentioned, because Marduk is the sun-god. Cf. Gen. 1:14-18.

Then Marduk said:

"Blood will I bind, bone will I fashion,
I will produce a man; 'man' is his name;
I will create the man 'man.'"

Kingu was accordingly brought before Ea, who laid a curse upon the monster, whose blood burst forth. From this Ea created man. Thus the Babylonians expressed man's kinship to divinity. Cf. Gen. 1:27; 2:7. There was a purpose in Marduk's creation; he made mankind for the service of the gods.

This epic of creation is mythological and polytheistic and has no exalted conception of divinity. The gods love and hate, scheme and plot, fight and destroy. Marduk conquers only after a severe struggle. Before the discovery of cuneiform tablets, the Babylonian story of creation was known only from Berossus, who says that at Bel's command one of the gods cut off Bel's head and mixed his blood with clay to create man. The original of Berossus is not extant, and he may have referred to the head of Tiāmat. In a Sumerian account, man is created from the blood of Langa, the god of carpenters. Clay in creation was also used when the goddess Aruru created Enkidu as a rival of Gilgamesh; she washed her hands, took a piece of clay, and spat upon it.

The resemblances between Gen., chs. 1; 2, and the Babylonian parallels suggest a common background, but this does not imply that Genesis is borrowed from the epic. In Genesis we have monotheism: God is master of the elements. The majesty of God is supreme. We have a dignified and exalted account of creation which has permanent spiritual values.

Creep'ing Thing. Any animal which creeps (Gen. 1:24, 25), whether a land or a water reptile (Gen. 6:7; Ps. 104: 25), and whether crawling on the belly or creeping on 4 or more feet (Lev. 11:41, 42).

Cres'cens (krēs'ēnz) [Lat., growing, increasing]. A Christian, who was for a time at Rome while Paul was a prisoner there, and then departed to Galatia or Gaul (II Tim. 4:10).

Crete (krēt). A large island in the Mediterranean, lying s.e. of Greece, and also known as Candia. It is about 160 miles long by 6 to 35 broad. It is traversed from e. to w. by a chain of mountains, of which Mount Ida, near the center, is 8,065 ft. high. Homer speaks of its fair land, its countless men of different races, and its hundred cities (Iliad ii. 649; Odyssey xix. 174). The half-mythic legislator, Minos, lived in Crete, and the fabulous Minotaur also was said to dwell there. Crete was conquered by the Romans, 68-66 B.C. Many Jews settled in the island (Acts 2:11; cf. I Macc. 15:19-23, Gortyna being in Crete). Christianity was early introduced; and Titus was left there to arrange the affairs of the churches and to counteract Judaizing doctrine (Titus 1:5, 14). Paul sailed along its whole s. coast on his voyage to Rome (Acts 27:7, 12, 13, 21). The Cretans were famous bowmen; but their moral reputation was bad, their unchastity and untruthfulness were proverbial (Titus 1:12, and R.V. note).

Crib. See MANGER.

Crick'et. The rendering in the text of R.V. of Hebrew hargōl, which belongs with grasshoppers and locusts, and which does not creep but leaps, is winged, and can be eaten (Lev. 11:22). The chief leaping insects belong to 3 families of Orthoptera (the grasshoppers, the locusts, and the crickets). The hargōl almost certainly belongs to one of the 3, though to which of them cannot now be determined. Among the few known species are the house cricket (Gryllus domesticus) and the field cricket (G. campestris). The A.V. renders hargōl "beetle," but the most typical species of the Coleoptera, or beetle order, are not leaping insects.

Cris'pus (krīs'pūs) [Lat., curled]. The ruler of the Jewish synagogue at Corinth. After listening to Paul's reasonings, he, with all his household, believed in Jesus (Acts 18:8), and was one of the few persons whom Paul personally baptized (I Cor. 1:14).

Croc'o-dile. See LEVIATHAN and LIZARD.

Cross. This word does not occur in the O.T., but crucifixion was common among various nations of antiquity; see CRUCIFIXION. Cross is used in a figurative sense by Jesus (Matt. 10:38; 16:24). From the narrative of the crucifixion it is evident that the cross was of wood, and was heavy, but still not too much so to be borne by a strong man (Matt. 27:32; Mark 15:21; Luke 23:26; John 19:17), and can scarcely, therefore, have been one of the massive structures which some painters depict. It was raised from the earth either before or after the victim had been affixed to it; probably, in most cases, before. Crosses are of three leading types: one, generally called the St. Andrew's cross, like the letter X; another like the letter T; and the third of the dagger form, †, known as the Latin cross. The cross of Christ was, probably, as artists believe, of the last-named type, which more easily than the others allowed the name, title, or crime of the victim to be affixed to the upper part (Matt. 27:37; Mark 15:26; Luke 23:38; John 19:19). Up to the death of Christ, and even after, the cross was evidently a name of horror and loathing (John 19:31; I Cor. 1:23; Gal. 3:13; Phil. 2:8; Heb. 12:2; 13:13), so that to bear the cross meant to incur great reproach and obloquy; but after the crucifixion the more zealous followers of Jesus regarded the cross with wholly altered feelings. Paul gloried in the cross of Christ (Gal. 6:14), by which he meant the atonement resulting from his crucifixion (Eph. 2:16; Col. 1:20).

Crown. 1. An ornamental headdress worn as a badge of authority or dignity; especially: (1) The royal crown. It was generally a circlet of gold (Ps. 21:3), and was often studded with gems (II Sam. 12:30; Zech. 9:16). Sometimes several crowns were combined or intertwined (Zech. 6:11; I Macc. 11:13). The crown which David took at Rabbah from the Ammonites probably belonged to the idol Molech (II Sam. 12:30, R.V. margin). Its weight was a talent of gold, and in it were precious stones. The ordinary headdress of the Persian king (Esth. 1:11; 6:8) was a stiff cap, probably of felt or of cloth, encircled by a blue and white band, which was the diadem proper. The royal crown of Assyria was a conical cap, sometimes tapering in a compound curve, but more frequently shaped like the modern fez or tarboosh only higher and ending in a round, blunt point. It was adorned with bands of wrought gold and jewels. The king is also represented wearing a simple fillet, and it is probable that this was a common custom, the crown royal being reserved for state occasions. In Egypt there were two royal crowns. The one for Upper Egypt was a high, round white cap, tapering to a knob; the crown for Lower Egypt was a flat-topped red cap, rising in a high point at the back and having a projection with a curled end springing diagonally toward the front. When the 2 kingdoms were united under one sovereign, he wore the 2 crowns combined, the crown of Lower Egypt being superimposed upon that of Upper Egypt. The Egyptian king is also frequently depicted with a band or diadem. The royal headdress generally bears just over the forehead of the king the Uraeus, the sacred serpent of the Egyptians, symbolizing sovereignty. The radiated diadem was a form of crown familiar to the Greeks and Romans and to the peoples under their influence. A crown or garland of some thorny plant was placed by the Roman soldiers around the temples of Jesus, with the twofold intention of torturing him and mocking his kingly claims (Matt. 27:29). (2) The high priest's crown. It consisted of a golden plate (Lev. 8:9), inscribed with the legend "Holy to Jehovah," and fastened on a lace of blue to the forefront of the miter (Ex. 28:36, 37; 29:6). (3) The crown of victory (II Tim. 2:5; 4:8; Heb. 2:9). It might consist merely of a wreath of leaves or be made of metal.

2. Anything resembling a crown, as the border or molding round about the Ark, the table, and the altar (Ex. 25:11, 24, 25; 30:3, 4).

Crucifixion. The act of fixing a victim to a cross for the purpose of capital punishment. This was done either by tying his hands and feet to it, or in the more cruel way of fixing them to it by nails driven through their fleshy portions. This method of punishment existed in many ancient nations. Alexander the Great crucified 1,000 Tyrians. According to Josephus, Cyrus introduced into his edict for the return of the Jews from Babylon a threat of crucifying anyone who attempted to prevent the missive from being carried into execution (Jos. Antiq. xi. 1, 3; 4, 6). Darius the Persian threatened this death, apparently, to those who refused obedience to his decrees (Ezra 6:11). Antiochus Epiphanes crucified faithful Jews who would not abandon their religion at his bidding (Jos. Antiq. xii. 5, 4), and Alexander Jannaeus crucified his enemies (Jos. War i. 4, 6; 5, 3). Among the Romans crucifixion was a penalty inflicted only on slaves, or on other persons who had committed the most heinous crimes; the ordinary Roman citizen was exempted from it by express legal enactment, but under the Empire crucifixion was imposed on citizens until Constantine put an end to it on religious grounds. The preliminary cruelties of scourging the victim (Matt. 27:26; Mark 15:15; John 19:1), and then, when his body was lacerated, compelling him to bear his cross (John 19:17), were not rare (cf. the proverb, Matt. 10:38). Thus the Roman procurator Florus (Jos. War ii. 14, 9) and Titus, at least on one occasion, had those scourged first who were afterward to be crucified. If the victim was simply tied to the cross, death did not take place till thirst and hunger had done their work; and this was sometimes the case even when the hands and feet were pierced by nails. If it was expedient on any ground to get rid of the victims before natural death had released them from their tortures, the end was sometimes hastened by breaking their legs, as was done in the case of the robbers crucified with Jesus (John 19:31-33). Many Jews were crucified after Titus took Jerusalem (Jos. Life 75). Constantine abolished punishment by crucifixion in the Roman Empire.

Cruse. A small pot or jug used for carrying water during a journey (I Sam. 26:11; I Kings 19:6) and for holding oil (I Kings 17:12; Judith 10:5); a flask, such as were made of alabaster and used for holding ointment (Matt. 26:7, R.V.). For cruse of honey (I Kings 14:3), a different word in Hebrew, the margin substitutes bottle; and the cruse of salt (II Kings 2:20) was rather a dish.

Cry's'tal. 1. The rendering of Hebrew gābīsh, ice and crystal, another reputed product of cold (Job 28:18; in A.V., pearl).

2. The rendering of Hebrew kerah (Ezek. 1:22), which R.V. marg. renders "ice," which is an established meaning of the word (Job 6:16; 38:29; Ps. 147:17).

3. The rendering of Greek krystallos (Rev. 4:6; 22:1). It is either ice or rock crystal, which is quartz, transparent, and when pure colorless.

4. The rendering of Hebrew ʾeskūkith, in A.V. of Job 28:17. R.V. makes it glass, since crystal occurs in the next verse. The cognate in Syriac is used for glass in Rev. 4:6.

Cub (küb), in A.V. Chub. A people mentioned with Ethiopia, Put, and Lud (Ezek. 30:5). "Libyans" of LXX suggests Lub.

Cu'bit [Latin cubitus, elbow, cubit]. A measure of length based on the length of the forearm, about 18 inches. The Egyptian cubit (17.72 inches) contained 6 handbreadths or palms (Herod. ii. 149). The royal cubit was a palm longer and was equal to 20.67 inches, as appears from measuring sticks found in the tombs. The Hebrews also had 2 cubits, the common and perhaps older cubit (Deut. 3:11; II Chron. 3:3) and a cubit which was a handbreadth longer than the common one (Ezek. 40:5; 43:13). The table of Hebrew lineal measure is 4 fingers=1 handbreadth or palm; 3 handbreadths=1 span; 2 spans=1 cubit (cf. Ex. 25:10 with Jos. Antiq. iii. 6, 5). It is not unlikely that the royal Egyptian cubit and the cubit of Ezekiel were theoretically equal, so that the common Hebrew cubit was 17.72 inches and the long cubit 20.67 inches.

Cuck'ow. See SEA MEW.

Cu'cum-ber. The rendering of Heb. kisshū', a vegetable which the Israelites obtained while they were slaves in Egypt, and longed for when they could not have it in the wilderness (Num. 11:5). It is Cucumis chate, which is very common in Egypt and somewhat sweeter than the common cucumber, Cucumis sativus. The cucumber was raised in gardens in Palestine (Isa. 1:8), and both the species mentioned are grown there today.

Cum'min [Gr. kyminon from Heb. kammōn]. A cultivated plant sown broadcast and, when ripe, beaten with a rod to detach its seeds (Isa. 28:25, 27). It was one of the trifles of which the Pharisees were particular in paying tithes (Matt. 23:23). Cummin is the Cuminum cyminum of botanists, a fennel-like plant bearing umbels of small white flowers. It was cultivated in Palestine for its seeds, which were eaten as a spice or relish with food. They are now in large measure superseded by caraway seeds, which are more agreeable to the taste and more nutritious.

Cun (kün), in A.V. Chun. See BERTHAH.

Cup. 1. A small drinking vessel (II Sam. 12:3), of earthenware or metal (Jer. 51:7), held in the hand (Gen. 40:11), and used for water (Mark 9:41), or wine (Ps. 75:8; Jer. 25:15). See BASIN.

2. Figuratively, the contents of the cup, whether pleasant or bitter; that which falls to one's lot (Ps. 23:5; Isa. 51:17; Jer. 16:7; Matt. 26:39).

Cup'bear'er. The official who poured drink into the cup and gave it to the king (Gen. 40:9-14, where the Hebrew word is rendered butler; Neh. 1:11; 2:1, 2). The office was one of the most dignified in an Oriental kingdom, and required moral trustworthiness in its occupant, lest he be bribed to present poisoned wine to the king (Jos. Antiq. xvi. 8, 1). It said much for the character of Nehemiah that he, a stranger and a foreigner, should have been appointed to such an office at the Persian court.

Cush (küsh) [Heb. Kūsh, Ethiopia]. 1. A son of Ham and his descendants collectively. They constituted 5 principal peoples, Seba, Havilah, Sabtah, Raamah, Sabteca, and were located in central and s. Arabia, except Seba, which is probably to be sought on the neighboring African coast (Gen. 10:6-8; 1 Chron. 1:8-10).

2. The land of the Cushites. In most passages it designates Ethiopia (II Kings 19:9; Esth. 1:1; Ezek. 29:10). In Gen. 2:13, R.V. (cf. ch. 10:8) the term denotes territory drained by the Tigris and Euphrates and so probably stands for Kassites (Cossaeans). Herodotus describes Asiatic Ethiopians in the army of Xerxes, who were different from the African Ethiopians (Herod. vii. 70).

3. A Benjamite, perhaps of Ethiopian descent (LXX, Chousi for Heb. Kūshī), who was a foe to David (Psalm 7, title).

Cu'shan (kū'shān) [belonging to Cush]. A country or its inhabitants mentioned in connection with Midian, and hence probably Arabia as occupied by Cushites (Hab. 3:7).

Cu'shan-rish'a-tha'im (kū'shān-rīsh'a-thā'im), in A.V. Chu'shan-rish'a-tha'im [Cushan of double wickedness]. A king of Mesopotamia, who held the Israelites in subjection for 8 years. Deliverance was achieved under the leadership of Othniel, Caleb's younger brother (Judg. 3:5-11).

Cu'shi (kū'shī) [an Ethiopian]. 1. An ancestor of that Jehudi who lived in Jeremiah's time (Jer. 36:14).

2. Father of the Prophet Zephaniah (Zeph. 1:1).

3. According to A.V., one of the 2 men who carried David the news of the victory over his rebellious son Absalom; but the Heb. has "the Cushi," evidently meaning, as R.V. renders it, "the Cushite," i.e., the Ethiopian. The actual name of the runner is unknown (II Sam. 18:21-23, 31, 32).

Cush'ite (kūsh'it). Ethiopian (Num. 12:1, R.V. and A.V. marg.; II Sam. 18:21, R.V.).

Cuth (kūth) and Cuthah (kū'thā). A city of Babylonia, often mentioned in connection with Babylon and Borsippa, and whose tutelary deity was Nergal. Colonists were brought from this place, among others, to Samaria after the deportation of the 10 tribes of Israel (II Kings 17:24, 30). Its site is at Tell Ibrāhīm, n.e. of Babylon.

Assyrian Cupbearer

Cym'bal [Gr. kymbalon (I Cor. 13:1)]. A musical instrument (II Sam. 6:5; I Chron. 16:5), Heb. ṣeṣṣelim, mēšiltayim, from the root šālal (to tinkle or clang). One form of the name is in the dual number, which implies that the instrument is of 2 distinct parts. This undoubtedly suggests cymbals, as the

CYRENE

LXX renders the word, which are concave plates of brass (I Chron. 15:19), one form of them being nearly flat, another consisting of hollow cones designed to be clashed together for their sound. See MUSIC.

Eastern Cymbals

Cy'press [Lat. cupressus, cupressus, from Gr. kyprarissos]. 1. E.R.V. marg. for Heb. tē'ashshūr in Isa. 41:19; 60:13. The text of both versions has "box."

2. Rendering of berōsh, A.R.V. marg., Isa. 41:19. See FIR. The cypress, Cupressus sempervirens, is the type of the suborder Cupressaceae, ranking under the order Pinaceae (conifers). About 10 species of the genus Cupressus are known. The common cypress is an evergreen running into 2 well-marked varieties, one a tall tree 60 feet high with erect closely appressed branches, and the other smaller, with the branches spreading. The cypress is a native of Persia and the Levant. It is extensively planted in cemeteries of the East.

3. The rendering in A.V. of Isa. 44:14 of Heb. tirzāh (cf. Arab. taraza, to be hard). See HOLM TREE.

Cy'prus (sī'prūs). An island celebrated in the earliest ages for the richness of its mines of copper. It is situated in the n.e. part of the Mediterranean Sea, about 41 miles from the coast of Cilicia and 60 from Syria. The more compact part of the island is 110 miles in length by 30 to 50 or 60 in breadth; besides which there runs from its n.e. extremity a narrow strip of land, 40 miles long by 5 or 6 broad, projecting from the rest of the island like a bowsprit from a ship. The area of Cyprus is about 3,584 square miles. The island is mountainous, with intermediate valleys, which are at certain seasons unhealthy. The mountains yield copper, and the mines were at one time farmed to Herod the Great (Jos. Antiq. xvi. 4, 5). Its ancient inhabitants were Kittim, probably akin to the pre-Hellenic population of Greece (Gen. 10:4), but Phoenicians from the coast of Syria colonized the island. They built as their capital the town of Kitium or Citium. Later other bodies of Greeks reinforced the original stock (cf. Herod. vii. 90), so that to this day about ¾ of the population belong to that race. In 58 B.C. Cyprus was seized by Rome and joined with Cilicia for administrative purposes; after the battle of Actium it was made an imperial Roman province (27-22 B.C.). In the year 22 B.C. Augustus handed it over to the senate, and henceforth it was under a proconsul. Many Jewish communities existed in the island (I Macc. 15:23; Acts 4:36). There were Christians connected with it before Stephen's martyrdom; and during the persecution which followed some of them returned to it, preaching the gospel (Acts 11:19, 20). It was visited for missionary purposes, first by Barnabas and Paul (Acts 13:4), and afterward by Barnabas and Mark (ch. 15:39). Paul sailed past it at least twice without landing (chs. 21:3; 27:4). See KITTIM.

Cyre'ne (sī-rē'nē). An important Greek colonial city in North Africa, beautifully situated on a tableland about 2,000 feet above the sea level, and a few miles distant from the Mediterranean. It constituted one of 5 Greek cities called Pentapolis, situated in Libya Cyrenaica, now Tripoli. It is believed that it was founded by Dorians about the year 632 B.C. During the time of the Ptolemies, in the 3d century B.C., many Jews became resident in Cyrene (Jos. Apion ii. 4; Antiq. xiv. 7, 2). Simon, who was compelled to carry the cross of Jesus, seems to have been a Cyrenian Jew (Matt. 27:32). Cyrenians joined with Libertines and others in forming a synagogue at Jerusalem (Acts 6:9). Men of Cyrene early became converts and preachers (ch. 11:20). Among them was a certain Lucius, a prominent man in the church at Antioch (ch. 13:1).

Cy-re'ni-us (sī-rē'nī-ūs). See QUIRINIUS.

Cyrus (sī'rūs) [Gr. Kyros from Old Persian Kūruš]. A Persian king twice named in The Book of Isaiah (ch. 44:28; 45:1-14). Daniel, referring to the conquest of Babylonia by the Medes and Persians, records that during the night which followed a great feast, Belshazzar, who had been regent at Babylon for his father Nabonidus, was slain (Dan. 5:30). Ezra relates that Cyrus, king of Persia, in the 1st year of his reign issued a proclamation permitting the Jews to return to their own land and rebuild the Temple, for the use of which he restored the sacred vessels taken by Nebuchadnezzar (Ezra, chs. 1; 5:13, 14; 6:3). Many of the Jews embraced the privilege and returned to Jerusalem (538 B.C.); but the work of rebuilding the sanctuary was greatly hindered by adversaries.

According to the Babylonian inscriptions, Cyrus was a son of Cambyases, grandson of Cyrus, great-grandson of Teispes (Chispis), all of whom reigned as kings of Anshan, a designation which appears to denote e. Elam with Susa as its capital. This royal line was founded by Achaemenes, father of Teispes. About the year 550 B.C., Astyages (Ishtu-megu), king of the Medes, marched against Cyrus, but was betrayed by his own army and delivered into the hands of Cyrus. Cyrus then took Ecbatana and carried its spoil to his own city. In 547 B.C., Cyrus, now called king of Persia, led the Persian army across the Tigris near Arbela and carried his conquest into the w. He conquered Lydia about this time, taking Sardes and making a prisoner of Croesus, its king (546). Next the Ionian Greeks were subdued, and before the end of 545 the entire peninsula of Asia Minor was a part of the Persian Empire. In 539 B.C., the 17th year of Nabonidus, in the month Tishri, Cyrus met and defeated the Babylonians at Opis; on the 14th day he took Sippar, and Nabonidus fled. Two days later, on the 16th, Gobryas (Ugbaru), governor of Gutium, at the head of a detachment of Cyrus' army, entered Babylon without fighting. Nabonidus was afterward captured at Babylon. On the 3d of Marsheshvan Cyrus himself formally entered Babylon, his governor Gobryas proclaimed peace to the province, governors were appointed, and an order issued for the restoration of many captive foreign idols to their several native sanctuaries.

Cyrus was succeeded by Cambyases in 529 B.C. According to Herodotus (i. 190, 191), Cyrus captured Babylon by turning the waters of the Euphrates temporarily into a lake excavated for the purpose, and then entering from the nearly dry bed of the river by the gates which had been left open on the night of a festival while the inhabitants were engaged in revelry. Historians now universally reject the tradition of a forcible capture of Babylon; according to the plain record of the Nabonidus-Cyrus Chronicle, Cyrus' troops under Gobryas peacefully occupied the city and captured Nabonidus in it. The account given by the Babylonian priest Berossus, who lived about the time of Alexander the Great, is as follows: "In the 17th year of Nabonidus, Cyrus came out of Persia with a great army, and, having conquered all the rest of Asia, came hastily to Babylonia. When Nabonidus perceived that he was advancing to attack him, he assembled his forces and opposed him; but he was defeated and fled with a few of his troops and was shut within the city of Borsippa [the twin of Babylon]. Hereupon Cyrus took Babylon and gave order that the outer walls should be demolished, because the city had proved very troublesome to him and difficult to take. He then marched to Borsippa to besiege Nabonidus; but as Nabonidus delivered himself into his hands without holding out the place, he was at first kindly treated by Cyrus, who sent him out of Babylonia but gave him a habitation in Carmania, where he spent the remainder of his life and died" (Jos. Apion i. 20).

Dab'a-reh (dāb'ā-rē). See DABERATH.

Dab'be-sheth (dāb'ē-shēth), in A.V. Dab'ba-sheth (dāb'ā-shēth) [hump of a camel]. A town on the boundary line of Zebulun (Josh. 19:11). Probably Tell esh-Shemmām opposite Tell ẖaimūn (Jokneam), s. of the Kishon.

Dab'erath (dāb'ē-rāth), in A.V. once Dab'a-reh (dāb'ā-rē) erroneously (Josh. 21:28) [probably, pasture land]. A city within the territory of Issachar, given with its suburbs to the Gershonites (Josh. 19:12; 21:28; I Chron. 6:72; Jos. War ii. 21, 3). It has been identified as the village of Deburieh at the w. base of Mount Tabor.

Dagon (dā'gōn) [dāgān, grain; cf. dāg, fish]. The national god of the Philistines. At Gaza, at Beth-dagon, and especially at Ashdod, he had a temple (Judg. 16:21, 23; I Sam. 5:1-7; I Chron. 10:10). Jonathan Maccabaeus, after defeating the Philistines, drove them into the temple of Dagon in Ashdod, and set fire both to the city and the temple (I Macc. 10:84; 11:4). Dagon was worshiped at an early time in Phoenicia. According to the Ras Shamra texts Dagan (Dagon) was the father of Aleyan (Baal), who was a corn god. The temples of both gods are similar and date from the beginning of the 12th dyn. of Egypt. The idol is considered to have had the head, arms, and upper parts of a human form (I Sam. 5:4), while the lower parts tapered away into the tail of a fish. Diodorus Siculus (ii. 4) mentions a goddess called Derceto, of similar form, as having existed at Ashkelon, another Philistine town. Leaping over the threshold of Dagon's temple may have been a part of Philistine ritual (cf. I Sam. 5:5, LXX; Zeph. 1:9).

Dal'a-i'ah (dāl'ā-i'ā). See DELAIAH.

Daleth (dāl'ēth). The 4th letter of the Hebrew alphabet. From Phoenician daleth is derived the Greek delta, whence Latin and English d. It stands at the head of the 4th section of Psalm 119, in which section each verse of the Hebrew begins with this letter.

The two Hebrew letters, daleth and resh (r), are somewhat similar now, and at certain stages of their development were distinguishable only when carefully written. This similarity caused difficulty to readers and copyists, and occasionally misled them as to the true spelling of words (cf. Gen. 10:4, Dodanim, and I Chron. 1:7, Rodanim).

Dal'ma-nu'tha (dāl'mā-nū'thá). A place situated probably on the w. shore of the Sea of Galilee in the vicinity of Magdala (Mark 8:10; cf. Matt. 15:39 A.V.). Dalmanutha may originate in an error for Heb. pl. miḡdālōth read as Dalmagōth (-noutha). It has also been suggested that Mark originally had Magada, which a scribe wished to correct to Magdal with a marginal gloss dal ou da (dal, not da); when this was introduced into the text Dalmanoutha resulted. At any rate, the place is not otherwise known. See MAGDALA, MAGADAN.

Dal'ma'ti-a (dāl-mā'shī-ā). A region on the e. shore of the Adriatic Sea, with the small but numerous adjacent islands. The mountain tribes were subdued in A.D. 9 by the Romans under Augustus Caesar and Tiberius and the province of Dalmatia was erected. It was regarded as part of Illyricum, which constituted the limit of Paul's missionary journeys in that direction (Rom. 15:19). His associate Titus, after being for a time with Paul in the Italian capital, departed to Dalmatia, perhaps to plant the gospel among its wild inhabitants (II Tim. 4:10).

Dal'phon (dāl'fōn). A son of Haman (Esth. 9:7).

Dam'a-ris (dām'ā-rīs). A woman converted through Paul's preaching at Athens (Acts 17:34).

Dam'a-scene (dām'ā-sēn). A native or inhabitant of Damascus (II Cor. 11:32).

Dam-as'cus (dā-mās'kūs). A city of Syria, on a plateau watered by the rivers Abanah and Pharpar (II Kings 5:12). The tableland is about 2,200 feet above the level of the sea, at the e. foot of the Antilibanus chain of mountains, and contains about 500 square miles. Where watered by channels from the rivers, it is exceedingly fertile, so that the city is embosomed in gardens and orchards, in refreshing contrast to the neighboring desert. Three great trade routes center at Damascus; one leads s.w. to the Mediterranean seacoast and Egypt, another runs s. to Arabia, and the third crosses the desert to Bagdad. The city is very ancient. It is mentioned as early as the time of Abraham (Gen. 14:15). In the days of David, Damascus was one of several petty states of s. Syria. It was captured and garrisoned by David (II Sam. 8:5, 6; I Chron. 18:5, 6). After he smote the Syrian kingdom of Zobah, a man called Rezon, a former subject of the king of Zobah, collected a band of men, seized Damascus, and founded the Syrian kingdom, which henceforth was so often in conflict with Israel (I Kings 11:23, 24). Damascus was the capital of Hezion, Tabrimmon, and the Ben-hadads (I Kings 15:18, 20; 20:34; II Kings 8:7), of Hazael (I Kings 19:15, 17; II Kings 8:15), and of Rezin (II Kings 16:5). Tabrimmon and the first Ben-hadad were in league with the king of Judah (I Kings 15:18, 19; II Chron. 16:2, 3). Ahab agreed to a covenant, obtaining the right to establish streets of bazaars in Damascus (I Kings 20:34). At this period Damascus took a leading part among the w. nations in resistance to Assyria. In alliance with kings of the seacoast and Ahab of Israel it met Shalmaneser at Karkar in (854) 853 B.C., and, though defeated, checked the Assyrian advance. But in 842, Shalmaneser defeated Hazael, king of Damascus, at Mount Hermon and forced him to pay tribute. When, in 734, Rezin of Damascus and Pekah of Israel planned to assault Jerusalem, Ahaz of Judah called in Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, who captured Damascus (732 B.C.), carried the inhabitants captive to Kir, and killed Rezin (II Kings 16:5-9; Isa. 7:1 to 8:6; Amos 1:3-5). But Damascus soon regained its prosperity (Ezek.

27:18). From the Assyrians Damascus passed to the Chaldeans, from them to the Persians, and then to the Macedonian Greeks. It was one of the 10 cities originally forming the Decapolis. Damascus was taken in 64 B.C. by the Roman general Metellus, and in 63 Syria became a Roman province. Many Jews dwelt in Damascus, and supported several synagogues (Acts 9:2; Jos. War ii. 20, 2). Near Damascus, Saul of Tarsus, when on his way to persecute the Christians of the city, was smitten to the earth and heard the heavenly voice (Acts 9:2, 3, 8-10; 22:6, 10-12; 26:12); and from the walls he was let down to escape the fury of the Jews (Acts 9:24, 25; cf. ch. 26:20; Gal. 1:17). The traditional street called Straight is about 2 miles long, and runs from n.e. to s.w., almost through the center of the city. It is a poor street now, but in the time of Paul it was a magnificent thoroughfare, flanked by Corinthian columns. At its e. end is the e. gate of the city. In Paul's time the city was in the hands of Aretas, king of Arabia Petraea, but it soon reverted to the Romans (II Cor. 11:32).

Dan (dān) [a judge]. 1. A son of Jacob by Bilhah (Gen. 30:5, 6). He had one son, Hushim (Gen. 46:23) or Shuham (Num. 26:42). The future destiny of his descendants was thus predicted by Jacob:

"Dan shall judge his people,
As one of the tribes of Israel.
Dan shall be a serpent in the way,
An adder in the path,
That biteth the horse's heels,
So that his rider falleth backward"

(Gen. 49:16, 17):

meaning that his tribe would contend with the foes of Israel as earnestly and craftily as would any of the tribes. Speaking on the same subject, Moses compared Dan to a lion's whelp "that leapeth forth from Bashan" (Deut. 33:22).

2. The tribe to which Dan gave origin, and the territory in Canaan which it obtained by allotment (Num. 1:12, 38, 39). Its assigned territory contained, among other towns, Zorah, Aijalon, Ekron, Eltekeh, and ended opposite Joppa (Josh. 19:40-46; 21:5, 23, 24; cf. Judg. 5:17). The Danites, however, did not possess themselves of all this region, but were restricted by the Amorites to the hill country (Judg. 1:34, 35). Cramped for room, they sent spies to the extreme n. of Palestine to look for a new location; they found what they desired in the town of Laish, occupied by foreigners. The Danites sent an expedition, seized the place, slew its inhabitants, and rebuilt it under the new name of Dan (Josh. 19:47; Judg., ch. 18). Oholiab and Samson were Danites (Ex. 31:6; Judg. 13:2, 24).

3. A town in the extreme n. of Palestine, the phrase "from Dan even to Beer-sheba" or "from Beer-sheba even to Dan" denoting the land in its entire extent from n. to s. (Judg. 20:1; I Chron. 21:2). The town was originally called Laish or Leshem. The name Dan was given to it after its capture by the Danites (Josh. 19:47; Judg., ch. 18). Abraham pursued Chedorlaomer as far as Dan (Gen. 14:14); thought by some to be Dan-jaan (q.v.). But Dan-jaan may be Laish, i.e., Dan; if so, the familiar name Dan has supplanted the older designation in Genesis (cf. Deut. 34:1). At Dan Jeroboam fixed one of his golden calves (I Kings 12:28-30; II Kings 10:29; Amos 8:14). Ben-hadad destroyed the town with other places in its vicinity (I Kings 15:20; II Chron. 16:4). Dan was in a fertile valley by Beth-rehob (Judg. 18:9, 28), near Lebanon, at the sources of the lesser Jordan (Jos. Antiq. v. 3, 1; viii. 8, 4), near the marshes of the waters of Merom (Jos. War iv. 1, 1), and about 3 miles w. of Bāniyās. The site is at Tell el-Kādi, which in Arabic signifies "mound of the judge," and thus preserves the sense of the old name Dan. At the base of this mound are 2 springs, whose waters presently unite and form the river Leddan, the shortest but most abundant in water of the 3 streams which flow together a few miles below and form the Jordan.

Dance. On joyous occasions of a secular or semisecular character, dancing, accompanied by music, was practiced among the Hebrews by women, either singly or in groups, especially in welcoming a victor home (Judg. 11:34; I Sam. 18:6, 7; 29:5; cf. Jer. 31:4, 13). Children, apparently of both sexes, took part in dances (Job 21:11; Matt. 11:16, 17; Luke 7:32). Dancing is a sign of joy (Ps. 30:11; Eccl. 3:4; Lam. 5:15; Luke 15:25).

Some of the customs of Hellenism were dangerous morally to the Jews. Ben Sira may have Greek dancing girls in mind when he warns against a woman that is a singer (Ecclus. 9:4). Salome, the daughter of Herodias, danced before an assembly of men (Matt. 14:6; Mark 6:22); probably her performance was derived from the pantomime solo dance of the Greek hired female dancers. Dancing as part of a religious ceremony or as an act of worship seems to have been common among the Hebrews. It was practiced chiefly by women (Ex. 15:20; Judg. 21:21, 23), but occasionally by men, as in the well-known instance of David's dancing before the Ark (II Sam. 6:14-23; I Chron. 15:29). Dancing before images was common among idolaters (Ex. 32:19; I Kings 18:26).

Dan'iel (dān'yēl) [God has judged]. 1. Son of David and Abigail, born at Hebron (I Chron. 3:1). He is called Chileab in II Sam. 3:3.

2. A priest who, doubtless in behalf of a father's house, signed the covenant in the days of Nehemiah (Ezra 8:2; Neh. 10:6). Chronologically he is the 3d of the name mentioned in the Old Testament.

3. A hero Danel (Daniel) in the Ras Shamra texts who renders justice to the widow and orphan. It has been supposed by some that Ezek. 14:14, 20; 28:3 refers to this ancient hero. It is noteworthy that in these 3 verses the kethib of the Hebrew text like Ras Shamra omits yod.

4. The celebrated Jewish prophet at the Babylonian court. He sprang from the princely family of the tribe of Judah (Dan. 1:3-7). When a youth, he was carried off with other captives by Nebuchadnezzar, in the 3d or, reckoning accession year as 1st year, the 4th of Jehoiakim, 605 B.C. (Dan. 1:1; Jer. 25:1). At Babylon the boy was selected with other young captives of good birth and parts to be trained for the state service. He and 3 companions obtained leave from the master of the eunuchs, under whose charge they were, to substitute simple food for the viands assigned them by the king which were likely to be contrary to the Mosaic Law and defiled by heathen rites (Dan. 1:8). The 4 young exiles all became proficient in Babylonian learning, while the grace of God enabled them to manifest uncompromising principle, even when it brought them face to face with death. The period of tutelage ended in the 3d year (v. 5), when they were given service at court; and Daniel continued in it with varying prominence until 538 B.C., the 1st year of Cyrus (v. 21). In Nebuchadnezzar's 2d year, 603 B.C., doubtless toward its close (cf. vs. 5 and 18), Daniel interpreted the king's dream of the great image (ch. 2:1-45). This success led to the prophet's being made ruler over the province of Babylon, and head over its wise men (vs. 46-49). He afterward interpreted the vision which revealed the approaching madness of Nebuchadnezzar (ch. 4). About this time Ezekiel cited Daniel as a notable example of righteousness and wisdom (Ezek. 14:14;

28:3); but see DANIEL 3. In the 1st year of Belshazzar Daniel himself had a vision and saw, under the figure of animals, 4 successive empires reaching to the time when the ancient of days should sit, and one like a son of man come with the clouds of heaven to set up a spiritual kingdom which should endure eternally (Dan., ch. 7). The scene of the vision of the 3d year of Belshazzar was at Shushan (ch. 8:2), the Elamite capital, and residence of Cyrus, king of Persia. The prophet himself was probably at Babylon (for a similar case, cf. Ezek. 8:1-3). In this vision he saw a ram trampled by a goat, and from the head of the latter, when its power was in turn broken, 4 horns appearing, from one of which a little horn sprang and wrought proudly, especially toward the glorious land and its sanctuary; whereby were symbolized the Persian and Macedonian empires, the division of the latter into 4 kingdoms, the rise of a fierce king and his desecration of the sanctuary (Dan., ch. 8).

On the fall of the Neo-Babylonian Empire, Darius the Mede appointed 120 satraps over the new kingdom, with 3 presidents over them, Daniel being one of the 3 (ch. 6:1, 2). Jealousy of Daniel on account of his ability and eminence led to a plot against him, and he was cast into the den of lions (vs. 3-23; I Macc. 2:60). In the 1st year of Darius, Daniel concluded from the statements of Jeremiah (Jer. 25:11, 12; 29:10) that the Captivity was approaching its close (Dan. 9:1, 2). He humbled himself, confessed the sins of the nation and prayed. In consequence there was revealed to him the prophecy of the 70 weeks (v. 24). In the 3d year of Cyrus, king of Persia, he had a vision of the final conflict between the powers of the world and the Kingdom of God (chs. 10 to 12). Daniel is referred to in Matt. 24:15; Mark 13:14; Heb. 11:33; II Esdras 12:11; I Macc. 2:60.

The Book of Daniel in the LXX, the Vulgate, and the English versions follows Ezekiel, but in the Hebrew canon is placed in the Writings or Hagiographa. It was not put with the Prophets because Daniel, although called a prophet (Matt. 24:15; Jos. Antiq. x. 11, 4 and 6), and one of the greatest of them (Jos. Antiq. x. 11, 7), and although he was marvelously gifted by the spirit of prophecy, was not regarded as officially a prophet. He had the donum propheticum, but not the minus propheticum: the prophetic gift, not the prophetic vocation. He was officially a statesman, and his life was passed in the business of the state. He does not use the common prophetic declaration, "Thus saith the Lord," and he does not exhort his contemporaries, as it was the function of the prophets to do. The book is in Hebrew, except chs. 2:4b to 7:28, which is in Aramaic. The Book may be divided into 2 sections:

I. Six anecdotes of his life in company with 3 compatriots (chs. 1 to 6): (a) the preparation of Daniel and his 3 companions for their work (ch. 1); (b) witness borne by God through the 4, at a foreign court and largely to foreigners, of his omnipotent and omniscient control of the powers of the world in their development and in their relation to the Kingdom of God (chs. 2 to 6). It includes Nebuchadnezzar's dream of the image made of 4 metals, together with clay in the feet, and its destruction (ch. 2); the attempt against Daniel's 3 companions and their deliverance from the fiery furnace (ch. 3); Nebuchadnezzar's dream of the tree hewn down (ch. 4); the writing on the wall at Belshazzar's feast (ch. 5); the plot to destroy Daniel, and his deliverance from the lions' den (ch. 6).

II. The visions of Daniel: (a) the 4 beasts and the being "like unto a son of man" (ch. 7); (b) visions having the fortunes of God's people especially in view (chs. 8 to 12), comprising 3 visions: 1. concerning the cessation of sacrifice, desolation of the sanctuary, opposition to the prince of princes (ch. 8; cf. vs. 13, 25). 2. In view of the near completion of the predicted 70 years of exile, Daniel prepared for the great event by confessing national sins and supplicating forgiveness. From prophecies gone before, it might be supposed that the Kingdom of the Messiah would be established immediately at the expiration of the Captivity; but in a vision Daniel is informed that 70 weeks must elapse after the decree to rebuild Jerusalem is issued before reconciliation is made and everlasting righteousness brought in (ch. 9). 3. He is further informed by a vision in the 3d year of Cyrus in regard to the overthrow of the Persian Empire, the persecution of God's people that shall ensue, and the final relief of the saints and the resurrection to glory (chs. 10 to 12).

The prophecy of the image broken by the stone (ch. 2:31-45), and that of the 4 beasts replaced by a being "like unto a son of man" (ch. 7), depict 4 worldly powers yielding place to the Kingdom of God. The 1st of these kingdoms symbolized in parallel is Babylonia as it is incarnated in Nebuchadnezzar (ch. 2:37, 38). The 2d is Media, which according to ancient historiography was one of the great monarchies of the Orient. That Media and Persia are the 2 horns of the ram (ch. 8:20) cannot be used as an argument against this identification, for a distinction between Medes and Persians is also maintained: "Darius the Mede" (ch. 5:31), "seed of the Medes" (ch. 9:1); "Cyrus the Persian" (ch. 6:28), "Cyrus, king of Persia" (ch. 10:1). Cf. also the prophecy of the destruction of Babylon by the Medes and note the reference to the king of the Medes (Isa. 13:17; 21:2; Jer. 51:11, 27-29). The 3d kingdom is Persia, and the 4th is Greece (the empire of Alexander the Great). The 4th beast had 10 horns (Dan. 7:7); the horn is a type of aggressive strength. Antiochus Epiphanes, the little horn (v. 8), had 7 predecessors in the Seleucid Dynasty: Seleucus (I) Nicator, Antiochus (I) Soter, Antiochus (II) Theos, Seleucus (II) Callinicus, Seleucus (III) Ceraunus, Antiochus (III) Magnus, Seleucus (IV) Philopator. There is no agreement about the 3 subsequent kings whom Antiochus Epiphanes displaced, but it is not necessary to insist on exact identification. Some include Alexander in the series. In that case, the 3 are: Antiochus' brother, whom he displaced by natural cause; Heliodorus, Philopator's prime minister, whom he got rid of; and the rightful heir, Demetrius, whose rights he usurped. Another solution, confining itself to the Seleucid Dyn., accepts a historical tradition of another son of Philopator, whom Antiochus caused to be put out of the way. By this interpretation, Alexander would not be included in the 7.

The 2-horned ram (ch. 8:3, 20) is the symbol of Media and Persia. The he-goat with the conspicuous horn between his eyes (v. 5) stands for the Greek Empire; the great horn, Alexander the Great, was broken (v. 8). The 4 horns which came in place of the great horn are the kingdoms of the Diadochi: Macedonia (under Cassander), Thrace and Asia Minor (under Lysimachus), Syria (under Seleucus), and Egypt (under Ptolemy). The little horn (v. 9) is Antiochus Epiphanes (cf. ch. 7:8). Some commentators, however, maintain that the Medo-Persian Empire is the 2d world power; in that case, Rome is the 4th empire. This view involves more difficulties than the explanation adopted above and seems less logical.

The prophecy of the 70 weeks also concerns the sufferings of the people of God (ch. 9:24-27). The prophetic era from which the weeks are reckoned is a decree for restoring and building Jerusalem (v. 25). "The anointed one," a prince (v. 25), is variously interpreted, as referring to Cyrus (Isa. 45:1), Zerubbabel (Hag. 1:14; Zech. 4:8-10; 6:12, 13), or better Joshua, the high priest, the contemporary of Zerubbabel (Zech. 3:8). "The anointed one" (Dan. 9:26) probably is the high priest Onias III, who was murdered at Antioch, c. 171 B.C. (II Macc. 4:33-35). It is accordingly reasonable to attribute the title (Dan. 9:25) to one of the priestly line, i.e., Joshua. The main interest of the writer lies in the maintenance of the cult. The rites were suspended in 586 B.C., but resumed in 538 upon the return from Babylon, making c. 49 years. The word "week" must be interpreted as a year-week. For a sabbath of years, see Lev. 25:2-4, 8.

The 70 weeks (Dan. 9:24) fall into 3 periods (vs. 25 seq.): 7+62+1. A.V., E.R.V. (marg.), and A.R.V. (text) read: "Seven weeks, and threescore and two weeks," agreeing with the Vulgate, which follows Theodotion. This, however, obscures the sense of the original. In the Hebrew text (v. 25) the main division of the verse falls after "seven weeks." E.R.V. (text), A.R.V. (marg.), and J.V. follow the punctuation of the Hebrew.

The prophecy of Jeremiah (Jer. 25:1, 11, 12; cf. II Chron. 36:21) concerning the 70 years was fulfilled with the return under Cyrus in 538 B.C.; by that time, as noted above, 7 year-weeks after the destruction of the Temple were completed. Sixty-two year-weeks equal 434 years. If this number be deducted from 605 B.C., the result is the period of Antiochus Epiphanes, but the 62 weeks should follow directly upon the 1st 7, i.e., after 538 B.C. It seems, therefore, better to assume that the writer is following no exact chronology from 538 to the Maccabean period. The last week (7 years) is introduced by the cutting off of an anointed one, who probably is Onias III; "the people of the prince that shall come shall destroy the city and the sanctuary," and he will make a league with the majority. The half-week (3½ years) of Dan. 9:27, when the tyrant shall cause the cult to cease, corresponds closely to the 3 years (168-165 B.C.) during which the Temple suffered sacrilege under Antiochus Epiphanes (I Macc. 1:54-64; 4:52-58); this 2d half of the week equals approximately the 2,300 mornings and evenings (Dan. 8:14). The week terminates with the purification of the Temple in 165 B.C. By this interpretation the 1st half of the week corresponds to Antiochus' earlier treatment of the Jews (I Macc. 1:10-15). The abomination of desolation (Dan. 9:27, LXX, and Vulgate; cf. Dan. 11:31; 12:11) is the heathen altar and its accompaniment which Antiochus set up in the Temple (I Macc. 1:54).

I Maccabees was written in Hebrew about the end of the 2d century B.C., and so shows an early traditional interpretation of the 70 weeks. The 2d of the dream visions of Enoch (Book of Enoch, 85-90) presents a series of 70 shepherds extending from the destruction of Jerusalem to the Messianic Kingdom; the last 12 are assigned to the Syrian period. The visions are generally regarded as among the earliest parts of Enoch, and since they are dated before the death of Judas Maccabaeus, they can be cited as a contemporary interpretation of the 70 weeks of Daniel.

Josephus made direct application of this passage from Daniel to the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70 (Jos. Antiq. x. 11, 7). Subsequent Jewish interpretation made the destruction of Jerusalem, either under Titus or under Hadrian, the terminus ad quem. Occasionally there is an apocalyptic or Messianic interpretation.

There developed also a specifically Christian interpretation which assumed various forms.

One combination which coincides with known history throughout starts with the decree of Artaxerxes in his 7th year, 458 B.C. A period of 7 weeks or 49 years came to a close about 408 B.C., and the reformation under Ezra and Nehemiah was conducted during this period and characterized this period as a whole. When this reform ceased to be the dominating feature of God's Kingdom is unknown, but Nehemiah's successor, who was a Persian and naturally not a maintainer of the exclusiveness of Jehovah's religion, was in office in 411 B.C., before the close of the 7th week. Then follow 62 weeks or 434 years, coming down through A.D. 26 to the time when Jesus began his public ministry, A.D. 27, probably early in that year. After these threescore and 2 weeks an anointed one was cut off (Dan. 9:26), making, it may well be, the reconciliation for iniquity and bringing in the everlasting righteousness, spoken of in v. 24; and in the midst of this last week one caused the sacrifice and oblation to cease, not by forbidding them, but by the one sacrifice on Calvary that rendered all others henceforth unnecessary. Nevertheless, notwithstanding the coincidence of the prophecy with the known events in the history of God's Kingdom, and the significance of this correspondence, yet quite probably the 70, and the 7 separated from it at the beginning, and the one week marked off from it at the end, are all symbolical, and measure symbolically, not mathematically, a vast period in the history of God's Kingdom on earth.

The largeness of the outlook and the comprehensiveness of the prophecies of Daniel are realized in the light of the use made of this book by the men of the Bible. 1. Our Lord chose the title Son of Man, by which he referred to himself more often than by any other title, from ch. 7:13, 14; and thus placed that aspect of his mission and Kingdom, which this title denotes, in the forefront. See SON OF MAN. 2. An apocalyptic interpretation of the prophecy of Daniel appears in the N.T.; Christ warned men that the abomination of desolation should yet stand in the Holy Place (Dan. 9:27; 11:31; 12:11; Matt. 24:15; Mark 13:14; cf. II Thess. 2:1-12). Evidently, on Christ's explanation, the content of the prophecies was not exhausted when the idolatrous altar was erected on Jehovah's altar by Antiochus Epiphanes (I Macc. 1:54). The prophecy could thus be made to fit the prospect of any great calamity which should threaten the Jewish religion; or the "abomination of desolation" embodies an idea which will come to manifestation in concrete form whenever the idea itself is present as a potent principle in history. Likewise the apostles understood that the little horn of the 4th beast (Dan. 7:7, 8, 24), and the king that speaks marvelous things against God (ch. 11:36), belong to the future and are yet to be revealed (II Thess. 2:4; Rev. 13:5, 6). Characteristic features of the conflict between the world and God's Kingdom undoubtedly belonged to the bitter struggle in the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, but not to that time only; and Christ and the apostles saw in these prophecies of Daniel an apocalypse of the future. These revelations were not exhausted by the events of the reign of Antiochus; they are big with meaning for the latter days of God's Kingdom. 3. The beast which John saw coming up out of the sea (Rev. 13:1) is a composite picture of the 4 beasts which Daniel saw emerging from the sea (Dan. 7:3-7). Daniel saw a lion with eagle's wings, a bear, a leopard with 4 wings and 4 heads, and finally a beast with 10 horns. On combining these 4 beasts as one animal, the beast that John saw is produced: like a leopard, but with the feet of a bear and the mouth of a lion, having 10 horns and 7 heads. Daniel describes 4 kingdoms of this world which rise successively, and are as fierce and terrible as wild beasts in their antagonism to the Kingdom of God. John does not view the kingdoms individually, but all the kingdoms of this world collectively. He gazes upon them as one, notwithstanding external differences. And John sees the dragon, the tempter serpent of Eden (Rev. 12:3, 9), conformed in appearance to the beast, because the dragon is the animating and molding spirit in the kingdom of the world. To neither Daniel nor John are the world powers presented in their political aspect, but solely as representatives of the world in its antagonism to the Kingdom of God. It is not the fortunes of the nations, but their relation to God's Kingdom, that is the prime object of the prophecy. This fact is important, and furnishes a clue to the final revelation, Dan., chs. 10 to 12, which may be divided into: prologue, chs. 10 to 11:2a; the revelation, chs. 11:2b to 12:4; epilogue, ch. 12:5-13. The last 2 chapters contain a presentation of universal history and may be interpreted and analyzed as follows: (a) ch. 11:2b, the Persian age; (b) vs. 3, 4, Alexander and the division of his empire; (c) vs. 5-20, the conflicts of the Lagidae and Seleucidae prior to Antiochus Epiphanes, with these episodes: v. 5, Ptolemy (I) Soter and Seleucus (I) Nicator; vs. 6-9, the tragedy of Laodice and Berenice and revenge taken by Ptolemy (III) Evergetes; vs. 10-19, Antiochus the Great; v. 20, Seleucus (IV) Philopator; (d) vs. 21-45, Antiochus (IV) Epiphanes; (e) ch. 12:1-3, final triumph of the righteous; (f) v. 4, injunction as to the book. It suggests that in these chapters also the aim is not to unfold political history, but is mainly to sketch apocalyptically great movements of the world in relation to the Kingdom of God. The enemies of Zion came, and had always come, from the n. and s. Developing that historical circumstance apocalyptically, the vision pictures a struggle between the contending world powers, a war of varying fortunes; the gradual overthrow of the king of the s. and the ultimate triumph of the king of the n., and his final mortal conflict with the Kingdom of God. The picture is a companion piece to Ezek., chs. 38; 39. 4. Daniel speaks of the time of the end, that is, the final time. It is "the latter time of the indignation" [of God] (Dan. 8:19; cf. ch. 11:36), when judgment is being executed upon the kingdoms of the world and the eternal Kingdom of God is being established (cf. ch. 10:14), to be followed by the consummation (ch. 12:1c-3). It is the final period of the conflict between the powers of the world and the Kingdom of God, ending in the complete victory of the Kingdom. The apostles also speak of this period, calling it the last hour, the last time, or the last days; and they allude to it as already begun in their day and not ended, and destined to witness a manifestation of Antichrist (II Thess. 2:2-4; II Tim. 3:1; I John 2:18; Jude 18). These men of the N.T. clearly saw the scope and meaning of Daniel's prophecies concerning the final time, and they had a sense of living in that predicted period.

There is no doubt that The Book of Daniel has a unity of thought. The use of 2 languages, however, has caused some difficulty, and various theories have been offered in explanation. Some have supposed that a portion of the Hebrew text was lost and that it was filled in from an Aramaic version of the book. But the question may be raised why the Aramaic begins at the proper place (Dan. 2:4b). Others have held the opposite view that the whole book was originally composed in Aramaic, then translated into Hebrew, and when portions of the Hebrew were lost the gap was supplied from the Aramaic original. The 2 divisions of the book (chs. 1 to 6 and chs. 7 to 12), however, correspond roughly to the limits of the 2 languages. It has accordingly been assumed that chs. 1 to 6 were originally in Aramaic, and the latter 6 chapters in Hebrew. By this theory, a redactor turned chs. 1 to 2:4a into Hebrew and then rendered Hebrew 7 into Aramaic, thus bonding the 2 into one. The Hebrew at both ends of the book would facilitate recognition of the work as eligible for the sacred canon.

The date of authorship has not been definitely settled. Some excellent modern scholars continue to date the book in the time of Daniel in the 6th century. Among the church fathers Jerome is a famous commentator on this book and presents the traditional Jewish exegesis of his time. He opposed the Neoplatonist Porphyry, who attacked the historicity of the work and maintained that it was Maccabean. Commentators now generally accept the date assigned by Porphyry and contend that it was written under the name of Daniel c. 168 B.C. to support the faith of the Jews under the dreadful persecution then raging under Antiochus Epiphanes. In its contributions to apocalyptic and eschatology the book holds an important place in O.T. theology.

The problems of authorship do not disturb the unity of the book. The contents of the work and its veracity must not be confused with the linguistic problems and the formation of the book. It is universally accepted that the Hebrew of Daniel is that of Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther. The literary use of Ezekiel is generally regarded as a terminus a quo for the book. Many scholars maintain that the great turning point in Hebrew style falls in the age of Nehemiah, and not in the Captivity. Linguistically the Hebrew can hardly be earlier than the 5th century. In comparison with other Biblical literature, Daniel belongs to the late period and could very easily be assigned to the 2d century B.C. It is difficult to determine an exact date from the linguistic evidence. The Aramaic of Daniel, according to Professor J. A. Montgomery, "is not earlier than within the 5th century, is more likely younger, certainly is not of the 6th century." Not counting ancient borrowings, there are about 15 Akkadian loan words and about 17 Persian words, all except 3 of which are found in the Aramaic section. Since Daniel lived from the days of Nebuchadnezzar to the fall of the Chaldean Empire under Nabonidus and Belshazzar, this number of Persian words may be rather surprising and may argue for Persian influence after the Exile. There are 3 words of Greek origin (ch. 3:5), which refer to musical instruments: kithrōs (kithārōs, kathrōs) for Greek kitharis; psalterion; and sämpnydh for symphōnia. Rather plausible arguments have been presented for early Hellenic influences in the Near East, but in view of the Persian loan words the Greek words also may point to a late date. In fact, the character of the Hebrew, the Aramaic, which seems later than that of the 6th century papyri, and the Persian elements may all point to the Persian period and even perhaps to the Hellenistic. In the light of this evidence, Montgomery presents the view that chs. 1 to 6, which he assigns roughly to the 3d century, were composed in Babylonia, while chs. 7 to 12 belong to the early years of the Maccabees, 168-165 B.C.

The spiritual lessons of the book are more important than questions of authorship. God rules, and his purposes will be vindicated. One must differentiate between the historicity of Daniel and the authenticity of the prophecies and visions on the one hand and the recording of the events and the redaction of the book in its final form on the other.

The asserted historical inaccuracies in Daniel are not statements which are disproved by history, but only statements which have seemed difficult to harmonize with the meager accounts of secular historians. The asserted historical inaccuracies have, moreover, been steadily diminishing before the increasing knowledge of the times of Cyrus. The existence of King Belshazzar was scouted; but now the records contemporary with the capture of Babylon have made him a well-known historical character; they have explained why he raised Daniel to the 3d place of power in the kingdom instead of the 2d, for his father and he already occupied the 2 higher places of authority; and they have made clear why he and not Nabonidus is mentioned as king at Babylon on the night of the capture of the city (see BELSHAZZAR). They do not yet clear up the reference to Darius the Mede's receiving the kingdom, but they show that the appointment of a regent for Babylonia by Cyrus was in accord with his policy. The allusions to Belshazzar as a descendant of Nebuchadnezzar agree with a custom of the time (see BELSHAZZAR). The growth of our knowledge of this period shows how cautious one should be in doubting the historical accuracy of the Biblical records.

The prophecy of Daniel is quoted by Christ as genuine and certain of fulfillment (Matt. 24:15). Josephus, who speaks of Daniel as a great prophet (Jos. Antiq. x. 11), believed that the prophecies of Daniel were in existence before the time of Alexander the Great, 330 B.C. (Jos. Antiq. xi. 8, 5), in fact, before the days of Artaxerxes (Jos. Apion i. 8). The deliverance of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego from the fiery furnace and of Daniel from the lions' den are cited in I Macc. 2:59, 60; cf. also ch. 1:54 with Dan. 9:27; 11:31.

Dan'-ja'an (dān'jā'an). A place between Gilead and Sidon (II Sam. 24:6). It may be identical with Dan, the conventional extreme n. of the country (cf. the connection with Sidon, Judg. 18:28, 29). The text may be corrupt, and this has been suggested: "And they came to Dan and Ijon [I Kings 15:20] and went round about to Sidon," or, "And they came to Dan and went round to Sidon."

Dan'nah (dān'ā). A village in the hill country of Judah (Josh. 15:49), modern Deir esh-Shemsh or Simya. LXX has Renna.

Da'ra (dār'ā). See DARDA.

Dar'da (dār'dó) [probably, thorn, thistle, for Heb. dardar]. A son of Mahol, family of Zerah, tribe of Judah, who was celebrated for wisdom (I Kings 4:31). In I Chron. 2:6 the name appears as Dara.

Dar'te. A gold coin current in Persia, worth about $5.50, which had on one side a king with a bow and a javelin, while on the other was a somewhat square figure; see MONEY. The chronicler reckons the value of the gold contributed by the princes in David's reign for the Temple in darics (I Chron. 29:7), because at the time of writing the daric was familiar to his readers and a common standard. The daric was current in the Persian period (Ezra 2:69; 8:27; Neh. 7:70-72; in A.V., dram).

Dar'ius (dā-rī'ūs) [Old Pers. Dārayavaush, possessing the good]. 1. Darius the Mede, son of Ahasuerus (Dan. 5:31; 9:1). When about 62 years old he was made king over the realm of the Chaldeans after the capture of Babylon by the army of Cyrus, and he reigned a part of one year at least before Cyrus (ch. 6:28). He set 120 satraps over the kingdom (ch. 6:1). The satraps were subject to 3 presidents, of whom Daniel was one (v. 2). Presidents and satraps were at the court of Darius (v. 6), and he had authority to write unto "all the peoples, nations, and languages, that dwell in all the earth" or land (v. 25). He was inveigled into issuing the foolish decree, for violating which Daniel was cast into the lions' den (ch. 6:1-27). In his 1st year Daniel saw the vision of the 70 weeks (ch. 9). He has not been identified with certainty, but was probably sovereign of the Babylonian Empire ad interim until Cyrus, who was pressing his conquests, was ready to assume the duties of king of Babylon. Josephus says that he was son of Astyages, but was known to the Greeks by another name (Jos. Antiq. x. 11, 4). Perhaps, then, he was Cyaxeres, son and successor of Astyages and father-in-law and maternal uncle of Cyrus (Xen. Cyropaedia i. 5, 2; viii. 5, 17-20); more frequently he is identified with Gobryas (Ugbaru), governor of Gutium, apparently a province in w. Media or on its borders, who led the detachment of Cyrus' army which captured Babylon and held the city until Cyrus arrived. Subsequently he was governor of that province.

2. A king of Persia (521-486 B.C.), known as Darius Hystaspis, i.e., Darius, son of Hystaspes. When he came to the throne, the building of the Temple had been suspended owing to complaints from the jealous neighboring tribes; but Darius, on being applied to, caused a search to be made at Achmetha, the Median capital, where the edict of Cyrus permitting the work to be undertaken was found (Ezra 6:1-12). The erection of the sacred edifice accordingly recommenced in his 2d year, 6th month, and 24th day (Ezra 4:24; Hag. 1:15; 2:18), and on the 3d day of the 12th month of his 6th regnal year (516) was completed (Ezra 6:15). The prophets Haggai and Zechariah prophesied during the reign of this monarch (Hag. 1:1; 2:1, 10, 18; Zech. 1:1, 7; 7:1). Through his father Darius belonged to the family of the Achaemenidae, which was already represented on the throne by Cyrus and Cambyses; but he was not in the line of succession. The leading events of his life are detailed in an inscription of Darius' own on a rock at Behistun, 65 miles s.w. of Hamadan. It is in 3 languages, Old Persian, Babylonian, and Elamite. Cambyses, Cyrus' son, put his brother Bardiya (Bardiya, Smerdis) to death, and some time afterward committed suicide. Then a Magian Gomates or Gaumata started up, pretending to be Bardiya, who he alleged had not really been slain. The fraud was discovered and a conspiracy formed against Gomates by 7 men of rank, one of whom was Darius Hystaspis. In 522 B.C. they slew the Magian and saluted Darius king. Susiana rose against the new monarch, but was temporarily subdued. Babylon followed under a leader called Nidintu-Bel, who was defeated in 521. There was a general revolt throughout the empire, and Darius says: "While I was in Babylon these provinces rebelled against me: Persia, Susiana, Media, Assyria, Armenia, Parthia, Margiana, Sattagydia, and the Sacians." But he and his lieutenants subdued them all, generally ending by impaling the rebel leader. Darius now ruled over an empire extending e. into India and w. to the Grecian Archipelago. He administered it on the whole, wisely and well. After an unsuccessful campaign against the Scythians near the river Don, in what is now Russia, and a quarrel with the Greeks, in which his generals Datis and Artaphernes were defeated in 490 B.C. at Marathon, Darius died at the age of 73 (Ctesias) in 486 B.C., after a reign of 36 years.

3. The last king of Persia, who reigned from 336/5 to 331 B.C. His true name was Codomannus. He was defeated by Alexander the Great (I Macc. 1:1; Jos. Antiq. xi. 8, 3), first at Issus in 333, when he fled into Persia, and again at Arbela in 331. He died about 4 months later at the hands of his servants.

Dār'kon (dār'kōn) [cf. Arab. daraka, to hasten]. Founder of a family, among the children of Solomon's servants (Ezra 2:56; Neh. 7:58).

Date. The fruit of the date palm or Phoenix dactylifera (II Chron. 31:5, A.V. marg.), from which honey was made (Jos. War iv. 8, 3). The text and the R.V., like the Hebrew original, use the general name honey, without specifying the kind.

Dā'than (dā'thān) [cf. Akkad. datnu, strong]. A son of Eliab, a Reubenite, who with Abiram, his brother, and On, a man of the same tribe, were prominent leaders in the rebellion of Korah the Levite. Their grievance was different from his. They thought that the leadership of Israel should have gone to the tribe to which they belonged, for Reuben was Jacob's eldest son. Then, again, they complained that Moses had taken them from a country where there was plenty, under the promise of leading them into "a land flowing with milk and honey," while in fact all that he had done was to march them up and down amid naked rocks and barren sands (Num. 16:1-35, cf. vs. 13, 14; 26:7-11; Deut. 11:6; Ps. 106:17).

Dath'e-ma (dāth'é-mā). A fortress in Gil-ead, into which the faithful Israelites fled for safety in the time of Judas Maccabaeus (I Macc. 5:9, 10). They were relieved by Judas and his brother Jonathan. Probably the ancient site of Tell Hamad, near Sheikh Miskin, in the plain of Hauran.

Daugh'ter. Besides corresponding to the several senses in which son is used, especially for child or remoter female descendant or as an expression of tender sympathy for a woman (Gen. 30:21; Ex. 2:1; Matt. 9:22; Luke 13:16), daughter denotes a female inhabitant of a country or town (Gen. 24:3; Judg. 21:21), a female worshiper of a god (Isa. 43:6; Mal. 2:11), the suburb of a city (Num. 21:25 marg.), the collective body of the citizens of a town or country (Ps. 9:14; 137:8; Lam. 4:21; Zech. 2:10). See HEIR, MARRIAGE, SLAVE.

Dā'vid (dā'vid) [beloved]. Son of Jesse and 2d king of Israel. His life falls into several distinct periods:

I. His youth, which was passed at Bethlehem of Judah. He was the youngest of 8 brothers (I Sam. 16:10, 11; 17:12-14). In the registry of the tribe of Judah (I Chron. 2:13-15) only 7 of these sons of Jesse are named, probably because one died without issue. David's mother was tenderly remembered for her godliness (Ps. 86:16; 116:16). His ancestral history was picturesque, inspiring, and generally praiseworthy, yet at times tainted by sin (Gen. 37: 26, 27; 38:13-29; 43:8, 9; 44:18-34; Josh. 2:1-21; Ruth 4:17-22). In person he was ruddy and beautiful to look upon (I Sam. 16:12). As youngest son, he was charged with the care of his father's sheep, and he displayed his fidelity and courage in this occupation by slaying both a lion and a bear which attacked the flock (chs. 16:11; 17:34-36). He possessed musical gifts of high order, at this period playing skillfully on the harp and later composing psalms. When King Saul had been rejected by God, the Prophet Samuel was sent to Bethlehem and directed to anoint David as Saul's successor. There was no public proclamation of David, lest the hostility of Saul should be aroused. At most, the act was performed in the presence of the elders of the town, and, so far as appears, no word concerning the purpose of the anointing was spoken to the audience (ch. 16:4, 5, 13), though Jesse and David were doubtless informed. It was a crisis in David's history. "The Spirit of Jehovah came mightily upon David." Still he did not despise his humble, daily work.

II. His service under Saul. Saul, forsaken by God, distressed by an evil spirit, and subject to melancholy and insanity, was advised by his attendants to attach a harper to his person to soothe him by music when disturbed; and one recommended David as a cunning musician, a man of valor and ready for war by reason of age, skill, and courage, even though perhaps not as yet experienced in battle, discreet, comely, pious (ch. 16:14-18). Saul summoned him, was benefited by his music and pleased with his character, asked Jesse that he might remain, and appointed him one of his armor-bearers (vs. 19-23). The service thus begun proved a school for David. He learned war and government, had intercourse with able men, and saw the dark and bright side of court life. David did not, however, as yet remain continuously with Saul. The king's condition evidently improved, and David returned frequently to Bethlehem to have an oversight over his father's sheep (ch. 17:15). While he was on a visit home the Philistines invaded Judah and encamped about 15 miles w. of Bethlehem. Saul led forth the army of Israel to meet them. The 3 eldest brothers of David were with the army, and after they had been absent from home about 6 weeks, their father sent David to inquire about their welfare. Goliath's challenge stirred his spirit. He felt certain that God through him would remove the reproach from Israel, and he asked who the Philistine was that defied the armies of the living God. His words were reported to Saul, who perceiving the spirit by which the young man was animated intrusted the single combat to him. David put off the armor with which Saul had armed him, urging that he had not proved it. He showed true genius. Goliath was rendered slow of motion by weight of armor; the kind of weapon he carried obliged him to fight at close quarters; and he was vulnerable only in the face, which under the circumstances was out of reach. David approached him, unhampered in movement by any armor, with a sling, in the use of which he was proficient, with 5 stones that could be hurled from a distance, with the consciousness of the righteousness of his cause and with implicit confidence in God. The taunts between the 2 champions are characteristic of ancient battle. Goliath fell, struck by a stone from David's sling. After the combat, David, on his way to Gibeon of Benjamin where Saul held court or to the tabernacle at Nob, displayed the head of the giant at Jerusalem, apparently in defiance to the Jebusites, who held the stronghold, and put the armor in the tent which he thenceforth occupied (ch. 17:54). The sword was deposited in the tabernacle (ch. 21:9). When David had gone forth to meet Goliath Saul, amazed at his spirit, asked Abner whose son such a youth could be; and when David returned triumphant the king put the same question to him, only to receive the simple answer, "I am the son of thy servant Jesse the Beth-lehemite." This reply formed the sum and substance of the interview (chs. 17: 55 to 18:1); David's ancestors were not notable for heroic achievement. The question of the king had also reference to the rank and material condition of the family, for Saul had promised to accept the victor as son-in-law and to free his father's family from taxation (chs. 17:25; 18:18). He found that he had no occasion to be ashamed of the birth of his son-in-law. The victory over Goliath was a second crisis in David's life. The valor, modesty, and piety, which he displayed won for him the disinterested and enduring love of Jonathan (ch. 18:1). He was no longer permitted to repair periodically to his father's house, but he remained continuously at court (v. 2). The ovation which he received aroused the jealousy of Saul, who thenceforth was David's enemy (vs. 6-9). Saul saw that Samuel's prediction of the transfer of the kingdom from him to one better than he (ch. 15:17-29) approached fulfillment in David, and he attempted to prevent it. He endeavored to slay David with his spear (ch. 18:10, 11). Failing in this, he reduced David in military rank and power (v. 13). He gave his daughter, whom he had promised to David for a wife, to another (vs. 17-19). He endeavored to entrap him to death through his love for Michal (vs. 20-27). As David grew in favor (vs. 29, 30) Saul's fear increased, and he no longer concealed his purpose to slay David (ch. 19:1). This purpose was never after allowed by Saul's adherents to be abandoned, but was fostered by a party at court (ch. 24:9; Psalm 7, title). Appeased for a time, jealousy soon revived, and he again attempted to smite David with his spear (ch. 19:4-9). Then he would have arrested David, who, however, escaped through Michal's subtlety (vs. 10-17). David wrote Psalm 59 at this time. He fled to Samuel at Ramah, whither Saul sent to seize him (I Sam. 19:18-24); fled next to Jonathan, who inquired and informed him that there was no longer safety for him at court (ch. 20).

III. The fugitive hero. Without confidence in God and sunk in despair David fled from Saul. Stopping at Nob, without faith, he told a lie (ch. 21:1-9); then hurried to Gath and sought protection of Saul's enemy Achish (v. 10). The lords of the Philistines, however, refused to harbor him who had formerly humiliated them, and they seized David (v. 14; Psalm 56, title). He feigned madness and made himself despicable, and Achish drove him away (cf. Psalm 34, title, but no doubt Abimelech=Achish). He regained his faith in Jehovah (Psalm 34), returned to Judah, and abode in the cave of Adullam (I Sam. 22:1), but placed his parents in Moab (vs. 3, 4). A motley company, mostly of unemployed and desperate men, numbering 400 at first, increasing eventually to 600, began to join him. Among these were Abiathar, the surviving priest of Nob, who brought an ephod with him, and the Prophet Gad, whom David had probably met at Ramah (vs. 5, 20; ch. 23:6). David thus had religious aid and companionship. From Adullam he went to the relief of Keilah and delivered the town out of the hands of the Philistines (ch. 23:1-5). On Saul's preparing to attack him there, he fled to the wilderness of Judah (v. 14; Psalm 63), whither Saul, at the instigation of the Ziphites, pursued him until compelled to desist by an incursion of the Philistines (I Sam. 23:14-29). That trouble being settled, Saul sought David in the wilderness near Engedi, but was for the time conquered by the kindness of David, who had the king in his power in the cave, but spared his life (ch. 24; Psalms 57; 142). David and his band of armed followers protected the exposed property of the Israelites from thieving marauders (I Sam. 23:1; 25:16, 21; 27:8), and naturally enough expected some return in gifts of food. He did not levy tax or demand regular contributions of provisions. Nabal's scornful rejection of his request incensed him, and he was saved from shedding blood in his fury only by the wisdom and address of Nabal's wife (ch. 25), whom David married after the death of her husband. David again came into the neighborhood of Ziph, and the Ziphites again informed Saul, who marched against David. David showed his magnanimity by not slaying the sleeping king, but merely carrying away from his side his spear and cruse of water (ch. 26). Despairing of always escaping Saul, David left Judah and obtained permission from Achish to occupy Ziklag, a frontier town toward the southern desert. Here he remained a year and 4 months, protecting the Philistines by warring with the desert tribes, yet sometimes wasting a remote village even of Philistia (ch. 27). When the Philistines went to Gilboa to war with Saul, David was prevented from accompanying them by the lords of the Philistines (chs. 28:1, 2; 29). Upon his return he found Ziklag in ruins. He pursued the retreating invaders and recovered the spoil (ch. 30). When he heard the result of the battle of Gilboa, he mourned the fate of Saul and Jonathan in an elegy (II Sam., ch. 1.)

IV. King of Judah. On the death of Saul the tribe of Judah, to which David belonged, elected him king, and he began to reign in Hebron (II Sam. 2:1-10), being then about 30 years old (ch. 5:4). The rest of the tribes, under the leadership of Abner, one of the ablest men of the time, set up Ish-bosheth, Saul's son, at Mahanaim, and for the next 2 years civil war raged between his partisans and those of David. It ended by the assassination, sorely against David's will, both of Abner and of Ish-bosheth (chs. 2:12 to 4:12). David's reign at Hebron continued for 7 years and 6 months (ch. 5:5). He had already several wives, and among the sons born to him at Hebron were Amnon, Absalom, and Adonijah (ch. 3:1-5).

V. King of all Israel. On the death of Ish-bosheth, David was elected king over all the tribes, and he at once set to work to establish the kingdom (ch. 5:1-5). Various towns in the territory of Israel were garrisoned by the Philistines, and others were held by the Canaanites. David began a siege of the Jebusite stronghold at Jerusalem. It was deemed impregnable by its inhabitants, but David took it by storm. He wisely made it his capital, and erected a palace there by the skill of Tyrian artificers. The new capital stood on the border of Judah and Israel. Its situation tended to allay the jealousy between n. and s. Its deliverance from the hands of the Canaanites opened the highway between Judah and the n., facilitated intercourse, and tended further to cement the kingdom. The Philistines twice invaded the land, and twice suffered defeat near Jerusalem (ch. 5:17-25; I Chron. 14:8-17). The king followed up the 2d victory by invading the country of the Philistines, took Gath, and by this conquest and by brief campaigns later (II Sam. 21:15-22) so completely subjugated the Philistines that these hereditary enemies ceased to trouble Israel for centuries. The kingdom being established, David turned his attention to religious affairs. He brought the Ark, with ceremony, sacrifices, and rejoicing, from Kiriath-jearim (Josh. 15:9; II Chron. 1:4), and placed it within a tabernacle which he had pitched for it in the city of David (II Sam., ch. 6; I Chron., chs. 13; 15:1-3). Next he organized the worship on a magnificent scale (I Chron., chs. 15; 16), and planned a splendid temple (II Sam., ch. 7; I Chron., chs. 17; 22:7-10). Through the divine favor he now became very prosperous. To insure the safety of the nation, to keep it from idolatrous contamination, and to avenge insult offered to it, he waged war with surrounding nations, and subdued the Moabites, the Ammaeans of Zobah and Damascus, the Ammonites, the Edomites, and the Amalekites (II Sam., chs. 8; 10; 12:26-31), thus extending his kingdom to the limits long before promised to Abraham (Gen. 15:18). It was during the Ammonite war that David committed his great sin in the matter of Uriah the Hittite, for which God rebuked him through Nathan the prophet, and imposed the penalty that the sword should never depart from his house (II Sam. 11:1 to 12:23). David sincerely repented (Psalm 51), but the child of the union died (II Sam. 12:19). Lawless lust and lawless vengeance were manifested in his own family (ch. 13). Lawless and unfilial ambition triumphed for a time in his family and led to civil war (chs. 14 to 19). The spirit of dissatisfaction and tribal jealousy fomented by Absalom showed itself after the suppression of Absalom's rebellion once more in the revolt of Sheba (ch. 20). David solemnly satisfied justice, according to the ideas of that age, in avenging Saul's bloody violation of the treaty rights of the Gibeonites (ch. 21). He committed a sin of pride in numbering the people, and was punished by a pestilence (ch. 24; I Chron., ch. 21). David was much occupied during his reign with the organization of internal affairs and with the preparation of material for the erection of the Temple. He closed his reign by securing the succession to Solomon (I Kings, ch. 1), and by providing that the guilt of some who had escaped justice in his day should not go unpunished (ch. 2:1-11). He died in his seventy-first year, after having reigned 40 (or, more precisely, 40½) years, 7½ at Hebron and 33 at Jerusalem (II Sam. 2:11; 5:4, 5; I Chron. 29:27).

David was early regarded as the sweet singer of Israel (II Sam. 23:1). Ancient Hebrew tradition, much of which was unquestionably current about David's own time and shortly after, ascribed the composition of psalms to him both directly and indirectly. His fondness for music is recorded in the historical books; he played skillfully on the harp (I Sam. 16:18-23; II Sam. 6:5), and he arranged the service of praise for the sanctuary (I Chron. 6:31; 16:7, 41, 42; 25:1). He composed a lament over Saul and Jonathan, and over Abner, and a song of deliverance and last words (II Sam. 1:17-27; 3:33, 34; chs. 22; 23:1-7). His musical activity is referred to by Amos, Ezra (Ezra 3:10), Nehemiah (Neh. 12:24, 36, 45, 46; Amos 6:5), and the son of Sirach (Ecclus. 47:8, 9). Such work on the part of David accorded with the times, for poetry and music had long been cultivated by the Hebrews as well as by the Egyptians and Babylonians (Num. 21:14; Judg., ch. 5). Seventy-three psalms are designated as David's in their Hebrew titles; and as in many cases the intention is to indicate that he is the author (cf. Psalms 3; 7; 34; 51 et cetera), it is possibly always the intention. Psalm 59 and perhaps Psalm 7 are assigned to the time of his sojourn at Saul's court; Psalms 34; 52; 54; 56; 57; 63; 142 to the period of distress when he was a fugitive; and Psalms 3; 18; 30; 51; 60 to the years of varied experiences when he was king.

Though at times David committed deep-dyed sins, for which the early and comparatively dark period of the Church's history in which he lived and his own deep penitence are his only defense, yet his general fidelity to Jehovah was such that he was called the man after God's own heart (I Sam. 13:14). Speaking generally, he did that which was right in the eyes of the Lord, save in the matter of Uriah the Hittite (I Kings 15:5). He served his generation by the will of God, and then fell asleep (Acts 13:36). His influence on mankind can scarcely be overestimated. He, rather than his predecessor Saul, was the founder of the Jewish monarchy. His psalms, sung throughout Christendom century after century, revive his spiritual influence. He was an important link in the chain of ancestry of Him who was at once David's son and David's Lord (Matt. 22:41-45).

Da'vid (dā'vid), Cit'y of. 1. The Jebusite stronghold of Zion captured by David's men, and called by him the city of David, because he made it his royal residence (II Sam. 5:6-9; I Chron. 11:5, 7). It stood on the ridge, s. of the later site of the Temple. It was early settled, and was a walled town in the 3d millennium B.C. The Ark was taken thither by David, and stayed there until the Temple was built (II Sam. 6:12, 16; I Kings 8:1; I Chron., ch. 15; II Chron. 5:2). David was buried there (I Kings 2:10). Solomon's queen, Pharaoh's daughter, dwelt there for a time (I Kings 3:1), though he afterward erected a palace for himself and her (chs. 7:1; 9:24; II Chron. 8:11). He was buried in the city of David (I Kings 11:43; II Chron. 9:31), as were Rehoboam (I Kings 14:31; II Chron. 12:16) and many other kings (I Kings 15:8, 24; 22:50; II Kings 8:24; 9:28; 12:21; 14:20; 15:7, 38; 16:20; I Chron. 14:1; 16:14; 21:1, 20; 24:16, 25; 27:9). Jehoiada, the high priest, was also interred there (II Chron. 24:16). Hezekiah brought the upper watercourse of Gihon to the w. side of the city of David (ch. 32:30; cf. ch. 33:14). Millo was apparently within its limits (ch. 32:5). In Nehemiah's time there was a descent from the city of David by means of stairs (Neh. 3:15; 12:37). It was fortified and garrisoned by the Syrians and Greeks during the Maccabean war (I Macc. 1:33; 2:31; 14:36, 37). See JERUSALEM.

2. Bethlehem, the birthplace or at least the home of David (Luke 2:4).

Day. 1. An interval of time comprising the period between two successive risings of the sun (Gen. 7:24; Job 3:6). The Hebrews reckoned it from evening to evening (Ex. 12:18; Lev. 23:32; Jos. War iv, 9, 12). This custom was probably due to the use of lunar months, which began with the appearance of the new moon. The exact designation of the civil day accordingly was evening-morning or night-day (Dan. 8:14, A.V. marg.; II Cor. 11:25). But although the evening properly introduced a new day, it was often reckoned in connection with the natural day which, strictly speaking, it followed—e.g. the evening which began the 15th of Nisan is designated by the expression "the fourteenth day . . . at even" (Ex. 12:18; cf. II Chron. 35:1). The days of the week were numbered, not named. The only exception was the 7th day, which was also called Sabbath.

2. The interval between dawn and darkness (Gen. 1:5; 8:22). It was divided into morning, noon, and evening (Ps. 55:17; cf. Dan. 6:10); or its time was indicated by reference to sunrise, heat of the day, cool of the day, sunset, and the like. After the Exile the use of hours became common, and the day from sunrise to sunset was divided into 12 hours (Matt. 20:1-12; John 11:9); the 6th hour being noon (John 4:6; Acts 10:9), the 9th the hour of prayer (Acts 3:1; Jos. Antiq. xiv, 4, 3).

3. Any period of action or state of being (Zech. 12:3 seq.); as day of trouble (Ps. 20:1), day of his wrath (Job 20:28), day of the Lord (Isa. 2:12; 13:6, 9; in the N.T. specially of the 2d advent of Christ, I Cor. 5:5; I Thess. 5:2; II Peter 3:10). So also in the Hebrew phrase translated, "In the day that," which is equivalent to "when" (Gen. 2:4, 17; Lev. 14:2), and is often rendered so in the English versions (Lev. 14:57; Num. 6:13; I Sam. 20:19; Ps. 20:9).

Day of the Lord. An eschatological term; it is the day of Jehovah's self-revelation to judge evil and to bring his work of redemption among men to completion. In that day Jehovah manifests himself in triumph over his foes and interposes in behalf of his people to deliver them. This deliverance will be primarily from external hostile oppression, but there may also be included release from social miseries. As such it was a day to be desired; apparently the term is older than written prophecy, for Amos (Amos 5:18) puts it into the mouth of the people. There will be a national dissolution, but only in order to usher in reconstruction. The popular idea of a day of deliverance was misleading to a people who depended more upon form and correct ritual than upon an ethical religion. Amos accordingly gave the term a new significance, when he spoke of the day of the Lord as God's judgment upon Israel (Amos 5:18-20; cf. also chs. 2: 3; 4:12 seq.; 5:10 to 6:14; 9:1-10). The day of the Lord, as understood by Amos, becomes a figure which is afterward often used by the prophets to portray impending doom. While the day is a judgment primarily on Israel, it also includes the Gentiles (cf. Ezek. 30:1 seq.; Obad. 15-17). The prophets in adopting the figure develop it partly according to the occasion and partly under the influence of the imagination. Isaiah (Isa. 2:12-21) represents it as directed against various objects of pride and strength; Joel (Joel 2:1 seq.) derives his imagery from a plague of locusts (cf. also Isa., chs. 2: 3; 13; 24; 34:8; Hos. 2:18 seq.; 4:3; 10:8; Joel, chs. 1 to 3; Micah, chs. 3: 4; Zeph., chs. 1 to 3; Zech., ch. 14; Mal., chs. 3; 4). The day of the Lord is the final and universal judgment. Although that day fills men with terror and anguish, it is also a cause of universal rejoicing, for then begins the reign of God (cf. Ps. 97:1; 98:9).

In the N.T. it is the day of Christ, the day of his coming in the glory of the Father. It is a day of wrath (Rom. 2:5 seq.), a day of judgment (Matt. 10:15; Rom. 2:16), a great day (Jude 6). Sometimes it is called "that day" (Matt. 7:22; I Thess. 5:4) or simply "the day" (I Cor. 3:13); also "the day of our Lord Jesus" (II Cor. 1:14); "the day of Jesus Christ" or "Christ" (Phil. 1:6, 10). The epistles of Paul are suffused with the longing for the day of Christ's glorious manifestation. The conception of the day centers in Christ and points to the establishment of the Kingdom of heaven.

Days'man (A.V.). One who has set a day for hearing a cause; a mediator or an arbitrator (Job 9:33, A.V.).

Day'star. See LUCIFER.

Dea'con [Gr. diakonos; in classical writers a servant, a waiting man, a messenger. It is used in this sense in Matt. 20:26, where it is translated "minister," and is distinguished from doulos, bond servant or slave in the next verse]. A Christian officer, whose spiritual and moral qualifications are laid down in I Tim. 3:8. It is justly assumed that the 7 men chosen to relieve the apostles of the secular care of the widows and other poor people in the Early Church were deacons (Acts 6:1-6; cf. the words ministratio, diakonia, and serve, diakoneō, in vs. 1 and 2). Their charge of the needy did not debar them from the privilege of speaking publicly for Christ, for Stephen and Philip labored also as preachers and evangelists. They did so, however, in the exercise of a personal gift rather than of an official duty. A plurality of deacons existed in the church at Philippi, and shared with the bishops the duties of the church (Phil. 1:1).

Dea'con'ess. A female deacon; like Phoebe, servant or diakonos of the church at Cenchreae

(Rom. 16:1, R.V. marg.). Deaconesses are probably referred to in I Tim. 3:11. They existed in the churches of Bithynia as early as A.D. 100, for Pliny, in his celebrated letter to the emperor Trajan regarding the Christians, reports having examined "two old women" of the Christian community "who were called ministers" (ministrae).

Dead Sea. The name now given to the sheet of water called in the Bible the Salt Sea (Gen. 14:3; Num. 34:12; Deut. 3:17; Josh. 3:16), the sea of the Arabah or Plain (Deut. 3:17; Josh. 3:16), and the e. or eastern sea (Ezek. 47:18; Joel 2:20; R.V., Zech. 14:8). Josephus calls it Asphaltites (Jos. Antiq. i. 9, 1). It was named the Dead Sea by the Greeks as early as the latter half of the 2d century of the Christian Era (Pausanias). It is situated in the deep volcanic rent or fissure which runs through Palestine from n. to s.; and is fed chiefly by the river Jordan, which empties into it on an average 6,000,000 tons of water every 24 hours. Its surface was ascertained by the officers of the ordnance survey to be 1,292 feet lower than the ocean level. The sea is like a long rectangle with the angles beveled off; but its regularity of form is interrupted by a projection into its s.e. side of a great promontory or peninsula called Lisan (the Tongue). The length of the sea from n. to s. is on an average about 47 miles, but it varies, a large portion of the s. shore being sometimes dry and sometimes covered with water. The breadth a little n. of Engedi is 9½ miles, and it is nearly as much everywhere n. of the Lisan. Ancient watermarks indicate that the area, especially the length, was formerly much larger (Jos. War iv. 8, 4). The Lisan is about 9 miles long from n. to s. Its banks are from 40 to 60 feet high; while, according to Tristram, its highest point is about 300 feet above the water. Lieutenant Lynch, who in 1848 led an expedition for the exploration of the Jordan and the Dead Sea, found the maximum depth of the latter, as ascertained by sounding, to be 1,278 feet; this was at a point near the mouth of the Arnon. Soundings farther n. yield 1,300 feet. South of the Lisan, on the contrary, the sea is quite shallow. Except on the n. side, where the Jordan enters, the Dead Sea is nearly surrounded by a rampart of cliffs, which in some places leave a narrow beach between them and the water, while in others they themselves constitute the coast line. These rise in successive terraces, which also exist along the lower part of the Jordan Valley. On the w. side, at En-gedi, the height from the seashore to the top of the cliffs is 1,950 feet; a little farther n. at Rās esh Shufk, the top is 2,519 feet above the Dead Sea, i.e., 1,227 above the Mediterranean. Farther n. the elevation gradually decreases till it reaches 1,400 feet above the Dead Sea. These w. cliffs contain deposits of bitumen in both liquid and solid state. On the e. side the precipitous mountains of Moab rise from 2,500 to 3,000 feet above the shore.

The Dead Sea is one of the most remarkable sheets of water on the face of the earth. No other is known to occupy so deep a hollow on the surface of the globe. Its waters are much saltier than those of the ocean, for while in the latter 100 lbs. of water contain 6 lbs. of salt, in the former 100 lbs. of water contain from 20 to 27.8 lbs. of salt. In consequence of this, eggs will float on its surface. A bather, too, finds himself buoyant, and when he comes ashore there is a greasy deposit of salt upon his skin, which tortures him if there happens to be a scratch on his body. The saltiness of the water is due to the nature of the soil, which abounds in the chlorides of sodium, magnesium, and calcium

These substances are carried into the sea by the river and the brooks; and there being no outlet, the salt remains and accumulates year by year, while the water with which it comes goes off to a large extent in vapor, evaporation being immense, since the air comes dry and thirsty from the desert.

The Scripture name, Salt Sea, has been superseded by the name Dead Sea. The old belief, however, that there is a total absence of life in and around the sea is erroneous. Organic life scarcely exists in its waters; neither shellfish nor corals are found. But vegetation flourishes on its shores at the mouth of wadies and by springs of fresh water; and birds frequent its strand or fly over its surface. According to Lartet, fish are found in small numbers s. of the Lisan. As a symbol of life in the new Kingdom of God, Ezekiel pictures the healing of the waters of the Dead Sea, and the multiplication of fish till the species rival in number those of the Mediterranean (Ezek. 47:6-12).

Dearth. See FAMINE.

De'bir (dē'bēr). 1. A king of Eglon, ally of Adoni-zedek; defeated, captured, and executed by Joshua (Josh. 10:3, 23, 26).

2. A city in the hill country of Judah, yet in the Negeb or southland. It was also called Kiriath-sepher (city of books); and Kiriath-sannah, city of a palm branch (Josh. 15:15, 19, 48, 49). In the time of Joshua it was inhabited by Anakim, had a king, and was head of other towns. Joshua captured it and slew its inhabitants (Josh. 10:38, 39; 11:21; 12:13); but it was reoccupied by returned fugitives, and had to be recaptured by Othniel (Josh. 15:15-17; Judg. 1:11, 12). It was assigned to the priests (Josh. 21:13, 15; I Chron. 6:57, 58). Dhāhariyeh, about 12 miles s.w. of Hebron, has been accepted by many as the site. A more probable identification is Tell Beit Mirsim about 13 miles w.s.w. of Hebron and about 3 miles n.n.w. of Shamir.

3. A town on the boundary of the tribe of Judah, near the valley of Achor (Josh. 15:7). The name is perhaps preserved in Thoghret ed-Debr, near ed-Dumm (Adummim), on the road between Jerusalem and Jericho.

4. A place e. of the Jordan, near Mahanaim (Josh. 13:26). R.V. marg. has Lidebir. Perhaps Lodebar (q.v.).

Deb'orah (dēb'ō-rā) [a bee]. 1. Rebekah's nurse, who accompanied her from Mesopotamia and lived until Jacob's return from Paddan-aram. She had perhaps returned to her kindred in Haran after the death of Rebekah and accompanied Jacob back to Canaan, or she had gone to him when he was sojourning at Shechem. At any rate she was with him at Beth-el. There she died at the age of about 155 years, for she could not have been much younger than Isaac. She was buried at the foot of the hill on which the town stood and under an oak, called in consequence Allon-bacuth, oak of weeping (Gen. 24:59; 35:8).

2. A prophetess, the wife of Lappidoth. She dwelt under a palm tree, called after her name, between Ramah and Beth-el, in Mount Ephraim, and there judged the Israelites. She summoned Barak to undertake the contest with Sisera, and accompanied him to the rendezvous of his army (Judg. 4:4-14). Afterward she composed a song of triumph for the victory (ch. 5; cf. v. 7).

Debt'or. One who owes another money. To foster the spirit of brotherhood and mutual helpfulness, the Mosaic Law ordained that the creditor release his brother Israelite from all obligations at the year of release, which recurred every 7 years (Deut. 15:1-4). In the intervening years custom permitted the seizure and enslavement of a debtor, his wife, and his children (II Kings 4:1; Neh. 5:5, 8; Isa. 50:1). In the time of Jesus, in accordance with Roman law, imprisonment was sometimes inflicted on a debtor (Matt. 5:25; 18:25, 30; Luke 12:58).

Deca'logue. See TEN COMMANDMENTS.

Decap'o-lis (dē-kāp'ō-lis) [Gr., league of 10 cities]. A district, beginning where the Plain of Esdraelon opens into the Jordan Valley and expanding e., which was dominated by 10 associated Greek cities. The Greek population had come in the wake of Alexander's conquest. The 10 cities originally included in the association were Scythopolis (Beth-shean), Hippos, Damascus; Gadara, Raphana, Kanatha; Pella, Dion, Gerasa, and Philadelphia (Rabbath Ammon). Other towns were afterward added. Ptolemy enumerates 18. Three roads connect Esdraelon with the commercial highway which runs between Damascus and Arabia along the margin of the desert. The 10 towns stood on these 3 roads and on the highway. The district is called "Decapolis regio" by Pliny (Hist. Nat. v. 16). Multitudes from Decapolis followed Jesus at an early period of his ministry (Matt. 4:25). The Gadarene demoniac, when the evil spirit was expelled, published his deliverance in Decapolis (Mark 5:20). Jesus traveled through its midst on his way from Tyre and Sidon to the Sea of Galilee, approaching the lake from the e. side (ch. 7:31).

De'dan (dē'dān). A Cushite people (Gen. 10:7), but also related to Abraham through Keturah (ch. 25:3). They were an important commercial people (Ezek. 27:15, 20; 38:13) of Arabia (Isa. 21:13), in the neighborhood of Edom (Jer. 25:23; 49:8; Ezek. 25:13), where caravan routes from southern, eastern, and central Arabia converged. The name lingers in Daidān, to the w. of Taima (Taymā) and s.e. of Allah. The Dedanites came from s. Arabia and dwelt near Raamah (Gen. 10:7), which is located in s.w. Arabia. N. Arabian Dedan, an emporium of the s. Arabian trade, was located at al-'Ula, in the once fertile Wadi el-Kura, in n. al-Hijāz. This Lihyānite capital was once a Minaean colony on the great trade route which carried the merchandise of Yemen and India to the Mediterranean ports. In Ezek. 25:13 and Jer. 49:7 seq. Dedan refers to the extreme s. of Edom, as Teman does to the n. of that land. On the basis of this it may be necessary to assume that another Dedan was on the s. border of Edom, but it may mean simply that the Dedanites constituted the s. border of Edom.

Deed'i-ca'tion, Feast of. An annual festival instituted by Judas Maccabaeus in 165 B.C. to celebrate the purification and renewal of the Temple, exactly 3 years after it had been desecrated by the introduction of Greek idolatry and other pollutions by order of Antiochus Epiphanes (I Macc. 4:52-59; cf. ch. 1:54, 59). The festival, called also lights (Jos. Antiq. xii. 7, 7), and celebrated much after the manner of the festival of tabernacles (II Macc. 10:6, 7), lasted 8 days, beginning on the 25th of Chislev (approximately December), and falling consequently in winter. Jesus was present at least once at Jerusalem during the festival, and delivered a discourse to the assembled multitude (John 10:22). The Jews still keep the festival.

Deer (A.V.). The English name of the genus Cervus, or of the family Cervidae. The word occurs only in A.V. in the name fallow deer (Deut. 14:5; I Kings 4:23), but the hart is frequently mentioned. Tristram enumerates 2 species of the genus Cervus as still occurring in Palestine, the roebuck (Cervus capreolus) and the fallow deer (Cervus dama); while the teeth and bones of 3 others, the red deer (Cervus elaphus), the reindeer (Cervus tarandus), and the elk (Cervus alces), are found in bone breccia in caves in the Lebanon Mountains.

De-grees'. See ASCENTS.

De-ha'ites (dê-hā'īts), in A.V. De-ha'vites (dê-hā'vīts). One of the tribes brought over to Samaria from the Assyrian Empire to replace the 10 tribes carried captive (Ezra 4:9). Rawlinson believes that they were the Dai, a nomad tribe of Aryan descent mentioned by Herodotus (i. 125).

De'ker (dê'kēr), A.V. De'kar (dê'kār) [piercing, mattock]. The father of Solomon's purveyor, Ben-deker (I Kings 4:9, R.V.).

De-la'iah (dê-lā'yā'), in A.V. once Da'ia'ah (dāl'ā-i'ā') (I Chron. 3:24) [Jehovah has drawn out, i.e., delivered]. 1. A descendant of Aaron. His family, grown to a father's house by the time of David, was made the 23d course of the priests (I Chron. 24:18).

2. A prince, son of Shemaiah, and one of those who urged King Jehoiakim not to burn the roll containing the prophecies of Jeremiah (Jer. 36:12, 25). Perhaps it is he or his grandson who is incidentally mentioned later (Neh. 6:10).

3. One of the Nethinim, and founder of a family (Ezra 2:60; Neh. 7:62).

4. A son of Elioenai (I Chron. 3:24).

De-li'lah (dê-lī'lā') [coquette; cf. Arab. dalla, to make gestures of love, to play the coquette]. The Philistine woman from the valley of Sorek who lured Samson to his ruin (Judg. 16:4-22).

De'los (dê'lōs), in A.V. De'lus (dê'lūs). A small island in the Aegean, celebrated as the birthplace of Apollo and Diana. The Roman consul Lucius wrote to Delos concerning a pact of friendship established between the Romans and the Jews (I Macc. 15:23). It was at that time the center of an extensive commerce.

Del'uge. See FLOOD.

De'mas (dê'mās). A fellow laborer of Paul, who sent salutations from Rome to the Colossians and to Philemon (Col. 4:14; Philemon 24). Afterward he deserted the apostle from unwillingness to suffer, and went to Thessalonica (II Tim. 4:10).

De-me'tri-us (dê-mê'trī-ūs) [Lat. from Gr., belonging to Demeter, the goddess of agriculture]. 1. Demetrius I, surnamed Soter, king of Syria 162-150 B.C., nephew of Antiochus Epiphanes. He had been kept as a hostage at Rome; but on hearing of his uncle's death he made his escape, and arriving safely in Antioch made himself master of the kingdom, and put to death Lysias and the young Eupator (I Macc. 7:1-4). In war with him Judas Maccabaeus lost his life (ch. 9:1-19). In 152 B.C. Alexander Balas, with the consent of the Roman senate, claimed the throne. The rivals met in a decisive battle in 150 B.C., and Demetrius was defeated and slain (I Macc. 10:48-50; Jos. Antiq. xiii. 2, 4).

2. Demetrius II, surnamed Nicator, son of Demetrius I. In 148-147 B.C. he raised the standard of revolt against Alexander Balas, aided by Ptolemy VI, defeated him (145 B.C.). Alexander fled into Arabia, where he was murdered, and Demetrius became king of Syria (I Macc. 11:15-19). But Alexander's general Tryphon almost immediately proclaimed Alexander's young son Antiochus king (vs. 39, 40). The struggle lasted until 139/8 B.C., when Demetrius, during a plundering expedition in Persia, was taken prisoner by King Arsaces and kept in bonds for 10 years. Before his departure on this expedition he gave the Jews their independence (I Macc. 13:36-42; Jos. Antiq. xiii. 4, 9). Demetrius regained liberty and the throne in 129 B.C. An Egyptian pretender, supported by Ptolemy VII, took the field against him. Demetrius was defeated near Damascus, fled to Ptolemais, and took ship to Tyre, where he was murdered (Jos. Antiq. xiii. 9, 3).

3. A silversmith at Ephesus, who made for sale silver models of the celebrated temple of Diana. Believing his craft to be in danger from Christianity, he excited his fellow workmen against Paul, and stirred up the riot in which the mob cried for two hours, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians" (Acts 19:24-41).

4. An approved Christian, commended by John also (III John 12).

De'mon [Gr. daimōn: (1) a god or deity in general; (2) one's genius; (3) one's fortune; (4) the soul of some man belonging to the golden age, now acting as a tutelary divinity; a god of inferior rank]. An evil spirit (Luke 8:29; 10:17-20). The designation is applied especially to the gods of the heathen (Deut. 32:17; Ps. 106:37; I Cor. 10:20; cf. Rev. 9:20; all R.V.), and to inferior evil spirits, subject to the Devil (A.R.V., Matt. 12:24-27; Luke 4:33; James 2:19; Rev. 16:14); see DEMONIAC.

The Jews held various notions on the subject; such as, the demons were the spirits of the wicked dead (Jos. War vii. 6, 3), and could be exorcised by means of roots and the name of Solomon (Jos. Antiq. viii. 2, 5), or driven away by fumes from the roasting heart and liver of a fish (Tobit 6:7, 16, 17).

Demo'ni-ac [Lat., possessed by a demon]. A person possessed and ruled by a demon (Matt. 4:24, R.V. marg.). The inhabitation of such a being in some cases affected the person physically, and produced certain ordinary diseases. Thus one possessed boy is described as having a deaf and dumb spirit and as being affected at intervals with morbid symptoms resembling those of epilepsy (Mark 9:14-29; cf. Matt. 17:15, 18; Luke 9:37-42). Hence the opinion of many is that possession was simply a Jewish hypothesis to account for bodily and mental diseases and for the visible effects on body and will of enslavement to sin. But this view takes no note of the fact that the demons speak (Mark 1:23, 24; 3:11, 12; 5:7); that they possessed at times knowledge beyond that of men; as, for example, of the divinity of Christ (ch. 1:24); that they recognized their own distinct individuality independent of Jesus and independent of the person possessed (Matt. 8:31); that the distant herd of swine became frenzied when the demons were cast out of the demoniac of Gadara and allowed to enter into them (vs. 30-32); that Jesus apparently recognized them as actually existing beings, and instructed his disciples, saying: "This kind can come out by nothing, save by prayer" (Mark 9:29); and that later, when the disciples reported that even the demons were subject unto them in his name, Jesus replied: "I beheld Satan fallen as lightning from heaven. . . Nevertheless in this rejoice not, that the spirits are subject unto you; but rejoice that your names are written in heaven" (Luke 10:17-20). Man was himself responsible for his hideous visitor. Probably not until a person was degraded and weakened by sin, personal or inherited, might he be taken captive by a demon (cf. I Sam. 16:14 with chs. 13:8-14; 15:10-31).

Dep'u-ty. One empowered to act for another, generally of higher rank than himself; as a regent ruling in place of a king (I Kings 22:47); an official invested with the powers and rank of a Roman consul (Acts 13:7; 18:12; 19:38, A.V.); see PROCONSUL.

Der'be (dûr'bê). A city in the s.e. part of Lycaonia, in Asia Minor. Paul was stoned and left for dead at Lystra, on his First Missionary Journey. On reviving, he went to Derbe (Acts 14:6, 20). On his Second Journey he again passed through it, and either there or at Lystra made the acquaintance of Timothy (ch. 16:1). Gaius was a native of Derbe (ch. 20:4). Sterrett located it at Zosta, but Ramsay more accurately fixed it in that neighborhood at the mound of Gudelissin in the plain about 3 miles n.w. of Zosta and 45 miles s. of Konia (Iconium).

Des'ert. 1. A rendering of Heb. midbâr and Gr. erêmos, an uncultivated, uncultivated plain, where wild beasts roam at will (Job 24:5); often terrible in its solitude and desolation (Deut. 32:10; A.V., Isa. 21:1), yet also capable of affording pasturage (Ex. 3:1, A.V.). The words are usually rendered wilderness (Gen. 16:7; 21:20; I Sam. 17:28; 25:21; Matt. 3:1; Mark 1:13; Luke 15:4).

2. A rendering of Heb. ârâbâh, arid region (Isa. 35:1, 6; 51:3). With the definite article the word specially denotes the plain of the Jordan and Dead Sea (Ezek. 47:8; II Sam. 2:29), and is rendered in R.V. as a proper name, Arabah.

3. A rendering of Heb. yeshimôn, a waste, a desolation (Ps. 78:40; 106:14; Isa. 43:19, 20). When the definite article is prefixed it is rendered as a proper name, Jeshimon (Num. 21:20, A.V. and marg. R.V.).

4. A rendering of Heb. hârâbôth, waste, desolate places (Isa. 48:21). R.V., Ps. 102:6; Ezek. 13:4, waste places.

Deu'el (dû'êl) [knowledge of God; or invocation of God; cf. Arab. da'â, call aloud]. A Gadite, the father of Eliasaph (Num. 1:14; 7:42; 10:20). Called in ch. 2:14 Reuel, which means "friend of God." It is uncertain which of these 2 forms is correct. The Samaritan text has "Deuel" everywhere, whereas the LXX and the Peshitta read "Reuel"; see DALETH, REUEL.

Deu'ter-on'o-my (dû'têr-ôn'ô-mî) [Lat., from Gr., repetition of the law]. The name, derived from the LXX, of the 5th book of the Pentateuch. The Gr. word, of which Deuteronomy is the English form, is used in the LXX to translate "copy of this law" in Deut. 17:18. But this book is not merely the repetition or copy of laws already given. It is a rehearsal under peculiar circumstances and for a special purpose. In Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers, the legislation is represented as in process of enactment, the occasion or the time when the successive installments were received is commonly stated, and each body of statutes is severally declared to proceed from God. In Deuteronomy, on the other hand, the law is represented, not as being enacted, but as being rehearsed and expounded. Thirty-eight years have elapsed since the greater part of the old legislation was given. The new generation, on the eve of taking possession of Canaan, is summoned to hear the law of the nation, to be instructed in the application of its principles to the new circumstances which await them, to have their apprehension of its spirituality quickened, and then to renew intelligently the covenant made with their fathers. Instead of the Lord speaking unto Moses, it is now Moses, at the command of God, speaking to the people (chs. 1:1-4; 5:1; 29:1). The book consists first and mainly of an address delivered in 3 installments, committed to writing, and solemnly ratified as a covenant (chs. 1 to 30).

First Address, chs. 1:6 to 4:40; with supplementary statement, vs. 41-49: Rehearsal of the history of the people since the covenant was made with the preceding generation at Sinai as a motive for obedience to Jehovah's laws. The speaker is declared to be Moses (ch. 1:1, 3, 5, 9, 15, 16, 19, etc.). The date is the 40th year, 11th month, 1st day; after the smiting of Sihon and Og, and after the sin in the matter of Baal-peor (chs. 1:3, 4; 4:3) beyond Jordan in the land of Moab (ch. 1:5; cf. Num. 33:48; 35:1), in the wilderness, in the Arabah (Deut. 1:1; cf. Num. 23:28; 24:1). The phrase "beyond Jordan" or "other side of Jordan" was ambiguous and required precise definition. To Abraham and the Canaanites it meant the country e. of the river; and as an established geographical term it meant the same to Abraham's descendants. They had arrived there; but they still called the place where they were by the old inherited designation "the other side of Jordan," just as they called the neighboring bluffs Abarim or "mountains of the other side." And the people felt, too, that they were on the other side of Jordan, outside of the Promised Land. But with the river in front of them the phrase was ambiguous, hence its repeated elucidation by some expression like "in the land of Moab."

Second Address, chs. 5 to 26: Rehearsal of statutes which concerned the people, with emphasis on the spirituality of the laws and urgent insistence upon their observance. These statutes are generally either substantive laws, that is, rights and duties (the procedure not being rehearsed), or else laws which natural depravity might lead men to ignore and where the appeal must be to religious motives: such as, asylum for the unintentional murderer, banishment of idolatry, and consideration for the weaker members and dependent classes of the community. The speaker is Moses (ch. 5:1, 5, 22); the date is at the end of the forty years, on the eve of crossing the Jordan, after Balaam's prophecy (chs. 8:2; 9:1; 11:31; 23:4).

Third Address, chs. 27; 28: Conclusion of the preceding: 1. Provision for writing the law on plastered stones on Mount Ebal. 2. Blessings and curses annexed to obedience and disobedience respectively. This great address is closely followed by a brief address (chs. 29; 30) at the ratification of the covenant as thus proclaimed (chs. 29:1; 30:1). This covenant, like the words of the former one made at Horeb, was recorded in a book (chs. 29:20, 21, 27; 30:10; cf. Ex. 24:4-8). The place and date are alluded to in Deut. 29:1, 5, 7, 8.

After delivering the address which forms the body of the book of Deuteronomy, Moses publicly appointed Joshua to be his successor and gave a formal charge to him (ch. 31:1-8). Moses delivered the written Law to the priests with a charge regarding its public reading (vs. 9-13). He repaired with Joshua to the tabernacle that Joshua might be charged by Jehovah, and was there instructed to prepare a song for the people (vs. 14-23). He prepared and wrote the song (v. 22), charged the Levites who bore the Ark to put the completed book, which contained law and song, beside the Ark for a witness (vs. 24-29), ordered an assembly called to hear and learn the song (v. 28), and repeated it publicly (chs. 31:30 to 32:47). Moses' farewell (chs. 32:48 to 33:29) and death (ch. 34).

The distinctive feature of Deuteronomy is the evident preparation for the settlement in Canaan. 1. It affects the language. For example, the people are about to live a settled life; hence the camp which figures so largely, though of course not exclusively, in the former legislation disappears from Deuteronomy, except where reference is made to future war or to the encampment at Shittim where they then are. The speaker mentions houses, towns, city gates. 2. It leads to minor modifications of existing laws to adapt them to the new mode of life. For example, the law which required animals that were slain for food to be brought to the door of the tabernacle is changed to permit the people to slay for food in the town where they reside (cf. Deut. 12:15, 21 with Lev. 17:3, 4); and for the same reason the firstling of animals need no longer be offered to God on the 8th day, but the sacrifice may be postponed until the owner comes up from his distant home to the sanctuary at the annual feasts (cf. Deut. 15:20 with Ex. 22:30); and in the case of the Hebrew bondman who wishes to remain attached to the household of his master, rather than claim his legal freedom, the ceremony at the doorpost suffices, and there is no longer insistence upon appearance before God (cf. Deut. 15:17 with Ex. 21:6). 3. It leads to the attempt to safeguard the interests of the dependent classes, the Levites, widows, orphans, strangers, and to protect them from the evils which evidently threatened to befall them in the future, in view of the spirit of self-seeking and indifference to others that had been manifested by the people time and again during the sojourn in the wilderness. 4. It leads to insistence upon one altar for the nation in the place where Jehovah shall record his name. The unity of the altar was intended to counteract the tendency to lapse into idolatry, by preventing the people from worshipping at the numerous local sanctuaries of the Canaanites; to render the worship of Jehovah a grander spectacle and of greater pomp than the rites of the idols of the Canaanites by uniting the numbers and the wealth of the Hebrews; and to give strength to the communal feeling and aid in binding the nation together. The spirit of jealousy between individuals and between tribes, the popular proneness to idolatry, and the willingness of large sections of the people to separate from their brethren and settle in attractive pastoral regions had already become manifest. The old law of the one altar is emphatically insisted upon at this crisis. It was essential to the unity of the nation and continuance of the theocracy. See ALTAR.

It has been urged that no distinction is made in Deuteronomy between priests and Levites such as appears in the legislation of Leviticus and Numbers. The priests are frequently called "the priests the Levites," and the passage Deut. 18:1-8, if it be isolated, may be interpreted to mean that any Levite might become a priest. But: 1. The tribe of Levi is indeed assigned priestly functions (Deut. 10:6; 18:1-8; 33:8, 9). That is correct, for the tribe as a whole was called to holy service, especially to priestly service. Even when the distinction between the priests and the lower order of the Levites was firmly established, the tribe as a whole is spoken of as priestly (I Kings 12:31; Mal. 2:1-4; 3:3; cf. Heb. 7:11). 2. The title "the priests the Levites" occurs in writings which were composed after the legislation of Leviticus was in full force. It is used by Ezekiel (Ezek. 43:19; 44:15) and by the Chronicler (II Chron. 23:18; 30:27). It should also be remembered that Jeremiah uses the expression (Jer. 33:18, 21). 3. Deuteronomy is based on previous priestly legislation, for it presupposes the technical laws of the ritual. The speaker explicitly refers to former laws on the subject of which he is speaking, and these laws are known only from the books of Leviticus and Numbers (cf. Deut. 18:1, 2 with Num. 18:20; Deut. 24:8, 9 with Lev., chs. 13; 14; Num., ch. 12), or he makes allusions which imply these laws (cf. Deut. 12:15 with Lev. 17:3 seq.). 4. The passage Deut. 18:1-8 may be readily interpreted on the assumption that the laws of Leviticus were in force. Levi was to have no inheritance with Israel, but was to enjoy certain perquisites (Lev. 6:17, 18; Num. 18:20, 21, 24, 26). The speaker presses this law with earnestness. The priests the Levites, the whole tribe of Levi, have no inheritance; they shall eat the offerings (Deut. 18:1). The dues of the priests, without the epithet "the Levites," are next spoken of. It is an urgent matter. The people must not defraud the priests of their income (cf. Deut. 18:3, 4 with Ex. 29:27, 28; Lev. 7:34; Num. 18:11, 12, where slight changes are introduced). Finally, the rights of the Levites at the sanctuary are dwelt upon. If a Levite—not necessarily a Levite of lower rank—come from any part of the country to the sanctuary, he shall minister in the name of the Lord as all his brethren the Levites do, which stand before the Lord, and he shall fare as they do (Deut. 18:6-8). The kind of service which he shall perform is not the matter at issue. The language covers both priestly service and the labors rendered by the lower order of the Levites (Deut. 17:12; 18:5; I Sam. 2:11, 18; 3:1; II Chron. 23:6; 29:4, 5, 11). The point insisted upon is that all Levites shall receive full recognition at the sanctuary and be accorded their prerogatives. It goes without saying that if the Levite be a priest, he shall serve and fare like his brethren the priests; if he be not a priest, he shall enjoy the privileges that belong to his brethren who are Levites but not priests. Those in power shall not deprive him of his prerogatives because he is obscure and from a distant part of the country. See PRIEST.

Dev'il (Gr. diabolos, slanderer). 1. An evil spirit (A.V. of Mark 1:34; Luke 4:33; 8:29). A.V. and E.R.V. (text) do not observe the distinction made in the Greek original between a demon and the Devil. Demons take possession of wicked men and are subject to the Devil (Matt. 4:24; 12:24); see DEMONIAIC. 2. The Evil One, Satan, the greatest of all the fallen spirits (Rev. 12:9; Matt. 4:8-11; 13:38, 39; 25:41; cf. Jude 6). The general opinion is that the sin into which he fell was pride (I Tim. 3:6). He is the great enemy of God and man (I Peter 5:8; I John 3:8), who tempted Christ and incites men to sin (Matt. 4:1; John 13:2). He is that old "serpent" who tempted Eve (II Cor. 11:3; Rev. 12:9; 20:2). Perhaps with reference to this transaction he is called a murderer from the beginning, and a liar, and the father of lies (John 8:44; cf. I John 3:8). When the good seed of truth is sown the Devil either steals it away (Luke 8:12) or sows tares (Matt. 13:38). He is continually going about like a roaring lion seeking whom he may devour (I Peter 5:8). He lays snares or practices wiles to injure the children of God (Eph. 6:11; II Tim. 2:26), and seduces them by his subtlety (II Cor. 11:3); but the person tempted is not to yield to him, but to resist him, and he will flee (Eph. 4:27; James 4:7). He had power to produce demoniacal possession (Acts 10:38), and he instigated the imprisonment of martyrs (Rev. 2:10). He is finally to be cast into a lake of everlasting fire prepared for the Devil and his angels (Matt. 25:41; cf. Jude 6). Pre-eminently sinful, unrighteous men, also those imbued with the spirit of lying and murder, are figuratively called children of the Devil (John 8:44; I John 3:8, 10). Judas was even called by Jesus a devil (John 6:70). His works Christ came to destroy (I John 3:8). Jude alludes to a dispute of the Devil with Michael for the body of Moses (Jude 9; cf. Rev. 12:7). Jude has been thought to quote an authoritative teaching of the Jewish Church, or a familiar interpretation of Zech., ch. 3, according to which the high priest represents Mosaism. More probably he drew this information from the apocryphal work, the Assumption of Moses.

Devote'. See ANATHEMA.

Dew. Moisture condensed from the atmosphere upon cold bodies. Used in Scripture figuratively for whatever comes noiselessly and even invisibly, but proves a refreshment and a blessing, as dew does to vegetation (Deut. 32:2; Ps. 110:3; Prov. 19:12; Micah 5:7).

Di'a-dem. 1. The rendering of Heb. šānūph, šānūph, something bound round. It was a headdress for man and woman (Job 29:14, R.V. marg., turban; Isa. 3:23, in A.V. hoods, R.V. turbans). A royal diadem of this type was worn by kings (Isa. 62:3), and is once mentioned as worn by the high priest (Zech. 3:5), where it is translated miter, but R.V. marg., turban (also, diadem, E.R.V.).

2. A rendering of Heb. mišneheth, a name applied specially to the miter of the Jewish high priest (Ezek. 21:26, A.V.), and regularly translated so.

3. The rendering of Heb. šephirāh, circlet, crown (Isa. 28:5).

Di'al. An instrument consisting of a surface which is graduated into hour lines, and furnished with a projecting gnomon to cast a shadow as the sun advances in its daily course, and thus indicate the hours. The dial of Ahaz (II Kings 20:11; Isa. 38:8) may have been such an instrument, with either flat or concave dial and with graduated lines called steps or degrees, which Ahaz had introduced from Babylonia, where the sundial was in use before the time of Herodotus (Herod. ii. 109), and at least as early as the 8th century B.C. It may, however, have been a flight of steps (Jos. Antiq. x. 2, 1) at the palace of Ahaz, so designed and arranged that the shadow of an obelisk near by passed over the steps and thus indicated the time of day. Heb. ma'ālōth, translated dial, is the same word as is rendered "steps" 5 times in II Kings 20:9-11 (R.V. text) and 3 times in Isa. 38:8 (R.V. text). The recession of the shadow on the dial of Ahaz may be explained as caused by refraction of the sun's rays, or by a solar eclipse. II Chron. 32:31 ("the wonder that was done in the land") seems to treat it as a local marvel.

Di'amond. A mineral of unequaled hardness and luster, transparent or translucent, and capable of taking a splendid polish. It is simply crystallized carbon.

Diamond is the rendering of:

1. Heb. yahālōm, a precious stone (Ezek. 28:13), one of those in the breastplate of the high priest (Ex. 28:18, R.V. marg., sardonyx; 39:11).

2. Heb. šāmīr, a hard stone used to point graving instruments (Jer. 17:1); elsewhere rendered "adamant" (Ezek. 3:9; Zech. 7:12).

Dian'a (dī-ān'ā). The Roman goddess of the moon. She corresponded to the Greek Artemis, who was twin sister of Apollo, and huntress of the sky. She was the ideal of chastity and virginity, and is generally represented as a tall and beautiful maiden, with a quiver on her shoulder and a bow or a javelin in her right hand, and as engaged in hunting deer. The Asiatic Artemis, Diana of Ephesus, had no connection with the Diana (or Artemis) of classical mythology, but was the mother-goddess of Asia Minor, known as Cybele, Magna Mater, and Ma. See ASHTORETH and ATARGATIS. Her image was supposed to have fallen from heaven (Acts 19:35), and it may have been originally a meteoric stone. Its form is known from ancient coins as the rude figure of a woman with crowned head, many breasts, and extended arms supported by props. Her primitive shrine near the sea, at the mouth of the Cayster, became eventually an imposing temple (see EPHEBUS). Demetrius the silversmith and his fellow craftsmen made silver models of it (Acts 19:24).

Coin Showing the Temple of Diana

Dias'po-ra (dī-ās'pō-rā). See DISPERSION.

Dib'lah (dīb'lā), in A.V. Dib'lath [rounded mass, cake]. A place in Palestine (Ezek. 6:14), which has not been located. The name probably should be changed to Riblah, a reading which has the authority of some MSS. quoted by Ginsburg in his edition of the Hebrew O.T. The expression "from the wilderness toward Diblah" should accordingly be understood as "from the wilderness to Riblah," i.e., from the farthest s. to the ideal boundary in the n. The latter has been described as "the entrance of Hamath" (cf. Ezek. 47:16; 48:1). In this case, Riblah, which is about 50 miles s. of Hamath, is used perhaps on account of its painful associations (II Kings 23:33; 25:6 seq., 20 seq.). For possible confusion of R and D, see the table of the alphabet.

Dib-la'im (dīb-lā'im) [twin fig cakes]. A parent-in-law to Hosea, if the transaction was real and not typical (Hos. 1:3).

Dib'lath (dīb'lāth). See DIBLAH.

Dī'bon (dī'bōn) [a wasting away]. 1. A town n. of the Arnon, wrested from Moab by the Amorites, taken by the Israelites (Num. 21:30; 32:3), rebuilt by the Gadites (ch. 32:34), and hence called Dibon-gad (ch. 33:45, 46), afterward given over to the tribe of Reuben (Josh. 13:9, 17). It reverted to the Moabites (Moabite Stone, 21, 28, see MOABITE STONE; Isa. 15:2; Jer. 48:18, 22). It still exists, as a heap of ruins, retaining its old name Dhibān, 3 miles n. of the Arnon, n.w. of 'Ara'ir. It was among the ruins of Dibon that in 1868 the Moabite Stone was found (q.v.).

2. A village in the territory of Judah (Neh. 11:25). See DIMONAH.

Dī'bon-gad' (dī'bōn-gād'). See DIBON 1.

Dīb'ri (dīb'ri) [loquacious]. A Danite, ancestor of him who was stoned to death in the days of Moses for blaspheming the Name (Lev. 24:11-14).

Did'y-mus (dīd'y-mūs) [Lat. from Gr., a twin]. See THOMAS.

Dik'lah (dīk'lā) [cf. neo-Heb. dekel; Aram. diklā, palm tree; Arab. daḡal, a species of poor dates]. A people descended from Joktan (Gen. 10:27; I Chron. 1:21), and who doubtless dwelt in Arabia.

Dil'ean (dīl'ē-ān), in E.R.V. and J.V. Dil'an (dīl'ān). A town in the lowland of Judah (Josh. 15:38); identified with Tell en-Nejileh.

Dill. See ANISE.

Dim'nah (dīm'nā). See RIMMON, I. 3.

Dim'on (dīm'mōn) [probably a variant of Dibon]. A place in Moab (Isa. 15:9); apparently Dibon, by an interchange of labials. Jerome states that in his day both names were common for the town. The form with m is chosen for the sake of an alliteration with dam (blood) used in the same verse. The waters of Dibon are best regarded as the Arnon, as the waters of Megiddo are the Kishon (Judg. 5:19).

Di-mo'nah (dī-mō'nā). A town in the Negeb, near Edom (Josh. 15:22), probably the same as Dibon (Neh. 11:25), and is to be sought near Kēbāb, n.e. of 'Ar'ara and e. of Tell el-Milh.

Dī'nah (dī'nā) [judgment or, perhaps, judged]. A daughter of Jacob by his wife Leah (Gen. 30:21). Going out apparently unprotected to see the Canaanite daughters of the land, she was either led astray or outraged by Shechem, the son of Hamor the Hivite. The young prince afterward wished to take her in honorable marriage, and her brothers apparently consented, on condition that the Hivites should be circumcised. These acquiesced in the stipulation, and carried it out; but an attack on their town was suddenly made by Simeon and Levi, 2 of Dinah's full brothers, who slew all the males in the place, Hamor and Shechem among the rest (Gen. 34:1-29). Jacob took no part in the treacherous and cruel deed, regarded it as inexpedient (v. 30), and denounced it with horror on his deathbed (ch. 49:5-7). By this act of his sons, however, the conquered district fell to him as head of the tribe, and he bequeathed it, not to those who were answerable for the abhorred deed, but to Joseph (Gen. 48:22).

Dī'na-ites (dī'nā-its). One of the foreign tribes settled in Samaria to replace the 10 tribes carried into captivity (Ezra 4:9). Probably the Armenian people who were known to the Assyrians as Dayani.

Din'ha-bah (dīn'hā-bā) [perhaps, give judgment]. The city of Bela, king of Edom (Gen. 36:32; I Chron. 1:43). Location uncertain. Jerome identified it with Dannaia, modern Khirbet ed-Denn, a town in Moab, a little s. of the Arnon.

Din'ner. See MEALS.

Dī'ny'si-us (dī'ō-nīsh'ūs) [Lat. from Gr., belonging to the god Dionysos]. A member of the Athenian supreme court, or Areopagus, who was converted through the preaching of Paul on Mars' Hill, where the court held its sittings (Acts 17:34).

Dī'ot'rephes (dī-ōt'rē-fēz) [Gr., nurtured by Zeus]. A member of the church of which Gaius, to whom John sent his Third Epistle, was a member. He loved to have the pre-eminence in the church to which he belonged, refused to receive the Apostle John or the brethren who went forth for the sake of the Name, and excommunicated those who entertained them (III John 9, 10).

Dī'phath (dī'fāth). See RIPHATH.

Dis'ci'ple. A pupil or scholar (Matt. 10:24); especially the follower of a public teacher, like John the Baptist (ch. 9:14). A person taught of God (Isa. 8:16). It is used of all of whatever age who in faith received the divine Master's instructions (Matt. 10:42; Luke 14:26, 27, 33; John 4:1; 6:66), and especially of the 12 apostles (Matt. 5:1; 8:23; 10:1; 12:1, etc.).

Diseas'es. Disease arises from the violation of physical or mental laws. The observance of these laws is often a moral act, and their transgression is sin (Prov. 23:29-32); so that disease is in certain cases the punishment imposed by the Creator for sin. God, moreover, sometimes smites a sinner with disease where no natural cause can be traced (Ex. 9:8 seq.; Num. 11:33; 12:9-11; Deut. 28:21-60; II Sam. 21:1; 24:15; II Kings 5:27). From the connection between sin and various diseases, the latter are sometimes attributed to Satan, who seduced the race to its fall into sin and who is still the great tempter to sin (Luke 13:16); but the inference is not legitimate that every disease is caused directly by sin or that Satan is the immediate cause of our maladies (Job, chs. 3 to 42; John 9:1-3). Various human diseases are mentioned, such as fever (Deut. 28:22; Matt. 8:14; John 4:52; Jos. Antiq. xiii. 15, 5), cutaneous disease (Lev. 13:6-8, 30, 39), dysentery (II Chron. 21:15, 18; Acts 28:8, R.V.), ophthalmia (Rev. 3:18; Tobit 2:10; 6:8; 11:13), boils (Ex. 9:9; I Sam. 5:6), paralysis (I Macc. 9:55; Matt. 8:6; 9:2; Acts 9:33).

Dī'shan (dī'shān) [pygarg, antelope]. A Horite tribe (Gen. 36:21, 28) under a chief (v. 30).

Dī'shon (dī'shōn) [pygarg, antelope]. A Horite tribe (Gen. 36:21, 26, 28; I Chron. 1:38), organized under a chief (Gen. 36:30), and descended through Anah from Zibeon (vs. 24, 25). Many interpreters, however, discover 2 persons of this name: one in vs. 20, 26, 30, the other in v. 25.

Dis'per'sion. Translation of Gr. diaspora; the body of Israelites scattered abroad in other lands than their own (Jer. 25:34; John 7:35; James 1:1). Dispersion was threatened as a penalty if the people departed from the Mosaic Law (Lev. 26:14, 33; Deut. 4:27; 28:64-68). The captivity of the 10 tribes and that of the 2 largely helped to fulfill these prophecies; for the mass of the 10 tribes were never restored to their own land, and of the 2 a very large number chose to remain in the region to which they had been taken rather than return to their own country. A very considerable immigration of Jews took place into the cities and towns of Alexander the Great's empire, and into the kingdoms of Egypt, Syria, etc., into which it was afterward divided; and later when the Roman Empire established its sway over these and other regions, colonies of Jews sought a settlement in all the important places. Agrippa, in a letter to Calgula preserved by Philo, says: "Jerusalem is the capital not alone of Judea but, by means of colonies, of most other lands also. These colonies have been sent out at fitting opportunities into the neighboring countries of Egypt, Phoenicia, Syria, Coelestria, and the farther removed Pamphylia, Cilicia, the greater part of Asia as far as Bithynia and the most remote corners of Pontus. In the same manner also into Europe: Thessaly, Boeotia, Macedon, Aetolia, Attica, Argos, Corinth, and the most and finest parts of the Peloponnesus. And not only is the mainland full of Israelitish communities, but also the most important islands: Euboea, Cyprus, Crete. And I say nothing of the countries beyond the Euphrates, for all of them, with unimportant exceptions, Babylon and the satrapies that include the fertile districts lying around it, have Jewish inhabitants." Thus the Dispersion, with synagogue and doctrine, was found in all parts of the known world (Acts 2:5-11; I Peter 1:1; Jos. War vii. 3, 3).

Divination. The attempt to read the future and utter soothsaying either by a kind of inspiration or afflatus (Acts 16:16), or else by means of signs. In the latter sense, it includes augury or foretelling the future by means of natural signs, such as the flight of birds, the disposition of the liver (Ezek. 21:21); hydromancy or foretelling from the appearance of water poured into a vessel or of objects dropped into the water (Gen. 44:5); foretelling by casting lots (Ezek. 21:21); and astrology or the determination of the supposed influence of the stars on the destiny of a person or a nation (cf. Isa. 47:13). The Hebrews also included in divination necromancy or foretelling the future by calling up the spirits of the dead and conversing with them (I Sam. 28:8). The Babylonians were famous for liver divination (hepatoscopy). The diviner sometimes pronounced blessing or cursing (Num. 22:6) as prophecy revealed by the afflatus or familiar spirit or the sign (vs. 12, 13).

Di-vin'er. A soothsayer; a practitioner of divination. They were numerous among heathen nations (Deut. 18:9-12; I Sam. 6:2; Isa. 19:3; Ezek. 21:21; Dan. 2:2; Acts 16:16), and also at various times among the Israelites, who were informed of the diviner's imposture, warned against placing reliance in him, and threatened with punishment for the sin of consulting him (Lev. 19:31; 20:6, 27; Deut. 18:10; I Sam. 28:8; Isa. 2:6; 3:2; R.V.; Jer. 27:9; 29:8; Ezek. 13:23; 22:28; Micah 3:6, 7, 11; Zech. 10:2). He practiced his art for hire (Num. 22:7, 17, 18; Acts 16:16).

Di-vice', Di-voice'ment. Annulment of the bonds of matrimony. Under the Law of Moses a man could divorce his wife if he found some unseemly thing in her. She might then be married to another man. If her second husband also divorced her, the first one was not allowed to take her again. The process of divorce, when once resolved upon, was easy. All the husband had to do was to give his partner a bill of divorcement, and send her away (Deut. 24:1-4; cf. Isa. 50:1; Jer.

3:8). Our Lord explained that this enactment was framed only on account of the Israelites' hardness of heart. He added that the original and just law, that of nature, is that a man cleave to his wife and they twain become one flesh, marriage being a permanent compact; and that a wife should not be divorced except for fornication, including what is now technically called adultery. If a man puts away his wife on other grounds and marries another, he commits adultery. If anyone marries a divorced woman, he also has committed the same sin (Matt. 5:31, 32; 19:3-9; Mark 10:2-12; Luke 16:18; cf. I Cor. 7:10-17).

Di'-za-hab (dī'zā-hāb), A.V. Di'za-hab [having gold]. A place cited to indicate the locality and circumstances connected with the farewell addresses of Moses (Deut. 1:1). Location uncertain. Edh-Dheilbeh, e. of Heshbon, has been proposed; near el-'Al there is Rujm Umm edh-Dhahab. Perhaps Di-zahab was a district in Edom identical with Me-zahab (Gen. 36:39; cf. LXX of Num. 21:14, which has Zahab for Vaheb of R.V.).

Do'dai (dō'dī). See Dodo 2.

Do'da-nim (dō'dā-nīm) [Dodanites]. Fourth son of Javan (Gen. 10:4). The LXX and the Samaritan text (Gen. 10:4), as well as the Hebrew (Masoretic) text in I Chron. 1:7, have Rodanim, which seems to be the correct reading. See RODANIM.

Do'da-va'hu (dō'dā-vā'hū), in A.V. Do'da-vah (dō'dā-vā) [beloved of Jehovah, or Jehovah is a Friend]. A man from Mareshah, father of that Eliezer who prophesied the destruction of Jehoshaphat's ships (II Chron. 20:37).

Do'do (dō'dō) [contraction of Dodavahu]. 1. A man of Issachar, ancestor of the judge Tola (Judg. 10:1).

2. An Ahobite, and the father of Eleazar, one of David's 3 mighty men of the 1st rank (II Sam. 23:9, R.V., following the Kethib of the Hebrew text, Dodai; I Chron. 11:12). David appointed Dodai (or probably his son) as military commander over the course of the 2d month (I Chron. 27:4).

3. A man of Bethlehem, father of Elhanan, one of David's mighty men (II Sam. 23:24; I Chron. 11:26).

Doe. A female deer or antelope. In Prov. 5:19, R.V., it is the female ibex or wild goat of Sinai (Capra bedou), in Hebrew ya'āldh. See ROE, GOAT.

Do'eg (dō'ēg) [timid]. An Edomite, the chief of Saul's herdsman (I Sam. 21:7). He was at Nob at the tabernacle, detained before the Lord on account of a vow or uncleanness or signs of leprosy (Lev. 14:4, 11, 21), or was perhaps in sanctuary for some crime (cf. I Kings 1:50), when David, a fugitive from Saul's court, arrived at Nob and obtained food and a sword from Ahimelech, who did not know that he was fleeing from the king (Psalm 52, title). Doeg subsequently told Saul what had occurred, which so excited the king that he summoned Ahimelech and fellow priests and demanded an explanation. Not considering it satisfactory, he ordered the guard to kill the priests. They would not. The king then bade Doeg do the deed. He did so, slaying 85 men. He subsequently fell upon the village, massacred the women and children, and destroyed even the cattle (I Sam. 22:7-23).

Dog. During the earlier period of Bible history the dog is described as prowling about the streets and suburbs of cities (Ps. 59:6, 14), feeding on what was thrown out to it (Ex. 22:31), licking up blood when it was shed (I Kings 22:38; Ps. 68:23), or devouring dead bodies (I Kings 14:11; 16:4; II Kings 9:35, 36); even sometimes congregating in packs, to surround and attack human beings (Ps. 22:16, 20). It was early trained sufficiently to aid the shepherd in protecting the flock against beasts of prey and thieves (Job 30:1). It was at length sometimes domesticated, accompanied its master from place to place (Tobit 5:16; 11:4), and was in the house with him and picked up the crumbs from under his table (Mark 7:28). Moreover, dogs licked the sores of beggars at the rich man's gate (Luke 16:21). The dog was also widely used by the ancients for hunting. But the great mass of dogs ran wild. On account of their food and habits, they were deemed unclean; and to call one a dog was a gross insult (I Sam. 17:43; II Kings 8:13). The term dog is applied in a figurative sense to those who are incapable of appreciating what is high or holy (Matt. 7:6), who introduce false doctrines with cynical effrontery (Phil. 3:2), who, like a dog returning to its vomit, go back to sins which nominally they had renounced forever (II Peter 2:22; cf. Prov. 26:11), or who are so vile as to submit to lust like dogs (Deut. 23:18). The later Jews were accustomed to call the heathen dogs because ceremonially unclean; and even Jesus once employed the term in order vividly to express his doctrine of grace (Matt. 15:26; Mark 7:27).

Dok (dök), in A.V. Do'eus (dō'küś) [cf. Syriac dūk, observe]. A little stronghold near Jericho, built by Ptolemy (I Macc. 16:15), son-in-law of Simon Maccabaeus (vs. 11, 12); Josephus calls it Dagon. Into this castle he received Simon and 2 of his sons, and then treacherously slew them (v. 16). The murder was avenged by John Hyrcanus, a 3d son of Simon. He besieged Dok, and after a time Ptolemy fled beyond Jordan (Jos. Antiq. xiii. 8, 1; War i. 2, 3). The name seems to remain in 'Ain Duk, a copious spring about 4 miles n.w. of Jericho.

Doph'kah (dōf'ká). A station of the Israelites on the route to Sinai between the Red Sea and Rephidim (Num. 33:12, 13). Serābit el Khādem or a place near the wadi Megharet has been suggested.

Dor (dōr) [habitation]. A town of the Canaanites on the Mediterranean (Josh. 11:2; I Macc. 15:11), about 8 miles n. of Caesarea. Joshua defeated its king (Josh. 12:1, 23). It lay in the territory of Asher; but was given to the tribe of Manasseh (ch. 17:11), which, however, did not expel the Canaanites (Judg. 1:27). About 1190 it fell into the hands of the Zakkalu, a people with the Philistines included in the "Peoples of the Sea"; they were still there in the days of Ramesses XII. The region about Dor was one of Solomon's tax districts (I Kings 4:11). In the latter half of the 4th century B.C. Sidon obtained Dor and Joppa. In 217 B.C. Antiochus the Great besieged it (Polybius 566); and about 138 B.C. Antiochus VII invested it by land and sea (I Macc. 15:11-14; Jos. Antiq. xiii. 7, 2). In the days of Alexander Jannaeus it was held for a time by the tyrant Zolius (Jos. Antiq. xiii. 12, 2). In 64 B.C. Pompey granted it autonomy (Jos. Antiq. xiv. 4, 4). In 56 B.C. it was rebuilt by Gabinus (Jos. Antiq. xiv. 5, 3). Remains of Dor are found at el-Burj, a short distance n. of eṭ-Ṭanṭūra.

Dor'cas (dōr'kās) [Gr. for Aram. ḥēbithā, gazelle]. Tabitha, a Christian woman of Joppa, a friend and helper of the poor. At her death, Peter was sent for, who, after prayer, bade her arise, and her life returned. The fame thereof spread, and many believed on the Lord (Acts 9:36-43). Dorcas societies are sewing circles for the poor, named from her.

Do'than (dō'thān) [possibly wells]. A town, known also as Dothain and Dothaim, not far from Shechem and Samaria, hard by a caravan route (Gen. 37:14, 17, 25; II Kings 6:13), near the Plain of Esdraelon and a pass into the hill country of Judah (Judith 4:6, 7). Joseph was cast into a pit in the vicinity, whence he was taken out and sold to the Midianites (Gen. 37:17-28). Elisha was once besieged in the town by the Syrians; but the soldiers of the beleaguering army were miraculously struck with blindness, led to Samaria, had their vision restored, and were finally sent home without molestation (II Kings 6:8-23). Its site is Tell Dōthān, near a well 9½ miles n., slightly e., of Samaria.

Dove. A bird (Ps. 55:6) having a plaintive voice (Isa. 38:14), a gentle, affectionate disposition (S. of Sol. 2:14; 5:2; 6:9), but not much sagacity (Hos. 7:11). It is timid, and when frightened trembles. When wild it sometimes frequents valleys (Ezek. 7:16), making its nest in the side of holes or fissures (Jer. 48:28). When domesticated it flies when alarmed to windows or cotes (Isa. 60:8; cf. Gen. 8:8-12). Jesus refers to it as proverbially harmless (Matt. 10:16). It was bought and sold within the Temple courts (Matt. 21:12; Mark 11:15; John 2:14), for it was used in sacrifice (Luke 2:24). The dove is a symbol of the Holy Spirit (Luke 3:22).

Dove is but another name for pigeon, though in popular usage it is usually restricted to the smaller species. It is frequently translated pigeon in the English versions (Gen. 15:9; Lev. 1:14; 5:7, 11; 12:6, 8; 14:22, 30; 15:14, 29; Num. 6:10).

The doves constitute a family of birds (Columbidae), of which Tristram enumerates four species as occurring in Palestine: the ringdove or wood pigeon (Columba palumbus), the stock dove (Columba oenas), the rock dove (Columba livia), and the ash-rumped rock dove (Columba schimperi). The ringdove visits Palestine in immense flocks in spring and autumn during its annual migrations; individuals also remain all the winter. The stock dove is found chiefly e. of the Jordan, or in the valley of that river. The rock dove is abundant on the coast and in the highlands w. of the Jordan. The ash-rumped rock dove is exceedingly abundant in the interior of the country and in the Jordan Valley, taking refuge in caves and fissures. It is the species described in Jer. 48:28.

Dove's Dung. A substance which rose to famine prices during the siege of Samaria by Ben-hadad (II Kings 6:25). Dung was also eaten during the siege of Jerusalem (Jos. War v. 13, 7).

Dow'ry. Among the Israelites and neighboring nations a bridegroom or his father paid a dowry to the bride's father to induce him to give her in marriage (Gen. 29:15-20; 34:12; Ex. 22:17; I Sam. 18:25). The lowest legal amount seems to have been 50 shekels (Deut. 22:29). Occasionally the bride's father gave his daughter a wedding present (Josh. 15:19; I Kings 9:16).

Drag'on [Gr. drakōn, dragon]. In the O.T. the word dragon is often used to translate tannin. Tannin denotes a land serpent (Ex. 7:9; cf. 4:3, 4; Ps. 91:13; and doubtless Deut. 32:33), great sea animals (plural, Gen. 1:21, in A.V. whales, in R.V. sea monsters; Ps. 74:13; 148:7), and the crocodile of the rivers of Egypt (Ezek. 29:3). The last is described as having jaws, and scales to which fish could stick (v. 4), and feet with which it disturbed the waters (ch. 32:2), as lying in the sea and in the branches of the Nile (ch. 29:3; 32:2), as swimming (v. 6), and as taken with great hooks (ch. 29:4) and with nets (ch. 32:3). It is used as a symbol for Egypt (Isa. 51:9; and probably 27:1).

The R.V. recognizes that tan, rendered "dragon" in A.V. of Job 30:29; Ps. 44:19; Isa. 13:22; 34:13; 35:7; 43:20; Jer. 9:11; 10:22; 14:6; 49:33; 51:37; Micah 1:8, and "sea monster" in Lam. 4:3, should be translated "jackal"; and that, on the basis of certain Hebrew MSS., the Hebrew text of Ezek. 29:3; 32:2 should be emended to read "dragon," where A.V. has once properly "dragon" and once "whale."

The dragon of N.T. imagery is "the old serpent," the Devil (Rev. 12:9; 20:2), who is symbolically portrayed as in color red and having 7 heads, 10 horns, an enormous tail, and a huge mouth, from which he was able to cast forth water like a river after those whom he would destroy (ch. 12:3, 4, 15; 16:13). He was hurled from the heavens to the earth, where he persecuted the Church, but was finally chained and imprisoned in the abyss (ch. 12:7-17; 20:2, 3). In certain features the dragon bears resemblance to the beast of ch. 13. This beast is a combination of Daniel's 4 beasts, and represents the combined powers of earth in opposition to the Kingdom of God (Dan., ch. 7). The picture of the dragon was conformed to that of the beast, because the dragon, that old serpent, is the animating and molding spirit in the kingdom of this world, and when he was portrayed in ch. 12, features of the world power familiarized by Daniel were combined with the distinguishing feature furnished by the serpent of Gen., ch. 3.

Drag'on's Well, in A.V. Drag'on Well. A well at Jerusalem, apparently between the Valley Gate and Dung Gate (Neh. 2:13; cf. ch. 3:13, 14); called Jackal's Well in A.R.V.

Dream. Ideas present to the mind during sleep. They may be classified as: 1. Vain dreams (Job 20:8; Ps. 73:20; Isa. 29:8). 2. Dreams employed by God for the purposes of his Kingdom. In producing them God works according to the laws of mind, and perhaps always employs secondary causes. They are (a) intended to affect the spiritual life of individuals. A Midianite's dream discouraged the enemy, and encouraged Gideon, who providentially heard it (Judg. 7:13). Perhaps such was the dream of Pilate's wife (Matt. 27:19). Many such providential dreams have been sent in modern times. John Newton, concerned about his soul's salvation, had a dream which made the way of salvation clear to him. (b) Directive and prophetic dreams, used when revelation was incomplete. They seem to have carried with them credentials of their divine origin. Divine communications were made in dreams to Abimelech (Gen. 20:3), to Jacob (ch. 28:12; 31:10), to Laban (ch. 31:24), to Joseph (ch. 37:5, 9, 10, 20), to Pharaoh's butler and baker (ch. 40:5), to Pharaoh (ch. 41:7, 15, 25, 26), to Solomon (I Kings 3:5), to Nebuchadnezzar (Dan. 2:1, 4, 36; 4:1, 2), to Daniel (ch. 7:1, 2), to Joseph the betrothed husband of Mary (Matt. 1:20), to the Magi (ch. 2:12). The power of accurately interpreting prophetic dreams was granted to certain favored people, as to Joseph (Gen. 41:16, 25) and to Daniel (Dan. 2:25-28, 47). Dreams offered as revelations to the Church were subjected to tests to determine their character. If they inculcated immoral conduct, they were by that very fact proclaimed false; and any man who sought by their means to lead Israel from the worship of Jehovah was to be put to death (Deut. 13:1-5; cf. Jer. 23:25-32; 29:8; Zech. 10:2). See VISIONS.

Dress. See CLOTHING.

Drink. The usual beverage of the Hebrews was water (Gen. 21:14; Ex. 23:25; I Sam. 25:11; I Kings 13:8; II Kings 6:22), though they also frequently used milk (Judg. 5:25), sour wine (Num. 6:3; Ruth 2:14), ordinary wine (Gen. 14:18; 27:25; Judg. 19:19; Neh. 5:15), and, more rarely, strong drink (Lev. 10:9).

Drink Offering. See OFFERINGS.

Drom'e-dar'y [Lat. dromedarius, from Gr. dromas, running]. 1. The rendering of Hebrew rekesh in A.V. of I Kings 4:28; but in Micah 1:13, "swift beast," and in Esth. 8:10, "mule." R.V. everywhere translates it "swift steed."

2. The rendering of Heb. rammāk (Esth. 8:10) in A.V. text and R.V. marg. R.V. text translates it "steed." Gesenius understands it to mean a mare.

3. The rendering of Heb. bēker (Isa. 60:6; Jer. 2:23). Arab. bakr denotes a young, vigorous he-camel. R.V. margin accordingly renders its "young camels."

The dromedary is a variety of the Arabian or one-humped camel (Camelus dromedarius) bred for speed and endurance. It can travel about 125 miles a day.

Drop'sy. A disease marked by an unnatural accumulation of watery liquid in any cavity of the body or in the tissues (Luke 14:2).

Dru-sil'la (drōō-sil'ā). The youngest daughter of Herod Agrippa I and his wife Cypros (born c. A.D. 38). Before the death of her father in A.D. 44, and when not yet 6 years old, she was promised in marriage to a certain Epiphanes, son of Antiochus, king of Commagene. The bridegroom promised to accept Judaism, but later refused, and the proposed alliance fell through. Azizus, king of Emesa, was next applied to, the condition offered being the same as in the former case. He accepted, and Drusilla became his wife. She had great beauty, and was in consequence persecuted by her elder sister Bernice, who was plain in appearance. Felix, procurator of Judea, was captivated by Drusilla's beauty and employed one Simon, a Cypriote, to gain her for his wife. She responded all the more readily because Bernice's petty tyranny over her made her unhappy. In defiance of Jewish law, she left her husband and married Felix, a Gentile and an idolater (c. 53). They had a son called Agrippa, who grew up to manhood and married, but perished in an eruption of Mount Vesuvius (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 5, 4; xx. 7, 1 and 2). One can well understand that when Paul, then a prisoner, reasoned before Felix and Drusilla of righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come, Felix trembled (Acts 24:24, 25).

Dul'ci-mer. The rendering of Aram. sūm-pōnyāh (-ā'), šimpōnyāh (-ā') (Dan. 3:5, 10, 15), probably meaning bagpipe, as R.V. marg. and J.V. make it. The real dulcimer is quite a different instrument. The list of instruments in which this word occurs begins with 2 wind instruments, followed by 3 stringed instruments, and closes with a wind instrument (bagpipe).

Du'mah (dū'mā) [silence]. 1. A tribe descended from Ishmael (Gen. 25:14; I Chron. 1:30). Its territory was probably the region called Doumaitha by Ptolemy, and Domata by Pliny, on the confines of the Syrian and Arabian deserts. It is the oasis Dūmat al-jandal (modern al-Jauf), in the n.w. part of the Arabian peninsula.

2. A symbolic designation of Edom, chosen on account of its assonance with Edom and in allusion to the desolation in store (Isa. 21:11).

3. A town in the hill country of Judah (Josh. 15:52). Its site is ed-Dōmeh, about 10 miles s.w. of Hebron and 2½ miles n. of Dhahariyeh.

Dung. Dung was used for manuring plants (Luke 13:8; Ps. 83:10). A dunghill, with straw trodden in it by the cattle, is referred to (Isa. 25:10). In the East dried cow dung is constantly used for fuel (Ezek. 4:12, 15). Beggars often lay on dunghills and ash heaps (I Sam. 2:8; Lam. 4:5). As a punishment, the house of a man was sometimes made a dunghill (Dan. 2:5), that is, probably, was converted into a draughthouse (II Kings 10:27). The passage in Daniel, however, is better rendered, "And your houses shall be made ruins."

Dung Gate. See JERUSALEM, II. 3.

Du'ra (dū'rā) (Akkad. dūru, circuit, wall]. A plain in the province of Babylon where Nebuchadnezzar's golden image was set up (Dan. 3:1). Several localities in Babylonia were called Duru; there is a river Dūra with Tūlūl Dūra near by.

Dys'en-ter'y. A disease characterized by inflammation and ulceration of the lower part of the intestines, with hemorrhage from the bowels. It is so constantly attended by fever that it is often called fever and dysentery. The father of Publius, chief man of the island of Melita while Paul was there, suffered from this complaint, but was miraculously cured by the apostle (Acts 28:7, 8, R.V.; in A.V., bloody flux).

E

Ea'gle. A bird of prey (Job 9:26; 39:27-30; Hab. 1:8), large (Ezek. 17:3, 7), swift of flight (II Sam. 1:23), seeing at a great distance, and building its nest on lofty rocks (Job 39:27-29; Jer. 49:16). It was currently believed to bestow great care upon its young while training them to act for themselves, stirring up the nest and forcing them out, hovering over them and under them when they made their first weak attempts to fly (Deut. 32:11; Ex. 19:4, 5). Sir Humphrey Davy relates witnessing a pair of golden eagles similarly engaged above the crags of Ben Nevis. There is also probably an allusion to an ancient popular belief that the eagle, at the end of a certain period molts and renews its youth (Ps. 103:5). The story was that the eagle, on reaching old age, flew upward toward the sun until its feathers were singed and it fell into the sea. Thence it emerged in the strength of youth. The allusion may, however, be to the great age to which the eagle lives and retains the vigor of youth. As a carnivorous bird, feeding on reptiles and occasionally on carrion, it was unclean (Lev. 11:13). The Hebrews, like the Arabs, applied the name which they used for eagle to birds that eat carrion, probably, like the Greek and Roman naturalists Aristotle and Pliny, including certain larger varieties of the vulture among the eagles (Matt. 24:28; cf. Prov. 30:17). In alluding to the baldness of the eagle (Micah 1:16), the prophet, if he does not refer to molting, which is an inconspicuous process in the eagle, has some vulture in mind, whose head is bald and neck but scantily feathered.

Ea'r'nest. Part payment in advance of a wage, a sum of money, or anything else promised, this being intended as a pledge or guarantee to the recipient that the bargain, contract, or promise will in due time be carried out. Blackstone says that the prepayment of a penny in England will legally bind a contract, and the handing over of the smallest quantity of goods ordered will bind the engagement for the remainder. The earnest, as a rule, is the same in kind as the ultimate payment, of which it is the pledge. The Spirit in the hearts of Christians is the earnest of their inheritance (II Cor. 1:22; 5:5; Eph. 1:13, 14).

Ea'r'ring. Earrings were worn by the Israelites, men, women, and children (Ex. 32:2), especially by the women (Ezek. 16:12; Judith 10:4). They were also worn by the Midianites (Num. 31:50), Assyrians, Egyptians, and other peoples. The custom was innocent in itself. But the earrings sometimes served as an amulet (cf. Isa. 3:20, R.V., amulet). As used in idolatrous worship, earrings were worn by the men and women of Jacob's household, until he ordered the strange gods to be put away (Gen. 35:4). They were made of gold (Ex. 32:2; cf. Prov. 25:12) or other precious metal. It is often not clear from the narrative whether earrings or nose rings are intended (Gen. 24:22, 30; Ex. 35:22).

Earth. 1. The world in which we dwell as distinguished from the heavens overhead (Gen. 1:1).

2. The dry land, as distinguished from the sea (Gen. 1:10); the habitable world (Gen. 1:28; 10:25; 18:18). It is frequently described in poetry. The earth is referred to as standing on pillars, on which it had been placed by God (I Sam. 2:8; Job 9:6; Ps. 75:3). The psalmist speaks of the inhabited earth as founded upon the seas and established on the floods (Ps. 24:2; 136:6; cf. Ex. 20:4). Others speak literally or figuratively of the foundations of the earth (Ps. 102:25; 104:5-9; Prov. 3:19; 8:29; Isa. 48:13).

3. Vegetable soil (Gen. 27:28; Ex. 20:24; Ps. 104:14).

4. The inhabitants of the world or of any region in it (Gen. 11:1; Ps. 98:9).

Earth'quake'. A shaking or trembling of the earth. In severe earthquakes, at the point where the force is greatest, the hills move to and fro (Jer. 4:24) and the foundations of the mountains, as it were, tremble (Ps. 18:7); clefts appear in the earth's crust (Zech. 14:4, 5) and chasms, into which men may fall, open and close (Num. 16:31-33); buildings are shaken down and their inhabitants often buried in the ruins; and if the sea is near, it may leave its bed for a few minutes nearly dry, and then bring in a wave upon the land which will sweep over it with destructive effect. Judea was visited by a severe earthquake in the days of Uzziah and Jeroboam II (Amos 1:1; Zech. 14:5; Jos. Antiq. ix. 10, 4). Another notable earthquake occurred in the 7th year of Herod the Great, which destroyed much cattle and upward of 10,000 lives (Jos. Antiq. xv. 5, 2). An earthquake, accompanied by darkness, signalized the death of Christ (Matt. 27:45, 51-54), and another heralded his resurrection (ch. 28:2). One occurred in Macedonia when Paul and Silas were in the jail at Philippi (Acts 16:26).

East. The direction toward the sunrise (as is denoted by the Hebrew and Greek words employed in Josh. 11:3; 12:3, etc.; Matt. 2:1). The Hebrews faced the point of the rising sun when they determined direction; hence the e. was the front (as is denoted by the Hebrew word in Gen. 2:8). The orientation of the e. gate of the Temple at Jerusalem was important; it was so built that on the days of the spring and fall equinoxes the first rays of the rising sun, heralding the advent of the glory of God, could penetrate into the Holy of Holies.

East, Child'en of the, or Men of, or Peo'ple of. A general designation of the tribes occupying the e. country, who inhabited the region bordering on Ammon and Moab (Ezek. 25:4, 10), dwelt as far n. as a district where people of Haran pastured their flocks' (Gen. 29:1, 4), and extended far southward into Arabia.

East Coun'try. The region lying e. of Palestine (Zech. 8:7), especially the Arabian and Syrian deserts (Gen. 25:1-7).

East Sea or East'ern Sea. See DEAD SEA.

East Wind. A wind blowing, broadly speaking, from the e. In Egypt it blasts the ears of corn (Gen. 41:23, 27), and in Palestine the vines and vegetation generally (Ezek. 17:7-10; 19:10-12). The e. wind in these lands is hot and sultry, and deleterious to vegetation, because it has been blowing over the Arabian or Syro-Arabian Desert (Hos. 13:15). Doubtless this same wind is meant in Jonah 4:8, although the Ninevites themselves would not have called it an e. wind.

East'er. Originally the spring festival in honor of the Teutonic goddess of light and spring known in Anglo-Saxon as Eastre. As early as the 8th century the name was transferred by the Anglo-Saxons to the Christian festival designed to celebrate the resurrection of Christ. In A.V. it occurs once (Acts 12:4), but is a mistranslation. The original is pascha, the ordinary Greek word for pass-over. K.V. properly employs the word pass-over.

E'bal (ē'bāl). 1. A son of Shobal, and a descendant of Seir the Horite (Gen. 36:23; I Chron. 1:40).

2. The same as Obal (cf. I Chron. 1:22 with Gen. 10:28).

3. A mountain separated only by a narrow valley from Mount Gerizim (Deut. 27:12, 13), w. of the w. highway and near the oaks of Moreh (ch. 11:30), which were near Shechem (Gen. 12:6; 35:4). When the Israelites passed the Jordan they were to set up great stones, plastered, on which the words of the Law were to be written. An altar also was to be built (Deut. 27:1-8). Representatives of 6 tribes, those of Reuben, Gad, Asher, Zebulun, Dan, and Naphtali, were to stand on Mount Ebal and pronounce curses on those who were guilty of certain heinous sins. The representatives of the remaining 6 tribes standing on Mount Gerizim were to pronounce blessings (Deut. 11:29; 27:9-26). These directions were carried out by Joshua (Josh. 8:30-35). Mount Ebal lies on the n. side of Nablus, the ancient Shechem, whilst Mount Gerizim lies on its s. side (Jos. Antiq. iv. 8, 44). Both are w. of the road from the s. to the n., and the branch road to Samaria and En-gannim passes between them. Ebal rises 3,077 feet above the sea, and is steep, rocky, and barren. In some places a few stunted olive trees may be discovered on its lower part, and prickly pear above; in others it is destitute of vegetation.

E'bed (ē'bēd) [servant]. 1. Father of Gaal (Judg. 9:28, 30).

2. A chief of the father's house of Adin, who returned from Babylon with 50 males under the leadership of Ezra (Ezra 8:6).

E'bed-me'lech (ē'bēd-mē'lēk) [servant of the King, i.e., God]. An Ethiopian, a eunuch of the palace, who heard that Jeremiah had been cast into a dungeon where he would probably have soon died of hunger, and, having obtained the king's permission, drew him out by cords let down, and rags to protect the prophet's armpits against their sharpness (Jer. 38:7-13). Jeremiah was subsequently commissioned to inform him that, on account of the service he had rendered, he should be preserved when Jerusalem was taken (ch. 39:15-18).

Eb'en-e'zer (ēb'ēn-ē'zēr) [stone of help]. A commemorative stone set up by Samuel, seemingly near Mizpah, between Mizpah and Shen, where the Lord discomfited the Philistines (I Sam. 7:10, 12). Twenty years previously the Israelites themselves had been defeated at this place by the Philistines and had lost the Ark (ch. 4:1-11; where the place is mentioned by its later name).

E'ber (ē'bēr), in A.V. thrice He'ber (I Chron. 5:13; 8:22; Luke 3:35) [other side, region beyond]. 1. A descendant of Shem through Arpachshad (Gen. 10:22, 24); and progenitor of a group of peoples (v. 21), embracing the Hebrews (ch. 11:16-26), the Joktanide Arabs (ch. 10:25-30), and certain Aramaean tribes descended from Nahor (chs. 11:29; 22:20-24). The name is used for these peoples collectively (Num. 24:24). Originally Eber belonged to the region beyond or e. of the Euphrates, perhaps also of the Tigris, with respect to the later Hebrews (cf. Josh. 24:2, 3, 14, 15), and to the Joktanide Arabs, and not unlikely with respect to his descendants, the ancestors of Abraham and Nahor, in Ur (Gen. 11:28).

2. A priest, head of the father's house of Amok in the days of the high priest Joiakim (Neh. 12:20).

3. A Gadite, head of a father's house in Gilead in Bashan (I Chron. 5:13).

4 and 5. Two Benjamites, a son of Elpaal and a son of Shashak (I Chron. 8:12, 22, 25).

E'bez (ē'bēz), in A.V. A'bez (ā'bēz) [tin]. A town of Issachar (Josh. 19:20). 'Ain el-Hūṣ, or el-'Abus, between 'Aulam and Sirin, may be considered as the place.

Ebi'a'saph (ē-bī'ā-sāf). See ABIASAPH.

Eb'on'y. Wood of various species of the genus Diospyros, of the Ebenaceae family. The inner wood is black, very hard, and heavy. Ebony is used for inlaying and ornamental turnery. The men of Dedan traded with it in the markets of Tyre, having obtained it apparently from India or Ceylon (Ezek. 27:15). The Greeks recognized 2 kinds of ebony, one variegated, from India, and the other black, from Ethiopia.

E'bron (ē'b'rōn), in A.V. He'bron. A town on the boundary line of Asher (Josh. 19:28). Perhaps identical with Abdon.

E'bro'nah (ē-brō'nā). See ABRONAH.

E'bat'ana (ēk-bāt'ā-nā). See ACHMETHA.

Ec'cle'si-as'tes (ē-klē'zī-ās'tēz) [Gr. ekklesiastēs, one who sits and speaks in an assembly or church, a preacher]. The name borrowed from the LXX and applied to the O.T. book called in Heb. Kōheleth. Kōheleth is etymologically related to the Heb. word for assembly or congregation. Originally it was a feminine abstract, which on account of its transference to a concrete male person became masculine. The English Bible follows the Greek and Latin versions in rendering it "the Preacher" (Eccl. 1:1). The Preacher is distinctly represented as Solomon, "son of David, king in Jerusalem" (v. 1), excelling all his predecessors in Jerusalem in wisdom and wealth (chs. 1:16; 2:7, 9). The book may be regarded either as a writing of Solomon himself in his old age or as words which, though not actually uttered by Solomon, accurately sum up his completed experience, are spoken from the standpoint of his finished course, teach the great lesson of his life as he himself learned it, and express the sentiments which he might rightly be supposed to entertain as he looked at life in the retrospect. The meaning of ch. 1:12-14 in the Hebrew may be either: "As for me, during my reign [which still continues] I have applied my heart to seek wisdom and have discovered that all is vanity," or "When I was king [as I am not now] I applied my heart to seek wisdom and discovered that all is vanity." The latter explanation is doubtless correct, for the language smacks everywhere of the vocabulary and grammar of the later post-exilic Hebrew Scriptures and of the Aram. portions of Daniel and Ezra. The book recounts the feelings, experiences, and observations which would be unavoidable to the wise man situated as was Solomon.

The message concerns solely the present life on earth. The question is raised whether any real profit accrues to man from toil (ch. 1:3). The method of investigation is that of the sage (v. 13). By observation and experience the Preacher finds that man's one source of satisfaction lies in himself, in the normal and healthy exercise of his powers of mind and body in harmony with the physical and moral laws of the universe in which he is placed (chs. 2:24; 3:12, 13, 22; 5:18; 9:7-10). Vain are wisdom (ch. 1:12-18) and pleasure (ch. 2:1-11). Still they have value; hence the Preacher compares wisdom and folly (vs. 12-23). He concludes that the homely rewards of labor excel (chs. 2:24; cf. 5:12). The conclusion is strengthened by the fact that man's activities are bound to the stages of his growth. There is a time fixed and unalterable for the exercise of each power of mind and body, and everything is beautiful in its season (ch. 3:1-11). And other joy is often rendered impossible by injustice and oppression (chs. 3:16 to 4:3). Formalism and dishonesty are unwise; and wealth is often injurious, and is less desirable than health (chs. 5:1 to 6:9). The Preacher speaks of the value of a good name and the means of obtaining it (ch. 7:1-10); and of the value of wisdom as a safeguard (vs. 11-22), and in dealing with kings (ch. 8:1-8); and he insists on the general truth that godliness is the best policy (vs. 10-15). Death comes alike to all; let man find pleasure, then, in the common, humble joys of life. They are his portion (ch. 9:2-10). After sundry other shrewd observations, the Preacher is led again to his main theme; exhorts young men to rejoice in their powers, but to use them mindful of being under moral government; makes his great appeal to youth to remember God, and sums up the matter in the pithy sentence: "Fear God, and keep his commandments; for this is the whole duty of man. For God will bring every work into judgment [even now, whatever the Judge may do in the world to come]" (chs. 11:9 to 12:14).

In his argument the writer appeals to man's relation to God in so far only as God is known in nature and experience. His references to God are thus in accordance with the methods of that philosophical school to which he belonged (see Wisdom), and are indispensable in a complete discussion of the means of adjusting oneself to the conditions which one learns by experience to be imposed upon him and under which he lives.

The startling character of some statements in Ecclesiastes led certain Jews to question its right to its place among inspired books. At last, however, its right to remain in the canon was universally accorded. There is no direct quotation from it or unequivocal allusion to it in the N.T.

Ed (ēd) [a witness]. A word inserted in A.V. and R.V. of Josh. 22:34. It or a similar word was doubtless originally in the Heb. It is found in some Hebrew MSS. and in the Peshitta, though it may be an insertion in them as it is in the English version. It is needful to the full meaning of the passage, which tells how the 2½ tribes e. of the Jordan reared an altar as a witness that they were of common descent and religion with those w. of the river. These latter, taking the altar to be the commencement of apostasy from Jehovah, were preparing to make war upon those who had erected it, when explanations were given and accepted as satisfactory (Josh., ch. 22).

E'dar (ē'dēr). See EDER.

E'den (ē'dn) [Heb. ēden, delight, pleasantness; cf. Neo-Heb. iddēn, to delight, make agreeable, and Arab. ghudnah, delicacy; or perhaps Akkad. from Sumerian ednu, plain, steppe, cultivated or arable land]. 1. A country in which God caused trees to grow from the ground and in this manner planted for Adam a garden, called from its situation the Garden of Eden. A river went out of the country of Eden to water the garden, and being thence parted, became 4 heads, called Pishon, Gihon, Hiddekel, and Euphrates. Of these 4 rivers, the Euphrates is well known. Hiddekel is the Tigris; the other two are doubtful. The Pishon surrounded or meandered through the land of Havilah, where there is gold; and the Gihon surrounded the land of Cush.

The main theories as to the site of the garden may be classed in two groups:

I. Those which, while proposing to identify the 4 streams with still existing rivers, fail to find a geographical counterpart of the one stream divided into 4. The site is, by many, sought in Armenia. The sources of the Tigris and Euphrates are in this region. The Pishon is supposed to be either the Phasis (modern Rion) or the Kur, the large tributary of the Araxes. The Gihon is identified with the Araxes, in Arabic known as Gaihun er-Ras. Objections to this theory are: (a) the difficulty in explaining the one river; (b) the absence of proof that the land of Cush ever extended to this region; (c) Havilah, as located by the Biblical writers, did not lie in Armenia. By others the garden is thought of as situated between the Nile and India or between India and the Oxus. Havilah is identified with a portion of India, where gold was obtained; and Cush with either Ethiopia, which is called Cush in the Scriptures, or the plateau of central Asia which was inhabited by the Kassites (Cossaeans). The Gihon, the river of Cush, is hence either the Nile, called by the Ethiopians Gēwōn or Gēyōn, or the Oxus. The same objections, mutatis mutandis, lie against the 2d theory as against the 1st. It may be added that the identification of the Gihon with the Nile is traceable as far back as Josephus, who identified the Pishon with the Ganges. In his case it probably rests on a misconception. The only land of Cush in the geographical knowledge of the later Israelites was Ethiopia; and accordingly Josephus understood the Nile by the Gihon, because it is the great river of the land of Cush. Some, accepting the Gihon as the Nile, have also identified the Pishon with the Persian Gulf.

II. Theories which seek an exact geographical counterpart to the Biblical description and identify not only the 4 rivers, but also the one. Calvin observed that the Tigris and Euphrates are actually united for a short distance as one stream, the Shatt al-Arab, which then divides and enters into the Persian Gulf by several mouths; and he concluded that the district watered by the united streams was the site of the garden. The annual deposit of silt at the head of the Persian Gulf through the centuries, however, is evidence that this particular spot was formerly submerged and that once the Tigris and the Euphrates emptied directly into the Persian Gulf. But the general locality indicated has much in favor of its being the site of the garden. Friedrich Delitzsch thinks that the river of Eden is the Euphrates. Its channel being higher than the Tigris, its superabundant waters on entering the alluvial plain n. of Babylon flowed from its banks and found their way across the plain to the Tigris. The district thus watered was extremely fertile, and here the Garden of Eden is to be sought. The word edinnu in Sumerian and Babylonian means plain; and the two river bottoms of s. Mesopotamia and the alluvial lowland form a plain, and were spoken of as an edinnu. A descendant of Cush reigned in the Babylonian plain (Gen. 10:8-10); and Kassites (Cossaeans) early descended upon Babylonia and for a time held the political power (c. 1746-1169). Hence the land of Cush may be satisfactorily regarded as having designated at one period Babylonia or its s. portion. Havilah was situated n.w. of the Persian Gulf, according to Scripture notices, and may be assumed to have extended to the Euphrates and bordered on Babylonia. Under these circumstances, the Pishon may reasonably be identified with the Pallakopas canal, which was probably a natural channel originally; and the Gihon with a great Babylonian canal which branched from the Euphrates e. at Babylon, and on which two of Nimrod the Cushite's cities, Babylon and Erech, stood. It may be the canal near Babylon whose name was Kaḥana or Guhana, corresponding to Gihon. This scholarly theory still lacks proof. According to another explanation, Eden was an island not far from the head of the Persian Gulf, near the mouths of the Euphrates, Tigris, Kerkha (Choaspes), and Karūn. Sayce proposed that the Garden of Eden is to be identified with the sacred garden of Ea at Eridu, once a seaport on the Persian Gulf; he makes the river which waters it (Gen. 2:10) the Persian Gulf, while in one of his views (1906) the Pishon is the Pallakottas and the Gihon the Shatt al-Hai. He maintains that an oblong was formed by the 4 rivers, which are given in this order of directions: s., e., n., w.

The site of the Garden of Eden is most probably to be sought about the head of the Persian Gulf, but the exact spot cannot be definitely determined. The locality is e. of Palestine, as Gen. 2:8 may mean. The Tigris and Euphrates Rivers are there. Havilah was a district of northern central Arabia. A land of Cush corresponded approximately to Elam, where the names Kashshu and Cossaeon long lingered. The plain of Babylonia could be and evidently was called an edinnu, as Delitzsch has shown. Possibly the fact that the Persian Gulf was called a river may also have some bearing on the solution of the problem. The Garden of Eden is referred to in Isa. 51:3; Ezek. 28:13; 31:9, 16-18; 36:35; Joel 2:3; cf. Gen. 13:10.

2. A region in Mesopotamia; mentioned in connection with Gozan, Haran, Reseph, Tassar (II Kings 19:12; Isa. 37:12), and with Haran and Canneh (Ezek. 27:23, 24). Apparently the locality is called in Amos 1:5 (marg.) Beth-eden. The region is mentioned in Assyrian documents by the name Bit-Adini, situated on both sides of the Euphrates n. of the Balikh River.

3. A Gershonite Levite, a son of Joah (II Chron. 29:12; 31:15).

E'der (ē'dēr), in A.V. once E'dar (Gen. 35:21) and once A'der (I Chron. 8:15) [flock]. 1. A tower, beyond which Jacob on one occasion spread his tent (Gen. 35:19, 21, 27), between Bethlehem and Hebron.

2. A town in the s. of Judah (Josh. 15:21); el-'Adar, about 4½ miles s. of Gaza on the right bank of the wadi Ghazzeḥ.

3. A Benjamite, son of Elpaal (I Chron. 8:15).

4. A Levite, son of Mushi, of the family of Merari (I Chron. 23:23; 24:30).

E'd'na (ē'd'nā) [Gr. from Heb. 'ednāh, de-light]. Wife of Raguel and mother of Sarah, who became the wife of Tobias (Tobit 7:2: 10:12; 11:1).

E'dom (ē'dūm); in A.V. of O.T. 4 times Id'u-me'a [red]. 1. A name of Esau, given in memory of his having sold his birthright for red pottage (Gen. 25:30; 36:1, 8, 19).

2. The Edomites collectively (Num. 20:18, 20, 21; Amos 1:6, 11; 9:12; Mal. 1:4).

3. The region occupied by the descendants of Edom, i.e., Esau. It was originally called the land of Seir (Gen. 32:3; 36:20, 21, 30; Num. 14:18). In the mind of the Israelites, Edom as the name of the country was doubtless associated with the settlement of their kinsman Edom in that region. It is a mountainous and extremely rugged country, about 100 miles long, extending s. from Moab on both sides of the Arabah, or great depression connecting the s. part of the Dead Sea with the Gulf of 'Akabah (Gen. 14:6; Deut. 2:1, 12; Josh. 15:1; Judg. 11:17, 18; I Kings 9:26). The summit of Mount Seir is believed to rise about 3500 feet above the adjacent Arabah. The lower part of the chain is of red Nubian sandstone, with dikes of red granite and porphyry; the summit is of a chalky limestone, probably of cretaceous age. Edom is not nearly so fertile as Palestine (cf. Mal. 1:2-4); but in the time of Moses it had fields, vineyards, wells, and a highway (Num. 20:17, 19). The Edomite capital in the times of the Hebrew monarchy was Sela, probably later Petra. Other important towns were Bozrah and Teman. In the Greek period the name was modified to Idumaea (q.v.).

The wilderness of Edom was the Arabah at the s. extremity of the Dead Sea (II Kings 3:8, 20).

E'dom-ites (ē'dūm-its). The descendants of Edom, i.e., Esau (Gen. 36:1-19), and others incorporated with them. As early as the return of Jacob from Mesopotamia, Esau had occupied the land of Edom (Gen. 32:3; 36:6-8; Deut. 2:4, 5; Josh. 24:4), having driven out the aboriginal Horites (cf. Gen. 14:6; 36:20-30; Deut. 2:12, 22). The Edomites appear to have been first ruled by tribal chiefs (A.V., dukes), who were probably like Arab sheiks (Gen. 36:15-19, 40-43; I Chron. 1:51-54); but before the rise of the Hebrew monarchy they were governed by kings (Gen. 36:31-39; I Chron. 1:43-51). When the Israelites were approaching Canaan, they sought permission from the king of Edom to pass through his territory, giving assurance that the privilege would not be abused. He refused the request, and was prepared to fight if the Israelites had persisted in moving forward (Num. 20:14-21). Notwithstanding this hostility, an Edomite was regarded in the Mosaic Law as a brother of the Israelites, and the posterity of the former were allowed in the 3d generation to become incorporated with the Hebrew people (Deut. 23:7, 8), while it was not till the 10th generation that the descendants of a Moabite or an Ammonite could obtain the same privilege (vs. 3-6). Saul fought against the Edomites (I Sam. 14:47); and David put garrisons in Edom after conquering the country (I Chron. 18:13; and II Sam. 8:13, 14, where 'ārām [Syrians] is doubtless the error of a copyist who misread daleth [d] as resh [r]). This conquest had been predicted by Balaam (Num. 24:18). Joab, David's commander in chief, remained in Edom for 6 months, cutting off every male (I Kings 11:15, 16); but Hadaad, one of the royal family, escaped with some others of his countrymen to Egypt and became an active enemy of Solomon (vs. 14-22). After the death of Ahab of Israel, and during the reign of Jehoshaphat of Judah, Edomites, Ammonites, and Moabites invaded Judah (II Chron. 20:1; see MEUNIM), but perished in internecine strife caused by Jehovah (vs. 22, 23). About this time, and perhaps during years previously, a deputy or appointee was "king" in Edom (I Kings 22:47), perhaps the person called king in II Kings 3:9. Edomites aided Israel and Judah in the contest with Mesha, king of Moab (vs. 4-27); but in the reign of Jehoshaphat's son Joram they revolted. Joram vanquished them in the field, but could not reduce them to subjection (II Kings 8:20-22; II Chron. 21:8-10). Amaziah was more successful. He slew 10,000 Edomites in the Valley of Salt, took Sela, the capital, and put 10,000 Edomites to death by flinging them from the top of the rock (II Kings 14:7; II Chron. 25:11, 12). In the reign of Ahaz, when Judah was attacked by Pekah and Rezin, the Edomites invaded Judah, and carried off captives (II Chron. 28:17). For a number of years, under Tiglath-pileser III, Sargon, Sennacherib, Esarhaddon, and Ashurbanipal, Edom was a vassal state of Assyria, but would join coalitions in revolt (711 and 701 B.C.). The Edomites rejoiced when Nebuchadnezzar destroyed Jerusalem (Ps. 137:7). The prophets foretold the calamities that should befall Edom for its inveterate enmity toward Israel (Ezek. 35:5, 6), but announced its ultimate incorporation into the Kingdom of God (Jer. 49:7-22; Lam. 4:21, 22; Ezek. 25:12-14; 35:15; Joel 3:19; Amos 9:12; Obadiah). When the captivity of the 2 tribes rendered the territory of Judah somewhat destitute of inhabitants, the Edomites seized on it as far as Hebron, and were themselves supplanted in Mount Seir by the Nabataeans. The political power of Edom was really completely at an end when Nabonidus made Taima his place of residence. Judas Maccabaeus retook Hebron and the other towns which the Edomites had occupied (I Macc. 5:65; Jos. Antiq. xii. 8, 6). John Hyrcanus compelled the Edomites to submit to the rite of circumcision, and incorporated them with the Jewish people (Jos. Antiq. xiii. 9, 1). The Herods were Idumaeans, i.e., Edomites.

Ed'rei (ēd'rē-i). 1. The capital city of Bashan (Deut. 3:10; Josh. 12:4; 13:12, 31). There the Israelites fought the great battle with Og, which deprived him of his dominions and his life (Num. 21:33-35; Deut. 1:4; 3:1, 10). Edrei has been identified with Der'a, about 27 miles e. of Gadara and about 22 n.w. of Bosora, modern Busra eski Şām.

2. A fenced city of Naphtali (Josh. 19:37), perhaps Tell Khureibeh, s. of Kedesh.

E'glah (ēg'lā) [heifer]. One of David's wives, and mother of Ithream (II Sam. 3:5; I Chron. 3:3).

E'gla'im (ēg'lā'im) [perhaps, 2 ponds; cf. Arab. 'ajala, to collect itself (water)]. A Moabite town (Isa. 15:8). Eusebius mentions Agallim, 8 Roman miles s. of Areopolis (Rabba); cf. also the town Agalla (Jos. Antiq. xiv. 1, 4). About 7½ miles s. of Rabba is Kerak, near which is Rujm el-Jilimeh which preserves the name of Byzantine Aegallim. Another suggestion is Khirbet Jaljūl, which lies about 4½ miles farther s.

Eg'lath-she'i-tshi'yah (ēg'lāth-shē'lī-shi'yā) [third Eglath]. A place in Moab (Isa. 15:5; Jer. 48:34, R.V.). J.V. follows A.V. in rendering, "A heifer of three years old."

Eg'lon (ēg'lōn) [perhaps, vituline]. 1. A king of Moab, who captured Jericho, held it for 18 years, and exacted tribute from Israel. He was assassinated by Ehud, the bearer of the tribute, who obtained a private interview with him on the pretext of bringing secret tidings (Judg. 3:12-30).

2. A town in the lowland and assigned to Judah (Josh. 15:39). Its king was one of the 5 allies who made war on Gibeon, but were defeated, captured, and executed by Joshua (Josh. 10:3-23, 34-37; 12:12). Khirbet 'Ajlān, 16 miles n.e. of Gaza, preserves the name, but the site is not ancient. Tell el-Heṣī, which is a few miles distant, has been proposed as more appropriate; Tell en-Nejileh, fully 3 miles s.e. of Tell el-Heṣī, has also been suggested.

E'gypt (ē'jipt). I. The country. 1. Its names. The country was named Aigyptos by the Greeks as early as the time of Homer. This name was apparently derived from Amarna ḫikuptaḥ, which represents Egyptian Ha(t)-ka-ptah, a designation of Memphis. The ancient Egyptians, however, called their native land Kemet (the black land), from its dark soil of Nile mud in contrast with the red land of the deserts. The most common designation was Touf (the two countries), meaning Upper and Lower Egypt. According to the Amarna tablets, the Canaanites called the land Misri. The Hebrew name, Misrayim, which has the same root, has generally been explained as a dual, but this view is not accepted by all grammarians. The modern Arab. name for Egypt is Misr.

I. 2. The territory and its divisions. In ancient times Egypt was the country watered by the Nile from the Mediterranean Sea as far as the First Cataract. In addition it included a series of oases in the w. desert, and also the territory between the e. mouth of the Nile and the wadi el-'Arish (the river of Egypt). The country is divided by nature into two tracts: a narrow valley running from s. to n., sunken in the midst of a desert; and the prolongation of the valley into a delta. These geographical divisions formed political boundaries also: Upper Egypt was coincident with the valley, and Lower Egypt with the Delta. The length of the Nile country from the sea to the First Cataract is 550 miles, and its breadth, from the head of the Delta to the cataract, averages about 12 miles. The cultivable tract thus formed between the cataract and the sea is somewhat less than 13,000 square miles, being about equal to the area of Connecticut and Massachusetts. Ancient Egypt was a small country, but at the same time, in proportion to its width, it was the longest country in the world. This long, narrow valley of the Nile, as far as the First Cataract, was in geologic times an estuary of the sea. In the strictest sense, Egypt, as the ancient Greeks said, is "the gift of the Nile." The soil varies from 33 to 38 ft. in depth; although the annual inundation of the Nile (June to October) fertilizes and softens the ground, irrigation is indispensable. Agriculture was and remained the foundation of the economic life. See NILE.

I. 3. The adjacent region. Egypt is bounded on either side by desert land. The waste country gradually rises from the Sahara in the w. toward the e., and terminates in a chain of mountains which skirt the Red Sea. The desert region on the e. of the river, extending to the Red Sea, was virtually uninhabited, and its scanty resources were worked by the Egyptians. The mountains form a broad and massive range of crystalline rock, running parallel with the coast of the Red Sea and sending forth numerous ramifications into the interior of the country. It was in these mountains, at Hammāmāt, on the caravan route between Koşer and Thebes, that the ancient Egyptians quarried the hard, dark-colored stone which they used for sarcophagi; and at Jebel Dukha, nearly opposite the extremity of the Sinaitic peninsula, they mined copper and emerald. Green and blue malachite, turquoise, and lapis lazuli, as well as copper, were also procured in the Sinaitic peninsula. Extensive masses of limestone stretch from the mountains to the Nile, yielding the alabaster with which the ancient Egyptians embellished their buildings. The desert on the w. of the Nile belongs to Libya. It presents an entirely different aspect from the region e. of the river, for it consists of an immense, monotonous, and stony tableland, 650 to 1,000 feet above the level of the Nile. The utter desolation of this desert is relieved at only 5 points within the Egyptian territory by oases.

Ancient Egypt was thus an isolated land—sea on the n., desert and sea on the e., and the Libyan Desert on the w. In the s. the valley is very narrow and the navigation of the Nile is obstructed by the cataracts.

Nubia, which finally became a part of the empire, extends from the First Cataract to the Sixth, a short distance north of the 16th parallel of latitude. During Dyn. XII the region between the First and Second Cataracts was conquered. Under Dyn. XVIII the frontier was extended to the Fourth Cataract.

II. The people. 1. Their origin. According to the Bible, Mizraim (Misrayim) was the son of Ham and the brother of Canaan, Put, and the Ethiopian Cush (Gen. 10:6). This statement can be interpreted in a political sense, since Egypt controlled Canaan for many centuries. The ancient Egyptians were Hamites and belonged to the white race. In prehistoric times a Hamitic race migrated in successive waves into Egypt and supplanted the aborigines. Later on, another invasion from Babylonia, largely of Semitic stock, entered the country and left its influence upon the language; at the same time a Nubian element was also injected into the Egyptian mixture. At a later date the country was divided into 42 nomes (provinces), or 20 in Lower Egypt and 22 in Upper Egypt, the great majority of which go back to prehistoric times.

II. 2. Their language. The Egyptian language offers an unusual philological history of about 5,000 years; its earliest records begin with Dyn. I, and the language, in one form or another, lived on continuously until Coptic, its lineal descendant, became practically extinct as a spoken language in the 16th century A.D.

Egyptian belongs to the Hamitic group of languages, but because it is closer to the Semitic than the other 2 main divisions of the Hamitic languages (the North African and the Ethiopian or Cushite), it may properly be called a Hamito-Semitic or Semito-Hamitic language. It is now generally believed that the Hamitic and Semitic families of languages are descended from a common stock. We may roughly distinguish the following linguistic stages: (1) Old Egyptian, of Dyns. I–VIII, which includes the language of the pyramid texts; (2) Middle Egyptian, the literary tongue of Dyns. IX–XVIII, and the vernacular of the early two thirds of the period (This became the classical norm and was imitated in later times.); (3) Late Egyptian of Dyns. XVIII–XXIV, exhibited chiefly in business documents and letters, but also in some literary works; (4) Demotic, a term applied loosely to the language used in books and documents written in the demotic script from Dyn. XXV to late Roman times (700 B.C. to A.D. 470); (5) Coptic, from the 3d century A.D. onward. This is the language of the Copts, the Christian descendants of the ancient Egyptians. The Bible has been translated into various dialects of Coptic, which is still, in the Bohairic dialect, used for liturgical purposes.

Originally there was used a kind of conventionalized picture writing known as hieroglyphic writing. It consisted chiefly of representations of objects, such as birds, beasts, plants, and implements, together with various geometric symbols. Two classes of hieroglyphic signs need to be distinguished here: (1) ideograms or sense signs, which signify either the actual object depicted or some closely connected notion; (2) phonograms or sound signs, which originally were ideograms and are in many cases still employed as such, but now have acquired sound values. These, when combined, yield a new word, which may have no connection with the original meaning of the symbols. Long before 3000 B.C. the Egyptians had evolved 24 letters, or uniconsonantal signs, which constituted an incipient alphabet, but it was used only to supplement the hieroglyphs. In the Egyptian characters vowels were not written, and even though the Egyptians had an adequate alphabet of consonants, they conservatively clung to the hieroglyphs as the basis of their writing. Hieroglyphs survived down to Christian times. Already under the Old Kingdom, the scribes began to dispense with the details of the pictures in order to write more rapidly, and thus arose hieratic writing, which was employed whenever ornamentation was not an object. About the 8th century B.C., the demotic, or popular, writing came into vogue. It was used in social and commercial intercourse, and was a cursive form of the hieratic.

With the spread of Christianity, the knowledge of the old native scripts and lore rapidly fell into oblivion. In the 3d century A.D. demotic was no longer used for documents, though there are demotic inscriptions at Philae as late as 473, more than two centuries after the final disappearance of the hieroglyphs. The Egyptian inscriptions, accordingly, long remained a mystery. In 1799 some French soldiers found at Rosetta a black basalt stone bearing an inscription in hieroglyphic, demotic, and Greek. It was a decree in honor of Ptolemy Epiphanes, erected by the priests (196 B.C.). This stone, now in the British Museum, became famous as the real key to the reading of the Egyptian language, and is known as the Rosetta Stone. In 1815 there was discovered at Philae an inscription in Greek and hieroglyphic in honor of Ptolemy Physicon and the two Cleopatras. From a study of the proper names on these two inscriptions, and a careful comparison of the Egyptian texts with the Greek, gradual steps were made in the decipherment of Egyptian, which was brought to a successful conclusion by Champollion in 1822.

II. 3. Their history. The basic economic, social, and political institutions of ancient Egypt were developed in the predynastic period. Reckoning by the Sothic cycle, Breasted calculated that in 4236 B.C. the Egyptians introduced the solar year of 365 days (12 months of 30 days each plus 5 feast days at the end of the year). To some scholars, however, this date seems too early, and they have taken 2773 B.C. as the year of the invention of the calendar.

Already in prehistoric times there were two kingdoms, Upper and Lower Egypt, which were united under one king; the capital was at Heliopolis. This consolidation, however, did not endure, but c. 3000 B.C. Menes, a king of Upper Egypt, restored the union. His capital was at Thinis. Manetho, a priest of Sebennytos, who flourished under Ptolemy I (305–285 B.C.), wrote a history of his country in the Greek language. He divided the long succession of pharaohs as known to him into 30 royal houses or dynasties from Menes to 332 B.C., when Egypt fell into the hands of Alexander the Great.

(1) The Old Kingdom. This early period is followed by the Old Kingdom, Dyns. III–VI (2600–2250 B.C.); during this period the capital was at Memphis. In Dyn. III (c. 2600–2550) expeditions were sent to Phoenicia for cedars. King Zoser, of Dyn. III, built a step pyramid and had as his vizier Imhotep, a distinguished physician, philosopher, and architect. Dynasty IV (c. 2550–2450) was the age of pyramid-building. There are three great pyramids at Gizeh, of which the largest was erected by Khufu (Cheops). Its original height was 482 ft.; it is 755 ft. square at the XII (2000–1780) the first pharaoh, Amenemhet I, moved the capital northward to Ith-toui (Captor of the Two Lands), on the w. side of the river, some miles s. of Memphis. In the latter part of this dynasty the pharaohs lived in the Fayyūm. This was the classical age of Egyptian literature. Amenemhet I wrote a series of maxims for his son. The romance of Sinuhe gives us an excellent picture of conditions in Syria and Palestine during this period. The great conqueror Sen-wosret (Sesostris) III established the frontier at the Second Cataract and invaded Syria. It was an era of great commercial activity; a canal was dug from the n. end of the Red Sea westward to the nearest branch of the Nile in the eastern Delta.

The Pyramids at Gizeh, Egypt

base and covers almost 13 acres. It is a solid mass of limestone, consisting of some 2,300,000 blocks, each of which weighs on the average  $2\frac{1}{2}$  tons. Herodotus relates a tradition that the labor of building this structure required 100,000 men for 20 years. Smaller pyramids were erected by Khafre and Menkure. The Sphinx is supposed to go back to Khafre. Dynasties V and VI extend from c. 2450 to c. 2250. In Dyn. V, Sahure built the first navy in the history of the world. He invaded Syria and sent expeditions to Punt for spices which were used in mummification. At this time Egypt controlled the trade routes in Egypt and the Sudan. Ptah-hotep composed some wisdom literature in this dynasty.

In Dyn. VI, the local governors began to assert themselves as landed barons, and the dissolution of the kingdom resulted. The nomes regained their independence, and thus Egypt was politically almost as it was before the accession of Menes. The Old Kingdom collapsed, and Dyns. VII and VIII are unimportant. In Dyns. IX and X a succession of 18 men at Heracleopolis succeeded in maintaining order. Dynasties VII–XI constitute the First Intermediate Period, which closed c. 2000 B.C. Dynasty XI built a centralized state at Thebes.

(2) The Middle Kingdom. Now follows the Middle Kingdom (Dyn. XII). The s. had triumphed over the n., and during Dyn. XI the capital was established at Thebes. In Dyn.

(3) Second Intermediate Period (1780–1546), including the Hyksos. The brilliant period of the Middle Kingdom was followed by the internal conflicts of the feudatories in Dyns. XIII–XIV, upon which succeeded the conquest by the Hyksos (rulers of the foreign lands), popularly called the Shepherd Kings, who reigned about 175 years (Dyns. XV–XVI, c. 1730–c. 1555). The Hyksos seem to have been Canaanites; recent evidence thus supports Manetho who calls them "Phoenicians." Their personal names for the most part are Semitic. Although most of the Hyksos were Semites, some may have been Hittites, Luvi-ans and Hurrians. It has been supposed that Joseph was vizier under one of the Hyksos rulers. Not much is known of this foreign domination; the capital of the Hyksos was located at Avaris in the Delta. Toward the end of the Hyksos period there maintained itself at Thebes Dyn. XVII, the last king of which was Ahmose (Amosis), who died c. 1546. He completed the expulsion of the Hyksos. While this invasion by the Hyksos was regarded by the Egyptians as a calamity, its influence was epoch-making and had much to do with transforming a peaceful people into a military nation. The Hyksos brought the horse and the chariot into the Nile valley, and the Egyptians learned war on a grand scale.

(4) The Empire (1546–1085 B.C.). With the expulsion of the Hyksos began the period of the Empire, or New Kingdom, with the capital at Thebes. All Egypt was now practically the personal estate of the pharaoh. The feudal lords had almost disappeared. Under the Empire, there were two viziers, one for the n. and one for the s.; the various departments of government were well organized. It was an era of great building projects, as is evident from the great temple at Karnak. Amenhotep I (1546-1525) was succeeded by Thutmose (Thothmes, Thutmosis) I (1525-1508). At the death of Thutmose II (1508-1504), the power was usurped by Hatshepsut (1504-1482), the daughter of Thutmose I; she was an aggressive ruler, and for 22 years kept the throne from Thutmose III. The greatest of all empire builders was Thutmose III (alone 1482-1450 B.C.), who conducted 17 campaigns and extended the empire to its widest limits. His domains included Palestine, Syria, and the region of the Upper Euphrates and reached to the Fourth Cataract, while his influence extended much farther. One of his most important battles took place at Megiddo, where, c. 1482, he defeated the Hittites. This great empire soon began to decay under the weak successors of Thutmose III. Amenhotep (Amenophis) III reigned from c. 1412 to c. 1375 and was followed by his son, Amenhotep IV (c. 1375-c. 1366), who had been coregent since c. 1387. He is better known as Akhnaton (Ikhnaton), and was interested more in religion than in the empire. He gave to the worship of Aton (the sun disk), a religion which was an approach to monotheism, official support against the well-established religion of Amun (Amon), the sun-god of Thebes. He moved the capital to a new city, Akhetaton (modern Tell el-Amarna), nearly 300 miles below Thebes. The frontiers of the empire were now neglected, and the Hittites and the Habiru were gradually encroaching upon Syria and Palestine. The Tell el-Amarna letters of this period contain many earnest pleas from Akhnaton's vassals in Byblos and Jerusalem for aid against the invaders, but he sent no effective help. Under Tutankhamun (Tutenkhamon) the capital was once more at Thebes. During Dyn. XVIII Amen-em-apt wrote his proverbs, which have many resemblances to those of Solomon.

Dynasty XIX (1353-1205) marks the restoration of the worship of Amun, the resumption of the old order, and the beginning of the new epoch. Harmhab (1353-1319) was the first ruler of this dynasty, and at once he proceeded with the work of reorganization. Ramesses (Ramses) I reigned from 1319 to 1318 and was succeeded by Sethi I (1318-1299); he began the conquest of Palestine and was succeeded by his son, Ramesses II (1299-1232), who c. 1295 fought with the Hittites at Kadesh on the Orontes in an indecisive battle. C. 1279, Ramesses, who could not regain the n. territory of Thutmose III, made a treaty on terms of equality with the Hittites, regaining control of Palestine and a great deal of Syria. Merenptah (Merneptah) (1232-1222) succeeded Ramesses II; during his reign Egypt was threatened with a desperate attack by the Libyans and the "Peoples of the Sea." The movement of these Aegean peoples is connected with the Homeric war against Troy and brought about the end of the Hittites. The empire was now on the defensive, and decay was not far off. At the end of Dyn. XIX a Syrian usurper held the throne for 5 years.

Dynasty XX (1200-1085) had 10 rulers bearing the name of Ramesses. During the reign of Ramesses III (1198-1167) another land and sea attack by the "Peoples of the Sea" was made upon Egypt, which was successfully repulsed.

(5) The Decline (1085-332 B.C.). During Dyn. XXI (1085-945), the Tanite-Amonite period, the high priests of Amun at Thebes (Hrihor and his line) and the nobles of Tanis (Smenides and his line) strove for the royal power. In the meantime the Libyans were peacefully penetrating the country, and Sheshonk I, a Libyan, succeeded to the throne, thus establishing Dyn. XXII (945-745). See SHESHAK (SHESHONK) and ZERAH (OSORKON) under PHARAOH. The capital was now at Bubastis in e. Delta. Dynasties XXIII (745-718) and XXIV (718-712) were also Libyan.

Lower Nubia had been dominated by the Egyptians for over 1,800 years, and the region between the Second and Fourth Cataracts had been under Egyptian control for about 1,000 years. By the middle of the 8th century B.C., a fully developed Nubian kingdom appeared, with the seat of government at Napata, just below the Fourth Cataract. By 722 or 721 Piankhi, a Nubian king, was in the possession of Upper Egypt as far as Heracleopolis; he captured Memphis, and received the submission of the lords of the Delta. See SO (SIB'E). Dynasty XXV (712-663), known as the Nubian or Ethiopian Dyn., was founded by Shabaka, a brother of Piankhi; the 3d and last ruler was Taharka (Tirhakah), a son of Piankhi. See PHARAOH.

Both Libyans and Nubians were largely Egyptianized and ruled as Egyptian pharaohs. Next came the Assyrians. In 671, Esarhaddon conquered the Delta, and Taharka abandoned Lower Egypt. Twenty lords of the Delta swore fealty to the new ruler, but with the withdrawal of the Assyrian forces Taharka once more became ruler of the whole country. Under Ashurbanipal a new conquest (667) was made and the Assyrians penetrated as far as Thebes. In a 2d campaign by Ashurbanipal, Thebes was taken and sacked (663). Cf. Nahum 3:8-10.

With Psamtik (Psammetichus) I began the 26th or Saite Dyn. (663-525); the capital was then at Sais in the Delta. He was pharaoh under Assyrian suzerainty until about 651, when the Assyrian garrisons were withdrawn on account of the revolt of Babylon under Shamash-shum-ukin; accordingly Psamtik, who had built up an army of Anatolian and Ionian mercenaries, was left independent. Another view is that the mercenaries were sent by Gyges, king of Lydia, and that the Assyrian garrisons were driven out. During this period the nation once more flourished, and an attempt was made to emulate the glories of the past. He was succeeded by his son Necho II (609-593). See PHARAOH 5, 6. Psamtik II, who saw no hope of conquest in Asia, turned his attention to Nubia; his son Hophra (Apries) once more directed longing eyes to the ancient dominions of Egypt in Asia. Hophra lost his life in a civil war with Ahmose (Amasis) II (569-525), who succeeded him. During the reign of Ahmose II, Naucratis, a Greek city, was founded on the Canopic mouth of the Nile. Egypt's naval strength of this period was the foundation of the sea power which under the Ptolemies made Egypt the dominant state on the Mediterranean.

In 525 B.C., Egypt was conquered by Cambyses (Dyn. XXVII) and became a Persian satrapy. In 404 Amyrtæus made himself king and reigned for 6 years, Dyn. XXVIII. In 398, Nephertites revolted against Persia and founded Dyn. XXIX. Twenty years later, the last king of the dynasty, Hakori, died, and there followed Dyn. XXX, the last dynasty of native Egyptian kings to rule the whole land. The first king was Nectanebo I; in this late period the course of events was dependent on the kaleidoscopic change of politics in Greece. Artaxerxes Ochus sent an expedition which conquered the land (343-342). In 332 the country submitted to Alexander the Great, whom the people regarded as their deliverer. After his death, it was ruled by the Ptolemies.

In 30 B.C. it became a Roman province and was governed by the Romans until A.D. 395. Then it was under Byzantine rule until A.D. 639, when the Arabs conquered Egypt.

II. 4. Their religion. In the earliest period each town had its own deity. The religion of the Egyptians for the most part centered about the veneration of the sun and of the Nile, as sources of life. In the Egyptian religion primitive conceptions of various ages and places were retained; apparently nothing was given up, and a conglomeration resulted. Osiris, the god of the Nile, consequently became the god of fertility; he was also god of the underworld. Re, the sun-god, was worshiped at Heliopolis (On). With the rise of Thebes, the local god Amun received prominence and was finally identified with Re under the compound name Amun-Re. The moon, as the measurer of time, the god of reckoning, of letters, and of wisdom, was worshiped at Hermopolis. Ptah, a god of Memphis, was known as the and 2 grandsons were already in Egypt; and his 2 sons by Rachel's maid, with 5 grandsons (Gen. 46:8-25). "All the souls that came with Jacob into Egypt, that came out of his loins" (even though some perhaps were still unborn, cf. Heb. 7:9, 10), were 66 souls (Gen. 46:26). "All the souls of the house of Jacob" which came into Egypt first and last, including the head of the house and Joseph with his 2 sons who were born in Egypt, were 70 souls (v. 27). This is also the enumeration of Ex. 1:5 (as in Gen. 46:15, apparently exclusive of Jacob, but in reality inclusive of him) and Deut. 10:22. The LXX, however, and Stephen, who follows the Greek version (Acts 7:14), reckon 75. This result is due to the addition in Gen. 46:20 of 3 grandsons and 2 great-grandsons of Joseph, whose names are obtained from Num. 26:29 and 35 seq. according to the text of the LXX. The numerical correspondences of the register, a total of 70, and the descendants of each maid precisely half those of her

"Great Chief of Artificers." The Egyptians also had a number of sacred animals, such as the bull, cow, cat, baboon, jackal, crocodile, etc. Some of the deities had human bodies and animal heads. Anubis, the guide of the dead, had a jackal head; Thoth, the scribe of the gods, that of an ibis; Horus, the sun-god, that of a hawk. With the growth of the empire there developed the idea of a universal god in Egypt; Aton is clearly distinguished from the material sun. The religion fostered by Akhnaton was a short-lived solar monotheism. A remarkably clear knowledge of ethical and religious truths was possessed from very early times—truth in regard to human conduct, sin, justification, immortality, and, with all the nature worship, even in regard to God. Of special interest is the Egyptian conception of immortality.

III. The Sojourn of the Israelites in Egypt.

1. The descent into Egypt. A grievous famine prevailed throughout the whole known world, or at least throughout that region about the e. and s.e. shores of the Mediterranean Sea. During this distress Joseph, who had risen to authority at the court of Pharaoh second only to that of the king, urged his father and brethren to leave Canaan and settle temporarily in Egypt (Gen. 45:9-11; 47:4, 29, 30; 48:21; 50:24). Accordingly Jacob migrated with his tribe. It consisted of the patriarch himself, his 6 sons and 1 daughter by Leah, with 23 grandsons and 2 great-grandsons; his 2 sons by Leah's maid, with 11 grandsons, 1 grand-daughter, and 2 great-grandsons; his 2 sons by Rachel, with 12 grandsons, of whom 1 son mistress (Leah 32, Zilpah 16, Rachel 14, Bilhah 7), suggest design, and can scarcely be altogether accidental. A comparison with Num., ch. 26, leads to the belief that regard was had to the subsequent national organization in constructing this table, and that its design was to include those descendants of Jacob from whom permanent tribal divisions sprang. The tribe of Israel settled in Goshen, and remained in and about this fertile region until the Exodus (Gen. 47:6, 11; Ex. 8:22; 9:26; 12:37).

III. 2. The sojourn as embedded in the national consciousness. The descent of Jacob and his family into Egypt, their subsequent increase and enslavement, their sufferings and their exodus in a body, were recorded in their earliest historical document (Gen. 46:4, 28-34; 47:27; Ex. 1:9, 11, 15-22; 2:11; 12:31-37; 13:21). The feast of the passover, and to a less degree that of the tabernacles, bore testimony to the events, and kept the knowledge of them alive among the people. A historical sojourn and the Exodus are accepted as facts in the experience of the nation by both psalmists and prophets. The standing types of the grievous oppression of the Church and of God's redemptive power and love are Israel's bondage in Egypt and deliverance from that affliction. The tradition is not peculiar to one tribe, as though but a portion of the Hebrew folk had endured Egyptian slavery; it is not exclusively Judean, but it is Ephraimite as well. The prophets of both kingdoms voice it—Isaiah, Micah, and Jeremiah, among the hills of Judah (Isa. 11:16; Micah 6:4; 7:15; Jer. 2:6; 7:22), and Hosea and Amos in the kingdom of Samaria (Hos. 2:15; 8:13; 9:3; 11:1; 12:9, 13; Amos 2:10; 3:1; 9:7). The tradition is the common property of all Israel. The people as a whole had suffered Egyptian bondage.

III. 3. The duration of the sojourn. The Biblical data are stated in the following terms: "He said unto Abram, . . . Thy seed shall be a stranger in a land that is not theirs, and shall serve them; and they shall afflict them four hundred years. . . . But in the fourth generation they shall come hither again" (Gen. 15:13-16, A.V.). "Now the time that the children of Israel dwelt in Egypt was four hundred and thirty years" (Ex. 12:40, R.V.); according to the LXX and Samaritan Pentateuch in this passage, the sojourning "in Egypt and in the land of Canaan was four hundred and thirty years." God spake to Abraham "that his seed should sojourn in a strange land; and that they should bring them into bondage, and treat them ill four hundred years" (Acts 7:6). "The law . . . came four hundred and thirty years after" the covenant (Gal. 3:17).

These statements are interpreted to mean: (1) The Children of Israel dwelt in Egypt 215 years. For the LXX, either to remove an ambiguity or because the Hebrew MSS. differed from the present Hebrew text, adds the words, "And in the land of Canaan," to the statement in Ex. 12:40. Now from the date of the covenant with Abram, shortly after his arrival in Canaan, to the migration of his descendants into Egypt was about 215 years (cf. Gen. 12:4; 21:5; 25:26; 47:9), leaving 215 years for the sojourn of the Children of Israel in Egypt. This statement is also made by Josephus (Jos. Antiq. ii. 15, 2): "The Hebrews left Egypt 430 years after our forefather Abraham came into Canaan, but 215 years only after Jacob removed into Egypt." In this statement he is following the LXX, but he nullifies his statement by saying elsewhere, "Four hundred years did they spend under these labors" (Jos. Antiq. ii. 9, 1; War v. 9, 4; manifestly incorrect, for the Israelites were not oppressed for 400 years). But however Josephus may vacillate, Paul dates the law at Sinai 430 years after the covenant with Abram, and the genealogies give 4 generations between Jacob and the Exodus, which may cover 215 years, but scarcely 400 years (Ex. 6:16-20).

(2) The Children of Israel dwelt 430 years in Egypt. (a) The natural interpretation of Gen. 15:13-16 requires this. (i) The statement is not that the Israelites should be afflicted 400 years, but that the entire sojourn as strangers in a land not theirs, where they shall be eventually brought into bondage, is 400 years. (ii) The event is not to take place until after Abraham's death (v. 15). (iii) The 4 generations are equivalent to the aforementioned 400 years. In this passage, generation does not mean each succession of persons from a common ancestor, as it does in Ex. 20:5; Job 42:16, but the age or period of a body of contemporaries, and this not in our modern sense of the average lifetime of all who pass the age of infancy, but the average period of the activity of any generation, and this is determined by the normal span of life. The generation lasts while any of its members survive (Ex. 1:6; Num. 32:13; Judg. 2:10; Eccl. 1:4). The period of a generation's activity may be judged from the length of the life of Isaac, 180 years; of Jacob, 147 years; of Levi, 137; of Kohath, 133; of Amram, 137; of Aaron, 123; of Moses, 120 (Gen. 35:28; 47:28; Ex. 6:16, 18, 20; Num. 33:39; Deut. 34:7). Or the period of a generation's activity may be estimated from the record of 3 generations between the birth of Abraham and the descent into Egypt, when Jacob was still active, a period of 290 years. A generation was about 100 years. But are not just 4 generations registered—namely, Levi and Kohath, who came into Egypt with Jacob, Amram, Moses, and Moses' sons? A consecutive genealogy in Levi, Kohath, and Amram is admitted; but was Moses the son of Amram and Jochebed (Ex. 6:20; I Chron. 6:1-3)? A difficulty arises if the passage be so interpreted. In the first place, Amram and his brothers gave rise to the Amramites, Izharites, Hebronites, and Uzzielites; and these one year after the Exodus amounted to 8,600 males; that is, the grandfather of Moses had 8,600 male descendants in the days of Moses, of whom 2,750 were between the ages of 30 and 50 (Num. 3:27; 4:36). Furthermore, in the parallel genealogy of the contemporaries of Moses Bezalel is 7th from Jacob and Joshua apparently 11th (I Chron. 2:18-20; 7:23-27). The language of Ex. 6:20 does not necessarily, nor even evidently, mean that Amram and Jochebed were the immediate parents of Moses and Aaron. In Gen. 46:18, great-grandsons of Zilpah are mentioned with others as sons which she bore to Jacob. In Matt. 1:8 Joram is said to have begotten his great-great-grandson Uzziah. According to Gen. 10:15-18 Canaan begat nations. Where the birth of Moses is narrated in detail, he is not said to be the child of Amram and Jochebed (Ex., ch. 2). The reason for registering only 4 names in the genealogy of Moses and others (Ex. 6:16-22) is that the first 3 names are official and give the tribe, family, and father's house to which Moses and Aaron belonged. The 3 names properly and at once classify Moses and Aaron. (b) Four hundred and thirty years for the sojourn is also the record of Ex. 12:40. The statement does not include the sojourn of the patriarchs in Canaan, for (i) Abraham and Isaac were not sons of Israel, and (ii) the verse in the Heb., Targum, etc., except the LXX and Samaritan, makes no reference to Canaan. (c) Paul's statement in Galatians can be explained on the interpretation of the data as meaning that the sojourn lasted 430 years. It is not his object to measure the exact time between the covenant and the law. His argument only requires him to prove that the law was given long after the covenant, and hence cannot disannul it. He proves it by citing the well-known period of the sojourn which intervened between the two events, the largest and most familiar single sum of years in the interval. He does not mean to state that the law came exactly 430 years after the covenant, but he rather refers in a general way to a great period in Hebrew history. The length which had elapsed is immaterial to the argument. It seems, however, that Paul in this passage had the chronology of the LXX in mind, but this is indifferent.

III. 4. The multiplication of the Israelites during the sojourn. (1) It has been pointed out (Keil) that if from the 70 souls who went down into Egypt there be deducted the patriarch Jacob, his 12 sons, Dinah, and Serah daughter of Asher, and also the 3 sons of Levi, the 4 grandsons of Judah and Asher, and those grandsons of Jacob who probably died without male offspring, inasmuch as their descendants are not named among the families of Israel (see Num., ch. 26), there will remain 41 grandsons of Jacob (besides the Levites) who founded families; and if, furthermore, there be allowed but 10 generations for the 430 years, nevertheless the 41 men would increase to 478,224 males if each family averaged 3 sons and 3 daughters during the first 6 generations, and 2 sons and 2 daughters during the last 4 generations. These, with the survivors of the 9th generation, would amount to more than 600,000 men above 20 years of age. (2) It is a mistake to overlook the fact that the household of the patriarch included numerous servants (Gen. 30:43; 32:5; 45:10), who were circumcised (Gen. 17:12, 13) and enjoyed full religious privileges (Ex. 12:44, 48, 49, etc.), and with whom intermarriage was no degradation (Gen. 16:1, 2; 30:4, 9; Num. 12:1; I Chron. 2:34, 35).

III. 5. The change of occupation during the sojourn. When the Israelites settled in Goshen they were a comparatively small tribe, independent, and herdsmen. But after Joseph and the men of that generation died, a new king arose who knew not Joseph (Ex. 1:6-8). He saw the increasing numbers of the Israelites, and, fearing that they might ally themselves with the enemies of Egypt, took measures to render them a subject people and to check their increase. Taskmasters were placed over

Pharaoh sufficient evidence at the outset of the divine authority of Moses, without inflicting unnecessary sufferings upon the Egyptians; and when he refuses to let the Hebrews go, they become more intense, and bring increasing pressure upon his obdurate heart until he finally yields. Even though the first 9 plagues can be explained as natural phenomena, the rapid succession of events and the definite purpose constitute a miracle. (2) A distinction was made, between the people of God and the Egyptians (Ex. 8:22, 23; 9:4, 25, 26; 10:22, 23; 11:5-7; and cf. chs. 9:11; 10:6). (3) A pestilence might have slain a great number of the Egyptians in one night, but the 10th plague is a pestilence with a method, and cannot under any circumstances be explained as a mere phenomenon of nature. We have here a direct intervention by them, and rigorous service was exacted from them in the form of agriculture, brickmaking, and building (Ex. 1:11, 14; 5:6-8), while they still provided at least some of their own support by herding (chs. 9:4, 6; 10:9, 24; 12:38).

III. 6. The miracles wrought by Moses at the end of the sojourn. The oppression of the Israelites lasted 80 years or more (Ex. 7:7; cf. ch. 2:2 seq.). At length their cry came up unto God and he sent Moses to deliver them (ch. 2:23 seq.). The humble ambassador of heaven was provided with miracles as his credentials. They were actual miracles—in Scripture parlance, signs, wonders, and powers. They were wonderful, unusual, and intended to enforce attention. They were signs accrediting Moses as the messenger of God to the Israelites (chs. 4:8, 9, 30, 31; 6:7) and to Pharaoh (chs. 3:20; 4:21; 7:3-5; 8:22, 23). They were powers, not mere natural phenomena; for (1) design is apparent in them. Even though the first 9 plagues are in the realm of nature, God controls nature and uses natural phenomena to accomplish his purposes. The plagues form an orderly series; each one is in logical, but not causal, relation to its successor; they increase in severity, affording God. It is not a promiscuous death: the first-born of every family of the Egyptians dies.

These signs, wonders, and powers belong to the first group of miracles recorded in Scripture. See MIRACLE, PLAGUE.

III. 7. The organization of the Israelites at the end of the sojourn. The forefathers of the Children of Israel had descended into Egypt as a family of 12 households, and had settled together in Goshen. As is quite natural in itself, and as appears from the narrative, they retained their organization despite their enslavement. They did not amalgamate with the master race, but remained a distinct people and preserved the 12 great family divisions. By the end of the 430 years, the families of the 12 sons had become 12 tribes, and the sons' sons, and in a few instances the sons' remoter descendants, had grown into large family connections. Accordingly at the time of the Exodus there was a people, Israel, divided into 12 tribes; and each tribe was subdivided into families or connections, which derived their names for the most part from the grandsons of Jacob (cf. Ex. 6:14 with Gen. 46:9, and Num., ch. 26 with Gen., ch. 46) and at the time of the 2d census numbered 57, without Levi; and each family connection, into fathers' houses (Num. 1:2, 18, 20). Authority of various kinds was vested in: (1) princes by birth (Ex. 16:22); heads of the tribes or family connections (Num. 1:4, 16); (2) elders, who were probably heads of tribes and families, and aged (Ex. 4:29; 12:21; 17:5, 6); (3) apparently also in priests (Ex. 19:22, 24; perhaps cf. Ex. 24:5). They were probably men out of the various tribes who performed priestly functions for the Israelites, as Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob as heads of the family had offered sacrifice. (4) The Egyptians had imposed further organization on the Israelites by setting over them officers (Ex. 5:6, 10, 19), Hebrews (vs. 15, 16), who had undoubtedly been appointed on their ability to direct. Through these various representatives, Pharaoh and Moses communicated their will to all the people with dispatch. The Children of Israel, grouped in tribes, families, and fathers' houses, officered and accustomed to obedience, were not an unwieldy horde, but a multitude with the organization of an army. They were fittingly called the hosts or armies of the Lord, and it is significantly said that they went out of Egypt by their hosts (Ex. 12:41).

III. 8. The Pharaohs of the Oppression and the Exodus. For many years Ramesses II was commonly regarded as the pharaoh of the oppression, and Merenptah as the pharaoh of the Exodus. The whole matter is, however, still in a state of uncertainty. On the basis of archaeological evidence some authorities have fixed upon c. 1400 B.C. as the year of the destruction of the city of Jericho. This agrees well with the Biblical chronology. The 4th year of Solomon's reign was c. 968 B.C., which according to I Kings 6:1 was the 480th year after the Children of Israel were come out of Egypt. Making allowance for approximate dates, this brings the year of the Exodus to a date not far from 1450 B.C., the year in which Thutmose III died. Accordingly he would be the pharaoh of the oppression, and Amenhotep II (1450-1425), his successor, the pharaoh of the Exodus. According to Judg. 11:26, 300 years intervened between Israel's occupation of the East Jordan and Jephthah's day, which would favor the earlier date of the Exodus. According to one of the steles of Sethi I, 'Apiru' (Hebrews) were found in the vicinity of Beisan. Sethi I and Ramesses II mention the tribe of 'sr, identified by most scholars with Asher, as settled in n. Palestine in the 15th century. On the Merenptah stele there appears the word "Israel" as the name of a people of Palestine raided by the Egyptians, which is naturally clear evidence for the presence of the Israelites there at that time. This is against the theory which makes Merenptah the pharaoh of the Exodus.

Some archaeologists, however, maintain that Jericho did not fall as early as 1400 B.C., but contend for a date between c. 1375 and c. 1300; while Ai slightly later in the early 13th century, and Kiriath-sepher and Lachish around 1230, fell into Israelite hands. Naturally this interpretation of the fall of Jericho and other cities would place the Exodus at a date between c. 1415 and c. 1340.

From the Amarna letters we learn that during the reigns of Amenhotep III and IV, nomads known as the Habiru (or Hapiru) were invading Syria along the whole frontier. Habiru (Hapiru), which corresponds to Egyptian 'Apiru, may be equated philologically with Hebrew 'Ibri (Hebrew), which means, "One from the other side," and perhaps, "One who passes (from place to place), a nomad." Some think that the invasion of the Habiru is that of the Israelites under Joshua, since the conditions reflected in the Amarna tablets correspond so accurately to those depicted in The Book of Joshua. A Joshua appears in both accounts, but we have not sufficient grounds for identifying the 2 men.

There are, however, some historians who still consider Ramesses II as the pharaoh of the oppression and Merenptah (Merneptah) as the pharaoh of the Exodus. In Ex. 1:11 it is stated that the Children of Israel built for the pharaoh store cities, Pithom and Raameses. The inference is that the latter city was named for the reigning pharaoh. But this name hardly proves anything. It is now known that Avaris, the Hyksos capital; Raameses, the capital of Dyn. XIX; and Tanis were all successive phases of the same city.

The Amarna tablets, which come to an end before 1360 B.C., and the Egyptian lists do not mention the fortified towns n. of the Arnon. It has therefore been suggested that Sihon's kingdom was founded after the Amarna period. It is also maintained for archaeological reasons that the regions of Moab and Edom to the s. were almost entirely unoccupied by a sedentary population between the 19th and 13th centuries B.C. It has accordingly been concluded that the Israelites may have occupied Sihon's territory shortly before 1250 B.C., and thus the Exodus would be dated c. 1290 B.C. or a few years earlier. The date 1290 for the Exodus is not certain, but reckoning 430 years (Ex. 12:40) from the era of Tanis (c. 1720), we obtain the date 1290 B.C., but this agreement may be accidental. At any rate, if this date be correct or approximately so, Ramesses II was the pharaoh of the Exodus. The date of the Exodus cannot be definitely determined on the present evidence available.

E'hî (ē'hî). See AHIRAM.

E'hud (ē'hūd) [probably contraction of Abihud]. 1. A Benjamite, descended through Jediael (I Chron. 7:10).

2. A left-handed Benjamite, descended through Gera. He assassinated Eglon, king of Moab, then the oppressor of Israel. Fleeing to the hill country of Ephraim, he summoned the Israelites by sound of trumpet, put himself at their head, descended to the valley of the Jordan, seized the ford of the river, and slew 10,000 Moabites as they attempted to cross. He judged Israel for the remainder of his life, and kept the people true to Jehovah (Judg. 3:15 to 4:1).

E'ker (ē'kēr) [offshoot, stock; cf. Lev. 25:47]. A man of Judah, a son of Ram, of the house of Jerahmeel (I Chron. 2:27).

E'kron (ēk'rōn) [rooting out]. The most n. of the 5 chief Philistine cities (Josh. 13:3; I Sam. 6:16, 17). It was assigned to Judah (Josh. 15:45, 46), and afterward to Dan (ch. 19:43); but the boundary line of Judah ran past it (ch. 15:11), and it was taken and possessed by the men of that tribe (Judg. 1:18). After a time it was recovered by the Philistines. When the people first of Ashdod and then of Gath became afraid to retain the Ark of God, they sent it to Ekron, whence it was returned to Israel (I Sam. 5:10, 11). Samuel recovered Israel's border as far as Ekron (I Sam. 7:14); and the Philistines, fleeing when Goliath fell, were pursued to its gates (ch. 17:52). Baal-zebub was worshiped there, a god Ahaziah, king of northern Israel, sought to consult (II Kings 1:2-16). Judgment was denounced against it and the other Philistine cities by the prophets (Jer. 25:15-20; Amos 1:8; Zeph. 2:4; Zech. 9:5, 7). In 701 B.C. it closed its gates against Sennacherib, but in vain. Alexander Balas, king of Syria, gave Ekron to Jonathan Maccabaeus (I Macc. 10:89). It is believed to be represented by the village of 'Akir, 6 miles w. of Gezer and 12 n.e. from Azotus.

E'la (ē'lā), in A.V. E'lah [probably hypocoristic, El (God)+a (meaning uncertain, perhaps an element of greatness)]. The father of one of Solomon's purveyors (I Kings 4:18).

El'a-dah (ē'lā-dā). See ELEADAH.

E'lah (ē'lā) [terebinth]. 1. A valley near Socoth in which Saul and the Israelites pitched, confronting the Philistines, just before the combat between David and Goliath (I Sam. 17:2, 19; 21:9). Probably the wadi es-Sunt, which is formed by the junction of 3 other valleys, and is about 14 or 15 miles w. by s. from Bethlehem. It is fertile and traversed by a stream. Wadi es-Sunt means the valley of the acacia (Acacia vera).

2. A duke of Edom, named from his habitation (Gen. 36:41; I Chron. 1:52). See ELATH.

3. A son of Caleb, the son of Jephunneh (I Chron. 4:15).

4. A Benjamite, son of Uzzi (I Chron. 9:8).

5. The father of one of Solomon's purveyors. See ELA.

6. The son and successor of Baasha in the kingdom of Israel. He reigned part of 2 years. As he was drinking himself drunk in the house of his steward in Tirzah, his capital, he was assassinated, with all his house, by Zimri, who commanded half his chariots. This fulfilled the prophecy made by Jehu, the son of Hanani, to Baasha (I Kings 16:6, 8-10).

7. The father of Hoshea, king of Israel (II Kings 15:30; 17:1; 18:1).

E'lam (ē'lām) [Heb. ēlām, Akkad. elamtu, highland]. 1. Elam was a region beyond the Tigris, e. of Babylonia. It was bounded on the n. by Assyria and Media, on the s. by the Persian Gulf, on the e. and s.e. by Persia. The name is preserved in Gr. and Lat. Elymais. Its capital was Shushan or Susa, which gave rise to the name Susiana, though sometimes Elymais and Susiana are made the names of adjacent instead of identical regions.

Elam was the seat of an ancient empire. See BABYLONIA, HAMMURABI, ABRAHAM, IV, CHEDORLAOMER. The first known historical ruler to mention Elam in a contemporary inscription is Eannatum of Lagash, who boasts that he conquered Elam. This victory did not have a prolonged effect, since under one of his successors, Enetarsi, the Elamites plundered Lagash. Affairs took a different turn under Sargon of Agade, who calls himself "smiter of Elam and Barahsi" (a district on the n.w. border of Elam). His successors all were victorious, and Naram-Sin was master "of the land of Elam, all of it." As a result of the blows dealt by the dynasty of Agade, Babylonia had rest from Elamite invasions for 300 years, but was held in subjection by the Gutians for 125 years to c. 2125 B.C. Under Ibi-Sin, the brilliant Sumerian 3d Dyn. of Ur came to an end (c. 2025), and he was carried in fetters to Anshan. The stage was now set for a ruler of Elamite origin to become king of Sumer and Akkad. Kudur-Mabuk, near the end of the 2d millennium, became master of Larsa; he was not a barbarian, but a statesman and an organizer. He was succeeded by his sons, Warad-Sin and Rim-Sin. Under their reign the land was prosperous, and there was cultural activity. After having reigned for 60 years, Rim-Sin was defeated by Hammurabi. The way for Hammurabi's brilliant rule was clearly paved by the Elamites. Later on an Elamite conqueror carried the stone on which was inscribed the Code of Hammurabi to Susa, where it was found in A.D. 1901-1902. In the time of Abraham, Chedorlaomer, king of Elam, was recognized as sovereign by Babylonian states, and laid even the country on the Jordan under tribute (Gen. 14:1-11). In the 8th and 7th centuries B.C., when Assyria was the dominant power in western Asia, Elam was its doughty opponent; but was subjugated after repeated campaigns of the Assyrians under Sargon, Sennacherib, and Ashurbanipal. Shushan was at length taken about 645 B.C. Elamites rendered military service to the Assyrians in the invasion of Judah (cf. Isa. 22:6). But before the close of the century, Elam was relieved of the Assyrian yoke through the fall of Nineveh. When Ezekiel prophesied the invasion of Egypt by Nebuchadnezzar, he mentioned a prior slaughter of the Elamites, perhaps by Nebuchadnezzar (Ezek. 32:24). But Elam, joining with Media, was ultimately to capture Babylon (Isa. 21:2; cf. v. 9). The following prophecies regarding Elam seem to refer to conquest and restoration (Jer. 49:34-39; Ezek. 32:24, 25). Elam was a province and Shushan a capital of the Persian Empire (Dan. 8:2; Herod. iii. 91; iv. 83; v. 49). On the return of the Jews from Babylon, Elamites, who had long before been forcibly settled in Samaria, joined with others in attempting to prevent the rebuilding of the Temple and city of Jerusalem (Ezra 4:9). Elamites were present on that day of Pentecost which was notable for the descent of the Holy Spirit (Acts 2:9). Elam or Susiana, now Khūzistān, is a province of modern Iran.

2. The 5th son of Meshelemiah, a Korahite Levite, in the reign of David (I Chron. 26:3).

3. A Benjamite, a son of Shashak (I Chron. 8:24, 25).

4. The head of a family of which 1,254 individuals returned from Babylon with Zerubabel (Ezra 2:7; Neh. 7:12), and 71 more with Ezra (Ezra 8:7). Its representative signed the covenant in Nehemiah's time (Neh. 10:1, 14).

5. The other Elam, of whom just as many descendants returned as of No. 4 (Ezra 2:31; Neh. 7:34).

6. A priest who took part in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:42).

E'lam-ites (ē'lām-its). Inhabitants of Elam. They were not a Semitic people, but were the easternmost neighbors of the Semites. At an early period they had settled in the Tigris-Euphrates Valley; in fact the Elamites or a people closely related to them constituted an important element in the pre-Sumerian population of Babylonia. Probably on account of these ancient contacts they were listed among the sons of Shem (Gen. 10:22; I Chron. 1:17). Their language has some relations to the Caucasian or Japhetic group and was in use for at least 4,000 years.

El'a-sa (ē'lā-sā), in A.V. El'e-sa. A place at which Judas Maccabaeus once camped (I Macc. 9:5) probably Khirbet Il'asa, which lies midway between the 2 Beth-horons.

El'a-sah (ē'lā-sā) [God has made]; see ELESAH. 1. A son of Shaphan. He and Gemariah carried a letter from Jeremiah in Jerusalem to the exiles in Babylon (Jer. 29:1-3).

2. A son of Pashur, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:19, 22).

E'lath (ē'lāth) and E'loth, the singular or plural being used indifferently; cf. E'lah [terebinth or other large tree]. A town on the Gulf of 'Akabah (Deut. 2:8; I Kings 9:26), on the e. border of the wilderness of Paran (Gen. 14:6). The caravan routes between S. Arabia and Egypt and Phoenicia passed its gates, making its possession valuable to an exactor of tribute. It was taken by Chedorlaomer from the Horites (Gen. 14:5, 6). In it dwelt a chief of Edom (ch. 36:41), and it constituted the s. limit of the Edomites (Deut. 2:8). It doubtless fell into the hands of David (II Sam. 8:14; cf. I Kings 9:26; II Chron. 8:17). After a time it reverted to the Edomites. Uzziah rebuilt it and restored it to Judah (II Kings 14:22; II Chron. 26:2). It was afterward captured by the Syrians and long remained in their power (II Kings 16:6). Elath, called in the Greek and Roman period Aila and Aelana, gave the name Aelanitic to the Gulf of 'Akabah, at the n.e. corner of which it was situated. It was long the station of a Roman legion, and was once the seat of a Christian bishopric. An Early Iron Age Elath may be detected at Aila. Ezion-geber lay w. of Elath, but, from the time of Uzziah, Elath is to be identified with Ezion-geber. It is now called Aila and 'Akabah.

El-be'rith (ēl-bē'rith). See BAAL-BERITH.

El'-beth-el' (ēl'bēth'ēl') [God of Beth-el]. The name given by Jacob to an altar which he reared at Beth-el, after his return from Mesopotamia. It commemorated the appearance of God to him there in a dream when he was fleeing to escape the consequences of his brother's wrath (Gen. 35:7; cf. 28:10 seq.). The sanctuary was named after the God to whom it was dedicated. See EL-ELOHE-ISRAEL.

El-dā'ah (ēl-dā'ā) [perhaps, God has called; cf. Arab. dā'ā, to call]. A son or tribe descended from Midian and related to Abraham (Gen. 25:4; I Chron. 1:33).

El'dad (ēl'dād) [God has loved]. An elder and officer of the Israelites who was summoned with 69 others to assist Moses in bearing the burden of government. Eldad and Medad for some reason failed to present themselves with the others at the tabernacle; nevertheless they too, although absent in the camp, were filled like the others with the divine Spirit, who works when and where he will. Joshua was jealous for Moses' honor, which he feared would suffer because they had received the gift without the intervention of Moses; but Moses rejoiced, and only wished that the Lord would put his Spirit upon all his people (Num. 11:26-29).

Eld'er. An official who, so far as can be judged, had by virtue of his right as first-born succeeded to the headship of a father's house, of a tribal family, or of the tribe itself (I Kings 8:1-3; Judg. 8:14, 16). When he was the head and representative of a tribe or of the larger tribal families the elder was an important prince. Ordinarily, only men of mature age came into these positions; hence the designation "elder." Other peoples which were organized on the tribal system had elders, as the Midianites and Moabites (Num. 22:4, 7). The title designates high officials generally in Gen. 50:7. They exercised authority over the people (Deut. 27:1; Ezra 10:3), and represented the nation in affairs of state (Ex. 3:18; Judg. 11:5-11; I Sam. 8:4), in extending honor to a distinguished guest (Ex. 18:12), in concluding covenants (II Sam. 5:3), and in religious acts (Lev. 4:13-15; Josh. 7:6). A body of 70 elders assisted Moses in the government of the Israelites (Num. 11:16, 24). Each town had its elders, who were probably the heads of the several family connections in the place and who administered its civil and religious affairs (Deut. 19:12; 21:2; Ruth 4:2-11; I Sam. 11:3; Ezra 10:14). These functions were still performed by the elders at the time of the Roman government of Judea (Matt. 15:2; 21:23; 26:3, 47). See SYNAGOGUE and SANHEDRIN.

In the churches founded by the apostles, elder or presbyter and bishop were interchangeable designations (cf. Acts 20:17 with v. 28, R.V.; Titus 1:5, 7), though not strictly synonymous. The former had primary reference to the dignity of the office, the latter to its duties. The distinction between elder or presbyter and bishop, as 2 separate orders of ministers, dates from the 2d century. The origin of the office of elder is not recorded, but elders existed practically from the beginning. In A.D. 44 they already existed in the church at Jerusalem (Acts 11:30); Paul on his First Missionary Journey appointed elders in every church (ch. 14:23), and they held office in churches not founded by Paul (James 5:14; I Peter 5:1). The office of elder in the Christian Church was evidently suggested by the office of elder among the Jews, and was invested with similar authority. Elders were associated with the apostles in the government of the Church (Acts 15:2, 4, 6, 22, 23; 16:4; cf. 21:18). They were the bishops or overseers of the local churches (ch. 20:17, 28; Titus 1:5), having the spiritual care of the congregation, exercising rule and giving instruction (I Tim. 3:4, 5; 5:17; Titus 1:9; James 5:14; I Peter 5:1-4; cf. Heb. 13:17), and ordaining to office (I Cor. 4:14). There were several bishops (Phil. 1:1) or elders (Acts 11:30) in a local church. There is no intimation of any division of labor among them. As in the synagogue, so in the Christian Church of apostolic times, preaching was not the peculiar function of the elders, nor was it restricted to them. They were, indeed, the regular pastors and teachers. Aptness to teach was an essential qualification for the office (I Tim. 3:2; Titus 1:9). But any man who possessed the gift of prophecy or teaching exhorted (I Cor. 12:28-30; 14:24, 31).

In the government of Reformed Churches the teaching elder is the minister, and the ruling elder is a layman who is an elder. The arrangement is convenient, but its existence in apostolic times is not universally admitted. Calvin interpreted I Tim. 5:17 as teaching two kinds of elders: first, those who both teach and rule, and secondly, those who rule only. But there is a wide dissent from this interpretation. It is urged that the apostle is speaking of two functions of the same office, the primitive elder having been, it is contended, both teacher and ruler.

In the Apocalypse the elders are 24 in number, possibly with reference back to the 12 founders of tribes under the Jewish economy, and the 12 apostles under the Christian Church (Rev. 4:4, 10; 5:5, 6, 8, 14; 7:11-13; 11:16; 19:4).

El'e-ad (ēl'ē-ād) [God has testified]. A descendant, perhaps son, of Ephraim. He and his brother were killed by the people of Gath when attempting to carry away the cattle belonging to that Philistine town. Ephraim, who was alive at the time, greatly mourned his loss (I Chron. 7:20-22).

E'le-a-dah (ē-lē-a-dā), in A.V. El'a-dah [God has adorned].

A descendant of Ephraim (I Chron. 7:20).

E'le-a'leh (ē-lē-a-lē). A town rebuilt by the Reubenites (Num. 32:3, 37). Later it fell into the hands of the Moabites (Isa. 15:4; 16:9; Jer. 48:34). The ruins, now called el-'Al, are on top of a hill, scarcely 2 miles n.n.e. of Heshbon.

El'e'a'sa (ēl'ē-ā'sá). See ELASA.

El'e'a'sah (ēl'ē-ā'sá) [God has made]. In Hebrew it is the same word as Elasah. 1. A descendant of Judah through Jerahmeel, but with Egyptian blood in his veins (I Chron. 2:33, 39).

2. A descendant of Saul and Jonathan (I Chron. 8:33-37; 9:43).

El'e'a'zar (ēl'ē-ā'zēr) [God has helped; see LAZARUS]. 1. The 3d son of Aaron (Ex. 6:23; Num. 3:2) and father of Phinehas (Ex. 6:25). With his brothers and his father he was consecrated a priest, and afterward acted as such (Ex. 28:1; Num. 3:4; 16:39; 19:3). He was not allowed to mourn when his elder brothers, Nadab and Abihu, were killed for offering strange fire (Lev. 10:1-7). He then became chief of the Levites, and 2d only to Aaron in priestly authority (Num. 3:32). Before Aaron died on Mount Hor, Eleazar, who had been directed to ascend the mountain with him, was invested with his sacred garments, and succeeded him in the high priesthood (Num. 20:25-28; Deut. 10:6). He held this office during the remainder of Moses' life and the leadership of Joshua. He took a prominent part in distributing Canaan by lot among the several tribes (Josh. 14:1). He was buried in a hill belonging to his son Phinehas in Mount Ephraim (Josh. 24:33), and was succeeded by Phinehas (Judg. 20:28).

2. A Levite, family of Merari, house of Mahli. He died without sons; his daughters were taken to wife by their cousins (I Chron. 23:21, 22; 24:28; cf. Num. 36:6-9).

3. A son of Abinadab. He was consecrated by the men of Kiriath-jearim to keep the Ark when they nobly received it from Beth-she-mesh after its restoration by the Philistines (I Sam. 7:1).

4. One of David's mighty men, a son of Dodo (Dodai in R.V.), the Ahohite (II Sam. 23:9; I Chron. 11:12; cf. 27:4 perhaps).

5. A priest, son of Phinehas. He assisted the high priest in the time of Ezra (Ezra 8:33).

6. A son of Parosh, who was induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:18-25).

7. A priest, one of those who acted as musicians at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem in the time of Nehemiah (Neh. 12:27-42).

8. Surnamed Avaran, of priestly descent, a son of Mattathias and brother of Judas the Maccabee (I Macc. 2:5). In the battle between Judas and the Syrians at Beth-zacharias, he boldly ran into the ranks of the enemy, crept under an elephant whose trappings indicated that it carried a royal rider, and thrust it in the belly. The beast in its fall crushed Eleazar to death (ch. 6:43-46).

9. An ancestor, perhaps great-grandfather, of Joseph, the husband of Mary (Matt. 1:15).

El'e-c'trum [Lat. from Gr. ēlektron, a pale-yellow alloy of gold and silver; also amber, as in Homer]. Rendering of Hebrew hashmal in the LXX and Vulgate (Ezek. 1:4, 27; 8:2), followed by J.V. (text) and E.R.V. marg. A.V. translates "amber," and A.R.V. (text), "glowing metal."

El'-E-lo'he-Is-ra'el (ēl'ē-lō'hē-'iz-rā-ēl) [God, the God of Israel]. The name given by Jacob to an altar which he erected near Shechem (Gen. 33:20).

E'leph (ē'lēf) [an ox]. A village of Benjamin (Josh. 18:28). Site unknown, but near Jerusalem.

El'e-phant. A genus of animals containing two recent species—Elephas indicus, the Indian, and Elephas africanus, the African elephant, with several others now extinct. Their tusks furnish ivory (I Kings 10:22, A.V. marg.). The elephant was used in war (I Macc. 1:17; 3:34), each beast being in charge of an Indian driver, and bearing on its back a tower from which 2, 3, or 4 soldiers fought (I Macc. 6:37, where 32 is an obvious error; Livy xxxvii. 40). The entire body of elephants was under a master (II Macc. 14:12). Before they entered battle, it was customary to inflame them by the sight and even taste of wine (I Macc. 6:34; III Macc. 5:2).

El'e-phan-ti'ne (el'ē-fān-tī'nē). See SEVENEH.

E'leu'ther-us (ē-lū'thēr-ūs) [Lat. from Gr., free]. A river (I Macc. 11:7; Jos. Antiq. xiii. 4, 5) which flows from Lebanon and empties into the Mediterranean Sea n. of Tripoli, and which formed the boundary between Palestine and Syria (I Macc. 12:30; Jos. Antiq. xv. 4, 1). It is now called Nahr el-Kebir.

El-ha'n'an (ēl-hā'nān) [God has been gracious]. 1. A son of Jair and perhaps a Beth-lehemite, who slew [the brother of] Goliath of Gath (cf. II Sam. 21:19 with I Chron. 20:5). The text of at least one passage, perhaps of both, has become corrupt. The Hebrew letters of "Beth-lehemite Goliath," with the particle 'ēth between them in the text of Samuel, closely resemble those of "Lahmi the brother of Goliath."

2. A Bethlehemite, a son of Dodo, and one of David's 30 heroes of the 2d rank (II Sam. 23:24; I Chron. 11:26).

E'li, I (ē'lī) [Heb., my God, but occasionally also used in Aramaic]. A word in the utterance of Jesus on the cross, spoken in Aram., 'ēli, 'ēmā(h) shēbaqtāni: "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" (Matt. 27:46; cf. Ps. 22:1). In Mark 15:34, instead of Eli, we have Eloi, which is for Aram. 'ēlāhi (ā being transliterated as ō).

E'li, II (ē'lī) [high; perhaps contraction for "God is high"]. A high priest of the family of Ithamar (I Sam. 1:9; cf. I Kings 2:27 and I Chron. 24:3, 6). He is said to have been the first of Ithamar's line to receive the office (Jos. Antiq. v. 11, 5; viii. 1, 3), but it is uncertain which priest of the other line he succeeded. Eli was also active as a judge of Israel. Being deeply pious, he had an essential qualification for his exalted offices. But there was one serious defect in his conduct: he did not deal firmly with his two sons, Hophni and Phinehas, when their behavior in the priestly office was scandalous (I Sam. 2:23-25; 3:13). Divine judgment was therefore denounced against him and his house by a prophet: Eli should see evil befall the sanctuary, his descendants should die in the flower of their age, his 2 sons should perish in one day, and a faithful priest should supersede Eli's descendants, from whom they should seek for subordinate priestly appointments that they might be fed (ch. 2:27-36). The message was confirmed by a similar revelation to young Samuel, which Eli received with resignation (ch. 3:11-18). Soon afterward Hophni and Phinehas, as custodians of the Ark, carried it to the field of battle, to aid the Israelites against the Philistines. Eli, now 98 years old and blind, being anxious for the Ark, took his seat by the wayside to watch. A runner arrived from the scene of strife with the news of Israel's defeat, the death of Hophni and Phinehas, and the capture of the Ark of God. On hearing that the Ark of God had been taken by the enemy, Eli fell backward from the seat and broke his neck and expired (ch. 4:1-18). He had judged Israel 40 years. With the death of Eli, the office lost for a long time its importance, for the Ark was in captivity and seclusion, and the tabernacle was no longer the place of Jehovah's gracious presence. Samuel the prophet was the religious leader of the people. The judgment against Eli's posterity was executed when Solomon deposed Eli's descendant Abiathar from the high priesthood, substituting Zadok in his room (I Kings 2:35).

E-li'ab (ê-lî'āb) [God is a father]. 1. The son of Helon, and the head of the tribe of Zebulun in the wilderness (Num. 1:9; 2:7; 7:24, 29; 10:16).

2. A Reubenite, son of Pallu and father of Dathan and Abiram (Num. 16:1, 12; 26:8, 9).

3. A Levite, an ancestor of Samuel (I Chron. 6:1, 27, 28). See ELIHU 1.

4. David's eldest brother. He was so tall and had so kingly a countenance that on seeing him Samuel exclaimed, "Surely Jehovah's anointed is before him." But, judged by the heart, he was not worthy of the kingdom (I Sam. 16:6, 7; 17:13). One defect which he had was his inability to appreciate the larger soul of David, his youngest brother (ch. 17:28, 29). His daughter Abigail married a son of David (II Chron. 11:18).

5. A Gadite, of the heroic type who joined David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:1, 8, 9).

6. A Levite, musician at the sanctuary in David's reign (I Chron. 15:12, 16, 20).

E-li'a-da (ê-lî'ā-dā), in A.V. once E-li'a-dah (ê-lî'ā-dā) (I Kings 11:23) [God has known—i.e., kindly regarded]. 1. A son of David, born at Jerusalem (II Sam. 5:13-16; I Chron. 3:8). Called also Beeliada (q.v.).

2. Father of Rezon of Zobah (I Kings 11:23).

3. A Benjamite, one of Jehoshaphat's chief captains (II Chron. 17:17).

E-li'ah (ê-lî'ā). See ELIJAH 2 and 4.

E-li'ah-ba (ê-lî'ā-bā) [God conceals (i.e., defends)]. A Shaaalonite, one of David's mighty men (II Sam. 23:32; I Chron. 11:33).

E-li'a-kim (ê-lî'ā-kim) [God will establish].

1. An ancestor of Christ. He lived before the Captivity, and was descended from David through Nathan (Luke 3:30, 31).

2. Son of Hilkiah. He was over King Hezekiah's household; and when Jerusalem had closed its gates against the Assyrians, he was one of 3 representatives of the king who were sent to confer with the Rabshakeh of Sennacherib (II Kings 18:18, 26, 37; Isa. 36:3, 11, 22). Next they were dispatched to lay the answer of the Rabshakeh before Isaiah, and desire him to obtain divine direction in the great crisis which had arisen (II Kings 19:2; Isa. 37:2). The prophet so highly commended Eliakim, and made him such promises from God, as to suggest that he must be regarded as a type of the Messiah (Isa. 22:20-25).

3. One of Josiah's sons, made king by Pharaoh-necho, who changed his name to Jehoiaakim (II Kings 23:34; II Chron. 36:4).

4. One of the priests who officiated at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:27, 41).

5. A descendant of Zerubbabel and an ancestor of Christ (Matt. 1:13).

E-li'am (ê-lî'ām) [God is a kinsman]. Father of Bath-sheba (II Sam. 11:3); by transposition of the constituent parts of the name called Ammiel (I Chron. 3:5). Perhaps he was David's mighty man of this name, the son of Ahithophel (II Sam. 23:8, 34).

E-li'as (ê-lî'ās). See ELIJAH.

E-li'a-saph (ê-lî'ā-sāf) [God has added]. 1. The head of the tribe of Gad in the wilderness (Num. 1:4, 14; 2:14; 7:42).

2. A Levite, the son of Lael, and prince of the Gershonites during the wilderness wandering (Num. 3:24).

E-li'a-shib (ê-lî'ā-shīb) [God will restore].

1. The ancestor from whom the 11th priestly course took its name (I Chron. 24:1, 12).

2. A Levite and singer whom Ezra induced to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:10, 19, 24).

3 and 4. Two men, a son of Zattu and a son of Bani, similarly persuaded by Ezra (Ezra 10:27, 36).

5. The high priest, the 2d in succession from Jeshua (Neh. 12:10). He lived in the time of Nehemiah, and with the priests rebuilt the sheepgate of Jerusalem (ch. 3:1, 20, 21). As high priest he could assign chambers in the Temple to whomsoever he pleased (Ezra 10:6). He was allied by marriage with Tobiah the Ammonite, and his grandson was son-in-law of Sanballat (Neh. 13:4, 28). Not being strict in regard to the separation of Jew and Gentile, he even assigned a chamber of the Temple to Tobiah (v. 5).

6. A son of Elioenai, a descendant of Zerubbabel (I Chron. 3:24).

E-li'a-thah (ê-lî'ā-thā) [God has come]. A son of Heman, and a musician in the reign of David (I Chron. 25:1, 4, 27).

E-li'dad (ê-lî'dād) [God has loved]. A prince of the tribe of Benjamin at the time when the Israelites were encamped at Shittim on the eve of entering the Promised Land. He was appointed a member of the commission to divide the land among the tribes (Num. 24:17, 21).

E-li'e-ho-e'nai (ê-lî'ê-hô-ē'nī), in A.V. ELI'ho-e'nai [to Jehovah are my eyes]. See also ELIOENAI. 1. A Korahite porter, the son of Meshelemiah (I Chron. 26:2, 3). A.V. has the variant Elioenai.

2. A son of Zerariah. He, with 200 followers, accompanied Ezra from Babylon (Ezra 8:1, 4).

E-li-el (ê-lî-ēl) [El (God) is God]. 1. A Levite, family of Kohath, and an ancestor of Samuel the prophet (I Chron. 6:1, 34). See ELIHU.

2. A Mahavite, one of David's mighty men (I Chron. 11:26, 46).

3. Another of David's heroes (v. 47).

4. One of the Gadites who came to David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:1, 8, 11).

5. A Levite, a son of Hebron. He lived in David's time (I Chron. 15:9, 11).

6. A Benjamite, a son of Shimei (Shimhi) (I Chron. 8:1, 20, 21).

7. Another Benjamite, a son of Shashak (I Chron. 8:22, 25).

8. A chief man of the half tribe of Manasse e. of the Jordan (I Chron. 5:24).

9. An overseer of the tithes and offerings in the reign of Hezekiah (II Chron. 31:13).

E-li'e-nai (ê-lî'ē-nī). Probably a contraction of Elihoenai. A Benjamite, a son of Shimei (Shimhi) (I Chron. 8:1, 20).

E-li'e-zer (ê-lî'ē-zēr) [God is a helper]. 1. A man of Damascus, the steward of Abraham (Gen. 15:2; cf. 24:2).

2. The younger son of Moses (Ex. 18:4; I Chron. 23:15, 17).

3. A Benjamite, family of Becher (I Chron. 7:8).

4. A son of Zichri. He was a captain over the Reubenites in David's reign (I Chron. 27:16).

5. A priest who blew the trumpet before the Ark in David's reign (I Chron. 15:24).

6. A prophet, son of Dodavahu of Mareshah. He predicted the shipwreck of Jehoshaphat's vessels because he had joined with Ahaziah, of Ahab's family (II Chron. 20:37).

7. One of those whom Ezra sent for Levites, when it was found that there were few of them among the returning exiles (Ezra 8:16).

8, 9, and 10. Three men, one a priest, one a Levite, and one a son of Harim, whom Ezra induced to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:10, 18, 23, 31).

11. An ancestor of Christ who lived between the time of David and the Captivity (Luke 3:29).

El'i-ho-e'nai (ēl'i-hō-ē'nī). See ELIEHOENAI.

El'i-ho'reph (ēl'i-hō'rēf) [perhaps, God is (the giver of) autumn (fruit)]. One of Solomon's scribes (I Kings 4:3).

E-l'i-hu (ē-lī'hū) [El (God) is He, or He is God]. 1. An Ephraimite, son of Tohu and an ancestor of Samuel the prophet (I Sam. 1:1), apparently called also Eliab and Eliel (I Chron. 6:27, 34).

2. David's eldest brother, called also Eliab (cf. I Sam. 16:6 with I Chron. 27:18). See JESSE.

3. A Manassite captain who with others joined David on his way to Ziklag (I Chron. 12:20).

4. A doorkeeper during David's reign, of the family of Obed-edom (I Chron. 26:1, 7).

5. One of Job's friends, a Buzite, the son of Barachel (Job, chs. 32 to 37).

6. A forefather of Judith; A.V., Eliu (Judith 8:1).

E-l'i-jah (ē-lī'jā); in A.V. twice E-l'i'ah (I Chron. 8:27; Ezra 10:26); in A.V. of N.T. E-l'i'as, the Gr. form of the name [Jehovah is God]. 1. One of the greatest of the prophets. He was a Tishbite, having been born perhaps at Tishbeh in Galilee; but he dwelt in Gilead (I Kings 17:1); see TISHBITE. He wore a garment of skin or of coarse camel's hair, which was girt about his loins with a leather girdle (II Kings 1:8; I Kings 19:13). When Ahab, influenced by his wife, Jezebel of Tyre, had given himself to the worship of the Tyrian god Baal, Elijah suddenly appeared upon the scene. He presented himself before the erring king, and predicted a drought of indefinite duration as a penalty for the rejection of Jehovah. On account of the famine he retired first to the brook Cherith, where he was providentially fed by ravens; see RAVEN. When the brook became dry he went to Zarephath on the coast of the Mediterranean, n. of Tyre. A widow trusted God and shared her last cake with Elijah. God saw to it that her jar of meal and cruse of oil did not fail until the famine was ended; and when her son died he was restored to life at the prayer of the prophet (I Kings, ch. 17). After many days, in the 3d year (I Kings 18:1), Elijah was directed to show himself to Ahab. Then followed the scene at Mount Carmel. The priests of Baal endeavored to secure evidence of Baal's divinity, but failed. Then Elijah gathered the people about an ancient altar of the Lord; he repaired it, taking 12 stones for the purpose, thus silently testifying that the division of the 12 tribes into two kingdoms was at variance with the divine will. To obviate every possibility of fraud, he made the people drench the sacrifice and the altar with water. Then he cried to the Lord. Fire fell, and consumed the sacrifice and destroyed the altar. Jehovah had attested his existence and his power. Baal's prophets, proved to be impostors, were taken down to the brook Kishon, at the foot of the mountain, and slain at Elijah's bidding (I Kings 18:1-40; cf. Deut. 17:2-5; 13:13-16). The people had acknowledged Jehovah and obeyed his prophet, and the token of God's returning favor was seen in the gathering clouds of rain; and the prophet, to do honor to the king as ruler of a realm now professedly the kingdom of God, girded up his loins and ran before the chariot of Ahab to the gate of Jezreel (I Kings 18:41-46); see FORERUNNER. But Jezebel, furious at the destruction of her prophets, vowed the death of Elijah, who fled to Mount Horeb. There, like Moses, he was divinely sustained for 40 days and nights (Ex. 24:18; 34:28; Deut. 9:9, 18; I Kings 19:8), a foreshadowing of the similar incident in the life of Jesus (Matt. 4:2; Luke 4:2). Elijah was rebuked, sent back to duty, and told to anoint Hazael as king of Syria and Jehu as king of Israel, that they might be the scourge of God to idolatrous Israel, and Elisha as his successor. Elijah cast his mantle upon Elisha, calling him to the work, and entrusted to him the further execution of the commission (I Kings, ch. 19).

When Jezebel had Naboth judicially murdered in order to obtain his vineyard for Ahab, Elijah met the king in the coveted plot of ground and denounced Jehovah's vengeance for the crime (ch. 21). The death of Ahab in the battle of Ramoth-gilead was the beginning of the judgment which Elijah had uttered against the royal house (ch. 22:1-40). When Ahab's son and successor, Ahaziah, injured by a fall from a window, sent messengers to the idol temple at Ekron to ask whether he should recover from his hurt, Elijah stopped them and turned them back; and twice when a captain with 50 men was sent apparently to arrest him, he called fire from the sky which consumed them. The 3d captain begged for his life, and Elijah went with him to the king (II Kings 1:1-16). Finally the prophet obtained the honor, bestowed before only on Enoch (Gen. 5:24), of being translated to heaven without dying. A chariot and horses of fire appeared to him when he had gone with his attendant Elisha to the e. of the Jordan, and, parting them asunder, took Elijah up in a whirlwind to heaven (II Kings 2:1-12). The event seems to have occurred just before Jehoram of Israel ascended the throne (II Kings, ch. 2; cf. chs. 1:18; 3:1) and during the reign of Jehoshaphat of Judah (ch. 3:11); yet Elijah wrote a document in which he addressed Jehoram of Judah, who indeed was a coregent with Jehoshaphat, and threatened him with divine judgment, not only for sins committed during the lifetime of Jehoshaphat, but for murder which he committed after Jehoshaphat's death (II Chron. 21:12-15; cf. v. 13 with v. 4). If Elijah was translated at the time indicated, he prophesied during his lifetime concerning future deeds of Jehoram, just as he foretold future acts of Hazael and Jehu (I Kings 19:15-17). Less in accordance with the language of II Kings 3:11 is the explanation that the account of Elijah's translation is inserted where it is in II Kings simply to complete the narrative of his public activity, and that Elijah was still alive when Elisha was with the army of Jehoshaphat in southern Judah, and was living when Jehoram became sole king. The last 2 verses of the O.T. predict that God will send Elijah before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord (Mal. 4:5, 6). The N.T. explains that the reference is to John the Baptist, who was like the Tishbite in humble dress and appearance (Matt. 3:4; Mark 1:6), in fidelity and in work (Matt. 11:11-14; 17:10-12; Mark 9:11-13; Luke 1:17).

There are those, however, who contend that while John appeared in the spirit and power of Elijah, the O.T. prophet is yet to come, in person, before the Second Advent of Christ. Elijah appeared on the Mount of Transfiguration as the representative of the O.T. prophecy to do honor to Jesus (Matt. 17:4; Mark 9:4; Luke 9:30); and Elijah's ascension, to which there was nothing analogous in the history of John the Baptist, doubtless foreshadowed that of our risen Lord.

The miracles which were wrought during the ministry of Elijah belong to the 2d of the 4 miracle periods of redemptive history, the period of the life-and-death struggle between the religion of Jehovah and Baal worship, when the adherence of the people of northern Israel to the faith of their fathers was at issue, and all other questions regarding religious observances sank to minor importance. See MIRACLE.

2. A Benjamite, a son of Jeroham, resident at Jerusalem (I Chron. 8:27, R.V.).

3. A priest, a son of Harim. He married a Gentile wife (Ezra 10:18, 21).

4. An Israelite induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:19, 26, R.V.).

E-li'ka (ê-lî'kâ) [perhaps, God has spewed out (rejected)]. A Harodite, one of David's mighty men (II Sam. 23:8, 25).

E'lim (ê'lîm) [large trees, such as oaks, terebinths, palms]. The 2d encampment of the Israelites after the passage of the Red Sea. It was between Marah and the desert of Sin, and had 12 springs of water and 70 palm trees (Ex. 15:27; 16:1; Num. 33:9, 10). It is identified with the oasis of Wadi Gharandel, 63 miles from Suez; here there is a permanent discharge of about 84 quarts (U.S. measure) of water per second. The vegetation consists of palm trees, tamarisks, and acacias.

E'lim'e-leh (ê-lîm'ê-lêk) [God is king]. A man of Bethlehem of Judah, the husband of Naomi (Ruth 1:1-3).

E-li'o-e'nai (ê-lî'ô-ê'nî) [my eyes (are turned) toward Jehovah]. Variant of Eliehoenai. 1. A descendant of Simeon (I Chron. 4:24, 36).

2. A Benjamite, family of Becher (I Chron. 7:8).

3. A Levite (I Chron. 26:3, A.V.). See ELIEHOENAI.

4 and 5. Two Hebrews, each of whom was induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:10, 19, 22, 27).

6. A man of Judah, descended from Shecaniah (I Chron. 3:22-23).

E-li'phal (ê-lî'fâl) [God has judged]. One of David's mighty men, a son of Ur (I Chron. 11:26, 35). Apparently called Eliphelet, the son of Ahasbai (II Sam. 23:34). See UR, II.

E-li'ph'a-let (ê-lî'f'â-lêt). See ELIPHELET.

E-li'phaz (ê-lî'fâz) [possibly, God is fine gold]. 1. A son of Esau, by Adah, one of his wives (Gen. 36:4).

2. A Temanite, one of Job's friends (Job 2:11; 4:1; 15:1; 22:1; 42:7, 9). Probably a descendant of No. 1, who had a son Teman (Gen. 36:11).

E-li'ph'e-leh (ê-lî'f'ê-lê'hû), in A.V. E-li'ph'e-leh (ê-lî'f'ê-lê) [may God distinguish him]. A Levite, a singer and a harper, who acted also as a porter when David brought up the Ark from the house of Obed-edom (I Chron. 15:15-21).

E-li'ph'e-let (ê-lî'f'ê-lêt), in A.V. twice E-li'ph'a-let [God is deliverance]. 1. A son born to David in Jerusalem (I Chron. 3:5, 6). A correct Hebrew alternate form is Elpalet, in A.V.; Elpelet, in R.V. (ch. 14:5).

2. Another son of David's, born also at Jerusalem, probably after the death of the former (II Sam. 5:16; I Chron. 3:8; 14:7).

3. A son of Ahasbai, and one of David's mighty men (II Sam. 23:34). Apparently called Eliphal in I Chron. 11:35.

4. A descendant of Jonathan and of Saul (I Chron. 8:33, 39).

5. A son of Adonikam. He returned with Ezra from Babylon (Ezra 8:13).

6. A son of Hashum. Ezra induced him to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:33).

E-li-s'a-beth (ê-lî'z'â-bêth) [Lat. from Gr. Elisabet(h), from Heb. 'êlishaba', God is an oath, i.e., the absolutely faithful One or a covenant maker]. A godly woman, a daughter of the house of Aaron, and bearing the name of Aaron's wife (Ex. 6:23, Elisheba). She became the wife of the priest Zacharias and the mother of John the Baptist. She bore him when she was of advanced years, his birth and mission having been communicated beforehand by an angel to her husband. Though of different tribes, she and Mary of Nazareth were kinswomen, and Mary visited Elisabeth at a village in the hill country of Judea. Elisabeth, inspired by the Holy Spirit welcomed Mary as the mother of the Lord (Luke 1:5-45).

E-lī'sha (ê-lī'shâ), in A.V. (Luke 4:27) El'ise'us (êl'i-sê'ûs) for Elisaios, the Greek form of the name [God is salvation]. The successor of Elijah in prophetic work in the Northern Kingdom. He was the son of Shaphat, dwelt at Abel-meholah in the Jordan valley, and belonged to a family of means; 12 yoke of oxen plowed his father's fields, God appointed him to succeed Elijah (I Kings 19:16, 19). Elijah found him plowing and cast his mantle over him. Elisha understood the significance of the act; he went home, gave a farewell feast to the people, and returned to be the follower and assistant of Elijah (vs. 19-21). When Elijah went beyond the Jordan to be translated to heaven, Elisha kept by him and, when told to ask a parting gift, he had the wisdom to petition for a double portion of Elijah's spirit. He saw the fiery chariot bear his master away and, taking the mantle which had fallen from Elijah, he struck the Jordan with it, which divided and permitted him to cross to its w. side (II Kings 2:1-18). His subsequent life was marked by a series of miracles, some of knowledge, others of power, expressly wrought in the name of the Lord. They belong to the 2d group of miracles in redemptive history. See MIRACLE. They occurred at a time when the religion of Jehovah was engaged in a desperate struggle for existence against Baal worship, and, like the miracles wrought by Elijah, were intended to accredit the prophet and to attest Jehovah to be the living God. The miraculous power was so much under Elisha's control that apparently he could exercise it at discretion; and he used it largely, as did Christ, in simple deeds of kindness. In the name of the Lord he healed with salt the waters of the spring at Jericho (vs. 19-22). He pronounced Jehovah's curse on lads who mocked in him the prophet of the Lord, and 2 bears presently tore 42 of them (vs. 23-25). He foretold the success of the expedition against Moab (ch. 3:11-27), secured the increase of a widow's oil (ch. 4:1-7), predicted to a Shunammite woman the birth of a son, and at his prayer that son was restored to life when he had died (vs. 8-37). He named an antidote to a poisonous plant in the pot in which food was being cooked for the prophets (vs. 38-41). As prophet of the Lord, he fed 100 men with 20 barley loaves and a few ears of corn (ch. 42-44), told Naaman to wash in the Jordan and he would be healed of his leprosy (ch. 5:1-19), and foretold its transference to Gehazi as a punishment for lying and covetousness (vs. 20-27). He made an iron axhead, which had fallen into the river, float to the surface (ch. 6:1-7). He informed the king of Israel of the movements and intentions of his Syrian rival (vs. 8-12). At his prayer, the Lord revealed to the prophet's servant horses and chariots of fire surrounding them for their protection (vs. 13-17), and caused blindness to fall on the Syrian emissaries sent to arrest them (vs. 18-23). He intimated, without being told it, that a messenger from the king of Israel was at the door to take his life (vs. 32, 33). He predicted great plenty and consequent cheapness of food in Samaria, while it was at famine prices during a siege, adding, however, that an unbelieving lord who discredited the prediction should not participate in the boon, and he did not, for he was trampled to death in a crowd (ch. 7). He informed Ben-hadad, king of Syria, of his approaching death (ch. 8:7-15). He declared the destruction of Ahab and his whole house, and sent a young prophet to anoint Jehu to execute the threatened judgment (chs. 9:1 to 10:28). He predicted 3 victories over the Syrians (ch. 13:14-19). Finally, after his death, a man hastily cast into the same sepulcher was at once restored to life on touching the prophet's bones (vs. 20, 21).

E-lī'shah (ê-lī'shâ). The descendants of Javan collectively, who inhabited the country of Elishah (Gen. 10:4). This country was maritime and exported blue and purple dye stuffs (Ezek. 27:7). It has been variously explained as Hellas, Elis, Aeolis, Italy, and Carthage. Philological objections weigh against the first 4; and there is no proof that Carthage was ever called Elis, which is another name for its queen, Dido. Alishiya, a country near Cilicia, whose king exchanged correspondence with the pharaohs of the 18th Egyptian dynasty, has been suggested. This identification commends itself.

E-līsh'a-ma (ê-līsh'â-mâ) [God has heard]. 1. Son of Ammihud, and prince of the Ephraimites at the beginning of the sojourn in the wilderness (Num. 1:10; 2:18), and ancestor of Joshua (I Chron. 7:26).

2. A man of Judah, descended through Jerahmeel and Sheshan (I Chron. 2:33-41).

3. A son of David, born at Jerusalem (I Chron. 3:1, 5, 6). See ELISHUA.

4. Another son of David (II Sam. 5:16; I Chron. 3:8).

5. A priest, one of those sent by Jehoshaphat to teach in the cities of Judah (II Chron. 17:7, 8).

6. A prince and scribe in the reign of King Jehoiakim (Jer. 36:9, 12, 20, 21), and probably identical with the grandfather of Ishmael of the seed royal who murdered Gedaliah, the governor of Judea under the Babylonians (II Kings 25:25; Jer. 41:1).

E-līsh'a-phat (ê-līsh'â-fât) [God has judged]. One of the captains of hundreds who supported Jehoiada in the revolt against Athaliah (II Chron. 23:1).

E-līsh'e-ba (ê-līsh'ê-bâ) [God is an oath]. Daughter of Amminadab, and sister of Nahshon. She became the wife of Aaron, and the mother of Nadab, Abihu, Eleazar, and Ithamar (Ex. 6:23).

El'ī-shu'a (êl'ī-shû'â) [God is salvation]. A son of David, born at Jerusalem (II Sam. 5:15; I Chron. 14:5). In the corresponding position in the 3d list of David's sons (ch. 3:6) the name Elishama appears. In view of the reading of the other catalogues, and since the name Elishama was borne by another of David's sons, mentioned farther on in all 3 lists, it is reasonable to believe that Elishama in I Chron. 3:6 is a misreading of Elishua.

El'ī'ud (ê-lī'ûd) [Lat. from Gr. Elhoud, probably from Heb. ʿĒlîhōd, God is majesty]. Son of Achim, and father of Eleazar, in the ancestry of Christ (Matt. 1:14, 15).

El'ī-za'phan (êl'ī-zâ'fân) or El-za'phan, the forms being interchangeable in Hebrew [God has concealed]. 1. Son of Uzziel, and chief of the Kohathites in the wilderness (Ex. 6:18, 22; Num. 3:30). He assisted in removing the bodies of Nadab and Abihu from the camp (Lev. 10:4). A new father's house was derived from him (I Chron. 15:8; II Chron. 29:13).

2. Son of Parnach, and prince of the tribe of Zebulun in the wilderness (Num. 34:25).

El'ī'zur (ê-lī'zēr) [God is a rock]. The prince of the Reubenites in the wilderness, the son of Shedeur (Num. 1:5; 2:10).

El-ka'nah (êl-kā'nâ) [God has created or acquired]. 1. A Levite, family of Kohath, house of Izhar, division of Korah. He was brother of Assir and Abiasaph (Ebiasaph) (Ex. 6:24; I Chron. 6:23, 36).

2, 3, and 4. Three Levites, links in one genealogy, one the son of Joel, the 2d the son of Mahath, and the 3d the son of Jeroham. Like the preceding, they were of the family of Kohath, house of Izhar, Korahite division; but they were descended from Abiasaph (I Chron. 6:36, son of Joel; vs. 26, 35, of Mahath; vs. 27, 34, and I Sam. 1:1, of Jeroham). The last of the 3 belonged to the hill country of Ephraim, lived at Ramathaim of the Zophites, was the husband of Hannah and Peninnah, and the father of Samuel (I Sam. 1:1; 2:11, 20).

5. Another Korahite who had dwelt in Benjamin, perhaps because the Korahites were doorkeepers of the tabernacle which was pitched in Benjamin (I Chron. 9:19), and who joined David at Ziklag (ch. 12:1, 6).

6. A doorkeeper for the Ark during the reign of David (I Chron. 15:23).

7. A high dignitary at the court of Ahaz, 2d only to the king (II Chron. 28:7).

8. A Levite who dwelt in a village of the Netophathites (I Chron. 9:16).

El'kosh-ite (ēl'kōsh-īt). A citizen of Elkosh (Nahum 1:1). The tradition that Alkush, 2 days' journey n. of Nineveh, was the birth and burial place of Nahum is late, being unknown to early Arabian and Syrian writers; and the contents of The Book of Nahum are against it. A credible, but unproved, identification is with the town Elcesi, or Helcesaei, in Galilee, which was pointed out to Jerome. According to another tradition, preserved by Epiphanius, Elkosh lay to the s. of Begabar, in Syriac Bēt Gabrē, that is, Bēt Jibrin, in the lowland of Judah.

El-lā'sar (ēl-lā'sār). A place in Babylonia, probably Larsa (Gen. 14:1, 9). See ARIOCH.

Elm. An erroneous rendering of Heb. ēlāh in Hos. 4:13, A.V.; R.V. renders "terebinth." The word is translated "oak" in Gen. 35:4 and Judg. 6:11, 19, with terebinth in R.V. marg.

El-mā'dam (ēl-mā'dām), in A.V. El-mo'dam (ēl-mō'dām). An ancestor of Christ, who lived before the Exile (Luke 3:28).

El-nā'am (ēl-nā'ām) [God is pleasantness]. The father of certain valiant men in David's army (I Chron. 11:26, 46).

El-nā'than (ēl-nā'thōn) [God has given]. 1. The father of Nehushta, mother of King Jehoiachin (II Kings 24:8). He dwelt at Jerusalem, and was probably the prince El-nathan, son of Achbor (Jer. 26:22; 36:12, 25).

2, 3, and 4. Three Levites, the first 2 chief men and the 3d a teacher, sent for by Ezra to the brook Ahava (Ezra 8:15, 16).

E-lō'ī (ē-lō'ī) [Aram., my God]. See ELI, I.

E'lon (ē'lōn) [oak or terebinth]. 1. A Hittite, whose daughter Esau married (Gen. 26:34; 36:2).

2. A son of Zebulun, and founder of a tribal family (Gen. 46:14; Num. 26:26).

3. A Zebulunite who judged Israel for 10 years, and was buried at Aijalon, in Zebulun (Judg. 12:11, 12).

4. A village of Dan (Josh. 19:43). Probably 'Alein, w. of Beit Mahsir, or Khirbet Wadi 'Alin, between Deir Aban and 'Ain Shems (Beth-shemesh).

E'lon-beth-ha'nān (ē'lōn-bēth-hā'nān) [Elon of Beth-nanan]. A town in Dan, to judge from its associates (I Kings 4:9), perhaps identical with Elon.

E'loth (ē'lōth). See ELATH.

El-pā'al (ēl-pā'āl) [God has wrought]. A man of Benjamin, son of Shaharaim, and head of a father's house (I Chron. 8:1, 8, 11, 12, 18).

El-pā'ran (ēl-pā'rān). See ELATH. El-paran (Gen. 14:6) may possibly be identified with an early Elath, perhaps one situated farther e., approximately on the site of modern 'Akabab.

El-pe'let (ēl-pē'lēt), in A.V. El-pa'let (ēl-pā'lēt). See ELIPHLEET.

El Shad'dai (ēl shād'ī). The etymology of this word is doubtful, but the correctness of the Masoretic pointing is shown by LXX Saddai (Ezek. 10:5). Shaddai is preceded by El in seven cases (Gen. 17:1; 28:3; 35:11; 43:14; 48:3; Ex. 6:3; Ezek. 10:5), where R.V. marg. reproduces the Hebrew. The traditional English rendering is "God Almighty"; this is based on interpreting Shaddai as One furnished with violent power, hence almighty, from Hebrew shādad (deal violently with, devastate). Cf. Isa. 13:6, "destruction [Heb. shōd] from the Almighty [Heb. Shaddai]." The Vulgate has "Deus omnipotens" in the above Gen. and Ezek. passages. The LXX has "Almighty" only in Job, where in 16 out of 31 instances it renders Shaddai by Pantokrator (Almighty) (Job 6:17; 8:5, etc.).

By another interpretation Shaddai means the One who is sufficient; this is based upon a division: sha (who)—adai (sufficiency). The LXX renders by "hikanos" (sufficient) in Ruth 1:20, 21; Job 21:15; 31:2; 40:2.

There has also been proposed a connection with Akkad. shadū (mountain), shaddāu (mountaineer), whence shaddāya, which came into Hebrew as Shaddai. This implies a mountain deity and suggests a N. Mesopotamian origin of the name before it was brought to Palestine. Although the meaning of the name is obscure, the rendering "Almighty" includes all the ideas suggested by these etymologies and does justice to God's nature.

El'te-ke (ēl'tē-kē), in A.V. El'te-keh (ēl'tē-kē). A town of Dan assigned to the Levites (Josh. 19:40, 44; 21:20, 23). In 701 B.C. Sennacherib destroyed the town, and in its vicinity the decisive battle between the Assyrians and Egyptians was fought. Probably Khirbet el-Mukanna', about 6 miles s.e. of 'Akir (Ekron) and 7 miles n.w. of Khirbet Tibneh (Timnah).

El'te-kon (ēl'tē-kōn) [perhaps, God is firmness]. A village in the hill country of Judah (Josh. 15:59), probably to be identified with Khirbet ed-Deir, about 1½ miles s. of Hausān and about 4 miles w. of Bethlehem.

El-tō'lad (ēl-tō'lād) [birth, race; el is by some taken as the definite article, as in Arabic]. A town in the extreme s. of Judah (Josh. 15:21, 30), assigned to the Simeonites (ch. 19:4); called in I Chron. 4:29 Tolad. Probably to be identified with Khirbet Erka Sakra, about 13 miles s.e. of Beer-sheba.

E-lul' (ē-lōl') [Heb. ēlūl from Akkad. ulūlu]. The 6th month of the year (Neh. 6:15; I Macc. 14:27), approximately September.

E-lu'zai (ē-lū'zā-ī) [God is my strength]. One of the valiant men who came to David to Ziklag (I Chron. 12:1, 5).

El'y-mā'is (ēl'ī-mā'is). This name, which represents O.T. Elam, was applied to a region of Persia on the s. spurs of Mount Zagros, s. of Media and n. of Susiana. See ELAM.

El'y-mas (ēl'ī-mās) [ety. uncertain]. A Jewish impostor, Bar-Jesus by name, which means son of Jesus or Joshua, who pretended to learn the future through sorcery. Paul encountered him in Paphos, a town of Cyprus, during his First Missionary Journey. He sought to turn from the faith Sergius Paulus, the Roman deputy or proconsul of the island, who seemed disposed to accept the doctrine of Paul and seek for baptism. The apostle, therefore, severely rebuked the sorcerer and struck him with temporary blindness, the miracle removing the last doubt which the proconsul had as to the claims of Christian truth on his acceptance (Acts 13:6-12).

El-za'bad (ēl-zā'bād) [God has bestowed]. 1. One of the valiant Gadites who came to David (I Chron. 12:8, 12).

2. A Levite of the family of Obed-edom, and a doorkeeper at the house of the Lord (I Chron. 26:1, 4, 7).

El-za'phan (ēl-zā'fān). See ELIZAPHAN.

Em-balm'. The Hebrews seldom embalmed their dead (Gen. 50:2, 26; cf. II Chron. 16:14; John 19:39), but the art of embalming was practiced by the Egyptians from very early times. The embalmers were a numerous guild, who dwelt at the cemeteries. They were divided into 3 classes—the 1st made the incision in the body, the 2d handled the spices, and the 3d conducted the religious ceremonies when the body was placed in the tomb. By the time of the 18th Dyn. they had brought their art to great perfection. The brain was drawn through the nose with an iron hook and replaced with spices. The entrails were removed, and the abdominal cavity was washed out by the injection of palm wine, and then filled with bruised myrrh, cassia, cinnamon, and other spices. Next the whole body was plunged in natron and left in it for 70 days. Then it was rolled in linen bandages only 3 or 4 inches wide, but of the extraordinary length of 700 or even 1,000 yards. Gum arabic was used to keep the bandages in their place, and finally the corpse, now mummified, was placed in a case of wood or cartonnage, made in the shape of a man, and carved and painted to represent the deceased person. It was often enclosed in a 2d or outer case of wood or in a stone sarcophagus. A less expensive method required no incision; the intestines were dissolved by an injection of oil of cedar. In the case of the poor, the abdomen was merely purged and steeped in natron (Herod. ii. 85-88). According to the historian Diodorus Siculus, the interment of a rich man cost the relatives the equivalent of about $1,200. A second-rate embalmment cost about $400, and there was a much cheaper kind for the common people. Embalming ceased about A.D. 700. Many mummies are in the British and other museums. Occasionally one is unrolled, but it tends to fall to pieces when exposed to the air.

Em-brol'der-y. Ornamentation by raised figures of needlework, executed with colored silks, gold or silver thread, or any similar material differing from that of the original cloth. Bezalel and Oholiab were able to practice, among other arts, that of embroidering in blue, purple, scarlet, and fine linen (Ex. 35:30-35; 38:23). The screens for the door of the tabernacle and the gate of the court (chs. 26:36; 27:16) and the girdle of the high priest (chs. 28:4-39; 39:27-29) were embroidered. The wealthy often wore embroidered garments (Judg. 5:30; Ps. 45:14).

E'mek-ke'ziz (ē'mēk-kē'ziz), in A.V. valley of Ke'ziz [a vale cut off or vale of fissure]. A town of Benjamin, evidently in a valley and apparently near Jericho and Beth-hoglah (Josh. 18:21).

Em'er-ald [Gr. smaragdos]. 1. The rendering of Heb. nōphek. It was the 1st stone in the 2d row of those on the Jewish high priest's breastplate (Ex. 28:4, 15, 18; 39:11). The Syrians brought precious stones of this kind into Tyre (Ezek. 27:2, 3, 16), and the Tyrians used them for ornaments (Ezek. 28:13). The exact stone intended is doubtful. It may be the carbuncle (R.V. marg.; cf. LXX, and Vulgate).

2. The rendering of Gr. smaragdos, a precious stone of a light green color. The name was perhaps applied to any green crystallized mineral. It was used for signets (Ecclus. 32:6); a rainbow is likened to it (Rev. 4:3); it was to be the 4th foundation in the New Jerusalem (Rev. 21:19; cf. Tobit 13:16). The emerald is a variety of beryl, distinguished by its color, which is bright green, from typical beryl, which is pale green, passing into light blue, yellow, or white. While the beryl is colored by iron, the emerald is colored by chromium. Anciently it was found in Cyprus, in Egypt, and in the mountains of Ethiopia.

Em'er-ods. Hemorrhoids (Deut. 28:27). They were inflicted on the Philistines of Ashdod and Ekron, to compel them to send back the Ark which they had captured (I Sam. 5:1, 6, 10, 12; 6:11).

E'mim (ē'mīm), in A.V. E'mims (ē'mīmz), a double plural. The ancient inhabitants of territory afterward occupied by the Moabites. They were tall as the Anakim, and were once a numerous and powerful people (Deut. 2:9-11). Chedorlaomer smote them in the plain of Kiriathaim (Gen. 14:5).

Em-man'u-el (ē-mān'ū-ēl). See IMMANUEL.

Em-ma'us (ē-mā'ūs). 1. A village 60 furlongs from Jerusalem, a distance which could be traversed on foot between the hour for supper and the time of an evening meeting (Luke 24:13, 29, 33; cf. Mark 16:14; John 20:19). Vespasian located 800 veterans at "Emmaus distant 30 [according to another reading, 60] furlongs from Jerusalem" (Jos. War vii. 6, 6). The Talmud states that Moza is Colonia. Kubeibeh, 7 miles n.w. of Jerusalem on the Roman road, was pointed out to the Crusaders as the site of Emmaus. In the vicinity was the town of Moza (Josh. 18:26). Three miles to the s. of Kubeibeh is Kulonieh (colony), whose distance from Jerusalem is 4 miles or more according to the road followed. Probably, therefore, the site of Emmaus is to be found either at Kubeibeh or Kulonieh, or in the intervening country. The distance and tradition since the time of the Crusaders point to Kubeibeh; the Roman colony to which Emmaus was assigned may have left its name attached to a village in the s. part of its possessions.

2. A walled town about 20 miles from Jerusalem by a circuitous Roman road (I Macc. 3:40; 9:50; Jos. War ii. 20, 4). Now 'Amwās.

Em'mor (ēm'ōr). See HAMOR.

E-na'im (ē-nā'im) [two springs]. A town on the road from Adullam to Timnah (Gen. 38:14, 21, R.V.).

E'nām (ē'nām). A village in the lowland of Judah (Josh. 15:20, 34); probably identical with Enaim.

E'nān (ē'nān) [having fountains; or having eyes, i.e., keen-eyed]. The father of the prince of the tribe of Naphtali in the days of Moses (Num. 1:15).

En-camp'ment. See CAMP.

En-chant'er. In Daniel (ch. 2:2, 10, R.V.) it is the rendering of Heb. 'ashshāph, Aram.

'āshaph. It denotes conjurors and exorcists who used incantations and pronounced spells for the purpose of securing the aid of evil spirits or of freeing the supposed victims of evil spirits from their torments.

En-chant'ment. The practice of magical arts or the utterance of certain words whereby the aid of evil spirits is invoked, in order to produce supernatural effects over human beings, dangerous animals, or nature generally. Enchantment is not always distinguished from divination in the English versions (Num. 23:23; 24:1; 11 Kings 17:17; Jer. 27:9. A.V.). Under enchantment are properly included magic (Ex. 7:11), conjuration, exorcism (Dan. 2:2, A.V., astrologer), sorcery (Acts 8:9, 11; 13:8, 10). The practicing of enchantments was forbidden by the Mosaic Law (Deut. 18:10). Charming practiced to prevent a venomous snake from biting (Eccl. 10:11; cf. Ps. 58:5; Jer. 8:17) belongs, of course, to a different category.

En'dor (ēn'dōr) [fountain of habitation]. A town belonging to the tribe of Manasseh (Josh. 17:11). Fugitives from Sisera's defeated army, fleeing home to the n., perished in its vicinity (Ps. 83:9, 10). Here dwelt the woman with a familiar spirit, whom King Saul consulted (1 Sam. 28:7). It has been identified with modern Endör (İndür) on the n. shoulder of Little Hermon, 6 miles s.e. of Nazareth.

En-eg-lā'im (ēn-ēg'lā'im) [fountain of two calves]. A place on the Dead Sea (Ezek. 47:10); identified with 'Ain Hajlah, n. of the Dead Sea and w. of the Jordan. Same as Beth-hoglah, q.v.

En-gan'nim (ēn-gān'nim) [fountain of gar'dens]. 1. A village in the lowland of Judah (Josh. 15:20, 34). It has been identified with Umm Jina, s.w. of Beth-shemesh, but 'Ain Fatir, e. of Beit el-Jemal, in the neighborhood, has been suggested as the more probable site.

2. A town on the boundary line of Issachar (Josh. 19:17, 21), assigned to the Gershonite Levites (ch. 21:29). It seems to be the Ginaea of Josephus (Jos. Antiq. xx. 6, 1; War iii. 3, 4). It is the modern Jenin, a village of about 3,000 inhabitants, on the s. margin of the Plain of Esdraelon, 5 miles n.e. of Dothan, about 7 s.w. from Mount Gilboa, and about 68 miles n. of Jerusalem.

En-ge'di (ēn-gē'di) [fountain of a kid]. A fountain and town originally called Hazazon-tamar, meaning pruning of a palm (II Chron. 20:2), on the w. shore of the Dead Sea, in the tribe of Judah (Josh. 15:62), about 35 miles from Jerusalem. A difficult caravan route, crowded between mountain and sea, passed the spot. In the time of Abraham it was occupied by Amorites, who were smitten at the spot by Chedorlaomer (Gen. 14:7). David took refuge in the strongholds of the vicinity (1 Sam. 23:29). In one of the caves where he was hiding he cut off the skirt of Saul's robe (1 Sam., ch. 24). The fountain, which still bears the name of 'Ain Jidi, is a copious hot spring of fresh water, bursting forth about 300 or 400 feet above the base of a vast cliff, midway between the mouth of the Jordan and the s. point of the sea. The hot water created an oasis, rich with semitropical vegetation and celebrated for palms, vineyards, and balsam (S. of Sol. 1:14; Jos. Antiq. ix. 1, 2). The ancient site seems to have been at Tell el-Jurn, near 'Ain Jidi. See HAZAZON-TAMAR.

En-had'dah (ēn-hād'dā) [swift fountain]. A frontier village of Issachar (Josh. 19:17, 21), probably el-Hadethah, about 6 miles e. of Mount Tabor.

En-hak'ko-re (ēn-hāk'ō-rē) [spring of the partridge, or of the caller]. A spring in Lehi which burst forth when Samson cried to the Lord (Judg. 15:18, 19).

En-ha'zor (ēn-hā'zōr) [fountain of Hazor]. A fenced city of Naphtali (Josh. 19:32, 37), identified with Khirbet Hašireh, w. of 'Ain Ibl not far from the ruin of Hazzūr.

En-mish'pat (ēn-mish'pāt) [fountain of judgment]. The same as Kadesh-barnea (Gen. 14:7).

E'noch (ē'nūk), in A.V. once He'noch (1 Chron. 1:3) [initiated, dedicated]. The same name, borne by others, is rendered Henoch and Hanoch. 1 and 2. A son of Cain, and the city which Cain built and named after him (Gen. 4:17).

3. A descendant of Jared, and progenitor of Methuselah. He lived 365 years, and walked with God. He is the only one of the line of whom it is not said that he died. "He was not; for God took him" (Gen. 5:18-24). He was translated, and did not see death (Heb. 11:5; Ecclus. 44:16; 49:14). In Jude 14, 15 there is a prophecy of Enoch's in which he declares God's just judgment of the unrighteous. The words of this prophecy are found in the pseudepigraphical Book of Enoch.

E'nosh (ē'nōsh), in A.V. E'nos (ē'nōs), except in I Chron. 1:1 [man]. The son of Seth (Gen. 4:26; 5:6-11; I Chron. 1:1; Luke 3:38, Enos).

En-rim'mon (ēn-rīm'ōn) [fountain of Rimmon or of the pomegranate]. A town of Judah, inhabited after the Captivity (Neh. 11:29), usually identified with Umm er-Rumāmin 9 miles n. of Beer-sheba. See RIMMON, I. 2.

En-ro'gel (ēn-rō'gēl) [perhaps, fuller's spring]. A fountain just outside Jerusalem (II Sam. 17:17), near the valley of Hinnom and on the boundary line between Judah and Benjamin (Josh. 15:1, 7; 18:11, 16). According to Josephus, it was in the king's garden (Jos. Antiq. vii. 14, 4). During Absalom's rebellion Jonathan and Ahimaaz took up their abode there, to be able to collect and send news to David (II Sam. 17:17). Near by was the stone Zohelath, where Adonijah instituted festivities when he conspired to seize the kingdom (I Kings 1:9). The traditional situation of the fountain, almost universally accepted, is Bir Eyyūb (Job's well), just below the junction of the valleys of Hinnom and the Kidron, s. of Jerusalem. This is a well, 125 feet deep, walled half way down and sunk the rest of the distance into the solid rock. That it is a well and not a fountain is scarcely a serious objection to the traditional identification (cf. Gen. 16:7 with v. 14). The identification of En-rogel with the Fountain of the Virgin in the side of Ophel has a few advocates, especially Grove, Conder, and Clermont-Ganneau.

En-she'mesh (ēn-shē'mēsh) [fountain of the sun]. A fountain and town on the boundary line between Judah and Benjamin (Josh. 15:1, 7; 18:11, 17). It is commonly identified with 'Ain el-Haud, a little e. of Bethany, on the road between Jerusalem and Jericho, and the last spring until the Jordan Valley is reached.

En-tap'pu-ah (ēn-tāp'ū-ā) (Josh. 17:7). See TAPPUAH 2.

E-pae'ne-tus (ē-pē'nē-tūs) [Gr., praise-worthy]. A convert belonging to Achaia, and the first fruits of that region to Christ. Paul called him beloved (Rom. 16:5).

Ep'a-phras (ēp'd-frās) [contraction of Epaphroditus]. A Christian who, coming to Paul whilst he was a prisoner at Rome, gave a highly favorable account of the Colossian church, with which he was connected, perhaps as its minister. He joined the apostle in sending it salutations (Col. 1:7, 8; 4:12). He remained in Rome, and was in some sense Paul's fellow prisoner in Christ (Philemon 23).

Epaph'ro·di'tus (ê-păf'rô-dî'tūs) [Gr., lovely, charming]. A Christian whom the church at Philippi sent with a present to the Apostle Paul, then a prisoner at Rome. Soon afterward he became seriously ill. It grieved him that the news of this sickness reached Philippi and created anxiety among his friends there. On this account Paul sent him back to Philippi as soon as his health permitted (Phil. 2:25-30; 4:18), making him the bearer of the Epistle to the Philippians. Epaphroditus and Epaphras hardly were the same person, for the former seems clearly connected with the church at Philippi, and the latter with that at Colossae.

E'pahh, I (ē'fā). A measure of capacity containing 10 omers (Ex. 16:36), and used for such articles as flour (Judg. 6:19) or barley (Ruth 2:17). It was equivalent to a bath or 1/10 of a kor (Ezek. 45:11, 14), and contained nine Attic metretres or 72 sextaries (Jos. Antiq. viii. 2, 9; xv. 9, 2, where read metretres for medimnoi), and it contained 1.05 bushels, American measure. See MEASURE, III.

E'pahh, II (ē'fā) [darkness]. 1. A branch of the Midianites (Gen. 25:4; I Chron. 1:33), rich in camels and dromedaries (Isa. 60:6). They lived in n.e. Arabia.

2. A concubine of Caleb (I Chron. 2:46).

3. A man of Judah, a son of Jahdai (I Chron. 2:3, 47).

E'phal (ē'fī) [Heb. ephai, fatigued, gloomy (kere); ōphai, flying, bird, or gloomy, dark (kethib)]. A Netophathite whose sons came with others to the Babylonian governor of Judea after the fall of Jerusalem and were promised protection (Jer. 40:8). All were subsequently massacred by Ishmael (Jer. 41:3).

E'pher (ē'fēr) [young deer or gazelle]. 1. A branch of the Midianites (Gen. 25:4; I Chron. 1:33).

2. A man of Judah descended from Ezra (I Chron. 4:1, 17).

3. A chief man in the half tribe of Manasse, e. of the Jordan (I Chron. 5:23, 24).

E'phes·dam·mim (ē'fēs-dām'm) [end or boundary of Dammim (blood)]. A place within the territory of Judah, between Socoh and Azekah (I Sam. 17:1); called Pas-dammim in I Chron. 11:13. Commonly identified with the ruins Damūn, about 4 miles n.e. of Socoh. Abel prefers Beit Faṣed, s.e. of Socoh.

E'phe·si·ans (ê-fē'zhānz), The Epis'tle of Paul to the. This epistle was written by the Apostle Paul when he was a prisoner (Eph. 3:1; 4:1; 6:20), probably at Rome A.D. 62, though some have assigned it to the Caesarean imprisonment (Acts 24:27). It is addressed "to the saints that are at Ephesus, and the faithful in Christ Jesus." R.V. notes, however, that some very ancient authorities omit the words "at Ephesus." The 2 chief N.T. manuscripts (Sinaiticus and Vaticanus) omit them, as does also the Chester Beatty papyrus, dating from the early 3d century (the oldest known MS. of Paul's letters). From very early times a difference of opinion appears as to its intended readers, though the tradition of the Church called it "to the Ephesians." The most probable explanation is that it was a circular letter intended for all the churches of the province of Asia, and that, since Ephesus was the chief of these, the epistle naturally came to be considered as addressed to it. Perhaps the address was blank, and copies left in each city with the blank filled. Its circular character seems to be confirmed by the absence from it of local allusions and discussions. It is a doctrinal and ethical treatise in the form of an epistle. Like that to the Colossians, it was sent by Tychicus (Eph. 6:21), and the similarity of language and thought shows that the two were written at the same time. Compare, for example:

Eph. 1:1, 2 with Col. 1:1, 2.

Eph. 1:3, 20; 2:6; 3:10; 6:12 with Col. 1:5; 3:1-3.

Eph. 1:6, 7 with Col. 1:13, 14.

Eph. 1:9; 3:9; 6:19 with Col. 1:26; 2:2; 4:3.

Eph. 1:10 with Col. 1:20, 25.

Eph. 1:11 with Col. 1:12.

Eph. 1:17 with Col. 1:10.

Eph. 1:19, 20 with Col. 2:12.

Eph. 1:20 with Col. 3:1.

Eph. 1:22 with Col. 1:18.

Eph. 1:23 with Col. 2:9.

Eph. 4:22-24 with Col. 3:8-10.

Eph. 4:32 with Col. 3:13.

These are but examples, to which even the reader of the English Bible can add many more.

The two epistles were evidently the product of the apostle's mind acting under the same circumstances; and Ephesians seems to have been written just after Colossians. In it the thought is carried farther. The theme of Colossians is the pre-eminence of Christ's person and work. That of Ephesians is the establishment of the Church, considered as the entire number of the redeemed. Ephesians, in fact, may be said to sum up all Paul's previous teaching in order to state the purpose of God in the mission of his Son, which was the redemption of his chosen people, a redemption which was to manifest to all the universe the riches of his grace. Hence, assuming salvation through faith, the divinity and finished work of Jesus and the calling of the Gentiles, it advances to a complete theodicy.

In Eph. ch. 1, we have what may be called the divine side of the Church's history, which originated in God's sovereign and eternal purpose (vs. 3-6), was effected by Christ's work (vs. 7-12), and is certified by the sealing of the Spirit (vs. 13, 14). Paul prays that they may understand the hope of Christ's calling, of which the risen and exalted Saviour is the first fruit and pledge (vs. 15-23). In ch. 2 we have the human side of the history, being taught that the elect are delivered out of sin and condemnation by unmerited grace (vs. 1-10), and are united, Jew and Gentile, through Christ into one spiritual temple (vs. 11-22). In ch. 3 the apostle states his own position as the minister to the Church of this divine mystery (vs. 1-13), and prays that they may realize and enjoy what God has prepared for them (vs. 14-21). Chs. 4 to 6 are an extended exhortation to walk worthily of their high calling in all the relations of the present life.

Before the Epistle to the Ephesians was written, Paul had seen a new spiritual community arise in the world, composed of persons of different races; he had been teaching that this community, the Church, is the body of Christ; and he had been emphasizing the importance of harmony among its members (Rom. 12:4-8; I Cor. 12:12-30; Col. 1:18; 2:19). In writing at this time to the churches in the province of Asia, whose membership was composed of the most diverse racial elements and among whom speculative theories were rife which tended to subordinate Christ, it was natural for the apostle to give prominence to the conception of Christ as the head of the body, the Church (Eph. 1:22, 23), "from whom all the body fitly framed and knit together through that which every joint supplieth, according to the working in due measure of each several part, maketh the increase of the body unto the building up of itself in love" (ch. 4:16, R.V.; cf. ch. 2:11-22).

The Epistle to the Romans, addressed from the East to the West, was Paul's complete statement of the way of salvation. The Epistle to the Ephesians, addressed from the West to the East, was his complete statement of the whole purpose of God in human history. It may be said to mark the climax of his theological instruction.

Eph'e-sus (ěf'ě-sŭs). A city of Lydia on the w. coast of Asia Minor, at the mouth of the Cayster, nearly midway between Miletus on the s. and Smyrna on the n. It was situated at the junction of natural trade routes, and was on the main route from Rome to the East. Here was located the famous temple to Artemis (Diana), who was represented as a

many-breasted mother goddess. See DIANA. In the 11th century B.C. the town was seized by the Ionians, a section of the Greek race. Ephesus became one of the 12 cities belonging to their confederation, and itself the capital of Ionia. About 555 B.C. the city submitted to Croesus, king of Lydia, whose capital was at Sardis, but it soon fell under the Persian domination. With the victories of Alexander the Great, Ephesus came under Macedonian-Greek rule. Hitherto it had been confined to a low, alluvial plain liable to be flooded. About 286 B.C. Lysimachus extended it to an adjacent eminence beyond the reach of the water. By this change of location the temple of Artemis was left outside the city walls. In 190 B.C. the Romans, after defeating Antiochus the Great at Magnesia, took Ephesus from him, and gave it to Eumenes II, king of Pergamos. On the death of Attalus III of Pergamos in 133 B.C. it reverted to them, and eventually became the capital of the Roman province of Asia. In A.D. 29 the city was much damaged by an earthquake, but was rebuilt by the emperor Tiberius.

Many Jews with Roman citizenship resided at Ephesus, and maintained a synagogue (Acts 18:19; 19:17; Jos. Antiq. xiv. 10, 11, and 13); and Paul, on his way to Jerusalem, toward the end of his Second Missionary Journey, paid a short visit to the place, preached in the synagogue, and left Aquila and Priscilla there, who continued the work (Acts 18:18-21). On his Third Journey he labored at Ephesus at least 2 years and 3 months, leaving the city after the riot which was stirred up by Demetrius, a maker of small silver models of the temple, who found his craft endangered by the preaching of the apostle (Acts, ch. 19; cf. I Cor. 15:32; 16:8; II Tim. 1:18). Paul left Timothy behind to prevent the church from being corrupted by false doctrine (I Tim. 1:3). Subsequently, returning from Europe and unable to revisit Ephesus, he summoned the elders of the church to him at Miletus (Acts 20:16, 17). Tychicus was afterward sent to Ephesus with the Epistle to the Ephesians (Eph. 1:1; 6:21; II Tim. 4:12). The church at Ephesus was one of the 7 churches of Asia addressed in The Revelation of John (ch. 1:11; 2:1-7), and according to tradition the Apostle John spent the last years of his life in that city. The 3d general council of the Church was held at Ephesus, A.D. 431, and defined the doctrine of the person of Christ so far as affirming that Christ has two natures and one person. The silting up of the harbor by mud brought down by the Cayster led to the decay of the city. Among its remains are the ruins of the wall and a gate, the stadium, a fine theater, Roman baths, and a library. The site of the great temple is a swamp.

An earlier Ionic temple was set on fire by Herostratos in 356 B.C. and destroyed; but it was rebuilt within a few years. The new structure was a magnificent work of Ionic architecture, 4 times as large as the Parthenon at Athens, and ranked as one of the 7 wonders of the world. It stood on a platform about 425 feet in length and 239½ feet in width, measured from the lowest step. A flight of 10 steps led to the pavement of the platform, and 3 more steps to the pavement of the temple. The temple itself was 342½ feet in length and 164 feet in width. It consisted of 2 rows of 8 columns each in front and rear, and 2 rows of 20 columns each on either side of the sanctuary. These with 2 columns at each entrance of the sanctuary made 100 in all. Each was a monolith of marble 55 feet in height, and the 18 at each end were sculptured. The roof was covered with large white marble tiles. The cella, or inner sanctuary, which these columns surrounded, was 70 feet wide and 105 long. Its internal ornamentation was of surpassing splendor, adorned with works of art by Phidias and Praxiteles, Scopas, Parrhasius, and Apelles. It was destroyed by the Goths about A.D. 260.

The theater was one of the largest known of all that have remained to modern times. The auditorium was semicircular, 495 feet in diameter, and the orchestra was 110. The stage was 22 feet wide. The theater contained 66 rows of seats, and afforded room for an audience of 24,500 persons.

Eph'al (ěf'lāl) [judicious]. A man of Judah of the family of Jerahmeel (I Chron. 2:3, 25, 37).

E'phod (ē'fōd) [a covering]. 1. An upper garment worn by the Jewish high priest. It was one of 6 sacred vestments which he was required to put on when about to conduct the worship of God (Ex. 28:4), and was of gold, blue, purple, scarlet, and fine twined linen. The ephod went closely round the body; it was supported by 2 straps, which passed over the shoulders and were attached in front and behind to its top edges (vs. 6, 7). There was a hole in the top, doubtless for the head, with a woven border of the same materials around, to render the cloth less likely to tear (v. 8; cf. v. 32). On top of each of the shoulder straps was an onyx stone, enclosed in a filigree setting of gold and engraved with the names of 6 tribes of Israel (chs. 28:9; 39:6, 7). In front, to rings attached underneath close to the coupling, the breastplate was bound with a lace of blue, so that the breastplate itself might be supported (chs. 28:25, 27, 28; 39:19-21). The robe of the ephod was a garment distinct from the ephod, was blue, and was sleeveless, fringed at the bottom with alternate bells of gold and pomegranates of blue, purple, and scarlet (Ex. 28:31-35; 29:5; 39:22-26).

A more simple ephod of linen, probably without the ornamentation, was worn by ordinary priests. The 85 priests whom Doeg slew all wore the linen ephod (I Sam. 22:18). Samuel, also, wore an ephod while he was a child in charge of Eli, the high priest (ch. 2:18). David wore one when officiating before the Ark as king (II Sam. 6:14).

David, desiring to ask counsel of God in the presence of the high priest, had the ephod brought near (I Sam. 23:9-12; 30:7, 8), for with it were the Urim and Thummim (Ex. 28:30). An ephod might thus readily become an object of adoration or be used in the worship of an idol (Judg. 8:27; 17:5).

It has been supposed that ephod does not everywhere denote a priestly linen waistcoat, but may also refer to some kind of idol or image. Thus if an ephod were the covering or casing of an image (cf. Isa. 30:22; 40:19), the term could finally be applied to the image itself. Thus with some plausibility Gideon's ephod (Judg. 8:26 seq.) has been explained as an idol. The ephod also figures as a part of the equipment of a sanctuary, as in the case of Micah (Judg. 17:5; 18:14-20). The mention of ephod in those passages in connection with teraphim (cf. Hos. 3:4) does not prove that it was an image. It has also been suggested that perhaps the ephod was an instrument of divination, an ark in which were the teraphim. On the whole, we do not have enough data to settle with confidence the difficulties involved in the cases where the ephod may not have been a garment.

2. The father of Hanniel, prince of Manasseh in the time of Moses (Num. 34:23).

Eph'pha-tha (ē'fā-thā). An Aramaic imperative signifying, "Be opened" (Mark 7:34).

E'phra'im (ē'frā'im) [double fruitfulness].

1. The younger son of Joseph and Asenath, daughter of Potipherah, priest of On. He was born while Joseph was prime minister of Egypt (Gen. 41:45-52). When the two sons were brought to Jacob on his sickbed, to receive their grandfather's blessing, Jacob intentionally laid his right hand (the hand of greater honor) on the head of Ephraim, the younger grandson, and his left on that of Manasseh, the elder. Being remonstrated with by Joseph, he explained that both should become a people, but Ephraim should be the greater and should be the ancestor of a multitude of peoples or tribal families (ch. 48:8-20). Ephraim and Manasseh, though only grandchildren of Jacob, were treated as if they were his children, and their descendants were consequently regarded as two tribes instead of one. Ephraim had the sorrow of losing 2 of his sons, Ezer and Elad, who were slain while making a raid on the cattle of the Philistines (I Chron. 7:20-22).

2. The tribe of which Ephraim was the progenitor (Josh. 16:4, 10; Judg. 5:14). The growth of the tribe was for a time retarded by the death of his sons in the above-mentioned raid. At the 1st census in the wilderness the Ephraimites numbered 40,500, being the lowest in number of the tribes excepting only Manasseh and Benjamin (Num. 1:33). They fell off during the wanderings, and at the 2d census numbered only 32,500, being now the lowest of all the tribes except Simeon (ch. 26:37); still the double tribe of Joseph was the largest of the tribes, and numbered 85,200 men, besides women and children (vs. 34, 37; cf. Deut. 33:17). When Joshua was the leader of Israel, the tribe rose rapidly in reputation, for he was himself an Ephraimite (Josh. 19:50; 24:30). The tribe was allotted territory west of the Jordan. Its s. boundary line ran from the Jordan at Jericho to Beth-el, Luz, Ataroth-addar, Upper Beth-horon, Lower Beth-horon, Gezer, and the sea (ch. 16:1-3, 5). The n. line ran through Michmethath, near Shechem, eastward to Taanath-shiloh, Janoah, Ataroth, and Naarah, reached Jericho and the Jordan (vs. 6, 7), and passed w. from Michmethath to En-tappuah, the river Kanah and the Mediterranean (v. 8; cf. 17:7). It had the territory of the half tribe of Manasseh, w. of the Jordan, on the n., and Benjamin on the s.; it reached the Mediterranean on the w. and to the Jordan on the e. Shechem was within the territory of Ephraim (Josh. 21:20, 21; I Kings 12:25; I Chron. 6:67). The Ephraimites failed to expel the Canaanites from Gezer, which was within the lot of Ephraim; but, either alone or in conjunction with the Manassites, they captured Beth-el (Judg. 1:22-29). They acted patriotically in the fight celebrated in song by Deborah (ch. 5:14). They quarreled with Gideon, who was a Manassite, for not having called them to aid him in expelling the Midianites from Canaan (ch. 8:1-3). They resolutely encountered in battle Jephthah, the deliverer of Israel, for not having summoned them to assist him in the Ammonite War, 42,000 of the tribe falling in the struggle (ch. 12:1-6). Micah, of graven image notoriety, resided in Mount Ephraim (ch. 17:1); and the Levite, the ill-treatment of whose concubine led to the hostilities against Benjamin, sojourned there (ch. 19:1). Jeroboam was a man of Ephraim, and after he had become king over the revolted 10 tribes, he rebuilt Shechem in Mount Ephraim to be his capital (I Kings 12:25).

The hill country of Ephraim, or Mount Ephraim, as it is sometimes called, was the part of the central range of Palestine occupied by the tribe of Ephraim. It did not include the towns of Taanach, Megiddo, Bethshean, and Abel-meholah, on the n. and e. (I Kings 4:8, 12), nor Kiriath-jearim, Gibeah, or the territory of Benjamin on the s. (Judg. 18:12, 13; 19:16; I Sam. 9:4). If it included territory n. of Shechem (cf. I Chron. 6:66, 68, with I Kings 4:12), it was thus bounded on 3 sides by the s. border of the Plain of Esdraelon, the Jordan Valley, and the territory of Benjamin. The term did not properly designate any part of the district occupied by Benjamin. Even Judg. 4:5 and II Sam. 20:1, 21 do not necessarily imply any broader use of the term. But after the establishment of the Northern Kingdom with its shifting s. frontier, the s. limits of the hill country of Ephraim were no longer clearly defined.

The wood of Ephraim, in which the battle took place between the forces of David and those of the rebel Absalom (II Sam. 18:6; cf.

17:22, 24, 26, 27), was evidently e. of the Jordan, and near Mahanaim, but its exact situation is unknown. It probably took its name either from the defeat of the Ephraimites in the time of Jephthah (Judg. 12:1 seq.), or because it was opposite to the territory and mountain of Ephraim.

For the gate of Ephraim, see JERUSALEM, II. 3.

3. The 10 tribes of which Ephraim became the head. Used in this sense especially by the prophets (Isa. 7:2, 5, 9, 17; 9:9; 17:3; 28:3; Hos. 4:17; 5:3; 9:3-17).

4. A city to which Baal-hazor was adjacent (II Sam. 13:23), probably the same place as Ephraim near the wilderness (John 11:54), and Aphaerema, which at one time belonged to Samaria (I Macc. 11:34). The Roman general Vespasian took Ephraim and Beth-el during his advance on Jerusalem (Jos. War iv. 9, 9). It has been identified with Ophrah of Benjamin, at the modern village of Tayibeh, on a conical hill standing on high land 4 miles e.n.e. of Beth-el.

E'phra-im-ite (ē'frā-īm-it). A member of the tribe of Ephraim (Judg. 12:5). More frequently Ephraimite, as in the original.

E'phra-in (ē'frā-īn). See EPHRON 2.

Eph'ra-thah (ē'frā-thāh), in A.V. Eph'ra-tah (ē'frā-tā) [fruitfulness, fruitful land]. A shorter form, occasionally used in the Hebrew text and preserved in the versions, is Ephrath. 1. The original name of Bethlehem in Judea (Gen. 35:19; 48:7; Ruth 4:11). It is sometimes called Bethlehem Ephrathah (Micah 5:2).

2. A wife of Caleb, son of Hezron. She was the mother of Hur (I Chron. 2:19, 50; 4:4).

3. The territory of Ephraim (Ps. 132:6; see EPHRATHITE 2); or better, Kiriath-jearim, which belonged to Caleb-ephrathah (I Chron. 2:24, 50), and where the Ark had been kept for a long time.

Eph'rath-ite (ē'frā-thīt). 1. A native or inhabitant of Ephrath, i.e., Bethlehem (I Sam. 17:12; Ruth 1:2).

2. An Ephraimite, one belonging to the tribe of Ephraim (I Sam. 1:1; I Kings 11:26, both A.V.).

E'phron (ē'frōn) [fawn]. 1. A Hittite, resident at Hebron, and owner of the cave of Machpelah, which he sold to Abraham (Gen. 23:8, 9; 25:9).

2. A city which was taken from Jeroboam by Abijah (II Chron. 13:19). The kethib is Ephrōn, but the kere Ephrayin is reproduced as Ephraim in A.V. and R.V. marg. Commonly identified with the town of Ephraim or Ophrah.

3. A city e. of the Jordan in the territory of Manasseh, in a pass on the road between Karnaim and Beth-shean. It was captured by Judas Maccabaeus (I Macc. 5:46-52; II Macc. 12:27, 29; Jos. Antiq. xii. 8, 5). It has been identified with et-Taiyibeh, n. of the wadi et-Taiyibeh.

4. A mountain ridge between Nephtoah and Kiriath-jearim, on the boundary between Judah and Benjamin (Josh. 15:1, 9).

Epi'cu-re'ans (ēp'i-kū-rē'ānz). One of the leading philosophic sects of Greece and Rome. It derived its name and its existence from the great philosopher Epicurus. He was born 341 B.C. in the island of Samos, but was of Athenian descent, and made Athens the scene of his lifework. In 306 B.C. he founded a school or college with a garden attached, in which he taught for the next 36 years, till his death in 270 B.C. He is said to have written about 300 philosophic books, nearly all of which are lost. In physics he, like Democritus, attributes all nature to changes among atoms in themselves eternal. He does not recognize a Creator; but, with curious inconsistency, finds a place in his system for a multitude of gods, who, however, supremely happy in themselves, take no part in human affairs. With regard to his ethics, a popular misconception prevails. He desires that pleasure shall be pursued and pain avoided; but the notion that by pleasure he meant only sensual gratification is erroneous. He included under the term the pleasure derived from the exercise of the intellect and the moral faculty. Personally he was so pure that some thought he was destitute of passions. The Epicureans were mostly men of soft temperament, the very opposite of the Stoics, who were cast in an iron mold. Both philosophic sects rejected Paul's doctrine at Athens, but both showed their tolerance by taking the apostle to the Areopagus to have his teaching examined.

Epi'lep'tic. A person affected with the falling sickness, a disease which in its severe form is characterized by recurrent attacks of loss of consciousness with spasms (Matt. 17:15, in A.V. "lunatic"; Mark 9:18). In this case the disease was occasioned by demoniacal possession.

Epi'stles. The name given to 21 books of the N.T. The earliest of them antedate the Gospels, Paul having written his Epistles to the Thessalonians about A.D. 50. They are letters which were written by the apostles, or which received apostolic sanction; and they are addressed to particular churches, and deal with doctrinal and practical questions, or to individuals, yet contain matter of wide import, or to Christians generally, and not to any one person or church. With the exception of The Epistle to the Hebrews and I John, the epistles, according to the custom of the time, begin with the name or title of the writer and that of the person or church addressed; then follow words of greeting.

The epistles are classed in 3 groups, but the groups are neither exhaustive nor mutually exclusive: 1. Pauline; for the first 13 begin with the statement that the letter was sent by Paul or by him in conjunction with other Christian workers, as Sosthenes (I Cor. 1:1), Timothy (II Cor. 1:1; Phil. 1:1; Col. 1:1; Philemon 1), or Silvanus and Timothy together (I Thess. 1:1; II Thess. 1:1). Paul, as a rule, employed an amanuensis to write from his dictation (Rom. 16:22), the apostle adding the salutation in his own hand, which he says was the token in every epistle (I Cor. 16:21; Col. 4:18; II Thess. 3:17). In the case of the Epistle to the Galatians, however, he departed from his rule, and wrote the whole letter with his own hand (Gal. 6:11). 2. Within the group of Pauline Epistles are 3 known as the Pastoral Epistles, namely, I and II Timothy and Titus. They are addressed to the persons whose names they bear, and contain directions for the training and governing of churches and the proper treatment of individual members. 3. Five epistles are called General in the titles prefixed to them in the A.V.: James, I and II Peter, I John, and Jude. In the Early Church, however, 7 were classed as Catholic, II and III John being included (Eusebius H.E. ii. 23), although these 2 are simple personal letters addressed to individuals. The word "catholic" was probably used in its sense of "general," to denote an encyclical letter to the Church at large; and the elect lady and Gaius, to whom II and III John respectively are addressed, were probably understood to represent the Church Universal.

The epistolary form was not a mere literary device, chosen for a doctrinal treatise. Usually at least the epistles were written in the way of ordinary correspondence. They were prompted by personal motives and were due to the writer's own initiative (Philemon, II John); or they were penned in reply to letters, or were based on information otherwise obtained, concerning matters requiring attention in any particular church (I Cor. 1:11; II Cor. 7:5-7; I Thess. 3:5, 6). But they are adapted to all persons in like circumstances; Paul requested that certain of his epistles be read by others than by those only to whom they were addressed (Col. 4:16). The apostles claimed that these epistles are the word of God (I Thess. 2:13; I Peter 1:12), and from the beginning they ranked with the other Scriptures. Peter spoke of Paul's epistles as part of the Scriptures (II Peter 3:15, 16), and Polycarp in A.D. 115 quoted The Psalms and Ephesians side by side as equally Scripture. See CANON.

The titles of the epistles were not part of the original composition, but were prefixed afterward. They are lacking in early manuscripts, and are no part of Scripture. Most of them are founded on the 1st verse of the epistle; but that prefixed to The Epistle to the Hebrews in A.V. is not derived from the letter itself, and is of doubtful accuracy. The notices appended to the epistles in the A.V. regarding the place where the letter was penned were likewise no part of the original composition.

Er (ēr) [watching]. 1. A son of Judah who died in Canaan by a judgment of God for his wickedness (Gen. 38:1-7; 46:12; I Chron. 2:3).

2. A descendant of Judah, of the family of Shelah (I Chron. 4:21).

3. An ancestor of Christ, about midway between David and Zerubbabel (Luke 3:28).

E'ran (ē'rān) [watchful]. A descendant of Ephraim through Shuthelah, and founder of a tribal family (Num. 26:36).

E'ras'tus (ē-rās'tūs) [Gr., beloved]. A Christian, one of those who ministered to Paul. He was sent with Timothy from Ephesus into Macedonia just before the riot at the former place (Acts 19:22). He is probably the person mentioned in II Tim. 4:20 as having abode at Corinth, who perhaps was the Christian in high official position, treasurer of Corinth, who joined with Paul in sending salutations to the Roman converts (Rom. 16:23).

E'rech (ē'rēk) [Akkad. Uruk and Arku]. A city of Shinar (Sumer), one of those constituting part of Nimrod's kingdom (Gen. 10:10). It is now represented by the mounds of Warka, a considerable distance s. of Babylon, in a marshy region, e. of the Euphrates. Archevites were settled in Samaria by Asnapper (Ezra 4:9).

E'ri (ē'ri) [watching]. A son of Gad and founder of a tribal family (Gen. 46:16; Num. 26:16).

E'sa'ias (ē-zā'yās). See ISALAH.

E'sar'haddon (ē'sār-hād'ōn) [Ashur has given a brother]. The favorite, though not the eldest, son of Sennacherib, king of Assyria. This partiality so annoyed 2 other brothers, Adrammelech and Sharezer, that they assassinated their father (681 B.C.), escaping afterward into Armenia (II Kings 19:36, 37; II Chron. 32:21; Isa. 37:37, 38). When this base murder was perpetrated, Esarhaddon was himself conducting a campaign in the n.w., probably in Armenia. Sennacherib was killed in the month of Tebeth, and Esarhaddon set out for Nineveh at the beginning of Shebat. The civil war came to an end in Assyria in Adar of 681.

Esarhaddon was equally eminent as a military general and a political ruler. In his 1st year he defeated the son of Merodach-baladan in s. Babylonia. Later he commenced the restoration of the city of Babylon which Sennacherib, provoked by its continual revolts against the Assyrian domination, had destroyed. Esarhaddon also waged war against the Cimmerian barbarians who had descended upon Assyria from beyond the Caucasus, against the mountaineers of Cilicia, and against the children of Eden who were in Telassar (cf. Isa. 37:12). In his 4th year he captured and pillaged Sidon, deported its inhabitants, razed the city to the ground, and erected a new town on the old site. Its king had escaped by sea, but he was pursued, taken, and beheaded. The same fate befell his 2 royal allies. Afterward 12 tribes on the mainland and 10 in Cyprus submitted to the Assyrian dominion. Among others were Manasseh, king of Judah, and the kings of Edom, Moab, Ammon, Gaza, Ashkelon, Ekron, and Ashdod. Esarhaddon successfully accomplished 2 most difficult military enterprises, the penetration of the Arabian desert and of far-off Media. He turned his attention to a yet greater undertaking, the conquest of Egypt, 675-674, but he was for a time diverted from his purpose, being compelled in his 8th year to war with a tribe at the head of the Persian Gulf and near Ur. At length in 671 he made his great expedition against Egypt. Marching past Tyre, he left the city under siege. He entered Egypt, captured Memphis, and conquered the entire country. He died in 669 B.C., and was succeeded by his eldest son, Ashurbanipal. Another son, Shamash-shum-ukin, was made ruler of Babylon under the suzerainty of Ashurbanipal.

E'sau (ē'sō) [hairy]. Son of Isaac and Rebekah, and elder twin brother of Jacob. Esau was so named because he was "all over like a hairy garment" (Gen. 25:21-26). As he grew up he became a skillful hunter, and was accustomed to bring home venison, doubtless the flesh of various antelopes, to his father Isaac. On one occasion he returned from the chase famishing, and asked for some red pottage which Jacob had just made ready. Jacob asked from him his birthright as payment; and Esau, esteeming the higher blessings lightly, and caring more for present gratification, sold his birthright rather than wait for the preparation of food. From the red pottage, which was its price, Esau obtained a 2d name, Edom (Red) (vs. 27-34; Heb. 12:16, 17). When he was 40 years old he married 2 wives, Judith or Oholibamah and Basemath or Adah, both Hittites (Gen. 26:34, 35; 36:1, 2). Afterward he wedded Mahalath, called also Basemath, the daughter of Ishmael (chs. 28:9; 36:3). When Isaac was old and nearly blind, he designed to confer the covenant blessing on Esau, who was his favorite son. But Jacob was Rebekah's favorite, and she induced him to personate Esau and obtain the blessing by fraud. Esau resolved to kill his selfish brother, but did not like to carry out the murder while his father was living (ch. 27:1-41). To give time for Esau's anger to cool, Jacob fled to Mesopotamia, and for 20 years was an exile (chs. 27:42 to 31:55). On his return he took means to appease his justly offended brother; and Esau, who was of a generous nature, dismissed his vindictive feeling, and gave Jacob a fraternal reception (chs. 32:3 to 33:15). Prior to this, Esau had taken up his abode in Mount Seir, to which he at once returned (ch. 33:16). The reconciliation between the brothers was permanent, and both met to bury their father (ch. 35:29). Esau's descendants increased and ultimately dispossessed the original inhabitants of Mount Seir and became the Edomite people (Deut. 2:4, 12, 22). Mount Seir could, accordingly, be called the Mount of Esau (Obad. 8, 9, 19, 21). For the election of Jacob to be the child of promise and the rejection of Esau, see Gen. 25:23; Mal. 1:2, 3; Rom. 9:12, 13.

Es'dra'e-lon (ěs'drâ-ě'lôn). See JEZREEL.

Es'dras (ěz'drâs). See APOCRYPHA and EZRA.

E'sek (ě'sěk) [contention]. A well dug by Isaac in the valley of Gerar, which the Philistine herdsmen claimed (Gen. 26:20).

E'shan (ě'shân), in A.V. Esh'e-an [support]. A village in the mountains of Judah, grouped with Dumah and Hebron (Josh. 15:52). LXX has Soma; hence it may be identical with Khirbet Sam'a, w. of Dôme'h, and about 10 miles s.w. of Hebron.

Esh'ba'al (ěsh'bâ'âl) [for 'ish-ba'al, man of Baal (Lord)]. See ISHBOSHETH.

Esh'ban (ěsh'bân). A son of Dishon, descended from Seir the Horite (Gen. 36:26; I Chron. 1:38, 41).

Esh'col (ěsh'kôl) [a cluster, especially of grapes]. 1. One of 3 Amorite brothers, residing near Hebron and confederate with Abram (Gen. 14:13, 24).

2. A valley near, probably n. of, Hebron (Num. 13:22, 23; Deut. 1:24). The region round about Hebron is celebrated for its large clusters of luscious grapes. It is uncertain whether the valley bore this name before the time of Moses or not. At any rate the name henceforth suggested to the Israelites the spot where the spies, whom Moses had sent to spy out the land, cut the famous cluster which 2 of them carried suspended on a pole between them (Num. 13:24).

Esh'e-an (ěsh'ě-ân). See ESHAN.

E'shek (ě'shěk) [violence, oppression]. A Benjamite, a descendant of Saul (I Chron. 8:1, 33, 39).

Esh'ka-lon'ite (ěsh'ká-lôn-it). See ASHKE-LOHITE.

Esh'ta-ol (ěsh'tâ-ôl). A town in the lowland of Judah (Josh. 15:20, 33), eventually allotted to the Danites (ch. 19:40, 41). It is commonly mentioned in connection with Zorah (Judg. 13:25; 16:31; 18:2, 8, 11; I Chron. 2:53). It has been identified as the village of Eshwa', about 1½ miles e. by n. from Zorah, and 13 miles w., slightly n. from Jerusalem.

Esh'ta-o'lite (ěsh'tâ-ô'lît), in A.V. Esh'ta-u'ite (ěsh'tâ-û'lît). An inhabitant of Eshtaoi (I Chron. 2:53).

Esh'temo'a (ěsh'tê-mô'á), once Esh'temoh (ěsh'tê-mô) (Josh. 15:50) [obedience]. 1. A town in the hill country of Judah, given with its suburbs to the priests (Josh. 15:20, 50; 21:14; I Chron. 6:57). David sent it some of the spoils obtained on the recapture of Ziklag (I Sam. 30:28). The site has been found at es-Semû'a, 9 miles s. of Hebron.

2. A Maacathite, son of Hodiah (I Chron. 4:19, R.V.).

Esh'ton (ěsh'tôn) [possibly, uxorious]. A descendant of Chelub, reckoned in the genealogy of Judah (I Chron. 4:1, 11, 12).

Es'li (ěs'li) [Gr., perhaps from Heb., Jehovah has reserved; cf. Heb. 'āšal, reserve, set apart]. An ancestor of Christ who lived after the Captivity (Luke 3:25).

Es'rom (ěs'rôm). See HEZRON.

Es'senes' (ě-sěnz'). An order of men among the Jews in the time of Christ, who numbered about 4,000, and devoted themselves to a more or less ascetic life. Hoping by isolation to escape ceremonial defilement, they formed colonies by themselves. The wilderness of Judea near En-gedi was a favorite place for their settlements, but there were colonies in various towns of Judea also. Each colony had its own synagogue, a common hall for meals and assemblies, and provision for daily bathing in running water. Whoever became a member of the order gave up all that he possessed to it. They read the Law of Moses daily and nightly, and endeavored to regulate their lives in every detail according to it. Their habits were simple. Their food and clothing were plain. They passed the day in husbandry and other useful industry. Money was almost unnecessary, as they supplied their needs by their own labor; and when they traveled, they found lodging and food free of cost among their brethren. They had no slaves, as they recognized no distinction between men save that of clean and unclean. They did not deny the fitness of marriage; but they abstained from wedlock, except one party among them. Their morality was lofty. They promised "to honor God, to be righteous toward man, to injure no one, either at the bidding of another or of their own accord, to hate evil, to promote good, to be faithful to every one, especially those in authority, to love the truth, to unmask liars, and to keep the hand from theft and the conscience from unrighteous gain" (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 1, 5; War ii. 8, 2-13).

Es'ther (ěs'tēr) [Heb. 'Estēr, probably from Persian; cf. Avestan star (star); or perhaps from Akkad. Ish-tar, which equals Heb. 'Ash-tōreth]. A beautiful maiden, daughter of Abihail, and probably of the tribe of Benjamin (Esth. 2:15; and cf. v. 5 with v. 7). Her Hebrew name was Hādassāh (myrtle). Early left an orphan, she was brought up at Susa, the Persian metropolis, by Mordecai, her cousin, who adopted her. Ahasuerus, king of Persia, who is identified with Xerxes, when in wine, ordered Vashti the queen to be brought into the banquet hall and displayed to the revelers. Angered by her refusal to submit to such indignity, he followed the advice of his obsequious courtiers and decreed her permanent seclusion, and had his realm searched for a fair maiden to take her place. Eventually, in the 7th year of the king, Esther was selected and installed in the palace as queen. It was not known at the time that she was a Jewess. She came to the throne at a critical time. The royal favorite was Haman. Five years after Esther's elevation (Esth. 2:16; 3:7), Haman, annoyed by Mordecai's refusal to do him obeisance, wished to revenge himself by the massacre, not simply of Mordecai, but of all the large Jewish population scattered throughout the empire. He secured the king's consent by the offer of a heavy bribe and by allusion to the stubborn adherence of the Jews to their own laws and customs; and he sought to get the aid of the rabble in the work of slaughter by an appeal to their greed (chs. 2:5 to 3:15). Mordecai urged Esther to interfere for the protection of her race. She was afraid; but, on being solemnly addressed by her guardian, she, after fasting and prayer, risked her life by coming unbidden into the king's presence. With great prudence and tact she made a favorable opportunity for bringing to the king's attention the fact that Haman's plot invaded the palace and included her; and, since the edict of destruction could not be recalled, she gained permission for the Jews to defend themselves, and even to take the offensive against their foes.

The time and manner of Esther's death are unknown. If Ahasuerus is Xerxes, as is believed, Esther was one of Xerxes' wives, of whom one was Amestris, the daughter or granddaughter of Otanes, first definitely reported as already Xerxes' wife in 479 B.C., his 7th or 8th regnal year (Herod. ix. 109; cf. vii. 61). Vashti was the reigning wife in Xerxes' 3d year (Esth. 1:3, 9), and Esther was put into her place in the 10th month of the 7th year (Esth. 2:16, 17), and was queen in the 12th year also (chs. 3:7; 5:3).

The Book of Esther is the last O.T. historical book in the English Bible. In the Hebrew canon it stands among the Hagiographa, and is grouped with 4 other rolls which were used on 5 solemn anniversaries. The last of these anniversaries is Purim; hence Esther is placed last among the Five Rolls (Megilloth). Long after the completion of the canon, the right of Esther to its place in that canon was called in question by the Jews—probably, however, not seriously, but to afford opportunity for intellectual display in its defense. The Jews now regard it with special honor. Christians have been more divided on the subject of its merits. Melito of Sardis and Gregory of Nazianzus omitted it from their lists of canonical books; Athanasius classed it with noncanonical books, and Luther denounced it. Opposition to it was based mainly on the fact that the name of God does not occur in it even once. But ch. 4:14 implies the existence of Providence; ch. 4:16 recognizes fasting as a religious practice, and ch. 9:31 not merely fasting, but a cry or prayer. The great lesson of the book is, in fact, the overruling power of Providence.

Investigators who seek for a possible mythological or legendary origin for certain narratives of the O.T. argue that The Book of Esther springs from such a source; they would make it of Babylonian origin. In its principal form this theory rests its claim for acceptance mainly on the evidence that Esther is a late form of the name of the Babylonian goddess Ishtar; and that Esther's other name Hadassah is the Babylonian word hadashatu (bride, originally myrtle), and is used as a title of goddesses. Mordecai is the same as Marduk, the patron deity of Babylon. He is the cousin of Esther, and it is possible thus to relate Marduk to Ishtar. Haman, the adversary of Mordecai, represents Hamman or Humman (Humban), a chief god of the Elamites, in whose capital, Susa, the scene is laid; and Zeresh, the wife of Haman, may be the same as Kirisha, an Elamite goddess, presumably the consort of Hamman. Vashti is also an Elamite deity, presumably a goddess. The successful resistance of Mordecai and Esther to Haman, Zeresh, and Vashti is the conflict of the gods of Babylonia with the gods of Elam; in other words, it is the struggle between Babylonia and Elam for supremacy, which lasted for a thousand years and ended in the victory of Babylonia (Jensen, Wiener Zeitschrift f. d. Kunde des Morgenlandes, vi. 47 ff., 209 ff.; Gunkel, Schöpfung und Chaos, 310–314, who admits that the basis is lacking so long as the word Pur remains unexplained, 314). If this theory were established, it might show that the Jews of the Dispersion, feeding their hopes on the prophecies of deliverance, instituted a joyous feast and made use of the contest of Marduk and Ishtar with Hamman and Vashti to illustrate or typify the certain victory of the Jews over all their foes.

This theory has serious weaknesses, and many critics have regarded the book as a historical romance written to glorify the Jews in a period when they were hated and envied by their neighbors, and to explain the origin of Purim. This feast has been variously assigned to a Persian or Babylonian origin.

It is easier and more satisfactory, however, to regard the book as historical. The narrative claims to be historical and refers to the chronicles of Persia as containing a record of the events in question (chs. 2:23; 6:1; 10:2). It gives the origin of Purim, which in the time of Josephus was observed in all parts of the world (Jos. Antiq. xi. 6, 13); the connection of the book with such an ancient Jewish feast still forms a considerable presumption in favor of its being founded on facts. This book gives a lifelike representation of Persian manners and customs, especially in connection with the palace at Susa (chs. 1:5, 10, 14; 2:9, 21, 23; 3:7, 12, 13; 4:6, 11; 5:4; 8:8). Furthermore, the character of Ahasuerus is in harmony with that of Xerxes as he is known in history. It appears that Xerxes held a great council of war in the 3d year of his reign before setting out for Greece and that he returned to Susa in the spring of his 7th year (cf. Herod. vii. 8; ix. 108). This agrees with the dates assigned to the great feast and the choice of a successor to Vashti (chs. 1:3; 2:16).

The narrative is minute and circumstantial, containing many names of courtiers and princes (ch. 1:10, 14). The Book of Esther tells more about Haman than his name. It knows him as the son of Hammedatha and an Agagite (chs. 3:1, 10; 8:5; 9:24), and gives the name of 10 sons of his (ch. 9:7–10). Concerning the Hebrews who figure in this narrative, Esther is known in the book as the daughter of Abihail and a queen of Ahasuerus. Mordecai either means "belonging to Marduk" or is a diminutive form of Marduk. The form of the name, however, points to a man, not a god. Such names were not wanting among godly Hebrews: cf. Apollos, Henadad, She-nazzar. The name Mordecai itself was borne by another Jew of the Exile besides the cousin of Esther (Ezra 2:2). The narrative takes Mordecai's lineage back through several ancestors to the tribe of Benjamin (Esth. 2:5).

No substantial ground has been found for regarding Esther, Mordecai, Haman, and Vashti as deities; in the narrative they are human beings. Against the heathen origin of Purim is the acceptance of the event by the Jews as historical. Furthermore, against the theories which assume a heathen festival as the origin of Purim, the grand objection is that no heathen celebration has yet been discovered for the 14th and 15th days of Adar, the 12th month of the year. See MORDECAI, PROVINCE, VASHTI.

The language of The Book of Esther is the Hebrew of the late period, but with many Persian words. From ch. 10:2 it would seem that Xerxes was dead when it was penned. By some, the date of composition is fixed in the reign of Artaxerxes Longimanus (465–425 B.C.); materials, however, do not exist for definitely dating the book. By the majority of critics it is assigned either to the early years of the Greek period (which began 332 B.C.) or to the 3d century B.C. Some favor c. 300 B.C. The book is not quoted in the N.T., nor alluded to. Certain additions to it appear in the LXX. Jerome separated them and put them at the end of the book, and they now find place in the Apocrypha.

E'tam (ē'tām) [perhaps, place of birds of prey]. 1. A village on the border of the s. country and the lowland, transferred from Judah to Simeon (I Chron. 4:32; cf. Josh. 15:32, 42); identified with 'Aiṭūn, about 11 miles w.s.w. of Hebron.

2. Samson dwelt for a time in the cleft of the rock of Etam (Judg. 15:8, 11), having gone there from Timnah. Conder locates this cleft at Beit 'Aṭāb, 5 miles s.e. by e. of Zorah. Others favor 'Arāk Isma'in, in Wadi Isma'in, 2½ miles e.s.e. of Zorah.

3. A town in the neighborhood of Bethlehem, fortified by Rehoboam for the defense of Judah after the secession of the 10 tribes (I Chron. 4:3; II Chron. 11:6; and Josh. 15:59a in LXX). According to the Talmud, the Temple at Jerusalem was supplied with water conducted from the spring of Etam, and an ancient aqueduct extends for 7 miles from the Temple hill, past Bethlehem, to 3 pools, the lowest of which is fed by a neighboring spring, situated on the s., called 'Ain 'Aṭān. Josephus relates that Solomon was fond of driving out in the early morning to Etan (written also Etam), distant 2 schoinoi or 7 miles from Jerusalem, where there was a delightful prospect of gardens and rivulets (Jos. Antiq. viii. 7, 3). Here, at Khirbet el-Khob, near 'Ain 'Aṭān, near the village of Urtās and about 2 miles s.w. of Bethlehem, was the site of Etam. The 3 reservoirs were discovered by pilgrims at quite a late date and named the pools of Solomon. The aqueduct is ancient, antedating the Christian era and the Roman period. Pontius Pilate probably used it as the last section of the great conduit which he undertook to build for the purpose of bringing water to Jerusalem from a distance of 200 stadia or 23 miles (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 3, 2), or 400 stadia (Jos. War ii. 9, 4).

E'tham (ē'thām). The 1st encampment of the Israelites after leaving Succoth, on their departure from Egypt. It was on the edge of the wilderness (Ex. 13:20; Num. 33:6). It apparently did not lie on the direct road from Egypt to the Philistine country (Ex. 13:17). The name was extended to a portion of the wilderness of Shur, requiring at least 3 days to cross it, and apparently reaching to or even including Marah (Num. 33:8; cf. Ex. 15:22). Apparently it was located at the e. end of the wadi Tūmilāt, n. of Lake Timsāh.

E'than (ē'thān) [perennial; permanent]. 1. A descendant of Judah, belonging to the tribal family of Zerah (I Chron. 2:6). He seems to have been the person of this name who was celebrated for his wisdom (I Kings 4:31; Psalm 89, title).

2. A Levite, of the family of Gershon, house of Libni (I Chron. 6:42, 43; cf. v. 20 and Num. 26:58).

3. A Levite, of the family of Merari, house of Mushi. He was a son of Kishi or Kushaiah, and was appointed a singer in the time of David (I Chron. 6:44, 47; 15:17, 19). His name, it appears, was changed to Jeduthun, "praising one," after his appointment to service in the tabernacle at Gibeon (ch. 16:38-41; cf. 15:17, 19 with 25:1).

E'th'a-nim (ē'th'a-nīm) [incessant rains]. The 7th month (I Kings 8:2), called also Tishri. It was approximately October. Within it fell the feast of trumpets, the great Day of Atonement, and the feast of tabernacles. See YEAR.

E'th'ba'al (ē'th'bā'āl) [with Baal; Gr. Ithobalos suggests "With him is Baal"]. A king of the Tyrians and Sidonians, and father of Jezebel (I Kings 16:31; Jos. Antiq. viii. 13, 1 and 2; ix. 6, 6). He was priest of Ashtoreth, but slew his brother and seized the throne (Jos. Aption i. 18).

E'ther (ē'thēr) [abundance]. A village in the lowland of Judah (Josh. 15:42), but allotted to the tribe of Simeon (ch. 19:7). It is called Tochen in I Chron. 4:32; identified with Khirbet el-'Ater, about a mile n.w. of Beit Jibrin.

E'thi-o'pia (ē'thī-ō'pī-ā) [Greek Aithiōpia]. A country called in Hebrew Kūsh (Cush), which is continually mentioned in connection with Egypt (Ps. 68:31; Isa. 20:3-5; Ezek. 30:4, 5; Dan. 11:43; Nahum 3:9) and sometimes with Libya or the Libyans (II Chron. 16:8; Ezek. 30:5; 38:5; Dan. 11:43; Nahum 3:9), and must certainly have been in e. Africa. It ran s. from Syene, the s. point of Egypt (Ezek. 29:10, R.V. marg.; cf. Judith 1:10). It was manifestly the upper region of the Nile, the Sudan, Nubia with Kordofan, Sennaar, and n. Abyssinia, a region in large measure desert, though in places fertile. The rivers of Ethiopia (Isa. 18:1; Zeph. 3:10) were probably the White and Blue Niles, with the Atbara and Takkaze. The topazes of Ethiopia were celebrated (Job 28:19). Its inhabitants were tall (Isa. 45:14). They were colored men, probably black (Jer. 13:23). They engaged in mercantile transactions, selling the productions of their country in foreign lands (Isa. 45:14), and as a consequence became wealthy (ch. 43:3). When the Ethiopians, led by Zerah, invaded Judah, they were signally defeated by King Asa (II Chron. 14:9-15; 16:8). An Ethiopian dynasty, the 25th, established itself in Egypt; to it belonged that Tirhakah who met Sennacherib in battle at Eltekeh (II Kings 19:9; Isa. 37:9). Isaiah (ch. 20:1-6) and Zephaniah (ch. 2:12) prophesied against the Ethiopians, while the psalmist predicted that Ethiopia would "haste to stretch out her hands unto God" (Ps. 68:31; cf. Ps. 87:4). The prophecy was fulfilled in the conversion of the Ethiopian eunuch (Acts 8:26-40) and the introduction of the gospel into Abyssinia.

E'th'-ka'z'in (ē'th'kā'z'in), in A.V. It'tah-ka'zin (it'ā-kā'z'in), with ending, -āh, which denotes direction. A place on the boundary line of Zebulun (Josh. 19:13), near Sepphoris; Kefer Kenna has been suggested as the site.

E'th'nan (ē'th'nān) [gift, hire]. A man of Judah, family of Hezron (I Chron. 4:7; cf. ch. 4:5 seq. and ch. 2:24).

E'th'ni (ē'th'nī) [cf. Ethnan]. A Gershonite Levite (I Chron. 6:41). In v. 21 he is called Jeatherai. The main difference is found in the last consonant and may have arisen from a scribal confusion of Heb. nun (n) and resh (r).

Eu'bu'lus (ū-bū'lūs) [Gr., well-advised, prudent]. A Roman Christian (II Tim. 4:21).

Eu'me-nes (ū'mē-nēs) [Gr., well-disposed]. King of Pergamos, 197-159 B.C. When the Romans defeated Antiochus the Great at Magnesia in 190 B.C., they assigned the greater part of the defeated king's realm n. of the Taurus Mountains to Eumenes in return for the services which he had rendered them (I Macc. 8:6-8; Livy xxxvii. 44). They bestowed Lycia and Caria on the Rhodians. The report, which Judas Maccabaeus heard, that the Romans had taken India and Media also was not true.

Eu-ni'ce (ū-nī'sē) [Gr., blessed with victory]. A pious Jewess, mother of Timothy (Acts 16:1; II Tim. 1:5).

Eu'nuch [Gr., keeping or guarding the couch]. Properly a chamberlain; but in the East persons who had been rendered impotent were employed for this office, hence an impotent man (Isa. 56:3; Matt. 19:12). There is scarcely a doubt that the word is used in this sense throughout Scripture, even when it is rendered into English by some other term. There have been, and still are, married eunuchs (Gen. 39:1, rendered "officer," and v. 7). Eunuchs often obtained high position and great authority. The captain of the guard of Pharaoh and his chief butler and his chief baker were eunuchs (Gen. 37:36; 40:2, 7, translated "officer"). Eunuchs ministered at the court of Babylon (Dan. 1:3). They served in the presence of the Persian king, and acted as doorkeepers of his palace (Esth. 1:10; 2:21); a eunuch was over his harem (ch. 2:3, 14), and a eunuch was deputed to attend his queen (ch. 4:5). They served also at the court of Ahab and his son Jehoram, and they waited upon Jezebel (I Kings 22:9; II Kings 8:6; 9:32). Even in Judah, although eunuchs were legally excluded from the congregation of the Lord (Deut. 23:1), they were employed at David's court (I Chron. 28:1), and, in the last days of the monarchy, at the degenerate court of the successors of Josiah (cf. II Kings 24:15 with Jer. 29:2; II Kings 25:19). The eunuchs in Judah were probably in most, if not in all, cases foreigners (Jer. 38:7). The cupbearer of Herod the Great was a eunuch, as were also the official who brought him his food and the one who assisted him to bed; and his favorite wife Mariamne was served by a eunuch (Jos. Antiq. xv. 7, 4; xvi. 8, 1). A eunuch was over the treasure of Queen Candace of Ethiopia, and he was admitted to baptism (Acts 8:27, 37; cf. Isa. 56:3).

Euo'dia (û-ô'dî-â), in A.V. Euo'dias (û-ô'dî-âs) [Gr., fragrance]. A Christian woman at Philippi blemished by bickering with Syntyche (Phil. 4:2).

Euphra'tes (û-frâ'têz) [Gr. of Heb. Perâth]. One of the great rivers of w. Asia. It is formed by the junction of two streams: the Murad Su, rising in Armenia, between Lake Van and Mount Ararat, being the more easterly; and the Frat or Kara Su, rising n.e. of Erzurum (Erzerum), the more westerly. Sometimes the name Frat, cognate with Heb. Perâth, is applied to both of these streams. They run in a w. direction to about latitude 39° N., and longitude 39° E., after which the combined waters turn s., break through the s. chain of the Taurus Mountains. Then the river bends s.e., constituting the w. boundary of Mesopotamia. About latitude 31° N., longitude 47° E., the Tigris unites with the Euphrates, to constitute what is now called the Shattal-Arab, which, after a course of about 90 miles more, falls into the Persian Gulf. The whole length of the Euphrates is about 1,800 miles. It was one of the rivers of paradise (Gen. 2:14). It was familiarly known to the Hebrews as "the great river" or simply "the river." It formed the n.e. limit of the Hebrew dominion when its extension was at the greatest (Gen. 15:18; cf. II Sam. 8:3; I Chron. 18:3; I Kings 4:21, 24). It was a boundary between e. and w., between Egypt and Assyria-Babylonia, each power desiring to possess the country between the brook of Egypt and the Euphrates. In the Persian period also it separated e. from w. (Ezra 4:10, 11; 5:3; 6:6; Neh. 2:7). It was a boundary of the Seleucid kingdom (I Macc. 3:32; 8:8), and it was regarded as the e. limit of the Roman Empire. The greatest city on its banks was Babylon. Another important place was the old Hittite capital Carchemish, the scene of various battles, especially of one (605 B.C.) between the Chaldeans led by Nebuchadnezzar and the Egyptians under Necho (Jer. 46:2). In the book of Revelation certain angels are described as being "bound at the great river Euphrates" (Rev. 9:14), and the 6th vial was poured out upon the Euphrates itself (ch. 16:12).

Eu-pol'e-mus (û-pôl'ê-mūs) [Gr., good at war]. Son of that John who obtained special privileges for the Jews from Antiochus the Great (I Macc. 8:17; II Macc. 4:11). Eupolemus was one of two ambassadors sent by Judas Maccabaeus to Rome to make a treaty with the Romans (Jos. Antiq. xii. 10, 6). Some think that he is the Jewish historical writer Eupolemus whom Alexander Polyhistor quotes so frequently.

Eu-raq'u'i-lo (û-râk'wî-lô) [Gr. Eurakylôn (e.n.e. wind), from Gr. euros (e. wind)+ Lat. aquilo (n.e. wind); cf. Vulgate europaquilo]. A tempestuous n.e. wind of the Mediterranean (Acts 27:14). The wind from that quarter, now called gregale, blows generally in early spring, and is the most violent wind on the Mediterranean.

Eu-rok'ly-dôn (û-rôk'li-dôn) [Gr. euroklydôn, from Gr. euros (e. or e.s.e. wind)+Gr. klydôn (wave)]. A tempestuous wind which blows from the s.e. or the e. It brought the vessel in which Paul was sailing toward Rome first into danger and then to shipwreck (Acts 27:14, A.V.). R.V. prefers the reading Eurakylôn, which has better MS. authority, and accordingly renders "Euraquilo."

Eu'ty-chus (û'ti-kūs) [Gr., fortunate]. A young man of Troas who, falling asleep while Paul was preaching there, fell from the 3d loft or floor. He was taken up dead, but was miraculously restored to life by the apostle (Acts 20:9, 10).

Ev'an-gel-ist [Gr., euangelistês, a messenger of good tidings]. An order of men in the primitive Church distinct from apostles, prophets, pastors, and teachers (Eph. 4:11). Their name implied that their special function was to announce the glad tidings of the gospel to those before ignorant of them, and, as they were not pastors of particular churches, they were able to go from place to place preaching to those who as yet were without the Christian pale. Philip, who was the means of converting and baptizing the Ethiopian eunuch, was an evangelist (Acts 21:8), and we find him successively at Jerusalem (ch. 6:5), in Samaria (ch. 8:5), on the road between Jerusalem and Gaza (v. 26), in the cities n. of Azotus (Ashdod) (v. 40), and finally at Caesarea (v. 40; ch. 21:8). Timothy was also commanded by Paul to do the work of an evangelist (II Tim. 4:5). At a later date the name was given to the writers of the 4 Gospels.

Eve (êv) [Heb., Hawwâh, life]. The name given by Adam to the first woman because she was the mother of all living (Gen. 3:20). Soon after his creation, she was brought into being to be a help meet for him. The narrative has been variously interpreted as meaning that: 1. Woman was formed from the rib of man, Adam being in a deep sleep (trance), which produced anesthesia (there may be the additional idea that divine working cannot take place under human observation); 2. Woman was not actually formed from man's rib, but Adam had a vision by which he was taught his oneness of nature with woman and her rights and privileges; 3. Woman's relation to man is set forth in allegory. The two human beings were placed in the Garden of Eden; and in order to test their obedience they were forbidden to touch or taste the fruit of one particular tree. But the serpent under Satanic influence led Eve to question the goodness of God and then to eat the forbidden fruit. She afterward persuaded Adam to eat, who thus shared her guilt. The result was the fall of man (Gen. 3:1-24; II Cor. 11:3; I Tim. 2:14). After the expulsion of the guilty pair from the garden, Eve became successively the mother of Cain, Abel, Seth, and other sons and also daughters (Gen. 4:1, 2, 25, 26; 5:1-5).

E'vi (ē'vi). One of the 5 kings of Midian, allies or vassals of Sihon, slain in the war waged by Moses against the Midianites because they seduced the Israelites to licentious idolatry (Num. 31:8; Josh. 13:21).

E'vil. The origin of evil is a problem which has perplexed speculative minds in all ages and countries. God is not the author of sin, but he permits it. He has permitted it, because the revelation of his infinite perfection is the highest conceivable good and the ultimate end of all his works, and there could be no manifestation of certain of his attributes if sin were not permitted. Were there no misery, there could be no mercy shown by God; and there could be no revelation of his grace and justice, if there were no sin (Rom. 9:22, 23). Sin is permitted that God's justice may be known in its punishment, and his mercy in its forgiveness.

E'vil-Me-ro'dach (ē'vīl-mē-rō'dāk) [Akkad. Amēl-Marduk, man of Marduk]. Son and successor of Nebuchadnezzar. He became king in 562 B.C., and reigned until 560. In the first of these 2 he took Jehoiachin, the captive king of Judah, from his prison and placed him above all the other rulers whom he had in thrall, giving him a daily allowance of food during the remainder of his life (II Kings 25:27-30; Jer. 52:31-34). A conspiracy was formed against Evil-Merodach, his own brother-in-law, Neriglissar or Nergalsarusur, being at its head. The king was accused of lawlessness and intemperance, and was put to death in 560 B.C. Neriglissar, the chief conspirator, then ascended the throne (Jos. Antiq. x. 11, 2).

E'vil Spir'it. See DEMON.

Ex'e'cu'tion-er. See GUARD.

Ex'ile. See CAPTIVITY and DISPERSION.

Ex'o-dus (ēk'sō-dūs) [Gr., a going out, a way out]. 1. The departure of the Israelites from Egypt, after they had been divinely emancipated from bondage in that land. There is great difficulty in settling the exact route of the Exodus. The miracles by the hand of Moses were wrought at Zoan, i.e., Tanis (Ps. 78:12), and Raamses was a suburb of that capital. Thence the Israelites journeyed to Succoth (Ex. 12:37), a site which is the same as, or near, Pithom; it is marked by Tell el-Maskhutah in the wadi Tumilat, 32 miles s.e. of Tanis and 11 miles w. of Isma'iliya. They did not take the shortest route to Palestine, which lay through the land of the Philistines, but went by way of the wilderness by the Red Sea (Ex. 13:17, 18). Their first encampment after leaving Succoth was Etham. The site has not been identified; but it was on the edge of the wilderness (v. 20). Thence they turned back and encamped before Pi-hahiroth, between Migdol and the sea, before Baal-zephon (Ex. 14:2; Num. 33:7). This camp has not been definitely located. It was, however, w. of the Red Sea. From this place they marched through the Red Sea into the wilderness of Shur (Ex. 15:4, 22; Num. 33:8), and thence along the coast of the Red Sea toward Mount Sinai (Ex. 16:1; Num. 33:10, 15). For the date of the Exodus, see EGYPT, III. 8.

2. The book of Exodus, the 2d book of the Pentateuch. In the Hebrew Scriptures the title consists of the opening words, "And these the names." The name Exodus was appropriately given to the book by the Greek translators, because it narrates the departure from Egypt, which was a turning point in Israel's history.

The book is a continuous narrative and may be divided into 3 sections: 1. In Egypt (chs.

1:1 to 12:36). The period of several centuries immediately following the descent of Jacob into Egypt is passed over with a single remark about the increase of the people after the death of Joseph (ch. 1:7). Oppression of the Israelites (v. 8 seq.). Birth, earlier life, and call of Moses (chs. 2 to 4). Struggle with Pharaoh and infliction of the plagues; in connection with the last plague, institution of the passover (chs. 5:1 to 12:36). 2. From Egypt to Sinai (chs. 12:37 to 19:2). Departure from Raamses (ch. 12:37-42). Supplementary regulation respecting the passover, stating the condition upon which foreigners could partake of it (ch. 12:43-51). Sanctification of the first-born enjoined upon Moses (ch. 13:1, 2); announcement to the people of a 7 days' festival to be observed henceforth in connection with the passover, and of God's command to sanctify the first-born (vs. 3-16). Passage of the Red Sea (ch. 14), song of deliverance (ch. 15:1-19), bitter water at Marah, manna and quails (chs. 15:20 to 16:36). At Rephidim: water from rock in Horeb, victory over Amalek, and visit of Jethro (chs. 17; 18). 3. At Sinai (chs. 19:3 to 40:38 and uninterruptedly to Num. 10:10). Establishment of the theocracy: theocratic covenant proposed by God on condition of obedience (Ex. 19:3-6), approval of the terms by the elders of the people (vs. 7, 8), the Ten Commandments and subsidiary laws enacted and written in the Book of the Covenant (chs. 20 to 23; 24:4; for analysis and form of these laws, see THEOCRACY). Ratification of the covenant by the nation (ch. 24:1-8), and the covenant meal of the contracting parties (vs. 9-11). Moses in the mount; architectural specifications for the tabernacle and its furniture, tables of stone (chs. 24:12 to 31:18; for analysis, see TABERNACLE). The golden calf (chs. 32; 33). Moses' 2d sojourn in the mount, with summarizing urgent repetition of covenant laws (ch. 34). Construction and erection of the tabernacle (chs. 35 to 40). See PENTATEUCH.

Ex'or-cist. One who professes by using words and ceremonies to eject evil spirits and deliver from their malign influence. Certain impostors of this sort, vagabond Jews, were encountered by Paul at Ephesus (Acts 19:13-19).

E'zar (ē'zēr). See EZER, I.

Ez'ba-i (ēz'bā-i). Father of one of David's mighty men (I Chron. 11:26, 37, possibly merely a variant reading for Arbite of II Sam. 23:35).

Ez'bon (ēz'bōn). 1. A son of Gad (Gen. 46:16). See OZNI.

2. The head of a father's house, family of Bela, tribe of Benjamin (I Chron. 7:6, 7).

Ez'e-ki'as (ēz'ē-kī'ās). See HEZEKIAH.

Ez'ek'iel (ē-zēk'y'ēl) [El (God) strengthen]. One of the greater Jewish prophets, a son of Buzi, and of priestly family (Ezek. 1:3). He grew up, until beyond the years of childhood, in the homeland, probably at Jerusalem in the environment of the Temple, during the ministry of the Prophet Jeremiah. He was carried captive from Judah by Jehoiachin (597 B.C.), 8 years after Daniel's deportation (chs. 33:21; 40:1; cf. II Kings 24:11-16). Josephus says that he was a youth at the time (Jos. Antiq. x. 6, 3). He was not a child but was under the age when Levites assumed their duties and were reckoned in the census as men. He lived with the Jewish exiles on the Chebar, a canal in Babylonia, probably at Tel-abib (Ezek. 1:1, 3; 3:15); married probably as early as the 6th, at least by the 9th year of the Captivity, and had a house (chs. 8:1; 24:1, 18).

His prophetic ministry began in the 5th year of Jehoiachin's captivity, 7 years before the destruction of the Temple at Jerusalem, while he was dwelling on the Chebar (ch. 1:1, 2). He was then in his 30th year (ch. 1:1), the age at which Levites entered upon service (Num. 4:3). The theory that the 30th year does not refer to Ezekiel's age, but is a date reckoned either from the accession of Nabopolassar, Nebuchadnezzar's father, or from the reforms of Josiah, fails in view of Jer. 25:1, 3; II Kings 23:36; 25:2-6; Ezek. 1:2. Though an exile in a foreign land, Ezekiel had freedom to utter his prophecies and was resorted to for advice by the elders of the people (chs. 8:1; 14:1; 20:1); but his words were not followed faithfully (ch. 33:30-33).

It is evident from the affinities of thought and language that he was quite familiar with Jeremiah's teachings. He takes up brief doctrinal remarks, or suggestive allegories, or short speeches of Jeremiah, and develops and expands them, and often gives to them a literary finish: as the caldron (Jer. 1:13-15; Ezek. 11:2-11; 24:3-14); the two sisters (Jer. 3:6-11; Ezek. ch. 23); forgiveness for the condemned, when penitent (a nation, Jer. 18:5-12, an individual, Ezek. 18:21-32); the evil shepherds replaced by the Davidic king (Jer. 23:1-6; Ezek. 34:1-24); individual responsibility in view of the proverb about the fathers eating sour grapes (Jer. 31:29, 30; Ezek. 18:2-31); the new spiritual nature (Jer. 31:33, 34; Ezek. 11:19, 20; 36:25-29); the exiles, not the Jews in Jerusalem, the hope of the future (Jer., ch. 24; Ezek. 11:15-21; 37:1-14). Ezekiel's prophetic activity extended over a period of at least 22 years (cf. ch. 1:2 with 29:17). The time and manner of his death are unknown.

The Book of Ezekiel stands in the English Bible between Lamentations and Daniel. As these 2 books are placed among the Writings or Hagiographa in the Hebrew canon, Ezekiel's place in the Hebrew Scriptures is directly after Jeremiah. The prophecies are arranged nearly, though not quite, in chronological order, and they are dated according to the years of Jehoiachin's captivity in which they were delivered. The book falls into 3 divisions:

I. Prophecies delivered before the capture of Jerusalem, foretelling its overthrow for its sins. In the 5th year the priest is called to the prophetic office and prepared for his work by a vision (chs. 1:1 to 3:21), and then is directed to prophesy, by symbolical actions and their interpretation, the destruction of the city (chs. 3:22 to 7:27). In the 6th year, are denunciations of Judah for idolatry (ch. 8); symbolical departure of Jehovah from the Temple because of its profanation (chs. 9:1 to 11:13); comfort, the exiles are still God's people, he will be a sanctuary to them (v. 16), restore them to the land of Israel (v. 17), give those that reform their lives a new heart (vs. 18-21). Unbelief and adherence to false prophets are the reasons for Jehovah's forsaking his city (chs. 12 to 14); the event is certain (chs. 15 to 17), but the repentant shall enjoy God's favor (ch. 18). Lamentation for the princes of Israel (ch. 19). In the 7th year, it is prophesied that, because Jehovah's name has been profaned in the sight of the heathen, he will punish the people, but will afterward restore them for his name's sake (ch. 20:1-44); the doom is certain, the transgressions are come to remembrance before God (chs. 20:45 to 23:49). In the 9th year, the siege of Jerusalem and the dispersion of the people are symbolized by a caldron (ch. 24).

II. Prophecies of judgment against the nations: in the 9th year, against Ammon, Moab, Edom, and Philistia (ch. 25); in the 11th year, against Tyre and Sidon (chs. 26 to 28); and in the 10th, 27th, and 11th years, against Egypt (chs. 29 to 32).

III. Prophecies concerning the Restoration, delivered after the capture and destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar. In the 12th year, the evening before the news of the fall of the city reached the prophet, the hand of the Lord was upon him, and the actual reception of the news marks the opening of a new activity on the part of Ezekiel (ch. 33:1-22). He is taught that, after the judgment, the people shall recognize that Jehovah is God, and that a true prophet has been among them (ch. 33:23-33); a good shepherd, even David, shall be raised up (ch. 34), their present foes punished (ch. 35), the people sanctified and restored to their land (ch. 36), revived as from the dead, their 12 tribes reunited (ch. 37), and their foes finally overthrown (chs. 38; 39). In the 25th year, the re-establishment of God's Church is disclosed, being symbolically exhibited in the vision of the Temple enlarged and holy throughout, and the people cleansed and accepted by Jehovah (chs. 40 to 43), its holy services (chs. 44 to 46), the river of life issuing from it and making the desert to rejoice (ch. 47), and the distribution of the land among the tribes, and their common city known as the place where Jehovah is (ch. 48).

In this vision the Temple that Ezekiel had known so well in his younger days is quite changed in appearance. Instead of the little hill of Zion, he beholds a high mountain, crowned by the buildings of a new and grander sanctuary. An angel, with a measuring rod and line, is standing at the gate. The new Temple is modeled, indeed, after the old in its general arrangements, but it is so located with reference to the habitations of men, and its courts and chambers are so disposed, as to safeguard the holiness of Jehovah, who is soon to dwell there, and impress upon the worshippers Jehovah's separateness from both moral and ceremonial impurity. Many years earlier Ezekiel had seen in vision Jehovah leaving the old, desecrated Temple (chs. 10:18, 19; 11:22-24); now the prophet beholds Jehovah returning by the same gate into the Temple and the glory of Jehovah filling the house, and he hears a voice from within saying: "This is the place of my throne, . . . where I will dwell in the midst of the children of Israel for ever. And the house of Israel shall no more defile my holy name" (ch. 43:1-7). In the inner court, before the holy house, Ezekiel sees the altar of atonement provided for the new Israel and hears the declaration, "And I will accept you, saith the Lord Jehovah" (vs. 13-27).

The worship of accepted Israel is now described to the prophet. In the new theocracy the reality will correspond to the divine ideal. The uncircumcised in heart or flesh will not enter into the sanctuary. The Levitical families who proved unfaithful of old will not be allowed to officiate at the altar; yet they will be given a place, albeit a humble one, in the Temple. The priests, the sons of Zadok, whose very name means righteous, that had remained faithful, will alone fill the high office of priest before Jehovah (ch. 44). An oblation unto Jehovah will be made of a portion of the land for the support of the services and ministry of the sanctuary (ch. 45:1-6). For the prince also suitable provision will be made from the oblation-land, enabling him to maintain the public services in the name of the people, and he shall not abuse his power by oppressing the people or encroaching on the prerogatives of the priests (chs. 45:7-12; 46:2, 16-18). The people likewise shall assemble in their own appointed place in the Temple, when they worship (v. 9). All members of the theocracy, official and lay, know

PLAN OF EZEKIEL'S TEMPLE

- A. The outer wall encompassing the Temple area
- B. The three outer gates
- C. The outer court
- D. The thirty chambers or cells
- E. The inner court
- F. The inner gates
- G. Eight steps leading to the inner gates
- H. Chambers for the singers in the inner court
- I. Altar of burnt offerings
- J. The building in the inner court behind the Temple
- K. A court or passage called "The Separate Place"
- L. Longer chambers (Ezek. 42:1, 8)
- L'. Shorter chambers (Ezek. 42:7, 8)
- M. Walk between the blocks of chambers
- N. Steps facing eastward and leading into the shorter chamber or block of rooms
- O. Priests' kitchens
- P. People's kitchens
- x. The place where Ezekiel stood, according to ch. 42:2

The checkered space within the outer wall is the pavement.

- Q. The Temple building
- 1. The porch (Ezek. 40:48, 49)
- 2. "The Temple" or the Holy Place (Ezek. 41:1, 2)
- 3. The Most Holy Place or the Holy of Holies

The checkered space around the Temple building represents "a raised basement round about" (Ezek. 41:8); i.e., it corresponds to a pavement.

and perform the duties in reference to atonement which belong to them in their several places and relations. Ezekiel is next shown a river issuing from the Temple, swelling into a mighty stream, and bringing life and health to the regions of barrenness and death (ch. 47:1-12). The bounds of the land to be occupied by the restored community are described (ch. 47:13-20), and the location of the tribes (chs. 47:21 to 48:29); the oblation-land being divided between priests, Levites, the prince, and the city (ch. 48:8-22). The city belongs to all Israel in common (vs. 15-20, 30-34; cf. v. 19 and ch. 45:6), and its name is Jehovah-shammah, Jehovah is there (ch. 48:35), symbolizing the central thought of the entire prophecy.

What was Ezekiel's contribution to Israel's thought? Critics of the school of Wellhausen regard Ezekiel as the father of the later formal Judaism. They assert that the description of the new Jerusalem in chs. 40 to 48 is a program, and gave rise to the characteristic priestly regulations contained in Leviticus and Numbers. This theory is rejected by scholars who take the Biblical view of the origin of Israel's institutions; they maintain that the characteristic legislation of Leviticus antedates Ezekiel, and also that the prophet did not intend these chapters as a program. The picture that is unfolded in these chapters is not an ideal which the prophet expected would be realized literally, but is purely symbolic; for in no other way is it possible to understand the high mountain of the new Zion, and the measurements, and the allotments of the land which are geometrical and not geographical, and the healing waters that issue from the sanctuary and presently become a mighty river, and the trees whose fruit is produced every month and whose leaves are for healing. Ezekiel's enrichment of Israel's thought, through these chapters and his other prophecies, is found in his spiritual teaching. Among other things he contributed: 1. To the thought of God. He removes as far as possible an anthropomorphic conception of God; cf. "the appearance of the likeness of the glory of Jehovah" (ch. 1:28). While others speak of Jehovah shepherd his people (Gen. 48:15; Psalm 28), gathering the scattered flock of Israel (Jer. 23:3; 31:10), and tenderly caring for them (Isa. 40:11), Ezekiel represents God as seeking his lost sheep (Ezek. 34:11-16; cf. Matt. 18:12-14; Luke 19:10). 2. To the vision of the new Jerusalem: the high mountain (Ezek. 40:2; Rev. 21:10), the holy city, God's tabernacle among men (Ezek. 37:27; Rev. 21:3), the glory of God in it (Ezek. 43:2-5; Rev. 21:11), the city foursquare (Ezek. 48:16, 30; Rev. 21:16), having 12 gates (Ezek. 48:30-34; Rev. 21:12, 13), the river of life (Ezek. 47:1; Rev. 22:1), and the trees on either side of the river, whose leaves are for healing (Ezek. 47:7, 12; Rev. 22:2). As in Ezekiel, so in John the vision is symbolical. 3. But above all Ezekiel contributed to the spiritual conception of the Jerusalem of the future. Taking up a germinal teaching of Jeremiah, he lays the emphasis on individual responsibility (Ezek., chs. 18; 33:1-20) and on the renewed nature of the people and the holiness of the kingdom as the crowning glory of the coming time (chs. 11:19, 20; 36:24-29). The spiritually regenerate Zion is henceforth definitely before the minds of God's people as a noble idea and the great hope.

E'zel (ē'zēl) [departure]. The place where David hid until Jonathan could inform him of Saul's disposition toward him (I Sam. 20:19).

E'zem (ē'zēm), in A.V. twice A'zem [mighty]. A village near the border of Edom in that part of the territory allotted to the tribe of Judah, which was afterward assigned to Simeon (Josh. 15:29; 19:3; I Chron. 4:29). It has been identified with Khirbet Umm el 'Azam.

E'zer, I (ē'zēr), in A.V. once E'zar [treasure]. A Horite tribe and its chieftain (Gen. 36:21, 30; I Chron. 1:38).

E'zer, II (ē'zēr) [help]. 1. A descendant, probably son, of Ephraim, killed in a raid against the Philistines (I Chron. 7:21).

2. A man of Judah, descended from Hur (I Chron. 4:1, 4).

3. A Gadite who joined David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:9).

4. A son of Jeshua. He was ruler of Mizpah, and repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:19).

5. A priest who took part in the ceremony at the dedication of the rebuilt wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:42).

E'zi-on-gē'ber (ē'zī-ōn-gē'bēr), in A.V. often E'zi-on-ga'ber (ē'zī-ōn-gā'bēr). A town on the Red Sea, at the n. end of the Gulf of 'Akabah, near and probably w. of Elath (Deut. 2:8; I Kings 9:26; 10:22; 22:48; II Chron. 8:17). The Israelites encamped by the town as they journeyed in the wilderness (Num. 33:35). Ezion-geber has been identified with Tell el-Kheleifeh, which is situated some 500 yards from the seashore, about halfway between 'Akabah at the e. end of the Gulf of 'Akabah and Mrahrash at the w. end. It lies in the bottom of a curve banked on the e. side by the hills of Edom, which continue into Arabia, and on the w. side by those of Palestine, which continue into Sinai. The town accordingly is open to the full fury of the winds that blow down the center of the Arabah like a forced draft. This phenomenon explains why Ezion-geber was founded at such an inclement site. Excavations have brought to light an elaborate system of furnaces equipped with flues and built to take advantage of the draft furnished by the winds from the n. Here were smelted, refined, and wrought into semifinished and finished products the ores extracted from the copper and iron mines in the Arabah. This discovery is interesting in view of the reference to iron and copper in Deut. 8:9.

The place apparently did not become a really important site until the reign of Solomon, who made it his naval base on the Red Sea. That king controlled the overland trade route to Arabia and the sea route from Ezion-geber to Ophir. For about 200 years Judah and Edom were engaged in a bitter struggle for the domination of these routes. After Solomon's death the sea traffic from Ezion-geber to Ophir seems to have ceased. Apparently the sea trade with Arabia remained quiescent until Jehoshaphat became king of Judah; it seems that he attempted to revive it, but failed. Ahaziah, the son of Ahab, offered to co-operate, but Jehoshaphat refused his aid (I Kings 22:48, 49; but cf. II Chron. 20:36, 37). During the reign of Joram, son of Jehoshaphat, Edom revolted against Judah and regained its independence (II Kings 8:20-22; II Chron. 21:8-10). Amaziah, king of Judah, however, waged a successful war against Edom (II Kings 14:7; II Chron. 25:11, 12) and his son Uzziah (Azariah) "built Elath, and restored it to Judah" (II Kings 14:22; II Chron. 26:1, 2). From the time of Uzziah Elath apparently is to be identified with Ezion-geber. If the reading of R.V. marg. in II Kings 16:6 (according to the LXX) be adopted, Ezion-geber (Elath) in 735 B.C. passed into the control of the Edomites and out of Biblical history. See ELATH.

Ez'nite (ēz'nīt). See ADINO.

Ez'ra (ēz'rā), in R.V. once Ez'rah [help]. 1. A man who is registered with Judah (I Chron. 4:1, 17); R.V. spells Ezra as in Heb.

2. One of the chief priests who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:1, 7). A father's house bore his name in the next generation (v. 13).

3. A priest descended from Zadok and from Phinehas (Ezra 7:1-6). He was a ready scribe in the Law of Moses, making the written law, which was in his hand (v. 14), the subject of study and teaching (vs. 10, 11). In the 7th year of Artaxerxes Longimanus, king of Persia from 464 to 424 B.C., he was commissioned by the king to go to Jerusalem to inquire into the civil and religious condition of the Jewish community and conform it to the teaching of God's law (v. 14). He was given orders on the authorities in the province "beyond the River" for money and goods for the Temple and for the exemption of the Temple officials from taxation (vs. 21, 24). He was authorized to lead a fresh company of Jewish exiles to Palestine, in addition to those who had accompanied Zerubbabel and the high priest, Jeshua, 80 years before (538 B.C.). On gathering together those who proposed to return, and mustering them, he found no Levites of the lower order; but on sending word to their chief, a few were persuaded to join him. After fasting and seeking God's guidance for the journey, the party, numbering over 1,700 men, set forth on the 12th day of the 1st month, in the 7th year of Artaxerxes, 458-457 B.C. (Ezra 8:1-23, 31). On reaching Jerusalem 4 months later, on the 1st day of the 5th month (ch. 7:8), Ezra gave over the vessels he had received for the Temple, offered sacrifice, and presented the king's orders to the neighboring governors (ch. 8:33-36). He was grieved to discover that Jews of Palestine, including even some of the priests, contrary to the Law of Moses, had married heathen wives; but he succeeded in inducing most of them to divorce these foreign women (chs. 9; 10). Thirteen years later, after Nehemiah had come to Jerusalem and repaired its walls, Ezra took the leading part in reading the Law of Moses to the people of the colony (Neh., ch. 8). He died, according to Josephus, about the time of Eliashib's succession to the high priesthood (Jos. Antiq. xi. 5, 5). He was certainly for a while contemporary with Eliashib (Neh. 3:1; 13:4, 7, 28). For his relation to the Law and to the O.T. books, see CANON.

The Book of Ezra consists of 2 parts: 1. A narrative of the return of the Jews from Babylonia under Zerubbabel in the year 538 B.C., the restoration of divine service, and the erection of the Temple in the face of Samaritan opposition (chs. 1 to 6). 2. Without reference to a gap of 58 years in the chronology, the narrative continues with an account of the return of a second body of exiles under Ezra in the year 458-457 B.C., and of Ezra's energetic and successful measures to put a stop to the marriage of Israelites with foreigners (chs. 7 to 10).

The book is largely composed of copies of public records and official documents. The provincial documents and history are written in Aram. (chs. 4:8 to 6:18; 7:12-26); namely, copies of the letters sent to the Persian kings by officials of the province "beyond the River" (chs. 4:8-16; 5:7-17; 6:6-12), the royal replies and decrees imposing commands on these officials (chs. 4:17-22; 6:3-5; and ch. 7:12-26, cf. vs. 21, 24), and the brief connecting history referring primarily to provincial affairs (chs. 4:23 to 5:5; 6:1, 2, 13-18). Aramaic had been for several centuries the language of international commerce and diplomacy. The remainder of the book, written in Heb., records the proper domestic history of Judah and is based on various historical documents. It includes the royal edict issued in behalf of the Jews (ch. 1:2-4), the list of the vessels of the Temple (ch. 1:7-11), copies of Jewish archives (chs. 2:1-67; 8:16:18-44), and the connecting history. The personal memoirs of Ezra are distinguished by the use of the first person pronoun, sing. and pl. (chs. 7:27 to 8:34; 9). The "we" sections also come from the records of Ezra, who in those verses speaks for the returned exiles as well as for himself.

Some scholars have assumed that the whole book was written by Ezra, but its historical value does not depend on such a hypothesis. While there is no doubt about the reliability of the historical contents, the majority of critics believe that the present form of Ezra-Nehemiah is the work of an editor, better known as the Chronicler, who has been conservatively dated at c. 400 B.C. See CHRONICLES. If the Chronicler actually compiled this book, he had access to official documents and to the personal memoirs of Ezra or to a reliable edition of such works. He himself may have supplied some of the connecting historical material and references to the Temple, cult, and music. If he was a contemporary of Ezra, this material came from his own observations; if he lived later than Ezra, he had access to reliable tradition or records.

The order of the Persian kings of the period is Darius (521-486 B.C.), Xerxes (486-464), and Artaxerxes (464-424). In view of this succession, ch. 4:6-23 is out of chronological order and properly belongs after chs. 4:24 to 6:18 (or v. 24). A reasonable explanation of this is that the Chronicler depended for Ezra, chs. 1 to 6, upon two main sources: one in Heb., represented by chs. 1:1 to 4:5; and another in Aram., represented by chs. 4:6 to 6:18. In this 2d source, chs. 4:24 to 6:18 probably stood before ch. 4:6-23, and thus the correct order of the Persian kings was preserved. The Chronicler, however, may have considered a sequence of content more important than a chronological order. Thus there are brought together the successful attempts of the enemies of the Jews to hinder the building of the Temple and the city walls. Chapter 4:5 refers to the opposition toward building the Temple in the days of Cyrus and Darius, and this is followed by a protest against restoring the city and its walls in the days of Xerxes and Artaxerxes (ch. 4:6-23). In ch. 4:6-8 the verses are disjointed, and it seems reasonable to suppose that each of these 3 verses presents a separate instance of Samaritan opposition. In fact, the Heb. text has a break between vs. 6 and 7 and one between vs. 7 and 8. In v. 7 there is no more than a bare reference to an Aram. letter; but the letter of v. 8, which seems to be a different one, is quoted in Aram. (ch. 4:11-16). Chapters 4:24 to 6:18 resumes the narrative which had been interrupted at ch. 4:5. Regardless of the sources used by the Chronicler, the hindrances raised by the Samaritans are thus grouped together.

Ezra and Nehemiah constitute a historical unit and linguistically belong to the same period as Chronicles. In the Heb. Bible, the books of Ezra and Nehemiah are counted as one, and the Talmud follows the same tradition. Originally they were one in the LXX, as they are in codices Vaticanus, Sinaiticus, and Alexandrinus. Esdras is the Gr. form of Ezra. Esdras A of the LXX is an apocryphal work, and Esdras B is our Ezra-Nehemiah. The Vulgate divides Ezra-Nehemiah, calling the former The First Book of Esdras and the latter The Book of Nehemias, which is also called the Second of Esdras. In the Eng. Bible, Ezra and Nehemiah are counted as 2 books. This separation probably began in the Christian Church; the 2 sections were doubtless regarded originally as 2 parts of the same book, as in the case of Samuel, Kings, and Chronicles. Since the 16th century, however, printed Heb. Bibles mark a division either as a concession to Christian usage or to facilitate reference; but in counting the total number of books, Ezra and Nehemiah are reckoned as one in the Heb. Scriptures.

In the Eng. Apocrypha I Esdras represents Esdras A of the LXX or III Esdras of the Appendix to the Vulgate; II Esdras is the Ezra Apocalypse or IV Esdras of the Appendix to the Vulgate. Thus in English Protestant usage the name Esdras is relegated to the Apocrypha.

For the relation of Ezra-Nehemiah to Chronicles, see CHRONICLES. See also NEHEMIAH.

Ez'rah (ěz'rá). See EZRA 1.

Ez'ra'hite (ěz'rá-hít) [alternate form of Zarhite]. A descendant of Zerah, belonging to the tribe of Judah, as Ethan (I Kings 4:31; Psalm 89, title; cf. I Chron. 2:6) and Heman (Psalm 88, title; cf. I Chron. 2:6).

Ez'ri (ěz'ri) [probably, (God is) a help]. Overseer of the laborers who tilled David's fields (I Chron. 27:26).

F

Fair Ha'vens (fâr hâ'vénz). A harbor on the s. coast of Crete, near the city of Lasea, where Paul's ship touched (Acts 27:8). It is located about 5 miles e. of Cape Matala, just w. of which the coastline turns n.

Faith. As far as a difference exists between belief and faith, belief is assent to testimony, and faith is assent to testimony united with trust. Faith is an active principle; it is an act of both the understanding and the will. The distinction between belief and faith is that between "believe me" and "believe on me." The verb believe thus does service for the two nouns faith and belief. In the Bible faith or belief is confidence in the absolute truthfulness of every statement which comes from God (Gen. 15:6; Mark 11:22; Rom. 4:3-5). In this faith the heroes of Scripture acted (Heb., ch. 11). In a special sense, faith is reliance on God's testimony regarding the mission and atoning death of his Son, the Lord Jesus Christ (John 5:24), and on the testimony of Jesus regarding himself (cf. John 3:18; Acts 3:16; 20:21; Rom. 3:25). Faith in the Redeemer, whereby a sinner rests upon him alone for salvation, is essential to salvation (John 3:15, 16, 18; Eph. 2:8, etc.). Belief in his historical existence and in the truth of his claims may be produced by evidence, but faith in him, reliance upon him for salvation, cannot be. It is the gift of God (Eph. 2:8); the Spirit applies the truth to the soul. Human means should be used, in co-operation with his Spirit, for its production (Rom. 10:17). It may exist in larger or in smaller measure (Rom. 4:19, 20; 14:1). The apostles when they deplored the weakness of their faith prayed to Jesus for its increase (Luke 17:5). It works by love (Gal. 5:6), and overcomes the world (I John 5:4). But with all its importance it is not the greatest of the 3 primary Christian graces, that position being occupied by love (I Cor. 13:13).

The system of doctrine given by revelation of God is termed the faith (Acts 6:7; 24:24; Rom. 1:5, etc.).

Fal'con. A diurnal bird of prey other than a vulture. The family includes among its genera falcons strictly so-called, hawks, kites, eagles. The word is used in R.V. to render Heb. 'ayyâh (Job 28:7; in A.V. vulture), an unclean bird (Lev. 11:14; Deut. 14:13; in A.V. kite).

Fall, The [translation of Gr. paraptōma, trespass, as applied to Adam's transgression (Wisd. of Sol. 10:1; cf. Rom. 5:15, etc.)]. The account of the fall of man (Gen., ch. 3) cannot be dismissed as an allegory or as a purified Semitic myth. In a Babylonian story Ea warned his son Adapa not to partake of food or drink offered him by the gods in Anu's heaven:

"Food of death they will offer thee to eat; Thou shalt not eat. Water of death they will offer thee to drink;
Thou shalt not drink. A garment they will show thee;
Put it on. Oil they will set before thee;
anoint thyself.
The command which I give thee, forget not. The word
Which I have spoken, hold fast."

As it turned out, they offered him the food and drink of immortality, but Adapa obeyed his father and thus lost eternal life. The resemblance to Gen., ch. 3, is remote and suggests no borrowing from the Babylonian.

The fall of man is narrated in Gen., ch. 3, as a fact, and the whole narrative is psychologically faithful to human experience. The Scriptural view of sin and redemption takes the Fall for granted. God created man, male and female, "endued them with living, reasonable, and immortal souls; made them after his own image, in knowledge, righteousness, and holiness, having the law of God written in their hearts and power to fulfill it, . . . yet subject to fall" (Larger Catechism, 17). But upon being left to the freedom of their will, they yielded to temptation and thus transgressed the commandment of God (Gen. 2:16, 17; 3:1-8). Through their disobedience they fell from the state of innocence and sinlessness. The result of the Fall is original sin, which has been conveyed to posterity by natural generation so that all human beings are conceived and born in sin (Ps. 51:5; John 3:6; Rom. 5:12). Death—spiritual, temporal, and eternal—is the consequence of sin. Many exegetes see in Gen. 3:15 the protevangelium or the first announcement of the gospel of redemption. The narrative includes also much symbolism of human suffering connected with the Fall (Gen. 3:16-19).

Paul assumes as not needing any proof that man's sinfulness is the result of Adam's fall. Just as Adam is related to the race as the author of sin and death, so Christ is the author of righteousness and life. At one end are Adam and sinful humanity; at the other, Christ and redeemed humanity (Rom. 5:12-21; I Cor. 15:21, 22, 45-49).

Fal'low Deer. The rendering of Heb. yah-mûr in A.V. of Deut. 14:5; I Kings 4:23. R.V. has roebuck (q.v.). The genuine fallow deer (Dama vulgaris) has horns, with their upper part palmated. The hair in summer is yellowish-brown all over, with spots; in winter the tints are less bright. The male is about 3 feet high at the shoulder. Its native country seems to be the Mediterranean region. It occurs sparingly in Galilee and Mount Lebanon.

Fam'il'iar Spir'it. The spirit of a dead person which professed mediums claimed to summon to consultation (Deut. 18:11), and which appeared to speak from the earth (Isa. 29:4), or to dwell in the controlling medium (Lev. 20:27, in Heb.). The medium was called the possessor or lord of a spirit (I Sam. 28:7, in Heb.). It revealed the future (Isa. 8:19). It was either a special spirit which was believed to respond always to the summons of the medium, as the English rendering would lead one to suppose, and who might raise other ghosts; or it was any spirit whom the medium desired.

I Sam. 28:8 is capable of either interpretation, "Divine . . . by the familiar spirit" in you or "whomsoever I shall name." To consult familiar spirits was apostasy from Jehovah (Lev. 19:31; Isa. 8:19). Under the Mosaic Law a person pretending to possess the power of consulting a familiar spirit was to be put to death (Lev. 19:31; 20:6, 27; Deut. 18:11). Saul carried out this enactment, but when sorely troubled about his fate, he sought out a woman of En-dor who had a familiar spirit, asked her to bring back Samuel to the world, and believed her statement that she had succeeded (I Sam. 28:3, 5-25). Manasseh favored them that professed to have familiar spirits (II Kings 21:6; II Chron. 33:6). His grandson Josiah carried out the Mosaic Law against them (II Kings 23:24). They probably included ventriloquists, as the rendering of the LXX implies, and the voice of the spirit accordingly merely appeared to come in a whisper from the ground.

Famine. Deficiency of food, generally produced either by failure of rain leading to the withering of the crops, or by the prevention of the entrance of food into a beleaguered city. Famine compelled Abraham to leave Canaan and sojourn in Egypt (Gen. 12:10). It was the first of a series of famines connected with the history of the patriarch and his descendants, and which led the Hebrews to withdraw temporarily from Palestine (chs. 26:1; 41:27-56; 47:13). Other famines occurred in the days of the Judges which made Elimelech remove to Moab (Ruth 1:1), in David's reign (II Sam. 21:1), in the time of Elijah (I Kings 17:1 seq.), in Elisha's time (II Kings 4:38; 8:1), and in the reign of Claudius, A.D. 41-54, when severe local famines swept in succession from Judea in his 4th year to Greece in his 9th year and Italy in his 11th year (Acts 11:28; Jos. Antiq. xx. 2, 5; 5, 2; Tacitus Ann. xii. 43). Among famines produced in besieged cities by the foe who prevented provisions from entering are those during the siege of Samaria by Ben-hadad (II Kings 6:24 to 7:20) and during the sieges of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar (II Kings 25:1-3; Jer. 52:4-6) and by Titus (Jos. War v. 10, 2 and 3).

Fan. The winnowing fan, in Heb. mizreh, was a fork with 6 prongs, with which grain, after it had been threshed, was thrown up against the air to clear it of the chaff (Isa. 30:24; Jer. 15:7). A shovel was also used for the same purpose. See THRESHING.

Farthing. 1. A Roman quadrans, a small brass coin equal to the 4th part of an as. The Greeks used the Roman name, calling the coin kodrantēs. In the time of Christ its value was about one half of an English farthing, or one quarter of a cent (Matt. 5:26; Mark 12:42).

2. An assarion, diminutive of the Lat. as, a copper coin equal to about 1 cent (Matt. 10:29).

Fast. Abstinence from food, or the period during which it takes place. 1. Involuntary, arising from the fact that nothing to eat is procurable. Of this type were apparently the 40 days' fast of Moses on Mount Sinai (Ex. 34:28; Deut. 9:9), of Elijah on his journey to Horeb (I Kings 19:8), and of our Lord during his temptation in the wilderness (Matt. 4:2; Mark 1:13; Luke 4:2); also of Paul (II Cor. 6:5).

2. Voluntary, from religious motives. In this sense it is often used regarding prescribed periods of abstinence. There do not appear to be any injunctions regarding fasting in the Mosaic Law, and neither the verb "to fast," nor the nouns "fast" and "fasting," occur in the Pentateuch. If fasts are prescribed at all, it is in the ambiguous language "Ye shall afflict your souls" (Lev. 16:29; 23:27; Num. 29:7). The 1st mention of voluntary fasting is in connection with King David, who refused food when he supplicated God for the life of the child borne to him in sin by the wife of Uriah (II Sam. 12:22). Many instances of the same unprescribed fasting are found in the later books of the O.T. (Ezra 8:21; Neh. 9:1; Esth. 4:3; Ps. 35:13; 69:10; 109:24; Dan. 6:18; 9:3). Sometimes fasts were proclaimed at periods of calamity (Jer. 36:9; Joel 1:14), the object being to chasten the soul (Ps. 35:13; 69:10) and make the voice heard in heaven (Isa. 58:3, 4). The public fast signified that a load of guilt was resting on the people, for which they humbled themselves before God (I Sam. 7:6). True fasting must not be confined to externals, but involves abstinence from iniquity and illicit pleasures (Isa., ch. 58). In Zechariah's days there were stated fasts in the 4th, 5th, 7th, and 10th months (Zech. 8:19), to commemorate the commencement of the siege of Jerusalem in the 10th month (II Kings 25:1), its capture in the 4th month (II Kings 25:3, 4; Jer. 52:6, 7), the destruction of the Temple in the 5th month (II Kings 25:8, 9), and the murder of Gedaliah and the Jews that were with him in the 7th month (v. 25). Anna served God with fasting (Luke 2:37). The Pharisee did so twice in the week (Luke 18:12). When religious formalists fasted, they sometimes ostentatiously put on a sad countenance. This practice was denounced in the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 6:16-18). The disciples of John the Baptist fasted; those of our Lord did not, at least while he was among them (Matt. 9:14, 15; Mark 2:18-20; Luke 5:33-35), but afterward in certain circumstances they did so (Acts 13:3; 14:23).

There are no injunctions laid upon Christians to fast; and the revisers, on the ground of textual criticism, have removed the word from Matt. 17:21; Mark 9:29; Acts 10:30; I Cor. 7:5.

Fat. 1. Abel offered the fat of the firstlings of his flock to Jehovah (Gen. 4:4; cf. Num. 18:17). The principle was laid down in the Mosaic Law that to the Lord belongs all the fat of sacrificial animals (Lev. 3:16; 7:23, 25). Neither it nor the blood was eaten (Ch. 3:17), but was burned as an offering to Jehovah (Ex. 29:13, 22; Lev. 3:3-5; 4:8-10); for a sweet savor unto Jehovah (ch. 4:31). In view of the settlement in Canaan and the remoteness of the majority of the people from the altar, this provision was apparently abolished with respect to animals slain solely for food (Deut. 12:15, 16, 21-24), the animals of the flock and herd being eaten as were non-sacrificial animals.

2. A wine vat (A.V., Joel 2:24; Isa. 63:2).

Father. 1. The immediate progenitor of a person (Gen. 42:13), or grandfather (ch. 28:13), or more remote ancestor (ch. 17:4). See PARENTS.

2. The founder of an occupation or a social group (Gen. 4:20). The ancestor or head, or one of the heads, of the inhabitants of a town (I Chron. 2:51; 4:14, 18).

3. One who acts toward another with paternal kindness and wisdom (Gen. 45:8; Judg. 17:10; 18:19). A title of respect and honor bestowed upon an authorized teacher, especially when aged (I Sam. 10:12; II Kings 2:12), and upon royal advisers and prime ministers (Gen. 45:8).

4. God, either as the Creator of the human race (Mal. 2:10; Jos. Antiq. iv. 8, 24; cf. Acts 17:28), or as the begetter and loving guardian of his spiritual children (Rom. 8:15; Gal. 4:6), or as standing in a more mysterious relation to Jesus (Matt. 11:26; Mark 14:36; Luke 22:42). See GOD.

Fath'om. A measure much used in reckoning depth of water (Acts 27:28). It is the rendering of Gr. orguia, which denotes the length of the outstretched arms, and was estimated at 4 cubits or 24 palms (Herod. ii. 149). The English fathom is 6 feet.

Feast. 1. A sumptuous meal attended by mirth and joyfulness (Dan. 5:1).

2. A time set apart by the canons of some religions for sacred joy. Besides the appointed seasons, called feasts or set feasts in the Eng. versions (Lev. 23:2, R.V. marg.), which included the weekly Sabbath, the memorial of trumpet-blowing on the 1st day of the 7th month, and the Day of Atonement on the 10th day of that month (Lev. 23:3, 24, 27), the Mosaic Law enjoined 3 annual celebrations called feasts or festivals. They were the passover on the evening of the 14th day of the 1st month, with the accompanying feast of unleavened bread commencing on the 15th and lasting 7 days (Lev. 23:5-8); the feast of weeks, called also feast of harvest and day of first fruits (Ex. 23:16; 34:22; Num. 28:26), and in later times, because celebrated on the 50th day after the passover, Pentecost (Acts 2:1); and the feast of tabernacles or ingathering, which commenced on the 15th day of the 7th month and continued for 7 or 8 days (Lev. 23:34-44). These 3 annual festivals were deemed so important that when they came every adult male not incapacitated by disease or infirmity was required to appear before the Lord at the sanctuary (Ex. 23:17; Deut. 16:16). For further description of these feasts, see the appropriate articles. As Jesus desired "to fulfil all righteousness," it may be assumed that he was customarily present at Jerusalem 3 times a year, on the occasions of the 3 festivals (Matt. 26:17; Mark 14:12; Luke 22:8; John 2:23; 7:2-37; 13:1). In addition to the festivals prescribed by the law, a festival called Purim was instituted to commemorate annually, on the 14th and 15th of Adar, the deliverance of the Jews from the plot of Haman (Esth. 9:21-28). Later still the festival of dedication was appointed, which was instituted by Judas Maccabaeus, to be celebrated annually for 8 days, from the 25th day of Chislev, in commemoration of the rededication of the Temple after its pollution by the agents of Antiochus Epiphanes (I Macc. 4:41-59; John 10:22). The Lord's Supper, instituted by Christ, or more broadly the Christian's life of faith, is also a feast (I Cor. 5:8).

Felix (fē'lix) [Lat., happy]. A freedman of the emperor Claudius, who was appointed procurator of Judea. The date of his appointment to office in Palestine is disputed. Cumanus succeeded the procurator Tiberius Alexander in A.D. 48 (Jos. Antiq. xx. 5, 2). According to Tacitus, Cumanus governed Galilee, and Felix ruled part of Samaria until, on the deposition of Cumanus, he was appointed procurator of the whole province by Quadratus, governor of Syria. Josephus, who was a boy in Jerusalem in A.D. 48, and became historian of the Jews, represents Cumanus as procurator of Judea, and states that Felix was sent as successor of Cumanus by the emperor Claudius to administer the affairs of Judea in 52 (Jos. Antiq. xx. 7, 1; War ii. 12, 8). Probably Cumanus and Felix exercised a joint procuratorship, with Cumanus higher in authority. In this article A.D. 52 is assumed as the date of his sole procuratorship in Judea. He seems to have obtained this appointment partly through the influence of his brother Pallas, who was a great man at the court of Claudius. Nero, the successor of Claudius, transferred 4 Galilean cities from Felix to Agrippa. Felix was cruel and tyrannical, and in the exercise of power showed the disposition of a slave (Tacitus Hist. v. 9; Ann. xii.

54). Jonathan, the high priest, had supported the appointment of Felix to the procuratorship, but displeased Felix by the fidelity with which he counseled him regarding his government of the Jews. Jonathan was murdered by the robbers, the so-called Assassins, who according to Josephus were encouraged by Felix. Felix undertook to suppress the robbers, who had become the terror of Judea. He captured many of them and crucified the ordinary sort. Their leader, Eleazar, however, had been sent to Rome before the assassination of Jonathan (Jos. Antiq. xx. 8, 5; War ii. 13, 2). Next, false prophets arose and led people in multitudes into the wilderness, where they were told God would show them the signals of liberty. Felix, believing these gatherings in the wilderness to be the commencement of revolt, attacked the people present and slew them in large numbers (Jos. War ii. 13, 4). An Egyptian soon afterward made his appearance as a prophet and led out a great mob to the Mount of Olives, under the pretense that they would see the walls of Jerusalem fall down, allowing them to enter the city. Felix attacked them with troops, slew about 400 and took about 200 prisoners. The Egyptian escaped. His insurrection was in A.D. 55; and when about 5 years later the riot about Paul arose, the Roman commandant at Jerusalem suspected that the apostle was the Egyptian back again to excite fresh troubles (Acts 21:38; Jos. Antiq. xx. 8, 6). Paul, arrested on the false charge of profaning the Temple, was sent for protection from Jewish violence to Caesarea, the seat of the Roman government for Judea (Acts 23:26, 33), and the trial took place before Felix (ch. 24:1-23). Felix' wife Drusilla, a Jewess, whom he had seduced from her lawful husband (Jos. Antiq. xx. 7, 1, 2), was present at an interview when Paul reasoned of righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come, with such power that Felix trembled. He did not repent, however. Nor did he set Paul free, for he hoped that his prisoner would buy freedom (Acts 24:24-26). On going out of office he left the apostle bound in order to please the Jews (Acts 24:27). This favor did not, however, prevent them from complaining of him after he had ceased to be procurator and returned to Rome, about A.D. 60. They represented that he had not acted well in the recent riots between Jews and Syrians at Caesarea, and he would have been punished by Nero had not the powerful intercession of his brother Pallas, who was a favorite with the reigning emperor, been exerted in his favor (Jos. Antiq. xx. 8, 9; cf. 8, 7; War ii. 13, 7). He was succeeded in the procuratorship by Porcius Festus.

Fenced Cit'ies. See FORTIFIED CITIES.

Fer'ret. See GECKO.

Fes'tus (fēs'tūs) [Lat., festal, joyful]. Porcius Festus, who succeeded Felix as procurator of Judea in the reign of Nero, while Pallas was still the emperor's favorite and Burrus was still alive (Jos. Antiq. xx. 8, 9). Pallas was put to death in A.D. 62, and Burrus died not later than February of the same year. Two years before the arrival of Festus, Paul could say that Felix had been for many years a judge unto the nation (Acts 24:10, 27). If the procuratorship of Felix be reckoned from A.D. 48 (see FELIX), he would have been many years in office in Palestine in A.D. 54 or 55, and Festus may have succeeded him in 55 or 56, the 2d and 3d years of Nero respectively. This date is adopted by some authorities, with the result of putting the dates of important events in Paul's life, among others his imprisonment, 4 or 5 years earlier than the date generally accepted by leading investigators who date Felix' accession in 52 and Festus' appointment in 60. Festus fell on troublesome times. The Assassins were murdering and pillaging. An impostor led a crowd of adherents into the wilderness, where the forces of Festus routed them with great slaughter. King Agrippa built a dining room in the royal palace of Jerusalem, and its windows overlooked the courts of the Temple. The Jews were annoyed, and built a wall to block the view. But the wall prevented the Roman guards also from seeing the inner courts, and Festus ordered its demolition. On appeal to Nero, however, it was allowed to remain (Jos. Antiq. xx. 8, 11). The character of Festus contrasts favorably with that of Felix (Jos. War ii. 14, 1). He reinvestigated Paul's case, and was satisfied of his innocence; but, in attempting to please the Jews, he suggested that the apostle be tried at Jerusalem. It was against this injudicious proposal that Paul appealed to Caesar (Acts, chs. 25; 26). Festus died at his post, and was succeeded, about A.D. 62, by Albinus, who is not mentioned in the Scripture narrative (Jos. Antiq. xx. 9, 1).

Fever. A disease, or rather a genus of diseases, attended by dryness and heat of the body, with consequent thirst, a high pulse, and other symptoms. Fever is the rendering of Heb. kaddahath, burning (Lev. 26:16, in A.V. burning ague; Deut. 28:22). In the latter passage it is associated with inflammation and fiery heat, both febrile symptoms. Fever is likewise the correct rendering of Gr. pyretos, from pyr, fire (Matt. 8:15; Luke 4:38; John 4:52; Acts 28:8). Galen and the Greek physicians divided fevers into greater and lesser. Luke in the passage quoted does so also, as might be expected from one who was himself a medical man. When the sword, the famine, and the pestilence are mentioned in this order of succession, the pestilence was probably typhus fever.

Field. In Biblical usage, unenclosed ground, whether pasture or tillage (Gen. 37:7, 14-16), of whatever extent, from a small area to the territory of a people (Gen. 14:7, R.V. marg.; 23:9; Ruth 1:6, rendered country; Matt. 6:28; 13:24). Boundaries, when artificially marked, were indicated by stones (cf. Deut. 19:14).

Fig and Fig Tree. A tree producing good fruit (Judg. 9:10) and the fruit itself (Num. 13:23), both called te'ênâh in Heb., while in Gr. the tree is sykê and the fruit sykon. The tree is native in w. Asia. The young tree does not bear fruit unless the ground is cultivated (Luke 13:6-9), and old trees speedily degenerate and fail when neglected (Prov. 27:18). The young fruit appears in spring before the leaves open, on branches of the last year's growth; it is the green fig (S. of Sol. 2:13). If blown from the tree (Rev. 6:13), it is eaten, though immature. If green fruit is not on the tree when the leaves have opened, no figs will be borne. The first ripe fruit is ready in June, in favored localities earlier (Isa. 28:4; Jos. War iii. 10, 8). The late figs grow on the new wood, keep appearing during the season, and are ripe from August onward. They are dried for preservation, pressed into cakes, and form a staple article of food (I Sam. 25:18; 30:12). The tree was highly prized, and is often mentioned along with the vine (Deut. 8:8; Ps. 105:33; Jer. 5:17; Joel 1:12), and to sit under one's vine and one's fig tree was the symbol of prosperity and security (I Kings 4:25; Micah 4:4; Zech. 3:10). The barren fig tree of our Lord's parable meant the Jewish nation. Figs were used in medicine, and there is mention of their employment as a poultice (II Kings 20:7).

Fir and Fir Tree. The rendering of Heb. berôsh, Aram. berôth (II Sam. 6:5; S. of Sol. 1:17); R.V. marg., cypress. The tree grew with the cedar in Lebanon (I Kings 5:8, 10; Isa. 14:8; 37:24; 60:13; Zech. 11:2). It was used for the woodwork of Solomon's Temple along with cedar (I Kings 5:8, 10; 6:15, 34; II Chron. 2:8; 3:5), for the planks of ships (Ezek. 27:5), for spears (Nahum 2:3), and for musical instruments (II Sam. 6:5). It belongs to the Coniferae or pine family. The only true fir of the region is Abies cilicica. It grows on the higher parts of Lebanon and in the mountains n., attaining a height of from 30 to 75 feet. The cypress (Cupressus sempervirens) is a tall tree, from 20 to 60 or 75 feet. The wood is reddish yellow, pleasant to the smell, and durable. It was much used for cabinet work. It is extensively planted in burial grounds in the East, for which its slender pyramidal form and gracefulness render it well-adapted. See CYPRESS 2. The Syrian or Aleppo pine (Pinus halepensis) is found in the mountains of w. Palestine, and is one of the characteristic trees of the lower Lebanon. It is inferior in size to the fir and the cypress. The stone pine (Pinus maritima) grows on the coast and in sandy plains, but is not common. In Gilead there are extensive forests of Pinus carica on the highest mountains above the line where the evergreen oaks cease. A tall, fragrant juniper (Juniperus ex-celsa) grows abundantly on Lebanon. For Isa. 44:14, see ASH.

Fire. Fire was found to be indispensable (Ecclus. 39:26). It was used in the arts (Gen. 4:22), in the preparation of food (Ex. 16:23; Isa. 44:16), and for warmth (Jer. 36:22; John 18:18; Acts 28:2). Offerings were made to Jehovah by fire (Gen. 8:20). The fire carried, as it were, the sacrifice to God, who took delight in the offering, or, to speak figuratively, smelled a sweet savor (Gen. 8:21). The offerer kindled the fire himself (ch. 22:6). Moses offered burnt offerings on the great altar newly erected (Ex. 40:29), but at the conclusion of the consecration of Aaron and his sons to the priesthood, fire came forth from the presence of Jehovah and consumed the sacrifice (Lev. 9:24). God accepted and appropriated the offering. This fire was not allowed to go out (ch. 6:9-13). Likewise at the dedication of the Temple and the new altar, fire came from heaven and consumed the sacrifice (II Chron. 7:1). On other occasions also God indicated his acceptance of a sacrifice by causing it to kindle (Judg. 6:21; I Kings 18:23, 24; I Chron. 21:26). Among the heathen there were fire worshippers (Wisd. of Sol. 13:2). The worshippers of Molech and some other idolaters burnt their children in the fire as an act of piety (II Kings 16:3; 21:6; Jer. 7:31; Ezek. 16:20, 21).

Fire Pan. A pan made of brass, gold, or silver (Ex. 27:3; I Kings 7:50; II Kings 25:15), and used for carrying fire (Lev. 16:12, censer).

Fir'kin. A measure of capacity (John 2:6), the rendering of Gr. metrētēs, which held approximately 9 gallons, American standard.

Firmament. The sky or heaven (Gen. 1:8), an expanse beaten out as it were, if we employ the figure embodied in the Heb. word (cf. Ezek. 1:22), which divided the primeval watery mass (Gen. 1:6), so that part of the waters were above it and others were below it (ch. 1:7; Ps. 148:4). The stars and planets were placed in it (Gen. 1:14, 17). The heavens, and presumably the firmament, are compared to a tent spread above the earth (Ps. 104:2; Isa. 40:22), are likened in strength to a molten mirror (Job 37:18), and are spoken of as if having windows, through which the rain pours and God's blessings descend (Gen. 7:11; II Kings 7:2; Ps. 78:23). This conception was current in ancient Semitic thought.

First-born' or First'ling, the former being used chiefly of men, the latter always of beasts. To the first-born offspring of men and animals God the giver has the first claim (cf. Gen. 4:4). Among the Israelites an additional reason existed in the fact that Jehovah had freed the people from Egyptian bondage. In the 10th and last plague of Egypt the first-born of the Egyptians were slain, while the first-born of the Israelites were preserved by sprinkling blood on the lintels and doorposts of the houses within which they resided (Ex. 12:12, 13, 23, 29). Saved in this manner, they became consecrated to Jehovah. Every first-born male of man and beast was holy to the Lord (chs. 13:2; 34:19), and could not be used by man (Lev. 27:26), but belonged to the sanctuary for sacrifice; the first-born of man, however, was redeemed (Ex. 13:13, 15; 34:20; cf. Lev. 27:6). On this occasion he was brought to the sanctuary and presented to Jehovah (Luke 2:22; cf. Num. 18:15). The Levites were afterward substituted for the Israelite first-born (Num. 3:12, 41, 46; 8:13-19; cf. Ex. 32:26-29) and served at the sanctuary. Those of animals also, against which the 10th plague was partly directed, became similarly consecrated to Jehovah, but there were distinctions among them. The firstling of clean animals was sacrificed. Unclean animals, of which the ass is named as representative, either had the neck broken or were replaced by a lamb (Ex. 13:13, 15; 22:29, 30; 34:20). On the establishment of the priesthood at Sinai, the disposition of these animals was specified. The fat of the clean animal was burned and the flesh was given to the priest. The unclean animal was redeemed or sold (Lev. 27:27; Num. 18:15-18). Later, in view of the new circumstances in which it was foreseen that the people would be placed in Palestine, and the inconvenience and expense of the journey to the sanctuary, a delay was authorized in presenting the firstling at the house of God. The firstling might be kept beyond the 8 days originally prescribed until the time of an annual festival; and the flesh, instead of falling as a perquisite to the priest, was given to the pilgrim who brought the animal, and to his family, to eat at the sanctuary (Deut. 15:19, 20). But defective animals were eaten at home without religious ceremony (vs. 21-23).

For the legal privileges of the first-born son, see BIRTHRIGHT.

First Fruits. The fruits first ripe, the plucking of which was an earnest of the coming harvest. First fruits were to be given as an offering to Jehovah: on behalf of the nation, a sheaf at the feast of unleavened bread and two loaves at the feast of weeks (Lev. 23:10, 17); and by individuals (Ex. 23:19; Deut. 26:1-11). The term is used figuratively in Rom. 8:23; 11:16; 16:5; I Cor. 15:20, 23; 16:15; James 1:18; Rev. 14:4. See FIRST-BORN.

Fish'ing. There was fishing in Egypt in the main channel of the Nile and in the several branches into which it separates before reaching the Mediterranean (Isa. 19:8), and the Israelites when in bondage in Egypt ate fish freely (Num. 11:5). The fishing along the

' Fishing with the Hook in Ancient Egypt

Mediterranean coast of Palestine was largely in the hands of the Tyrians and Sidonians in the n. (Neh. 13:16) and the Philistines in the s. To the Israelites belonged the Sea of Galilee, which was their chief fishing ground. Tristram enumerates 22 species of fish in its waters, many of which pass down the Jordan also; but any that reach the Dead Sea die in its briny water. Fish were on sale in Jerusalem (II Chron. 33:14; Neh. 13:16). For fishing, lines, hooks, and spears were used (Job 41:1, 7; Isa. 19:8; Amos 4:2; Matt. 17:27), and nets were cast from boats (Luke 5:4-7).

Fitch [variant of Eng. vetch]. A tare (Vicia), an herb much cultivated as a forage plant (Isa. 28:25, 27, Heb. keṣaḥ). The plant so designated was sown broadcast; and when its fruits were ripe, they were beaten out with a staff to separate the seeds. R.V. marg. prefers black cummin (Nigella sativa), and considers the plant to have been what is now called, from its fennel-like leaves, fennel flower. It is of the crowfoot or buttercup order (Ranunculaceae). It is a foot and a half high, with yellow or, more rarely, blue petals, many stamens, and several seed vessels, with numerous black acrid and aromatic seeds, which are used in the East for seasoning dishes and as a carminative.

Hebrew kussemeth is likewise translated fitch in Ezek. 4:9, A.V.; but elsewhere in A.V. is rendered rye. Everywhere in R.V. it is translated spelt.

Flag. 1. The rendering of Heb. 'āhū in Job 8:11. R.V. marg. translates it reed-grass, and also in the text of Gen. 41:2, where A.V. renders it meadow. It was a water plant and grew, among other places, on the edge of the Nile. It is not likely that it was the flag, which is an iris, with 3 brightly colored petals. It seems to have been the Egyptian designation for the crowded mass of water plants, rushes, reeds, sedges found along the margin of the Nile.

2. The rendering of sūph (Ex. 2:3, 5; Isa. 19:6), a plant growing by the brink of the Nile. It also grew in salt water (Jonah 2:5, where it is rendered "weeds"). The Red Sea in Heb. is called the Sea of Suph. The word denotes aquatic vegetation, whether seaweeds or fresh water reeds and sedges.

Flag'on. 1. A vessel for holding liquids (Isa. 22:24, in Heb. nēbel).

2. The rendering in A.V. of Heb. 'ashīshāh, something pressed closely together (II Sam. 6:19; I Chron. 16:3; S. of Sol. 2:5; Hos. 3:1). R.V. correctly translates it cake of raisins.

Flax. The rendering of Heb. pēsheth and pishtāh and of Gr. linon (cf. Isa. 42:3 with Matt. 12:20). It was a plant cultivated in Egypt and elsewhere (Ex. 9:31). It had stalks, which were spread on flat roofs of houses and dried by exposure to the heat of the sun (Josh. 2:6). Its fibers were fine (Isa. 19:9), and were woven like wool (Prov. 31:13; cf. Hos. 2:5). It is undoubtedly the flax plant (Linum usitatissimum), the type of the botanical order Linaceae, or flaxworts. It is a small plant, with solitary erect stems, 5 sepals, 5 fugitive petals, with 5 perfect and as many rudimentary stamens. It is now found only in a state of cultivation. The woody fiber of the bark furnishes the flax fiber of which linen is woven, and the seeds constitute the linseed of commerce, valued on account of its oil.

Flea. An insect, called in Heb. par'ōsh (I Sam. 24:14; 26:20). The species is a universal pest in Palestine; so much so that it has become a popular saying that the king of the fleas has his court at Tiberias.

Flesh. 1. The muscles of the animal body, whether of man, beast, bird, or fish; or, less precisely, all its softer parts (Gen. 40:19; Ex. 12:8; 16:8; Lev. 21:5; Job 10:11; Luke 24:39; I Cor. 15:39). It is distinct from the spirit (Job 14:22; Isa. 10:18, Heb.: 31:3; Matt. 26:41; Col. 2:5).

2. All beings possessed of flesh, man and the inferior animals, especially man (Gen. 6:13, 19; 8:17; Acts 2:17; Rom. 3:20; I Cor. 1:29).

3. Human nature deprived of the Spirit of God, dominated by the appetites and obeyed by the mind (Rom. 7:5; 8:5-7; II Cor. 7:1; Gal. 5:16-21; II Peter 2:10), thus including the whole unregenerated and unsanctified nature of man (Rom. 8:8, 9; cf. John 3:6).

Flint. In Scripture, any hard or intractable rock (Deut. 8:15; 32:13; 1's. 114:8); and hence figuratively, uncompromising firmness in the discharge of duty (Isa. 50:7; Ezek. 3:9). In it the miner sinks his shaft in quest of gold (Job 28:9, R.V.). Broken fragments were used as rude knives (R.V., Ex. 4:25; Josh. 5:2, where in Heb. the generic word for rock is used).

Flood. A stream, especially a great stream (Job 14:11; 28:11, A.V.), as the Nile in its inundations (Jer. 46:7; Amos 8:8, A.V.), the Euphrates (Josh. 24:2, A.V.), the Jordan (Ps. 66:6, A.V.). An inundation (Dan. 9:26; Nahum 1:8; Matt. 7:25, 27; Luke 6:48). A great restless mass of water; the sea and its currents (Ps. 24:2; Jonah 2:3).

Specially, the Deluge in the time of Noah. It was sent as a divine judgment on the antediluvians for their wickedness (Gen. 6:5-13). Secondary causes were employed to bring on the catastrophe. Two are mentioned: the fountains of the great deep were broken up, and the windows of heaven were opened. Thus part of the water was that of the ocean, the rest was produced by a downpour of rain continuing 40 days and nights (ch. 7:11, 12).

Coin of Apamea, Representing Noah and the Ark

All the high mountains under the whole heaven were covered, 15 cubits upward the waters prevailed, and all flesh died that moved on the earth, man, bird, beast, and creeping thing. Noah only was left and they that were with him in the ark (ch. 7:19-23); see ARK 1. The waters prevailed 150 days, until at length the ark rested on the mountains of Ararat. Two and a half months later the tops of the mountains were seen (ch. 8:3-5). Three months later, after investigating the state of the water by means of birds which he sent forth, on the 1st day of the 1st month Noah removed the covering from the ark and saw that the face of the ground was dried; but 8 weeks more elapsed before God gave command to go forth from the ark (ch. 8:13-15). The chronology of the flood according to Genesis is given on the following page.

As is now generally known, the account of the Flood was handed down by tradition. The description originated with eyewitnesses. Its language must be understood in the sense which it bore to the authors and promulgators of the narrative centuries before the days of Moses. The extent of the Flood cannot be determined from the account of it which has been transmitted. The Deluge may have been universal and covered the globe, or it may have been confined to a locality of greater or less extent. All the mountains under the whole heaven, that is within the horizon of the inmates of the ark as they drifted on the waters, were covered (cf. the employment of similar language in Col. 1:23). The explanation of a local flood in the Tigris-Euphrates valley would satisfy the Biblical account, since the first home of man was in that region and the Deluge is recorded in the early chapters of Genesis. The purpose of the Flood was to destroy the corrupt race of man (Gen. 6:7, 13, 17; 7:4), and with man all animals dependent upon the existence of dry land were involved in destruction. This was also the result as discerned by those who were saved in the ark (ch. 7:21-23), and as confirmed by their descendants when they migrated in the earth. They met no survivors. They found the world uninhabited. Noah had been instructed to take male and female of every kind of animal, and to gather food for them (ch. 6:20, 21). The language of the command was intended to be understood in its usual sense, as any man of that age would understand it. Noah doubtless took specimens of every animal of which he had knowledge and food suitable for them; but there is no evidence that he believed himself to be commanded to seek for species as yet unknown, or if under supernatural impulse the animals unsought came to him (as some would unnecessarily interpret ch. 7:8, 9), to gather peculiar food and provide peculiar shelter for strange animals of different kinds and from different climes.

The tradition of the Flood was current among the people from whom the Hebrews sprang. In the ancestral home of Abraham (Sumer and Akkad) the Flood was remembered as a great crisis in human history. Eight rulers are mentioned in the Sumerian list of kings. Then follows this statement: "The flood swept thereover. After the flood had swept thereover, when the kingship was lowered from heaven, the kingship was in Kish." Thereupon the list of kings is resumed.

Archaeological excavations have shown the destruction wrought by floods in Sumer and Akkad to be a fact. At Kish a flood sediment (averaging a thickness of 1 foot) covered uniformly all that constituted the civilization of that city. The foundations of the buildings, however, were not affected by the overflow of the river, and the remains below and above the flood deposit reveal a continuous Sumerian civilization. Kish, it seems, was temporarily abandoned. When the civil and religious classes returned to the site of the city, they possessed the new stage of culture represented in the finds above the flood level. The Kish flood deposit lies shortly above the Jemdet Nasr period (toward the end of 4th millennium B.C.). There is also evidence of a deluge at Shuruppak during the same period. There is, however, more spectacular evidence of a flood at Ur. During 1927-1929 Woolley worked on a prehistoric graveyard at Ur. In the course of this excavation, there was found a layer of clay 8 feet thick, the texture of which showed that it had been deposited there by the water. Below this clay were definite remains of an earlier civilization. It certainly may be inferred that a flood of unusual magnitude was required to leave such a deposit. This deluge was not the same as that of Kish and Shuruppak, but took place at an earlier period, between al-Ubaid I and II. Although all these discoveries have been very interesting, we do not have sufficient evidence to equate any one of these floods with that of Genesis; they prove, however, that civilization was interrupted at several places and at different periods by floods.

The Sumerians, Babylonians, and Assyrians had slightly divergent traditions. The story, as current in Babylonia in the time of Alexander the Great, was recorded by Berossus (Jos. Antiq. i. 3, 6; Apion i. 19), and is quoted in full by the church historian Eusebius. Berossus lists 10 antediluvian kings. Two of his names are corruptions of one Sumerian name, En-men-lu-Anna. The last one in his list is Xisouthros, the hero of the flood, who lived at Sippar. Xisouthros was commanded to build a boat, into which he took his family and near friends and fowls and quadrupeds, together with provisions. After the rain had ceased, he released some birds which returned to the ship. After some days he let them go again, and they returned with their feet soiled with clay. After the 3d release the birds did not return. The ship had been grounded in Armenia, and so Xisouthros removed a part of the side of the ship and left with his wife, daughter, and the pilot. An altar was erected and sacrifice was offered. The rest of the persons in the ship left after these 4d had departed.

The oldest account of the flood is recorded in a Sumerian version, which has been preserved in fragmentary form. It probably was written in the time of the dynasty of Isin, but not later than the 1st dynasty of Babylon (i.e., somewhere between 1894 and 1595 B.C.). According to this narrative "the deluge swept over the land for seven days and seven nights." The hero of the flood was Ziusud-ra, who had found safety in a ship, sacrificed after it was all over, and finally was made immortal by the gods.

The most complete Babylonian account is found in the Gilgamesh epic. The text, as we have it, comes from the library of Ashurbanipal (669-626 B.C.) but it was copied from much older originals. This epic was written on 12 tablets, of which the 11th is devoted to the flood.

Gilgamesh was a king of Uruk (Erech). His friend Engidu died and he was anxious to find a means of restoring him to life. He knew that Ut-napishtim, who survived the flood, had attained immortality, and so with Ur-Shanabi, the sailor of Ut-napishtim, he crossed in 3 days the sea, which under ordinary circumstances required a month and a half. Gilgamesh asked Ut-napishtim how he attained endless life, and in the ensuing conversation is related the history of the deluge.

There was a city Shuruppak on the Euphrates, and the gods resolved to send a flood. So the god of wisdom, Ea, repeated their decision to a reed hut:

"O reed hut, reed hut, O wall, wall,
O reed hut hearken, O wall attend!
O man of Shuruppak, son of Ubar-Tutu,
Pull down thy house, build a ship.
Leave thy possessions, take thought for thy life . . ."

It seems that Ut-napishtim was sleeping at the time in the hut and that he received the warning in a dream (cf. Gen. 6:8, 13, 14, 17). So he built a boat in the form of a cube, with 120 cubits as each of its 3 dimensions; it was 6 stories high (cf. Gen. 6:15, 16). He divided it on the outside into 7 parts and in its interior into 9 parts; he pitched it with 3 sars of bitumen on the outside and with the same amount on the inside (cf. ch. 6:14). Oil was brought in for food and for the libation (cf. ch. 6:21). He filled the ship with gold and silver, and he also took in his family and household, craftsmen, and the beasts of the field (cf. chs. 6:18-22; 7:1-3, 7-9, 13-16). When the appointed time approached, in the evening there appeared a heavy rainstorm. Ut-napishtim embarked and closed the door (cf. ch. 7:16b). At dawn there came a black cloud up from the horizon, and Adad thundered within it. While some gods went as messengers over mountains and valleys, the rain descended (cf. ch. 7:11). The flood covered the mountains, and no more were people recognized in heaven (cf. ch. 7:18, 19). At this point the gods became afraid:

"The gods were frightened at the deluge,
They fled, they climbed to the highest heaven;
The gods crouched like a dog, they lay down by the walls.
Ishtar cried like a woman in travail. . .
The gods sat bowed and weeping."

The wind blew for 6 days and nights, and the tempest overwhelmed the land, but abated on the 7th (cf. chs. 7:4, 10, 12, 17, 24; 8:1 seq.). Ut-napishtim says:

"I looked upon the sea, the roaring was stilled,

And all mankind was turned to clay"

(cf. ch. 7:21-23). He then opened the window (cf. chs. 6:16; 8:6) and looked in all directions (cf. ch. 8:13). After 12 days an island appeared, and finally the ship was grounded upon Mount Nisir (cf. ch. 8: 4, 5). Seven days later Ut-napishtim sent forth a dove which came back; then he released a swallow, which also returned. Finally he let go a raven. In telling about this, he says:

"The raven went out, the diminution of the waters it saw;

It alighted, it waded about, it croaked, it did not come back"

(cf. ch. 8:7-12).

Thereupon Ut-napishtim sent everything forth to the 4 quarters of heaven (cf. ch. 8: 14-19) and sacrificed upon the mountain peak (cf. v. 20). He arranged the sacrificial vessels by sevens and piled beneath them reeds, cedar wood, and myrtle. The gods apparently were pleased, for he says:

"The gods smelled the savor,
The gods smelled the sweet savor,
The gods gathered like flies over the sacrificer"

(cf. ch. 8:21). In the end it seems that the gods did not approve of the deluge; Ishtar says about Enlil:

"For he was not wise; he sent the deluge,
And numbered my people for destruction."

And Ea said to Enlil:

"How, how couldst thou without thought send a deluge?

On the sinner let his sin rest,
On the wrongdoer rest his misdeed.

Forbear, let it not be done, have mercy [that men perish not]"

(cf. chs. 8:21, 22; 9:11-17).

Then Ea, having gone on board the ship, brought forth Ut-napishtim and his wife. He blessed them (cf. ch. 9:1-3, 7) and bestowed immortality upon them.

It is quite apparent that the Hebrew account has much in common with the Babylonian, and perhaps both go back to a common source. Yet the name Noah has its closest parallel in a Hurrian fragment, where he is called Naḫ-molel. The origin of viticulture (cf. ch. 9:20), which has no counterpart in Babylonia, is appropriate to a Hurrian source. While the similarities are apparent, the differences are still more remarkable. Although we are dealing with a prehistoric period and therefore with traditions, a spirit which is unique in literature breathes through this O.T. account. The Babylonian account is polytheistic, materialistic, and in many respects crude; it reflects a low conception of divinity. In the O.T. narrative, on the other hand, we have monotheism and a God who hates iniquity, transgression, and sin. The incident of the Flood, as related in Genesis, has ethical and spiritual meaning. God works among men; he is interested in humanity and is merciful. In this early tradition are depicted the reward of righteousness and the possibility of fellowship with God. The inspiration of the O.T. account becomes self-evident in contrast with the Babylonian.

Flute. A musical instrument (Dan. 3:5); called in Aram. mashrôḳithā, pipe. Pipes consisting of 1, 2, or more reeds were in use.

A flute or pipe, in Gr. aulos, was played in the house of mourning (Matt. 9:23, R.V.) and on occasions of joy (Rev. 18:22). See PIPE.

Flux. See DYSENTERY.

Fly. 1. A two-winged insect, one of the order Diptera, specially the domestic fly (Musca domestica). So troublesome are flies of various kinds in hot countries (Isa. 7:18; Eccl. 10:1) that the Ekronites worshiped a god Baal-zebub, lord of flies, who was supposed to avert them (II Kings 1:2).

2. The rendering of Heb. 'ārôb, a voracious, biting insect of Egypt (Ex. 8:21; Ps. 105:31). It devoured (Ps. 78:45) and destroyed (Ex. 8:24 marg.). According to the LXX, the dog fly.

Folly. The absence of wisdom, disregard of the true nature of things in their relation to man and God. Hence injudicious action or conduct (Prov. 15:21; Eccl. 1:17; 10:1; II Cor. 11:1, A.V.), and wickedness (Gen. 34:7; Deut. 22:21; Josh. 7:15; Judg. 19:23; 30:6).

Food. The food of the Hebrews, when they lived a simple nomadic life, consisted largely of bread and the products of the herd, such as milk, curds, and occasionally meat (Gen. 18:7, 8; Judg. 5:25). Wild honey was also eaten (Judg. 14:8, 9). When they adopted a settled life in Palestine, the products of garden, vineyard, and olive yard were added, such as lentils, cucumbers, beans (II Sam. 17:28), pomegranates, figs, grapes (Num. 13:23; 20:5; Matt. 7:16). Sweet and sour wine were important articles of food. Fish were eaten, locusts also, and fowl and eggs (I Kings 4:23; Neh. 13:16; Matt. 4:18; Luke 11:12). A simple repast consisted of bread and lentils (Gen. 25:34) or other pottage (II Kings 4:38), or bread and wine (Gen. 14:18), or roasted grain and sour wine (Ruth 2:14). Abraham honored his unexpected guests with a more pretentious meal, consisting of butter and milk, cakes made of fine flour, and the flesh of a calf (Gen. 18:3-8). A greater variety of foods came on the tables of the rich and great (I Kings 4:22, 23; Neh. 5:18). See MEALS.

Fool. One destitute of understanding or wisdom (II Cor. 11:16), especially a wicked man; the idea is that nothing shows a greater want of understanding than for a man to commit wickedness. The greater the talents, the greater the responsibility, and consequently the folly of misusing them for evil ends (I Sam. 26:21; II Sam. 3:33; 13:13; Ps. 14:1; cf. vs. 2, 3, etc.; Prov. 26:10; Matt. 5:22). See FOLLY, PHILOSOPHY, and WISDOM.

Foolishness. The same as folly (II Sam. 15:31; Prov. 22:15).

Footman. 1. A soldier who marches and fights on foot, in contradistinction to one on horseback (Num. 11:21; II Kings 13:7; I Chron. 18:4).

2. A runner (I Sam. 22:17, A.V.), one of the king's bodyguard. See RUNNERS.

Foreigner. in A.V. usually stranger. A Gentile; a person belonging to another people than Israel and owning other allegiance than to Israel and Israel's God (Deut. 29:22), as the Egyptians (Ex. 2:22), Jebusites (Judg. 19:12), Philistines (II Sam. 15:19), Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, Sidonians, Hittites (I Kings 11:1). As a technical term foreigner does not include: 1. Slaves bought with money and captives taken in war; for they were in the power of their masters and subject to the laws of Israel (Gen. 17:12; Ex. 21:20, 21). 2. Proselytes to the religion of Israel (Gen. 34:14-17; Isa. 56:6-8; Acts 2:10). 3. The so-called sojourners or strangers. See STRANGER.

Israel was Jehovah's peculiar people (Deut. 14:1, 2); therefore idolatrous Canaanites specifically were not to be received into covenant relations of any sort (Ex. 23:32), and all foreigners were debarred from eating the passover (Ex. 12:43), entering the sanctuary (Ezek. 44:9; Acts 21:28; cf. Deut. 23:3, 7, 8), and ascending the throne as king (Deut. 17:15). Intermarriage with them on equal terms was forbidden (Ex. 34:12, 16; Deut. 7:3; Josh. 23:12, specifically Canaanites; cf. Gen. 24:3, 4; 26:34, 35; 28:1; 34:14-17; Judg. 14:3; Ezra 10:2; Neh. 13:26, 27; Tobit 6:12). The flesh of animals that died, which the Israelites were not allowed to eat, might be sold to foreigners (Deut. 14:21); money might be lent to them on interest (ch. 23:20; cf. Ex. 22:25); and debts could be collected from them even in the year of release, when they were remitted to Israelites (Deut. 15:3). In later times strict Jews abstained from even eating and drinking with Gentiles (Acts 11:3; Gal. 2:12). Yet access into Judaism was always open to the Gentiles (Gen. 17:27; 34:14-17; Matt. 23:15); and their ultimate engrafting into the Kingdom was Israel's expectation.

Forerunner. A precursor; as: 1. A runner who immediately precedes the horse or chariot of high officials in order to clear the way or make proclamation (I Sam. 8:11; II Sam. 15:1; I Kings 1:5; 18:46; Esth. 6:9). 2. Descriptive of a herald (Herod. i. 60). 3. The advance guard of an army (Wisd. of Sol. 12:8; Herod. iv. 121, 124; cf. ix. 14). 4. First fruits (Num. 13:20, LXX).

As a forerunner Christ has entered on our behalf into heaven, the Holy of Holies, into the immediate presence of God (Heb. 6:20).

Forest. One was on Lebanon, famed for its cedars and firs (I Kings 7:2); another stretched from the Mediterranean Sea well into the hill country of Ephraim (Josh. 17:15, 18); a 3d was in Judah (I Sam. 22:5); and a 4th, the forest of Ephraim, generally supposed to have been e. of the Jordan near Mahanaim (II Sam. 18:6).

Fortified Cities. Towns fortified by walls, towers, gates, and bars (Deut. 3:5; II Chron. 8:5; Neh., ch. 3). Such were the cities of the Canaanites and the Amorites when the Israelites warred against them (Num. 13:28; Deut. 3:5; Josh. 14:12). After the Israelites had occupied Canaan, they, like their predecessors, had fenced cities (Deut. 28:52; II Sam. 20:6; II Kings 14:13; II Chron. 12:4; Jer. 5:17; Hos. 8:14; Zeph. 1:16).

Fortunate (fôr-tû-nă'tûs) [Lat., fortunate]. One of 3 messengers, apparently from Corinth, who reached Paul and supplied what was lacking on the part of the church in that city (I Cor. 16:17).

Fountain. A spring arising from under a rock or a bank, or welling up from the ground (Deut. 8:7). Strong fountains are numerous in Palestine. They are the permanent source of rivers, and give life and fertility to the soil. Many towns are named from them, as En-dor and the other compounds of En. Figuratively, fountain symbolizes the permanent and inexhaustible source of spiritual blessings (Ps. 36:9; Jer. 2:13; Rev. 7:17; 21:6). Children are also described as a fountain proceeding from the parents (Deut. 33:28).

Fountain Gate. See JERUSALEM, II. 3.

Fowl. Any bird. (Gen. 1:26; Lev. 11:13-19).

Fowler. One who catches birds by a net or other snare (Ps. 124:7; Prov. 6:5); hence figuratively one who ensnares the innocent or unwary and takes their life, or lures them to moral and spiritual ruin (Ps. 91:3; 124:7; Hos. 9:8).

Fox. An animal which dwells in holes (Matt. 8:20), especially among solitary ruins

(Lam. 5:18), and is sly and careful for its own safety (Ezek. 13:4; Luke 13:32). Tristram enumerates two species as occurring in Palestine, the Egyptian fox (Vulpes nilotica), and the tawny fox (Vulpes flavescens). The former is abundant in central and s. Palestine, as well as e. of the Jordan, and the latter, which is somewhat larger and may perhaps be only a variety of the common fox (Vulpes vulgaris), in the wooded parts of the country.

Under the general name of fox, shū'āl, the Hebrews appear to have comprehended the jackal, which belongs to the dog family, although they had a special name for the jackal. The jackal is perhaps intended in Judg. 15:4, R.V. marg.; for it abounds in the lowland of Philistia, goes about by night in bands, and spends the day as a pack in some cave. It is thus easily caught; whereas the fox is a solitary animal and difficult to capture. The jackal also devours carrion (Ps. 63:10, R.V. marg.), which the fox is loath to do. The jackal eats fruit as well as flesh, and may be intended in S. of Sol. 2:15, yet the fox tramples and destroys vineyards.

Frankincense. A fragrant gum of a tree (Ecclus. 50:8; S. of Sol. 3:6). It is white in color, as its Heb. lebōnāh denotes. It was an ingredient in the holy anointing oil with which priests were consecrated to their sacred functions (Ex. 30:34). It was added with oil to the meal offerings (Lev. 2:1, 2, 15, 16), and ultimately burned (ch. 6:15). No frankincense was added to sin offerings (Lev. 5:11) and offerings of jealousy (Num. 5:15). Pure frankincense was poured upon the 12 loaves of showbread (Lev. 24:7; cf. I Chron. 9:29; Neh. 13:5). The dromedaries of Midian, Ephah, and Sheba, brought it to Palestine from Arabia (Isa. 60:6; Jer. 6:20, R.V.). The hill of frankincense (S. of Sol. 4:6) was probably a retired spot in the palace gardens, among exotic frankincense trees (cf. Eccl. 2:5; Jos. Antiq. viii. 6, 6; ix. 1, 2). The frankincense of antiquity, the olibanum of European commerce, comes from Boswellia floribunda, one of the Amyridaceae (Amyrids), growing in India, or from other species of the genus, especially B. Carteri, B. Frereana, and B. serrata, of which there are 2 varieties, B. serrata proper, the B. thurifera of Roxburgh, and the variety B. glabra. The 1st and 4th species are Indian; the 2d and 3d occur on the Somali coast of Africa and on the s. coast of Arabia. The frankincense itself is gum resin, which is dry, consists of tears often an inch long, with a balsamic odor, especially when burnt. A poor quality, reddish in color, is obtained in the spring; the best is got later, and is white.

Friend of the King. A high court official (Gen. 26:26; I Kings 4:5), probably the king's confidential adviser. Under the Syro-Macedonian kings there was a specially privileged class known as the king's friends (I Macc. 2:18; 3:38; 6:10). See PRIEST.

Frog. An amphibious animal (Ex. 8:3; Rev. 16:13); in the O.T. probably Rana punctata, the dotted frog of Egypt.

Front'let. A band for the forehead; then, figuratively, the constant public exhibition of a trait or obedience to a command (Ex. 13:16; Deut. 6:8, 9; 11:18; cf. Prov. 3:3). The injunction was interpreted literally by the later Jews. See PHYLACTERY.

Full'er. One who cleanses undressed cloth from oil and grease and renders it thick or compact by the application of pressure, or else one who thoroughly cleanses soiled garments (Mark 9:3). The clothing was steeped in soap and water (Mal. 3:2) and trodden, as the Heb. word denotes. A fuller's field lay outside of Jerusalem and was a well-known landmark at the time of the monarchy. It had a highway and the conduit of the upper pool (Isa. 7:3; 36:2), and was so near the city that the Assyrian ambassadors standing in the field and speaking were heard and understood by the people on the city wall (II Kings 18:17). An old view placed these events somewhere on the w., near the present Jaffa Gate, as here runs an aqueduct from the Birket Mamilla, in the upper Hinnom valley, into the city. Another view favors a n. location, since the n. was the usual side for attack. Josephus (War v. 4, 2) places a Monument of the Fuller at the n.e. corner. It is more probable, however, that the conduit referred to is the tunnel connecting the Fountain of the Virgin with the Pool of Siloam; in that case the fuller's field was in the valley of the Kidron.

Fur'long. The rendering of Gr. stadion (Luke 24:13; John 6:19; 11:18; Rev. 14:20). The Gr. stadion was 600 Greek and 606½ English feet, or about ¼ of a Roman mile. It is a little less than an English furlong, which is 660 English feet, or ¼ of an English mile. See MEASURE, I.

Fur'nace. 1. An oven for smelting iron from the ore (Deut. 4:20; I Kings 8:51). See IRON, I.

2. A crucible for refining gold and silver, and for melting gold, silver, brass, tin, and lead (Prov. 17:3; Ezek. 22:20). See SMITH.

3. A bake oven; so in Neh. 3:11; Isa. 31:9. See BREAD.

G

Ga'al (gā'āl) [loathing; but cf. Arab. ju'al, beetle]. A son of Ebed. With a band of followers he came to Shechem and began to vilify Abimelech, the absent king, and to assume authority. Zebul, the governor, sent word to Abimelech of what was going on and advised him to lie in wait by night and advance against the town at dawn. He did so. Gaal went forth and gave him battle, but was put to flight (Judg. 9:26-41).

Ga'ash (gā'āsh) [trembling, earthquake]. A hill in the hill country of Ephraim, s. of Timnath-serah (Josh. 24:30; Judg. 2:9; II Sam. 23:30; I Chron. 11:32).

Ga'ba (gā'bā). See GEBa.

Gab'ba-i (gāb'ā-i) [tax gatherer]. A Benjamite who accompanied to live in Jerusalem after the Captivity (Neh. 11:8).

Gab'ba-tha (gāb'ā-thā) [Aram. gabbethā, back, ridge, hill, height; or perhaps gabbathā, bald forehead]. The equivalent in Aram. of Gr. lithostrotion, a pavement of tessellated work (John 19:13). On it stood the public tribunal on which Pontius Pilate sat to decide cases. Probably it was an open space in front of Herod's palace (cf. Jos. War ii. 14, 8).

Gab'riel (gāb'rī-ēl) [man of God, or probably, God has shown himself mighty]. An angel of high rank sent to interpret a vision to the Prophet Daniel (Dan. 8:16-27). He was commissioned again to visit the prophet to give him skill and understanding, and reveal to him the prophecy of the 70 weeks (ch. 9:21-27). At a long subsequent period he was dispatched to Jerusalem to announce to Zacharias the birth of John the Baptist (Luke 1:11-22), and to Nazareth to hail the Virgin Mary as chosen to the high privilege of being mother of the Messiah (vs. 26-38). Gabriel described himself as habitually standing in the presence of God (Luke 1:19).

Gad (gād) [good fortune]. 1. A son of Jacob by Zilpah, Leah's handmaid. At his birth Leah said, "With fortune [or Fortunate!]" and she called his name Gad (Gen. 30:10, 11; cf. v. 13, R.V.). By another interpretation of the text (kere), it may mean "Fortune is come." Jacob prophesied:

"Gad, a troop shall press upon him;
But he shall press upon their heel"

(Gen. 49:19, R.V.). Moses blessed God who enlarged Gad, and praised the valor of the tribe and its fidelity to duty (Deut. 33:20, 21). Gad had 7 sons (Gen. 46:16), each of whom, with the possible exception of Ezbon, founded a tribal family (Num. 26:15-18).

2. The tribe of which Gad was the progenitor, the Gadites (Num. 1:14; Deut. 27:13; Ezek. 48:27, 28, 34). At the 1st census in the wilderness the Gadites capable of bearing arms were 45,650 (Num. 1:24, 25); at the 2d there were 40,500 (ch. 26:15-18). Valiant Gadites joined David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:8). The territory occupied by the tribe was e. of the Jordan and was assigned them by Moses, but with the proviso that, before finally settling down in it, the warriors of the tribe should cross the river with their brethren, and give assistance in the conquest of Canaan (Num. 32:20-32). The territory of the Gadites was situated between that of Reuben on the s. and the half tribe of Manasseh on the n. It included the s. part of Mount Gilead from the Jabbok s. to Heshbon, and from the vicinity of Rabbath-ammon on the e. westward to the Jordan Valley. In the valley it took in the entire e. bank from Beth-nimrah, near the n. end of the Dead Sea, to the Lake of Gennesaret (Josh. 13:24-28; Deut. 3:12, 16, 17). The country was adapted to pasturage (Num. 32:1-4). Ramoth in Gilead was in the territory of Gad, and was appointed a city of refuge (Josh. 20:8). II Sam. 24:5 probably means that the enumerators passed from the Arnon toward Gad and unto Jazer.

3. A prophet, David's seer, who, when David was in the cave of Adullam, advised him to quit that place of refuge and seek safety elsewhere (I Sam. 22:5), and who later gave the king the option from God of 3 kinds of punishment for his having numbered the people (II Sam. 24:11-14). He aided in arranging the musical service of the sanctuary (II Chron. 29:25), and he wrote an account of David's reign (I Chron. 29:29).

4. A heathen deity was known by the name of Gad. The Israelites are represented as engaging in idolatrous worship and setting a table for Fortune (Gad) and filling up mingled wine unto Destiny (Meni) (Isa. 65:11, R.V.).

Gad'a-renes' (gād'ā-rēnz'). Natives or inhabitants of Gadara, which Josephus describes as a Greek city (Jos. Antiq. xvii. 11, 4). Eusebius places it e. of the Jordan, nearly opposite to Tiberias and Scythopolis. It has been identified as Umm Keis, on a bold headland about 5½ English miles s.e. from the s. side of the Sea of Galilee, with the sea in full view and the river Yarmūk between. The hot springs belonging to Gadara are n. of the Yarmūk, while Umm Keis lies to the s. of that river. Gadarenes is the reading approved by textual criticism in Matt. 8:28 (cf. Mark 5:1; Luke 8:26, 37, A.V.). See GERGESENES.

If Josephus is correct in giving Pella as the n. boundary of Perea (Jos. War iii. 3, 3), there probably was a 2d Gadara, the metropolis of Perea, a place of strength, which had wealthy inhabitants (Jos. War iv. 7, 3). It is probably represented by Tell Jadūr, near es-Salt.

Gad'di (gād'ī) [cf. Gaddiel]. The spy from the tribe of Manasseh in the exploration of Canaan (Num. 13:11).

Gad'di-el (gād'ī-ēl) [Gad (fortune) is God]. The spy representing Zebulun in the exploration of Canaan (Num. 13:10).

Gad'i (gād'ī) [a Gadite]. Father of King Menahem (II Kings 15:14).

Ga'ham (gā'hām) [cf. Arab. jahm, burning]. A son of Nahor and Reumah (Gen. 22:24).

Ga'har (gā'hār) [cf. Arab. jahīr, weak]. Head of a family of Nethinim who returned from captivity (Ezra 2:47; Neh. 7:49).

Ga'i (gā'ī) [valley]. A locality near Ekron, probably Gath (I Sam. 17:52, R.V. marg., as in LXX, Codex Vaticanus).

Ga'lus (gā'yūs). 1. A Macedonian, one of Paul's companions who was dragged into the amphitheater during the riot at Ephesus (Acts 19:29).

2. A man of Derbe, who accompanied Paul on his last journey to Asia (Acts 20:4).

3. A Christian of Corinth, baptized by Paul, noted for hospitality to his fellow Christians (Rom. 16:23; I Cor. 1:14). Perhaps he was the person to whom John addressed his 3d epistle (III John 1).

Ga'l'ad (gāl'ā-ād). See GILEAD.

Ga'lal (gāl'āl) [rolling, or perhaps, for the Lord has rolled]. 1. A Levite (I Chron. 9:15).

2. Another Levite, the son of Jeduthun (I Chron. 9:16; Neh. 11:17).

Ga-la'tia (gā-lā'shī-ā). A district of central Asia Minor, bounded on the n. by Bithynia, Paphlagonia, and Pontus, on the e. by Pontus and Cappadocia, on the s. by Cappadocia, Lycania, and Phrygia, on the w. by Phrygia and Bithynia. Its name was derived from the fact that certain Gallic tribes, after having invaded Macedonia and Greece (278-277 B.C.), migrated to Asia Minor and received this territory from Nicomedes, king of Bithynia, in return for services rendered him in war. The Gauls were commonly called Galatāi by the Greeks. The chief cities of Galatia were Pessinus, Ancyra, and Tavium. The territory, however, varied in size at different times according to the fortunes of war. In 189 B.C. the Galatians were subdued by the Romans, but retained their self-government, and were favored by their conquerors, since they were valuable allies. Hence under their last king, Amyntas, their territory was much extended to the s., so as to include part of Phrygia, Pisidia, Lycaonia, and Isauria; and, after the death of Amyntas (25 B.C.), this enlarged region became the Roman province of Galatia. In 7 B.C. Paphlagonia and part of Pontus were added on the n., and after A.D. 63 other territorial changes were frequently made. During the travels of Paul, therefore, the term Galatia was applicable both to the original Galatic territory and to the large Roman province. It is disputed in which sense it is used in Acts 16:6 (R.V., "they went through the region of Phrygia and Galatia," but which Ramsay translates "they went through the Phrygo-Galatic region"), and in Acts 18:23 (which translation is open to similar differences of opinion), and in Paul's epistle to the "churches of Galatia." If Galatia meant the Roman province, then Paul evangelized it on his First Missionary Journey (Acts, chs. 13; 14) in company with Barnabas. If it meant the old territory of Galatia, then he evangelized it on his Second Journey (Acts 16:6). The churches of Galatia are also mentioned in I Cor. 16:1. In II Tim. 4:10 we read that Crescens had gone to Galatia, which, however, many think meant Gaul (now France). I Peter was addressed to the Christians of Galatia among others (ch. 1:1), and there Galatia clearly means the Roman province. There are, however, serious difficulties in so understanding it in The Acts and in the Epistle to the Galatians.

G. T. F. (rev., H. S. G.)

Ga-la'tians (gá-lā'shānz), The Epis'tle of Paul to the. A letter addressed to the churches of Galatia (ch. 1:2), showing that there were a number of them in different parts of the territory. What churches are thus described depends on the meaning we attach to the term Galatia (q.v.). The date of the epistle also turns on this point. If Galatia be the Roman province and the churches of Galatia those founded on Paul's First Journey (Acts, chs. 13; 14), then the epistle was probably written toward the latter part, or at the close, of Paul's Second Journey, since Gal. 4:13 ("the first time," R.V.) implies that he had visited them twice, and since for various reasons it seems necessary to date the epistle later than those to the Thessalonians. If, however, Galatia means Galatia proper, and if it was evangelized on the Second Journey (Acts 16:6), then the epistle could not have been written before the apostle's sojourn in Ephesus, since Acts 18:23 mentions his 2d visit, on this interpretation, to Galatia. In conformity with this latter view are the facts, 1st, that the apostle appeals to his readers as if he alone had been their spiritual father (Gal. 4:13-20), whereas on his First Missionary Journey Barnabas was associated with him; and, 2d, that Paul's description of his reception as an angel of God (ch. 4:14) hardly comports with any known experience of his on his 1st journey. Many scholars take this latter view, conclude that Galatia proper was evangelized on the 2d journey, and date the epistle in A.D. 55 or 56. Others, however, put it still later, thinking that its resemblance to Romans shows that it was written shortly before that epistle, say in the winter of 57-58. Whatever its readers and date, it was occasioned by the operations of certain Judaizing teachers among the Galatians, who assailed Paul's authority, and taught the necessity of observing the Mosaic laws. They declared that Paul, not being one of the original apostles, was dependent on others for his knowledge of the gospel. They seem also to have charged him with being himself inconsistent in his preaching of Gentile freedom from the Law. They also attacked his doctrine, and persuaded his converts to adopt Jewish observances. The very gospel being thus at stake, Paul wrote this epistle with great intensity of feeling and vigorous argument.

This epistle is the Magna Charta of Christian liberty. After the introduction (ch. 1:1-10), in which the apostle opens the subject of their error in listening to false teachers, and vehemently asserts the divineness of the gospel he had preached, he defends his apostolic authority (chs. 1:11 to 2:21) as given directly by Christ and not dependent on man. He also shows that the Jerusalem church and the original apostles agreed with his position (ch. 2:1-10), and that (ch. 2:11-21) he had never changed his teaching, even when Peter at Antioch had seemed by his conduct to oppose it. In ch. 3 he defends his doctrine of justification by faith alone, appealing in proof to their own experience of salvation through faith (ch. 3:1-5), to the teaching of Scripture regarding the original Abrahamic way of salvation (vs. 6-9) and to certain facts, fully taught in Scripture, concerning the Law, namely, that the Law, since it requires perfect obedience as the condition of salvation, brings only a curse or penalty (vs. 10-12); that Christ has redeemed us from the curse, having become a curse for us (vs. 13, 14); that God ratified his covenant of salvation by faith with Abraham and his seed, and hence the Law, which came later, cannot disannul the original compact (vs. 15-18), but was intended as a temporary discipline to make men realize that sin is a transgression of God's commandments (vs. 19, 20), that the Law was therefore a tutor to bring sinners to Christ (vs. 21-24). In ch. 4 the apostle advances 3 more reasons for their fidelity to his gospel, namely, the analogy of sonship and its rights under the civil law (ch. 4:1-11), their personal affection for himself (vs. 12-20), and the illustration which the narrative of Genesis provided in the account of Hagar and Sarah and their sons (vs. 21-31). In chs. 5:1 to 6:10 he applies the doctrine of freedom from the Law, bidding them to maintain, yet not to abuse, their liberty, and to exercise it with meekness and a sense of responsibility. The closing verses (ch. 6:11-18), form the conclusion, probably in the apostle's own handwriting (see v. 11 in R.V.), in which he summarizes the substance of his instruction.

The Epistle to the Galatians is of immense value. 1. It is important for the details it gives about the apostle's life. Its harmony with the account in The Acts of Paul's life, and of his relation to the church, has been much contested but may be completely proved (see PAUL and the remarks, made at the proper chronological point in the article, concerning Paul's 1st visit to Jerusalem after his conversion, Gal. 1:18, 19; Acts 9:26-29, and concerning the Council at Jerusalem, Gal. 2:2-10 and Acts, ch. 15). 2. The epistle proves also that the older apostles were in accord with Paul, though to him was allotted the work among the Gentiles. 3. It gives in briefer outline, and with special application, the same scheme of salvation and the same view of the Hebrew dispensation which is more elaborately and calmly presented in The Epistle to the Romans. All men being under the Law, and condemned as sinners by the Law, salvation is impossible by the works of the Law. Christ alone can save, since he has by his death met the claims of the Law against those who believe. The Law was never intended to save, but to be a tutor or schoolmaster (i.e., a slave who led children to school) to bring us to Christ. By faith Abraham was saved, and by faith alone do we become children of Abraham, partakers of the blessing and heirs of the promise. Judaism, as a method of salvation, was therefore a misinterpretation even of the O.T. itself, and the distinction between Jew and Gentile has been done away. The declaration of these truths made Christianity a world religion instead of a Jewish sect.

Gal'ba-num. A fragrant spice (Ex. 30:34; Ecclus. 24:15), in Heb. ḥelbēnāh, in Gr. chalbanē. The Gr. and Rom. Galbanum was a gum brought from Persia. It is generally supposed to have come from 2 umbelliferous plants, Ferula galbaniflua and F. rubricaulis.

Gal'e-ed (gāl'ē-ēd) [heap of witness]. A cairn erected by Jacob in Mount Gilead, n. of the Jabbok. The exact situation is unknown. It was between the respective homes of Laban and Jacob, and was intended as a memorial of the covenant concluded between them there, that neither would pass that place to the other the other injury (Gen. 31:45-54); see MIZPAH 1.

Gal'ga-la (gāl'gá-lá). A place (I Macc. 9:2), presumably one of the towns known as Gilgal; mentioned in connection with Arbela. It may be for Galilee, since Josephus (Antiq. xii. 11, 1) does not mention it, but refers simply to Arbela of Galilee. See GILGAL.

Gal'i-lae'an (gāl'i-lē'ān), in A.V. Gal'i-le'an (gāl'i-lē'ān). A native or inhabitant of Galilee (Mark 14:70; Luke 13:1).

Gal'lee (gāl'i-lē) [Lat. Galilaea, from Gr. Galilaia, from Heb. Gālīl, circle, region, district]. Originally a district in the hill country of Naphtali (II Kings 15:29; I Chron. 6:76), Kedesh being one of its cities (Josh. 20:7; 21:32). The 20 unimportant towns given by Solomon to Hiram were in the land of Galilee (I Kings 9:11). In this region many of the Canaanites remained (Judg. 1:30-33; 4:2), and the expression "Galilee of the nations" or "Gentiles" implies that the district or region so called was inhabited chiefly by a non-Jewish population (Isa. 9:1; cf. I Macc. 5:15 and Matt. 4:15). The name Galilee gradually extended until it included the country as far s. as the Plain of Esdraelon (I Macc. 5:55; 10:30; 12:47, 49). Many of its inhabitants had been carried away, especially during the Assyrian wars (II Kings 15:29), and the few Jews who settled in Galilee after the Return were taken to Judea by Simon Maccabaeus about 164 B.C. (I Macc. 5:23); but Galilee soon afterward became thoroughly Jewish. It formed part of the kingdom of Herod the Great, and on his death passed under the authority of Herod the tetrarch. It was the most n. of the 3 provinces w. of the Jordan into which (if Phoenicia be ignored) Palestine was divided in the times of the Romans. At the period of the Jewish war, A.D. 70, it was divided into Upper and Lower Galilee; and was bounded on the n. by Tyrian territory, on the s. by the n. boundary line of Samaria and Scythopolis to the Jordan, on the e. by Hippene, Gadaris, Gaulonitis, and the kingdom of Agrippa, that is, by the Jordan and its lakes, and on the w. by Phoenicia. Lower Galilee lay to the s. of Upper Galilee and extended from Tiberias to near Ptolemais, now Acre, on the Mediterranean Sea (Jos. War iii. 3, 1; Life 13, 14, 37; cf. Judith 1:8). It was at that time densely populated. It furnished an army of 100,000 men (Jos. War ii. 20, 6). There were 240 cities and villages within the limits of the two Galilees (Jos. Life 45). The smallest of these villages, according to Josephus (Jos. War iii. 3, 2), had 15,000 inhabitants, but this probably is an exaggeration. The largest city was Sephoris, and the largest village Japha (Jos. Life 45). The mixture of races tended to produce a distinct accent or even dialect (Mark 14:70; Luke 22:59; cf. Acts 2:7). The people also was supposed to be one which never would produce a prophet (John 7:41, 52). Nevertheless, nearly all the apostles of Jesus were natives of Galilee, and he himself was brought up in it and made it the chief scene of his ministry, laboring on its e. limits by the Sea of Galilee, and within its area at Chorazin, Bethsaida, Capernaum, Nain, Cana, and Nazareth.

Galilee is about 60 miles long by 25 broad. It is generally mountainous with fertile valleys between. Its scenery is picturesque. Lower Galilee is divided from Upper Galilee on a line running almost due w. from the n. end of the lake to Acre. It is a grain-growing region, with a less elevation above the sea level than Upper Galilee, its mountains being all under 1,850 feet high. Upper Galilee has summits of 2,000, 3,000, and 4,000 feet altitude.

Gal'i-lee (gāl'i-lē), Sea of. A fresh-water lake, fed by the river Jordan. It was called originally Sea of Chinnereth (Num. 34:11), later Lake of Gennesaret (Luke 5:1; Jos. Antiq. xviii. 2, 1; cf. xiii. 5, 7; I Macc. 11:67), and Sea of Galilee or Tiberias (John 6:1; 21:1). The latter name is preserved in Arab. Bahr Tabariya.

It is enclosed by hills, except where the Jordan enters and leaves. The hills on the e. side rise to the height of 1,000 feet and more; those on the w. side toward the s. end of the lake are of like character, but toward the n.w. they are lower and less steep. It is designated a sea, from its considerable extent, though its water is fresh. Its length from the entrance to the exit of the Jordan is 12¾ miles; its greatest breadth, which is opposite to Magdala, is 7½ miles. Its e. side is destitute of conspicuous indentations, while on the w. side there is a swelling bay extending from Tell Hum on the n. to Tiberias on the s. The surface of the lake is 682 feet below the level of the Mediterranean. Lying so low, it has a semitropical climate, and since ice-crowned Hermon is not far away, sudden and violent storms at times rush down the mountain slope and terminate on the lake.

The water abounds in fish, and in Christ's day fishing in this lake apparently was a profitable industry. Thus Zebedee employed men to help him (Mark 1:20). Tristram enumerates 22 species; 2 of Blenniidae, 7 of Chromidae, 1 of Siluridae, and 12 of Cyprinidae. Some are called after Biblical personages, viz., Chromis Andraee, C. Simonis, and C. Magdaleneae. The best for the table of all fish now in the lake are the sheatfish (Clarias macracanthus) and the barbel (Barbus longiceps). The sheatfish, called by Josephus Coracinus (War iii. 10, 8), belongs to the same family as the American catfish, and attains a length of 3 feet. The most abundant fish is Chromis tiberiadi. Tristram saw them in shoals of over an acre in extent, so closely packed that it seemed impossible for them to move. Their dorsal fins, rising above the water, gave it at a distance an appearance as if a heavy shower were pattering on one spot of the glassy lake. Of course, the same kinds of fish are found in the Jordan and its tributaries also.

Gall. 1. The bitter secretion of the liver, bile (Job 16:13; 20:25); in Heb. mē'rārāh and mē'rōrāh, as being bitter. Venomous, malignant feeling against what is good was called the gall of bitterness (Acts 8:23).

2. A poisonous, bitter herb (Deut. 29:18; 32:32, 33; Ps. 69:21), called in Heb. rōsh, in Gr. cholē. It grew up spontaneously in the furrows of fields (Hos. 10:4, where the Eng. Bible translates it hemlock); hemlock, colocynth, and the poppy have all been suggested as the equivalent of rōsh. It was associated in rhetorical language with wormwood. A sore punishment was likened to a drink of gall water (Jer. 8:14; 9:15; 23:15).

The wine to drink mingled with gall, cholē (Matt. 27:34), doubtless is derived from the LXX of Ps. 69:21, where rōsh is rendered by cholē. According to Mark 15:23, it was myrrh. It is well known that the Romans gave wine with frankincense to criminals before execution to alleviate their sufferings; in Jesus' case myrrh was used.

Gal'ery. A long room or corridor, or a partial story in a building (Ezek. 41:15, 16; 42:3, 5). A different Heb. word, rendered galleries in A.V. of S. of Sol. 7:5, doubtless means tresses, as it is translated in R.V.

Fishermen Mending Their Nets by the Sea of Galilee

Gal'ey. A low flat-built vessel with one or more banks, i.e., rows of oars (Isa. 33:21; II Macc. 4:20).

Gal'im (gāl'im) [heaps]. 1. A village near Gibeah of Saul and Anathoth (Isa. 10:29, 30), apparently not a great distance from Bahurim (I Sam. 25:44; II Sam. 3:13-16); probably Khirbet Ka'kūl.

2. A town of Judah called Gallim, mentioned by the LXX in a group with Tekoa, Bethlehem, Etam, and especially in connection with towns s.w. of Jerusalem, between Karem and Baither; probably Beit Jāla, near Bethlehem (Josh. 15:59a).

Gal'li-o (gāl'i-ō). Roman proconsul of Achaia at the time of Paul's 1st visit to Corinth. His original name was Marcus Annaeus Novatus; but he was adopted into the family of Lucius Junius Gallio and took the name Junius Annaeus Gallio. He was the brother of the Roman philosopher Seneca, and, like him, was put to death by the emperor Nero. When the Jews, maddened by the success of Paul at Corinth, dragged him before the proconsul's tribunal, Gallio refused to take notice of religious questions and summarily dismissed the case. He remained equally indifferent when the crowd took Sosthenes, the ruler of the synagogue, and beat him before the judgment seat (Acts 18:12-17).

Ga'lows. Haman had a gallows (tree, R.V. marg.) made 50 cubits high, on which to hang Mordecai (Esth. 5:14). Hanging by strangulation was not a Persian method of punishment. Haman no doubt intended to impale Mordecai (cf. Esth. 2:23; Herod. iii. 159); the "tree" probably was a pole or stake.

Gama'li-el (gā-mā'li-ēl) [God has rewarded]. 1. Son of Pedahzur and head of the tribe of Manasseh in the wilderness (Num. 1:10; 2:20; 7:54, 59).

2. A member of the Jewish sanhedrin, a Pharisee, and a doctor of the Law, held in high reputation by the Jewish people. He advised against persecuting the apostles on the ground that if their work were simply man's it would eventually fail, while if it were from God opposition to it was wicked and vain (Acts 5:34-39). Gamaliel had Paul for one of his pupils in the Law (ch. 22:3). According to the Talmud, Gamaliel was the grandson of the celebrated rabbi Hillel. Gamaliel died about A.D. 50.

Games. In the N.T. there are numerous allusions to the games of ancient Greece. The most important of these were 4: the Olympic, at Olympia, in the district of Elis, in the Peloponnesus; the Pythian, at Delphi, in Phocis; the Nemean, at Argos, in Argolis, in the Peloponnesus; and the Isthmian, on the isthmus of Corinth. The contests were in chariot, horse, and foot racing, quoiting, boxing, wrestling, hurling the spear. The competitors went through a long course of severe training. Immense multitudes were spectators of their skill, and though the reward of the victor was but a crown of leaves (wild olive at Olympia, pine at the Isthmus, laurel at Delphi, parsley at Nemea), the honor given to him by his fellow citizens and countrymen was great beyond measure. Similar games were introduced into Judea by hellenizing Jews in the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes, and were fostered by Herod the Great (I Macc. 1:10, 14; Jos. Antiq. xv. 8, 1). As the Isthmian games were held in the vicinity of Corinth, and the other 3 at no great distance, it is natural for Paul's 2 epistles to the Corinthians to contain metaphors or comparisons borrowed from the games. In I Cor. 9:24-27 there is allusion to the training of a competitor in the games, to running, and to fighting, the object in view being to gain a prize. There are scattered allusions of a similar kind through other epistles (Gal. 2:2; 5:7; Phil. 2:16; 3:14; II Tim. 2:5). In Hebrews there is a notable passage (ch. 12:1, 2). The vast multitude of men and women who have borne testimony to their faith in God is likened to the immense concourse of spectators at a foot race. The competitor lays aside every weight to make himself lighter, and the long, flowing garment, which else would beset him and perhaps throw him down. He requires patience to go forward perseveringly, but obtains it by looking at the umpire seated at the end of the course, ready to confer the prize if it be fairly won. Every one of these details had a distinct spiritual reference, which would come home with great power to every reader of the epistle who had seen any of the Grecian games.

Grecian Games of Pulling and Wrestling

Gam'ma-dim (gām'ā-dīm), in A.V. double pl. Gam'ma-dims (gām'ā-dīmz) [valorous men, A.R.V.]. Brave people who manned the towers of Tyre (Ezek. 27:11, A.V.). A proper name is expected in the context, and these men may come from Kumidi, a place in n. Syria, mentioned in the Tell el-Amarna letters.

Ga'mul (gā'mūl) [recompensed]. A descendant of Aaron whose family in David's reign was made the 22d course of the priests (I Chron. 24:17).

Gar'den. The first garden or park of Scripture is that of Eden, which God caused to grow for man in his state of innocence (Gen. 2:8 to 3:24; Ezek. 28:13; 31:8, 9). Gardens were watered in Egypt (Deut. 11:10) with water raised from the Nile by sweep and bucket, or by wheel from wells, and poured into the irrigation ditch. By opening or closing this furrow with the foot the water was led to the spot desired. Irrigation was practiced in Palestine also (Eccl. 2:6; Isa. 58:11; Jer. 31:12). Herbs were cultivated in gardens (I Kings 21:2); so also were lilies and other flowers (S. of Sol. 5:1; 6:2), and fruit trees (Jer. 29:5, 28; Amos 9:14). The Garden of Gethsemane seems to have been an olive grove and to have had a press in it wherewith to express the oil from the fruit. There was a royal garden at Jerusalem (II Kings 25:4), another at Etam near Bethlehem (Jos. Antiq. viii. 7, 3; cf. S. of Sol. 6:11; Eccl. 2:5), another in the palace at Shushan (Esth. 1:5). To protect gardens against depredators they were enclosed with a wall or hedge (S. of Sol. 4:12; Isa. 5:2, 5), and occasionally a lodge was placed within them, attended by a watcher (Isa. 1:3). In the seclusion and coolness of gardens people walked (Susanna 1:7), sometimes bathed (v. 15), spread repasts (Esth. 1:5), engaged in devotion (Matt. 26:36), practiced idolatrous rites (Isa. 1:29; 65:3; 66:17; cf. II Kings 16:4), and occasionally buried their dead (John 19:41).

Ga'reb (gār'ēb) [late Heb. gārāb, jug, but cf. Arab. jirāb, scabby; Heb. gārāb, leprosy]. 1. An Ithrite, one of David's mighty men (II Sam. 23:38; I Chron. 11:40).

2. A hill near Jerusalem on the w. (Jer. 31:39; cf. vs. 38, 40). Exact situation unknown.

Gar'lic. A bulbous plant resembling the onion, and in Heb. called shūm. It was much eaten in Egypt (Herod. ii. 125), and the Israelites when there used it for food (Num. 11:5). It is Allium sativum, of the same genus as the onion but with more taste and scent than that esculent. It is a native of central Asia, is grown largely in the Mediterranean region, and is eaten by the common people as a relish to their bread.

Gar'ment. See CLOTHING.

Gar'mite (gār'mit) [pertaining to Gerem, or bonyl]. A gentile name applied to Keilah (I Chron. 4:19).

Gar'ner. A place for storing grain, a granary (Ps. 144:13; Joel 1:17; Matt. 3:12).

Gar'nish. To adorn, to decorate with ornamental additions (II Chron. 3:6; Job 26:13; Matt. 12:44; 23:29; Luke 11:25; Rev. 21:19, A.V.).

Gar'rison. A military post; a body of troops stationed in a fort (I Sam. 13:23; 14:1, 4, 6, 11, 15; II Sam. 23:14; II Cor. 11:32, A.V.). In the O.T. passages, Heb. maṣṣab is rendered garrison.

A different Heb. word, nēṣīb, is used in I Sam. 10:5; 13:3, 4, but the Eng. Bible also renders it garrison. This word has caused some difficulty in commentators, since in Gen. 19:26 it signifies pillar. In I Kings 4:19 nēṣīb means officer, and could very well have this translation in II Sam. 8:6, 14, where the Eng. Bible has garrison. II Sam. 23:14 reads maṣṣab, garrison, while the corresponding section, I Chron. 11:16, has nēṣīb, which must accordingly be rendered garrison. It may, to some commentators, seem desirable to limit, in the Books of Samuel, the meaning of nēṣīb to officer. Thus the Targum translates the word in I Sam. 10:5; 13:3, 4; the smiting of a Philistine officer by Jonathan would naturally be regarded as a cause of war. The Eng. rendering, however, makes sense in the context and has the support of the Vulgate.

Gash'mu (gāsh'mū). See GESHEM.

Ga'tam (gā'tām) [cf. Arab. ja'thām, lean and weak]. A descendant of Eliphaz (Gen. 36:11; I Chron. 1:36), and chief of a tribe of the sons of Esau (Gen. 36:16).

Gate. Every city or palace had a gate. It was often protected by a strong tower (II Chron. 26:9), and the gateway frequently led through the tower. Bars were placed across the gates to render them stronger against assault (Deut. 3:5; I Kings 4:13; II Chron.

A City Gate

8:5; 14:7). The gate was a place of public concourse where business was carried on (I Kings 22:10; II Kings 7:1; Ezek. 11:1); legal transactions conducted and witnessed (Gen. 23:10, 18; Ruth 4:1-11); cases tried and judgment pronounced (Deut. 21:19; 22:15; 25:7-9; Job 31:21; Amos 5:15). There were gates in the enclosures connected with the mansions of the aristocracy (Luke 16:20), where love of magnificence and display found expression (Prov. 17:19).

Gath (gāth) [wine press]. One of the 5 great Philistine cities (I Sam. 6:17; 7:14). It was noted as the residence of a remnant of the Anakim, men of great stature (Josh. 11:22; cf. Num. 13:33; Deut. 2:10, 11). To this race Goliath and the other gigantic warriors probably belonged (I Sam. 17:4; II Sam. 21:15-22; I Chron. 20:4-8). The town was captured by David (I Chron. 18:1). During Solomon's reign, it had a king of its own who was probably subject to the king at Jerusalem (I Kings 2:39, 42). It was fortified by Rehoboam (II Chron. 11:8), but soon again reverted to the Philistines. It was captured by Hazael (II Kings 12:17). Uzziah broke down its wall (II Chron. 26:6); and henceforth it drops out of history. Micah names it, but he may be quoting an old expression (Micah 1:10; cf. II Sam. 1:20). When afterward the Philistine cities are mentioned, Gath is missing (Jer. 25:20; Zeph. 2:4; Zech. 9:5); and it is not referred to in Maccabees, nor by Josephus when he relates events subsequent to the year 750 B.C. It is probably to be located at Tell 'Arak el-Menshiyeh, 6½ miles w. of Beit Jibrin (Eleutheropolis).

Gath'-he'pher (gāth'hē'fēr), in A.V. once through misapprehension Gil'tah'-he'pher [wine press of digging]. A town on the boundary line of Zebulun (Josh. 19:13). It was the birthplace of the Prophet Jonah (II Kings 14:25). In Jerome's day it existed as a small village, 2 Roman miles e. of Sepphoris. This location corresponds with el-Meshhed, 3 miles n.e. of Nazareth. The original site was s. of this village at Khirbet ez-Zurra'. Here one of Jonah's tombs exists, its chief rival being at the site of ancient Nineveh.

Gath'-rim'mon (gāth'rīm'ūn) [pomegranate press]. 1. A town of the tribe of Dan (Josh. 19:45), assigned to the Kohathite Levites (ch. 21:24; I Chron. 6:69). It may have been at Tell Abu Zeitūn, e. of Jerisheh in the plain of Joppa.

2. A town in Manasseh w. of the Jordan, assigned to the Kohathite Levites (Josh. 21:25); probably an erroneous transcription of Ibleam or Bileam (q.v.).

Gauls (gōlz). See GALATIA.

Ga'za (gā'zā), thrice Az'zah in A.V. and once in R.V. (I Chron. 7:28) [Heb. 'azzāh, Gr. Gaza, Arab. Ghazzah has preserved the ancient name]. 1. The most s. of the 5 Philistine cities (Josh. 13:3; I Sam. 6:17; Jer. 25:20), and very ancient (Gen. 10:19; el-Amarna letters, 15th century B.C.). It stood on the main road, between Mesopotamia and Egypt, at the edge of the desert and at the junction of a trade route from s. Arabia. Assigned to Judah (Josh. 15:47), it was captured by the men of that tribe (Judg. 1:18), but reverted to the Philistines (cf. Judg. 6:4). Samson carried off the doors of the city gate (Judg. 16:1-3). In prison and blinded he ground grain there (v. 21). The tutelary god of Gaza, as of Ashdod, was Dagon. The last act of Samson's life was to throw down the 2 middle pillars of the temple of Dagon from their place (vs. 23-31). Gaza was the limit of Solomon's dominion toward the s.w. (I Kings 4:24). Hezekiah smote the Philistines as far as Gaza's gate (II Kings 18:8). The city was taken by Sargon in 720 B.C. Necho took the city (Jer. 47:1), probably after the battle of Megiddo in 608 B.C. (Herod. ii. 159). Judgment was denounced against it and the other Philistine cities by the prophets (Jer. 25:20; 47:1, 5; Zeph. 2:4; Zech. 9:5). One sin specified was its sale of captured Hebrews to the Edomites (Amos 1:6). It held out against Alexander the Great for 5 months, and when it fell its inhabitants were massacred. Jonathan Maccabaeus was shut out of Gaza and burnt its suburbs; but he eventually made peace without storming the place (I Macc. 11:61, 62). It was afterward captured by his brother Simon (ch. 13: 43-48; Jos. Antiq. xiii. 5, 5). About 96 B.C., after a year's siege, it was devastated by Alexander Jannaeus (Jos. Antiq. xiii. 13, 3). In 62 B.C. Pompey placed it under the jurisdiction of Syria (Jos. Antiq. xiv. 4, 4). Gabinius, the Roman governor of Syria, built it in 57 B.C., probably on a new site, and the old town perhaps became known as Desert Gaza (Jos. Antiq. xiv. 5, 3; Strabo xvi. 2, 30; cf. Acts 8:26). About A.D. 65 the Jews destroyed Gaza, but it rose again, and coins are extant belonging to it which were struck in honor of Titus and Hadrian. Later it became the seat of a Christian bishopric; in A.D. 634 it was captured by the Arabs. It is situated 44½ miles s. of Jaffa and 2½ miles from the Mediterranean.

2. A town of Ephraim (I Chron. 7:28, A.V.); R.V. reads Azzah, but Ayyah in marg., which is the better Heb. reading. It is probably to be identified with Turmus 'Ayya in a small fertile plain between Sinjil and Seilun (Shiloh).

Ga'za'ra (gá-zā'rā). See GEZER.

Ga'zath-ite (gā'zāth-it). See GAZITE.

Gazelle. A small antelope, called in Heb. gebī. Where A.V. renders this word by roebuck, R.V. substitutes gazelle; and where A.V. renders it by roe, R.V. generally places gazelle on the marg. There is no doubt that the gazelle (Gazella dorcas) is intended. It was ceremonially clean (Deut. 12:22; 14:5), was hunted (Prov. 6:5; Isa. 13:14), and was swift-footed (II Sam. 2:18; I Chron. 12:8). Its beauty and grace rendered it a term of endearing comparison (S. of Sol. 2:9, 17; 8:14). It is about 3 feet 6 inches long by 1 foot 9 inches high. The horns are larger in the male than in the female; the limbs and whole form in both sexes graceful; the fur mostly fawn colored about the head, more fulvous on the other parts. It is found in Syria, Egypt, and Arabia, mostly in small groups or nearly solitary. It is timid and flees from a pursuer rapidly and with great bounds. Tristram found a 2d species of gazelle (Gazella arabica), larger than the common one, e. of the Jordan.

Ga'zer (gā'zēr) and Ga'ze'ra (gā-zē'rā). See GEZER.

Ga'zez (gā'zēz) [shearer]. A son and perhaps also a grandson of the elder Caleb (I Chron. 2:46).

Ga'zite (gā'zīt), in A.V. once Ga'zath-ite. A native or inhabitant of Gaza (Josh. 13:3; Judg. 16:2).

Gaz'zam (gāz'ām) [devourer, destroyer; cf. late Heb. gāzam, to cut off]. Founder of a family of Nethinim who returned with Zerubabel (Ezra 2:48).

Geba (gē'bā), in A.V. thrice Ga'ba [a hill]. A city of Benjamin (Josh. 18:24; I Chron. 8:6), allotted to the priests (Josh. 21:17). It must be distinguished from Gibeah of Saul (Isa. 10:29). Geba was the n. extreme of the Kingdom of Judah (II Kings 23:8; Zech. 14:10). A village bearing the old name marks the site, 6 miles n.n.e. of Jerusalem and 2 miles s.w. of Michmash.

Gē'bal (gē'bāl) [mountain]. 1. A city on the Mediterranean (Josh. 13:5; I Kings 5:18, R.V.; Ezek. 27:9), 42 miles n. of Sidon; called Byblos by the Greeks and Jubayl in Arab. It was a dependency of Egypt in the 15th century B.C., and the correspondence of its governor Rib-Addi with the pharaoh has been preserved in the Tell el-Amarna letters. 2. The n. portion of the mountains of Edom (Jos. Antiq. ii. 1, 2; ix. 9, 1; Ps. 83:7); known also as Teman.

Gē'bal-ites (gē'bāl-its), in A.V. Gīb'lites. The people of the town and kingdom of Gebal (Josh. 13:5; I Kings 5:18; in text of A.V. stonesquarers).

Gē'ber (gē'bēr) [a man, a hero]. Solomon's purveyor for the territory of s. Gilead (I Kings 4:19), and probably father of the purveyor for n. Gilead and Argob (v. 13).

Gē'bim (gē'bīm) [cisterns]. A village n. of Jerusalem (Isa. 10:31); identified by various scholars with Khirbet ed-Duweir, but Bātn el-Batfāsh has also been suggested with good reason.

Gēck'o. The rendering of Heb. 'anākāh, a ceremonially unclean animal classed with creeping things (Lev. 11:30, R.V.). The gecko is a wall lizard. It has white spots on its back; and it emits a plaintive wail, whence the Heb. name. The common gecko or fanfoot (Ptyodactylus gecko) is very common in Palestine. It frequents houses, running over the walls and ceiling. It is able to do this by reason of the peculiar construction of its toes, which are provided with plates under which a vacuum is created when the animal walks, thus causing it to adhere.

Gēd'a-lī'ah (gēd'ā-lī'ā) [Jehovah is great].

1. A harper, son of Jeduthun (I Chron. 25:3), and head of the 2d of the 24 companies of 12 musicians each which David appointed for the service of the sanctuary (v. 9).

2. An ancestor of the Prophet Zephaniah (Zeph. 1:1).

3. A son of Pashhur in Jeremiah's time (Jer. 38:1).

4. A man of Judah of high birth, son of Ahikam, son of Shaphan. He was appointed by Nebuchadnezzar governor of Judah after the capture of Jerusalem. He fixed his residence at Mizpah, where he was treacherously assassinated by Ishmael of the seed royal (II Kings 25:22-26; Jer. 39:14; 40:5 to 41:18).

5. A priest whom Ezra induced to divorce his foreign wife (Ezra 10:18).

Gēd'e-on (gēd'ē-ūn). See GIDEON.

Gē'der (gē'dēr) [a wall]. A town in the extreme s. of Judah (Josh. 12:13), but exact site unknown. It may be the same as Beth-gader or Gedor, 3.

Gē'de'rah (gē-dē'rā) [wall, enclosure, sheep-fold]. 1. A town in the lowland of Judah (Josh. 15:36), identified with Jedireh, 4 miles and 4½ miles respectively to the n.w. of Zorah and Eshtaol (v. 33).

2. A village of Benjamin (cf. I Chron. 12:4), identified with Jedireh, about 6 miles n. by w. of Jerusalem.

Gē'de'rite (gē-dēr'it). A man of Geder or Gederah (I Chron. 27:28; cf. Josh. 15:36).

Gē'de'roth (gē-dē'rōth) [enclosures, sheep-folds]. A town in or near the lowland of Judah (Josh. 15:41). In Ahaz' reign it was taken by the Philistines (II Chron. 28:18). Its site is commonly fixed at Katrah, called in I Macc. 15:39 Kidron, in the maritime plain about 4 miles s.w. of Ekron.

Gē'de-ro'thā'im (gēd'ē-rō-thā'im) [2 enclosures]. A town within the territory of Judah (Josh. 15:36), otherwise unknown. The LXX regards it as a common noun and translates it "its cattle shelters." One thing is in favor of this rendering; while the towns are reckoned up as but 14, 15 names are given. The name may have come into the text by dittography of the preceding Gederah.

Gē'dor (gē'dōr) [wall, fortress, walled enclosure]. 1. A son of Jehiel, and a brother of Ner, the ancestor of Saul (I Chron. 8:30, 31; 9:35-37).

2. A town in the hill country of Judah (Josh. 15:58; I Chron. 4:4, 18). Its site is marked by Khirbet Jedūr, about 7 miles n. by w. of Hebron.

3. A town, apparently in the territory of Simeon, not far from the s.w. boundary of Palestine (I Chron. 4:39); see GEDER. The LXX, however, reads Gerar.

4. A village in Benjamin (I Chron. 12:7; cf. v. 1); Khirbet el-Judeira, between Beit 'Anān and Beit Likya.

Ge'-ha-ra'shim (gē'hā-rā'shīm) [valley of craftsmen], in A.V. Char'a'shim [craftsmen]. A valley in Judah (I Chron. 4:14), inhabited after the Exile by the tribe of Benjamin (cf. Neh. 11:35). It may perhaps be identified with Šarafand el-Kharāb, about 5 miles s.w. by w. of Lydda (Lod) in a dale that slopes into the valley of the Nahr Rūbin. See CHARASHIM.

Geha'zi (gē-hā'zī) [valley of vision]. Elisha's servant. He told the prophet of their hostess' desire for a son; but when the lad that was given her died and the mother cast herself at Elisha's feet, Gehazi would have thrust her away (II Kings 4:14, 27). To teach that it is not magic but faith and prayer which avail, Elisha sent Gehazi to lay the prophet's staff on the dead child. He did so, but without effect (vs. 29-37). When Naaman the Syrian followed the directions of Elisha and was cured of leprosy, he wished to make the prophet a present. The man of God refused, but Gehazi ran after him and told him that Elisha asked a talent of silver and 2 changes of raiment for needy friends. As penalty for his avarice and lying, and for bringing the prophetic office into contempt, the leprosy of Naaman cleaved to him (II Kings 5:20-27). More sayings and doings of Elisha's servant are subsequently reported, but the person referred to was probably Gehazi's successor.

Geh'en'na (gē-hēn'ā). See HELL 2.

Ge'il'loth (gē-lī'lōth) [circles, regions]. Apparently the same place as Gilgal, opposite the ascent of Adummim (cf. Josh. 15:7 and 18:17).

Ge'mal'li (gē-māl'lī) [probably, camelowner]. Father of the spy Ammiel (Num. 13:12).

Gem'a-ri'ah (gēm'ā-rī'ā) [Jehovah has accomplished]. 1. A son of Hilkiah. He was one of two messengers sent by Zedekiah to Nebuchadnezzar. Jeremiah took advantage of the opportunity to send by them a letter to the captives in Babylon (Jer. 29:3).

2. A prince, son of Shaphan the scribe, and brother of Ahikam. He occupied a chamber in the Temple. He joined in requesting Jehoiakim not to burn Jeremiah's writings (Jer. 36:10, 12, 25).

Gen'e'al'o-gy. The tracing backward or forward of the line of ancestry of an individual or a family. The regulations of the commonwealth of Israel necessitated this being done to a large extent. Succession to the royal sovereignty, the high priesthood, the headship of tribe, tribal family, and father's house, depended upon lineage. There was general knowledge on the subject from the earliest period. There was interest in genealogy by reason of the constitution of tribes, which were divided on the lines of growth into great families, and these in turn into smaller families and so-called houses. Birth in a household declared one's relation to the several divisions of the tribe as distinctly as the native place determined one's classification according to the geographical divisions and subdivisions of a kingdom. Definite genealogical records are traceable from the beginning of the Hebrew nation (Num. 1:2, 18; I Chron. 5:7, 17). Claimants in the days of Ezra sought their register among those that were reckoned by genealogy, but since they could not find it, they were expelled from the priesthood as being polluted (Ezra 2:61, 62; Neh. 7:63, 64).

Two genealogies of Christ are given: 1 by Matthew in the direct, and 1 by Luke in the reverse, order of descent (Matt. 1:1-16; Luke 3:23-38). Matthew's purpose is to show Christ's legal title to the throne of David and to the covenant with Abraham (Matt. 1:1). Luke begins with the 2d Adam, the eternally begotten Son of God, and ascends to the 1st

Adam, the son of God by creation (Luke 3:38). Apparently to help the memory, either Matthew or the official record from which he quoted made 3×14=42 generations for the period between Abraham and Jesus; viz., 14 generations between Abraham and David, 14 between David and the Babylonian Captivity, and 14 more between the Babylonian Captivity and Jesus Christ. To carry out this artificial division Ahaziah, Joash, and Amaziah are omitted between Joram and Uzziah in the second 14. There may be similar omissions in the last 14. In Luke there are 41 names in the line of descent from David to Jesus, against 28, or, with the omitted 3, 31 in Matthew. If the Shealtiel and Zerubbabel of Matthew are the same as those of Luke, as can scarcely be questioned, the difficulty arises that in Matthew Shealtiel is the son of Jechoniah, but in Luke the son of Neri; indeed, the 2 lines of descent from David to Jesus are different in the 2 evangelists. They diverge from David; one line passes through Solomon and the other through his brother Nathan. Putting both in the direct order of descent, they stand thus:

From Matthew's Genealogy	From Luke's Genealogy
David	David
Solomon	Nathan
	Mattatha
Rehoboam	Menna
Abijah	Melea
Asa	Eliakim
	Jonam
Jehoshaphat	Joseph
Joram	Judas
	Symeon
	Levi
	Matthath
	Jorim
	Eliezer
	Jesus
	Er
	Elmadam
	Cosam
	Addi
	Melchi
	Neri
	Shealtiel (Salathiel)
	Zerubbabel
	Rhesa
	Joanan
	Joda
	Josech
	Semein
	Mattathias
	Maath
	Naggai
	Esli
	Nahum
	Amos Mattathias
	Joseph
	Jannai
	Melchi
	Levi
	Matthath
	Heli
	Joseph, the husband of Mary

Two explanations of these divergent genealogies are possible.

1. The Early Church generally explained both tables as recording the genealogy of Joseph. Julius Africanus (A.D. 220), the first known investigator of the question, adopted the theory that Joseph's grandfathers in the 2 genealogies, Melchi [Africanus has a corrupt text] and Matthath, had married successively the same woman, and that consequently Heli and Jacob were half brothers, having the same mother but different fathers. Heli married and died childless; and Jacob, according to the law of Levirate marriage (Deut. 25:6), took the widow to wife and raised up seed to his brother Heli by begetting a son Joseph. Hence Matthew can say, "Matthan begat Jacob, and Jacob begat Joseph"; and Luke can say, "Joseph, the son of Heli, the son of Matthat."

A reader solution of the problem on the lines of this theory is that the table in Matthew contains the legal successors to the throne of David, while that in Luke gives the paternal ancestors of Joseph. The line of Solomon became extinct in Jechoniah, otherwise known as Jehoiachin; and the succession passed over to the collateral line of David which sprang from David's son Nathan. The representative of this line was Shealtiel. For a brief space the royal line and the natural lineage of Joseph were identical; but after Zerubbabel the two lines separated. The family of the elder son, in whom the title to the throne inhered, at length became extinct, and the descendants of the younger son succeeded to the title. Matthat of this line (by some identified with Matthan) became heir apparent. He is supposed to have had 2 sons, Jacob and Heli. The elder, Jacob, had no son, but probably a daughter, the Virgin Mary. The younger, Heli, had a son Joseph; and Joseph, since his uncle Jacob had no male descendant, became heir to his uncle and to the throne. Broad genealogical terminology enables Matthew to say "Jacob begat Joseph," and Luke to say "Joseph, the son of Heli."

II. Since the Reformation a different conception of the 2 genealogies has won wide favor. According to this opinion, the table in Matthew gives the genealogy of Joseph and exhibits him as heir to the throne of David, while the table in Luke gives the genealogy of Mary and shows Jesus to be the actual son of David. With the clear declaration of Luke that Jesus had no human father, with the customary Heb. usage of the word son for descendant however remote, and on the basis of the approved Gr. text, the advocates of this view render Luke 3:23, Jesus, "being the son (as was supposed) of Joseph the son of Heli," etc. Jesus, according to Luke, is grandson of Heli, Mary's father, and thus a lineal descendant of David. A difficulty, not however peculiar to this theory, but lying equally against the first-mentioned hypothesis, is Matthew's record that Shealtiel was begotten by King Jechoniah, whereas Luke makes Shealtiel the son of Neri. Perhaps the simplest solution is the following: Jechoniah, who spent years in captivity, appears to have been the surviving nominal king of Judah in the year 562 B.C., 25 years after the fall of Jerusalem (II Kings 25:27). He apparently had no sons when carried off captive in 597. He was comparatively young, and children are not mentioned in the enumeration of his family (II Kings 24:8, 12, 15). Jeremiah prophesied that no son of his should occupy the throne (Jer. 22:30; cf. what is said of his father, ch. 36:30). In the genealogy as given in Matt., ch. 1, appears the entry, "After the carrying away to Babylon, Jechoniah begat Shealtiel." The 2 genealogies are intelligible, if this notice in Matthew be understood as a broad declaration in genealogical form denoting legal succession to the throne. The title passed from Jechoniah on his death to Shealtiel, a lineal descendant of David. There may of course have been close kinship between Jechoniah and Shealtiel. If Jechoniah had no son surviving him, but only a daughter, the inheritance passed to her children according to the Law (Num. 27:8-11). The phraseology of the genealogies is therefore explained on the assumption that Neri married the daughter of Jechoniah and begat Shealtiel by her. Shealtiel's lineage was reckoned as usual through his father back to Nathan and David, but his title to the throne was reckoned through his maternal grandfather Jechoniah to Solomon and David.

In I Chron. 3:17 is the record: "The sons of Jechoniah, the captive: Shealtiel his son, and Malchiram," etc. The epithet "his son" is peculiar to Shealtiel, peculiar also in that it is deemed necessary to apply it to one of a group already designated as sons of Jechoniah. It marks Shealtiel as the king's successor. He could be called his son, if his daughter's son, just as Abiezer, son of the sister of Gilead, son of Manasseh, is reckoned among the sons of Manasseh, and apparently even among the sons of Gilead (I Chron. 7:14, 18; Num. 26:30).

Hebrew genealogical tables are apt to differ in the principles of construction from modern registers of pedigree. 1. Symmetry is often preferred to the exhibition of the unbroken descent from father to son. Hence links were freely omitted, and the enumeration was otherwise left incomplete: ten in the genealogy from Adam to Noah, and 10 from Shem to Abraham; seventy sons of Noah's sons, and 70 souls of the house of Jacob (Gen. 46:27). 2. The genealogy may be tribal rather than personal; and son may denote the inhabitants of a country, a people or tribe (Gen. 10:2-22), a town (v. 15), rarely an individual (vs. 8-10). Similar phenomena are found elsewhere (Gen. 25:2-4; I Chron. 2:50-55; see Son). 3. The words bear and beget and father are used with a corresponding breadth of meaning; as bear or beget a grandchild (cf. Gen. 46:12 with vs. 15, 18, 25), or great-grandchild (v. 12, and probably vs. 21, 22), or grandchild's grandchild (Matt. 1:9), or country (Gen. 25:2, 3).

Gen'era'tion. 1. A begetting or producing, and then the person or thing produced (Gen. 2:4; 5:1); in Heb. only pl. tôlêdôth.

2. Each succession of persons from a common ancestor (Gen. 50:23; Ex. 20:5; Deut. 23:2); in Heb. expressed by a modification of the proper numeral or by dôr with an ordinal number.

3. The age or period of a body of contemporaries, not in the modern sense of the average lifetime of all who survive infancy, but the average period of the activity of any body of contemporaries as determined by the normal span of life. The generation lasts as long as any of the members survive (Ex. 1:6; Num. 32:13; Judg. 2:10; Eccl. 1:4); in Heb. dôr.

Gen'esis (jén'è-sîs) [Gr. genesis, origin]. The name, borrowed from the LXX, of the first O.T. book, called by the Hebrews from its initial word Berêshith (In the beginning). It naturally divides itself into 3 sections: 1st, the history of the universe, showing God's relation to it, and introducing human history (chs. 1:1 to 2:3); 2d, a sketch of human history before Abraham, showing God's relation to the human race, and introducing the history of the chosen people (chs. 2:4 to 11:26); and 3d, the history of the covenant people down to the descent into Egypt (chs. 11:27 to 50:26). The 2d section, which deals with prehistoric times, includes the creation of man and his original condition (ch. 2:4-25), the Fall (ch. 3), the progress of sin (ch. 4:1-15), the worldly race (vs. 16-24), the godly line (chs. 4:25 to 5:32), the increase of wickedness (ch. 6:1-8), the flood (chs. 6:9 to 9:17), the re-peopleing of the earth (chs. 9:18 to 10:32), the building of the tower of Babel (ch. 11:1-9), and the Semitic race in its earliest germs (ch. 11:10-26). The 3d section includes the early history of Abraham, his call, and his sojourn in Canaan (chs. 11:27 to 25:10), the life of Isaac from his father's death to the departure of Jacob for Mesopotamia (chs. 25:11 to 27:40), the life of Jacob from his departure for Mesopotamia to the death of Isaac (chs.

27:41 to 35:29), the descendants of Esau (ch. 36), the early history of Joseph to the time when he was sold into Egypt (ch. 37), Judah's sin and shame (ch. 38), Joseph in Egypt (chs. 39 to 45), Jacob and his whole household with Joseph in Egypt (chs. 46 to 49), and the death of Jacob and Joseph (ch. 50).

In this book 10 successive sections begin with the formula, "These are the generations of" (chs. 2:4; 5:1; 6:9; 10:1; 11:10; 11:27; 25:12; 19; 36:1; 37:2).

Gennes-á-ret (gē-nēs'á-rēt); in A.V. of I Macc. Genn-ne'sar (gē-nēs'ár), in R.V. of same Genn-es'areth (gē-nēs'á-rēth). A land adjacent to the Lake of Gennesaret, on its n.w. shore (Matt. 14:34; Mark 6:53); described by Josephus as a fertile plain, 30 stades in length by 20 in breadth, watered by a fountain called Capharnaum, and producing walnuts, palms, fig trees, olives, and grapes (Jos. War iii. 10, 8). It is the plain now called el-Ghuweir, formed by a recession of the hills from the shore just n. of Magdala, and measuring about 3 miles by 1½ miles.

The Lake of Gennesaret (Luke 5:1; Jos. Antiq. v. 1, 22; xviii. 2, 1 and 3) or Gennesar (Jos. War. ii. 20, 6), or the water of Gennesareth or Gennesar (I Macc. xi. 67; Jos. Antiq. xiii. 5, 7), was a common name for the Sea of Galilee.

Gent'iles (jēn'tilz). All nations of the world other than the Jews (Isa. 49:6; Rom. 2:14; 3:29). The Jews were the chosen people of God; their religion was sublime and stood in strong and favorable contrast to the Gentile religions; strict laws were enacted to prevent the corruption of manners and of the true religion through contact with idolaters. These things led the Jews, though unjustly, to feel contempt for the Gentiles. The Israelites had been chosen for a purpose. They were to be "a light to the Gentiles" (Isa. 49:1-6), who were embraced in the promises (Isa. 2:2-4; Amos 9:12; Zech. 9:7). When Peter, taught by the vision at Joppa, broke through caste restriction, visiting and eating with the Gentile Cornelius, it gave offense even to Christian Jews (Acts 10:28; 11:3); and when Paul, speaking from the steps of the castle of Antonia, declared that God had commissioned him to preach to the Gentiles, the audience of Jews in the Temple court cried out for his death (ch. 22:21, 22). The early churches consisted largely of Gentiles, and the first Council of Jerusalem declined to impose on the former the burden of the Mosaic Law (ch. 15:1-29).

Ge-nū'bath (gē-nū'bāth) [theft]. The son of the Edomite prince Hadad and the Egyptian queen's sister (I Kings 11:20).

Ge'ra (gē'rā) [probably hypocoristic; Heb., gēr, sojourner, and a divine element]. 1. A son of Bela and grandson of Benjamin (Gen. 46:21; I Chron. 8:3).

2. Another descendant of Bela, perhaps remoter than son (I Chron. 8:3, and probably v. 7).

3. A Benjamite, father of Ehud (Judg. 3:15).

4. A Benjamite, father of that Shimei who cursed David (II Sam. 16:5).

Perhaps 3 and 4 denote the founder of the family to which Ehud and Shimei belonged and are identical with the grandson of Benjamin.

Ge'rah (gē'rā). See WEIGHTS.

Ge'rar (gē'rār) [cf. Arab. jarrah, earthenware pot]. An ancient city on the s. border of Palestine near Gaza (Gen. 10:19; II Chron. 14:13), and early occupied by Philistines (Gen. 26:1). The country subject to it extended toward Kadesh and Shur (cf. ch. 20:1, 9 with ch. 26:6, 17, 18). It is commonly identified with Tell Jemmeh (near Khirbet Umm Jerrār) on the s. side of the wadi Ghuzzeh about a mile above the point at which the wadi esh-Sheri'ah enters it, about 8 miles s.e. of Gaza. Some scholars, however, prefer Tell esh-Sheri'ah, about 19 miles s.w. of Eleutheropolis (Beit Jibrin).

Ger'asenes (gēr'á-sēnz). The people of Gerasa (R.V. of Mark 5:1 and Luke 8:26, 37; MSS. vary between Gerasenes, Gadarenes, Gergesenes); the name Gerasa is probably still echoed by Kersa, a ruin on the e. shore of the Sea of Galilee, opposite Magdala, 5 miles from the entrance of the Jordan into the lake. A short distance s. of the site is the only place on this coast where the steep hills come down close to the water (Luke 8:32). The city of the Decapolis, known as Gerasa, now Jerash, does not meet the conditions of the narrative, being 37 miles s.e. of the Sea of Galilee and 32 miles s.e. of Gadara.

Ger'gesenes' (gūr'gē-sēnz'). The people of Gergesa (Matt. 8:28, A.V., but in R.V., Gadarenes). The introduction of the name Gergesenes into the text is ascribed to Origen, who is said to have felt that Gadara was too far from the lake and to have been told by people acquainted with the region that an old town named Gergesa existed near the declivity down which the swine rushed. The ruin Kersa is probably this old town. See GERASENES.

Ger'i'zīm (gē-rī'zīm) [a pl., Gerizites]. A steep rocky mountain forming the s. boundary of the valley in which Nablus, the ancient Shechem, lies, and facing the more elevated Mount Ebal, on the n. side of the valley. Mount Gerizim rises 2,849 feet above the level of the Mediterranean, and 700 feet above the town. When the Israelites conquered central Palestine, Joshua carried out the direction given to Moses and placed half of the tribes in front of Mount Gerizim to pronounce blessings and the other half over against Mount Ebal to pronounce curses (Deut. 11:29; 27:12, 13; Josh. 8:33-35). Jotham, the son of Gideon, standing on Mount Gerizim, proclaimed his parable to the men of Shechem (Judg. 9:7). Josephus (Antiq. xi. 8, 2, 7) says that Manasseh, brother of Jaddua, the high priest in the time of Alexander the Great, had married the daughter of a foreigner, Sanballat. The elders at Jerusalem commanded him either to divorce her or no longer to approach the altar. Manasseh thought of divorcing her, though she was still dear to him; but her father, Sanballat, promised to build for his son-in-law, if he retained his wife, a rival temple to that of Jerusalem. He kept his word, erecting one on Mount Gerizim. This was the origin of the Samaritan temple on that mountain and must be dated before 330 B.C. If Sanballat was the Samaritan of that name who was an opponent of the Jews in the time of Nehemiah, about 445 B.C. (Neh. 4:1; 13:28), and not an official sent by Darius Codomanus (Jos. Antiq. xi. 7, 2; xii. 5, 5), the temple was built considerably before 330 B.C., perhaps c. 432. It was destroyed by John Hyrcanus, 128 B.C. The erection of the edifice made Gerizim the Samaritan sacred mountain. It was to it that the woman of Samaria and Jesus referred as "this mountain" (John 4:20, 21; cf. Jos. Antiq. xii. 1); and Jacob's Well, at which they were conversing, was at the foot of Mount Gerizim. Gerizim, now called Jebel et-Tūr, is a high tableland stretching far toward the e. and s.e. of Nablus. From the days of Benjamin of Tudela, a Jewish rabbi who traveled in Palestine about A.D. 1160, on to recent times, the view was held that Gerizim, the mountain of blessings, was fertile, and Ebal, that of curses, barren. But with the exception of a small ravine coming down from Gerizim near Nablus, both mountains are equally barren. See SHECHEM.

Ger'shom (gŭr'shŏm) [By a popular ety. in Ex. 2:22; 18:3, interpreted as "sojourner there." "Banishment" has been suggested from Heb. gārash (drive out); also defined as "bell" from Arab. jaras. In both these cases -om is a suffix]. 1. Gershon, the son of Levi (I Chron. 6:16, 17, 20, 43, 62, 71). See GERSHON.

2. The elder son of Moses, born to him in Midian (Ex. 2:22; 18:3). He gave rise to a father's house which was reckoned among the Levites, not among the priests (I Chron. 23:14-16).

3. A descendant of Phinehas the priest, and head of a father's house in that line in the time of Ezra (Ezra 8:2).

Ger'shon (gŭr'shŏn) [banishment, but cf. Arab. jaras (bell); here the suffix is -on]. A son of Levi, and founder of the Gershonite family (Gen. 46:11; Ex. 6:16; Num. 3:17). He is sometimes called Gershom, which has a different suffix with the same meaning. His 2 sons, Libni and Shimel, gave rise to 2 subdivisions of the greater tribal family (Ex. 6:17; Num. 3:18; I Chron. 6:17).

Ger'shon-ites (gŭr'shŏn-its). The children and descendants of Gershon, constituting one of the 3 great divisions of the Levitical body. In the wilderness they encamped on the w. side of the tabernacle and had charge of the tabernacle itself, the tent with its hangings, and those of the courtyard (Num. 3:23-26; 4:21-28). To aid them in moving the tabernacle there were assigned to them 2 wagons and 4 oxen (ch. 7:7). The Gershonites consisted of 2 families, the Libnites and the Shimeites, and at the first census in the wilderness numbered 7,600 males (ch. 3:21, 22). Of the 13 cities assigned to them, 2 were in the half-tribe of Manasseh beyond the Jordan, 4 were in Issachar, 4 in Asher, and 3 in Naphtali (Josh. 21:27-33). The Gershonites were re-organized by David (I Chron. 23:7-11).

Ge'ruth Chim'hām (gĕ'rŭŭth kīm'hām) [the lodging place of Chimhām]. Probably a khan (Jer. 41:17, R.V.). See CHIMHām.

Ger'zites (gŭr'zīts). See GIRZITE.

Ge'shan (gĕ'shān), in A.V. Ge'sham (gĕ'shām). A man of Judah, a son of Jahdai (I Chron. 2:47).

Ge'shem (gĕ'shēm) and Gash'mu [rain; but cf. Arab. jasuma, to be bulky]. An Arabian, a great opponent of the Jews after their return from captivity. He ridiculed the proposal of Nehemiah to rebuild the wall of Jerusalem, as if this were tantamount to rebellion (Neh. 2:19). Not succeeding in deterring the Jew by this means, he joined with others in plotting violence, if not even actual murder, against him. Failing in this purpose also, he allowed the report to be circulated far and wide on his authority that Nehemiah was fortifying the city preparatory to rebelling against Persia and proclaiming himself king (Neh. 6:1 seq.).

Ge'shur (gĕ'shŭr) [a bridge]. A district lying between Hermon and Bashan and bordering on Argob (Deut. 3:14; Josh. 12:5; 13:11, 13; I Chron. 2:23). Evidently it was situated to the e. of Maacah, for Maacah bordered on Naphtali. It probably extended across Jauban from the Sea of Galilee to Bashan. It constituted an Aramaean kingdom (II Sam. 13:37; 15:8). Here David obtained a wife, and hither his son Absalom fled after the murder of Amnon (II Sam. 3:3; 13:37).

Gesh'u-rites (gĕsh'ŭ-rits); in A.V. twice Geshu'ri (gĕ-shŭŭ'ri), as in Heb. 1. The people of Geshur (Deut. 3:14; Josh. 12:5; 13:11, 13).

2. A people in the country s. of Philistia in the direction of Egypt (Josh. 13:2; I Sam. 27:8).

Ge'ther (gĕ'thĕr). A family of the Aramaeans (Gen. 10:23; I Chron. 1:17). Their locality is uncertain.

Geth-sem'ane (gĕth-sēm'ā-nĕ) [Gr. from Aram., an oil press]. A garden, presumably of olives and furnished with a press to squeeze oil from the fruit. It was e. of Jerusalem, a little beyond the brook Kidron, and at or near the foot of the Mount of Olives (cf. Matt. 26:30 with v. 36; cf. Mark 14:26 with v. 32; John 18:1). It was a favorite spot with our Lord, who often resorted to it for retirement (Luke 22:39; John 18:2), and it is now forever sacred as having been the scene of his agony and of his betrayal and arrest (Matt. 26:36-56; Mark 14:32-52; Luke 22:39-53; John 18:1-12). The traditional site of Gethsemane lies a little e. of the bridge by which the road from St. Stephen's gate of Jerusalem crosses the Kidron. The Garden is situated at the angle made by the division of the road into 2 branches, one, the most n., leading directly up the face of the Mount of Olives, while the more s. one winds gently around the s. brow of the hill. The Garden is nearly square, measuring about 150 by 140 feet, and the Franciscans in 1848 enclosed it with a wall. Eight venerable olive trees are within, on which it is said the tax levy can be traced back to the occupation of Jerusalem by the Arabs in the 7th century; and many equally old are outside on the slope of the mount. These trees, however, did not witness our Lord's agony, for all the trees around Jerusalem were cut down during the siege of the city by Titus (Jos. War v. 12, 4). Robinson thinks that the spot is the same as that described by Eusebius as at the Mount of Olives, and afterward more definitely by Jerome as at the foot of the mount, but he is doubtful if it is the genuine Gethsemane. Thomson regards the position as too near the city and too close to the great thoroughfare e. to have served as a place for retirement on that dangerous and dismal night. He believes Gethsemane to have been in a secluded vale several hundred yards n.e. of the traditional site. Barclay thinks it evident that the present enclosure, from its narrow dimensions, can occupy only in part the site of the ancient garden, and finds a better position higher up in the valley. The Greeks enclosed an adjacent piece of ground to the e., on the slope of the mountain, as being the Garden.

Ge'u'el (gĕ-ŭ'ĕl) [majesty of God; or perhaps, redeemed of God]. The spy from the tribe of Gad (Num. 13:15).

Ge'zer (gĕ'zĕr), in A.V. twice Ga'zer [portion]. In A.V. of I Macc. the Gr. forms Gazera and Gazara are used. An ancient Canaanite town, going back to c. 3000 B.C., not far from Lachish and the lower Beth-horon (Josh. 10:33). It was on the boundary line of Ephraim (Josh. 16:3; cf. I Chron. 7:28), and with its suburbs was assigned to the Kohathite Levites (Josh. 21:21; I Chron. 6:67). The Ephraimites failed to expel the Canaanite inhabitants, and occupied the city with them at least for a time (Josh. 16:10; Judg. 1:29). More than one battle in David's reign was fought at or near Gezer (II Sam. 5:25; I Chron. 14:16; 20:4). One of the pharaohs captured Gezer from the Canaanites (I Kings 9:16). After burning it, he gave the ruins over to Solomon as a dowry with his daughter when she was married to the Hebrew king. The city was at once rebuilt. It was an important place in the wars of the Maccabees. Bacchides strengthened its fortifications (I Macc. 9:52). It was besieged and taken by Simon, and made stronger than before (chs. 13:43, R.V., 48, 53; 14:34). It is now called Tell Jazer and is situated about 18 miles w.n.w. of Jerusalem and 5½ e. of Ekron.

Gez'rite (gěz'rit). See GIRZITE.

G'ah (g'ā) [breaking forth, as of a spring]. A village somewhere between Gibeon in Benjamin and the ford of the Jordan near the Jabbok (II Sam. 2:24).

G'ant. A man of abnormally tall stature; like Og, king of Bashan, whose bedstead or sarcophagus was 9 cubits long by 4 broad (Deut. 3:11), Goliath of Gath, whose height was 6 cubits and a span (I Sam. 17:4), and the man whom Benaiah slew, whose height was 5 cubits (I Chron. 11:23). A stalwart race of men like the Anakim and other early nations of Canaan and the country e. of the Jordan (Deut. 1:28; 2:10, 11, 20, 21; 9:2). When Hebron was captured by the Hebrews, the Anakim who escaped destruction took refuge in the Philistine towns. Goliath of Gath, Ishbi-benob, and other huge Philistines were probably of this expelled race of the Anakim (I Sam. 17:4; II Sam. 21:15-22). The valley of the Rephaim or giants near Jerusalem was a perpetual reminder, by its name, of the early stalwart race which long inhabited it (Josh. 15:8; 18:16). The exact meaning of nephilim, the word rendered giants in Gen. 6:4; Num. 13:33 A.V., is uncertain, and accordingly it is left untranslated in R.V.

Gib'bar (gib'ār) [mighty man, hero]. A man whose children, or a place of whose former inhabitants some descendants, returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:20). In the parallel passage in Neh. 7:25 Gibeon stands in place of Gibbar.

Gib'berthon (gib'ê-thōn) [mound, height]. A town of Dan (Josh. 19:44) assigned to the Levites of the family of Kohath (ch. 21:20-23). The Philistines gained possession of it. Nadab was assassinated there while laying siege to the place (I Kings 15:27). Omri before he ascended the throne also besieged the town (I Kings 16:15, 17). It is probably to be identified with Tell el-Melāt, 5½ of a mile s. of Na'aneh and directly e. of Ekron ('Akir).

Gib'ea (gib'ê-ā) [a hill]. A grandson of Caleb, but probably a village (I Chron. 2:49); see GIBEAH 1.

Gib'eah (gib'ê-ā) [a hill]. 1. A village in the hill country of Judah (Josh. 15:57); it has been identified with el-Jeba' about 10 miles n.n.w. of Hebron, and about 11 n.e. of Eleutheropolis, and about 7½ s.w. of Bethlehem, but on account of the list of places in vs. 55-57 its location is to be sought s.e. of Hebron.

2. A town of Benjamin near Ramah (Judg. 19:13, 14); called also Geba, the masculine form of the same name (cf. ch. 20:10, R.V. marg., with v. 4). It is designated Gibeah of Benjamin (ibid.; cf. I Sam. 13:2), and Gibeah of the children of Benjamin (II Sam. 23:29); and appears to be identical with Gibeah of Saul (I Sam. 11:4; II Sam. 21:6; Isa. 10:29). Its inhabitants by their misbehavior brought down punishment, not merely on themselves, but on the whole tribe of Benjamin (Judg., chs. 19; 20). Gibeah was Saul's place of residence when he was called to be king (I Sam. 10:26), and it remained his home and served as the political capital of his kingdom (chs. 15:34; 22:6; 23:19). It existed in the days of Isaiah and of Hosea (Isa. 10:29, distinguished from Geba; Hos. 9:9; 10:9). The town was situated on the highway from Jerusalem to the n., about midway between Jerusalem and Ramah (Judg. 19:13; Jos Antiq. v. 2, 8, cf. viii. 12, 3; War v. 2, 1). Its site is Tell el-Fūl, about 4 miles n. of Jerusalem.

3. A hill or town in the hill country of Ephraim, belonging to Phinehas, where Eleazar the high priest, the son of Aaron, was buried (Josh. 24:33; Jos. Antiq. v. 1, 29). Generally identified with Jibia, 8½ miles w.s.w. of Seilun (Shiloh), and 3½ miles e. by s. of Tibneh (Timnath); but Nebi Sāleh about 1½ miles n.e. of Tibneh seems a better site. The tradition of the Samaritans, which locates the grave at 'Awertah, 4½ miles s. of Shechem, is late.

4. Gibeah or hill of God (I Sam. 10:5, R.V. marg.). Often identified with Gibeah of Saul, for it appears to have been Saul's home (ch. 10:10-14). On account of the name (v. 5, R.V. marg.) its identity with Ram Allah (height of God), 4 miles n.w. by n. of Ramah, has been proposed. Much depends upon the identification of Rachel's sepulcher and Zelzah (cf. ch. 10:2-5 with ch. 13:3).

Gib'eath (gib'ê-āth) [a hill]. A town of Benjamin (Josh. 18:28). Generally identified with Gibeah, 2.

Gib'eath-ite (gib'ê-āth-īt). A native or inhabitant of Gibeah (I Chron. 12:3).

Gib'eon (gib'ê-ōn) [pertaining to a hill]. The chief city of the Hivites, a people of Canaan (Josh. 11:19), included in the general designation Amorite (II Sam. 21:2). They possessed also Chephirah, Beeroth, and Kir-iath-jearim (Josh. 9:17). They obtained a treaty with Joshua by false pretenses. The deceit was discovered and they were made slaves of the Israelites (ch. 9). But the treaty was respected: the Gibeonites were aided against their enemies (ch. 10:1-11); and several centuries later, when Saul violated its provisions by a massacre of Gibeonites, the sense of justice was satisfied by the execution of 7 of Saul's sons (II Sam. 21:1-9). Gibeon was within the territory assigned to the Benjaminites (Josh. 18:25); and was given, with its suburbs, to the family of Aaron (ch. 21:17). Saul's ancestors dwelt for a time in the town and were men of influence (I Chron. 8:29; 9:35). In the contest between Ish-bosheth and David, a battle took place here (II Sam. 2:8-17, 24; 3:30). Here David gained a victory over the Philistines (I Chron. 14:16; in II Sam. 5:25, Geba). In its vicinity Joab murdered Amasa (II Sam. 20:8). There also, in David's reign and in the early part of Solomon's reign, before the Temple was built, stood the tabernacle and the brazen altar; and there Solomon sacrificed and in a dream received a message from God (I Kings 3:4-15; I Chron. 16:39, 40; 21:29; II Chron. 1:3, 6, 13). Gibeonites returned from the Exile (Neh. 7:25), and aided in rebuilding the wall of Jerusalem (ch. 3:7). According to Josephus, Gibeon was 40 or 50 stadia (about 4½ to 6 miles) from Jerusalem (Jos. Antiq. vii. 11, 7; War ii. 19, 1). Its site is found at the modern village of el-Jib, 5½ miles n.w. by n. of Jerusalem. An oblong or oval hill stands in the midst of a basin consisting of broad valleys in a high state of cultivation. The hill is steep of ascent, being composed of horizontal layers of limestone rock that form great steps from the plain upward.

S.e. of the village, and quite a distance down the hill, is a fine fountain of water, which flows into a subterranean reservoir artificially cut. Not far from it, among olive trees, is an open reservoir about 59 feet long by 36 feet broad; it was doubtless intended to receive the superfluous waters of the cavern. On the w. is a tank, 11 by 7 feet in size, cut in the rock, and called el-Birkeh, the pool. In the plain a little lake, 6 to 8 acres in extent, is formed during the winter. One or other of these was doubtless the pool or great waters of Gibeon (II Sam. 2:13; Jer. 41:12).

The wilderness of Gibeon was perhaps simply the uncultivated plateau between Gibeon and Ramah. If a desert is meant, it was at considerable distance e. from the city (II Sam. 2:24).

Gib'e-on-ites (gīb'ē-ūn-its). The inhabitants of Gibeon or of that city with its 3 dependent towns (II Sam. 21:1-4; cf. Josh. 9:3, 7, 17).

Gib'lites (gīb'lits). See GEBALITES.

Gid-dal'ti (gī-dāl'ti) [I have magnified (God)]. A singer, a son of Heman (I Chron. 25:4), and head of the 22d of the 24 companies of 12 musicians each which were appointed in David's reign for the service of the sanctuary (v. 29).

Beginning with Hananiah the names in I Chron. 25:4, read in their present sequence, but variously divided and conjoined and changed in vocalization, form a prayer. The sequence, however, is not preserved in vs. 23-31.

Gid'del (gīd'ēl) [(God) has increased, or reared]. 1. Head of a family of Nethinim (Ezra 2:47; Neh. 7:49).

2. Head of a family of Solomon's servants (Ezra 2:56; Neh. 7:58).

Gid'eon (gīd'ē-ūn), in A.V. of N.T. Ged'eon after the Gr. [hewer, feller]. A son of Joash, family of Abiezer, tribe of Manasseh, who dwelt at Ophrah (Judg. 6:11). While threshing wheat in the wine press at Ophrah, to hide it from the Midianite pillagers, he was called by the angel of Jehovah to deliver his people (vs. 12-24). At once he offered sacrifice (cf. Ex. 20:24). That night he threw down his father's altar of Baal and built an altar of Jehovah (Judg. 6:25-27). The townspeople demanded his death, but his father urged that Baal be allowed to contend for himself. Gideon thus acquired the name Jerubbaal, "Let Baal contend," and later, when the word Baal was shunned as abominable, Jerubesheth, "Let the shameful thing contend" (Judg. 6:28-32; II Sam. 11:21; see ISH-BOSHETH). Having summoned the men of Manasseh, Asher, Zebulun, and Naphtali (Judg. 6:35), he yet hesitated until his call had been confirmed by the miracle of the fleece (vs. 36-40). With his followers intentionally reduced to 300, that the glory of the victory might be not with man but with Jehovah, he made a night attack on the Midianite camp, which was pitched in the valley of Jezreel (v. 33), by the hill of Moreh (ch. 7:1). The Midianites were thrown into confusion, fought each other and fled. The flight was to the Jordan and their own country beyond. Ephraimites, summoned by couriers from Gideon, seized the fords of the river to intercept fugitives, and captured and slew 2 princes of Midian and took their heads to Gideon, already across the river (chs. 7:24 to 8:3). Continuing the pursuit, he and his band drove the Midianites to the confines of the desert and brought back the 2 kings of Midian captive and put them to death (ch. 8:4-21). This victory was the celebrated day of Midian (Isa. 9:4; 10:26; Ps. 83:11). A movement now set in to make Gideon and his house royal, but he refused the crown because Jehovah was their king (Judg. 8:22, 23). However, he had the earrings of the Midianites made into an ephod, which he put in his own city, Ophrah. His act was unwise as the event proved, and the ephod became a snare to Gideon and his family and a means of seduction to Israel (Judg. 8:24-27; cf. Lev. 20:6). Gideon had many wives and 70 sons, besides a son Abimelech, a concubine's child, who made himself king on the death of his father. Gideon died in a good old age (Judg., chs. 6 to 8; Heb. 11:32).

Gid'e-o'ni (gīd'ē-ō'ni) [cf. Gideon]. Father of the prince of the tribe of Benjamin in the time of Moses (Num. 1:11).

Gid'dom (gīd'dōm) [a cutting off]. A village apparently in Benjamin, between Gibeah and the rock of Rimmon (Judg. 20:45).

Gier'-ea'gle. 1. The rendering in A.V. of Heb. rāhām, so named from its affection for its young. In R.V. the word is translated vulture, which is the meaning of gier. It was ceremonially unclean (Lev. 11:18; Deut. 14:17). Undoubtedly the Egyptian vulture, Pharaoh's hen or chicken (Neophron percnopterus), is meant, which the Arabs still call rahām. Its general color is white but the primary feathers of the wings are black. The young are brown. The length of the adult is a little over 2 feet. It ranges in summer from the s. of France, by s. Europe and n. Africa, to the w. of India, where it is replaced by a closely allied species. The Egyptian vulture is common in Palestine during its n. migration, and breeds in that country.

2. The rendering in R.V. of Heb. peres (Lev. 11:13; Deut. 14:12). See OSSIFRAGE.

Gifts. Gifts were given by fathers to sons (Gen. 25:6), or as dowry to daughters on their marriage (Judg. 1:15), or by the bridegroom to the bride's father (Gen. 34:12), or by people present by invitation at a wedding (Ps. 45:12). They were bestowed upon fellow men out of good will (Esth. 9:22) or to secure favor (Prov. 18:16). It was forbidden to offer them to judges for the purpose of bribery (Ex. 23:8; Deut. 16:19; Prov. 29:4). Monarchs bestowed them as a reward for service (Dan. 2:48), or as a gracious favor to cause public rejoicings (Esth. 2:18). They were brought by subjects as tribute (II Sam. 8:2, 6; II Chron. 26:8; Ps. 45:12; 72:10; Matt. 2:11). Gifts were required for the expenses of religious worship (Matt. 5:23, 24; 8:4; Luke 21:5). Essentially the same customs as to gifts still prevail throughout the East.

The gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ (John 4:10; Rom. 6:23). Christ gave gifts unto men (Eph. 4:8). He not only opened up a way for them to God, and enables them to stand before the just and holy One, but he has obtained for them the gift of the Holy Spirit (John 14:16; 16:7; Acts 2:38) and all the manifestations of the Spirit in the hearts and lives of believers: repentance (Acts 5:31), faith (Eph. 2:8), love (Rom. 5:5), joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, meekness, temperance (Gal. 5:22). All Christian virtues are graces, that is, gifts. God bestows various gifts upon men, qualifying them severally as he will for different forms of work in the Kingdom (Rom. 12:6; I Cor. 7:7; 12:4, 9; Eph. 4:7-16). See MIRACLE, TONGUE.

Gih'on (gī'hōn) [bursting forth, as a fountain]. 1. One of the 4 rivers of paradise (Gen. 2:13). See EDEN.

2. A spring in a valley outside the walls of Jerusalem from which the city obtained part of its water supply (II Chron. 32:30; 33:14; Jos. Antiq. vii. 14, 5). It was not in sight of the stone of Zohaleth, near En-rogel; but the sound of the trumpet and the noise of the shouting at Gihon were heard at En-rogel (I Kings 1:40-45). On Ophel the Jebusites (c. 2000 B.C.) cut a passage through the rock to a chamber. Thence a channel descended for 125 ft. to a spot where buckets could be let down a 40-ft. shaft. At the bottom was the water which had been carried back 50 ft. from Gihon; the spring had been dammed up, and so its water flowed into this underground conduit. It was probably up this water passage that Joab climbed to admit the armies of David into the city. There was an upper and presumably a lower Gihon, as early as the time of Hezekiah at least. The upper Gihon is to be identified with St. Mary's Well or the Virgin's Fount, which is situated in the Kidron Valley on the e. side of Ophel and s. of the Temple area. From Gihon Hezekiah made his aqueduct, the Siloam tunnel (II Kings 20:20; I Chron. 32:30), which led to the Siloam pool within the city walls to the s.w. of the spring (cf. John 9:7).

Gil'-lai (gīl'ā-lī) [perhaps, Jehovah has rolled away]. A Levite, a musician who took part in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:36).

Gil'-bo'a (gīl-bō'ā). The mountain on which Saul was defeated by the Philistines and met his death (I Sam. 28:4; 31:1, 8; II Sam. 1:6, 21; 21:12; I Chron. 10:1, 8). It is the n.e. spur of Mount Ephraim, and forms the watershed between the Kishon basin and the Jordan Valley. The ridge forms an arc e. of the Plain of Esdraelon and runs first s.e. and then s. It is about 8 miles long and 3 to 5 miles in breadth, and is divided by ravines into several plateaus. The highest point, which is at Sheikh Burkān, is 1,696 feet above sea level. The w. slopes of the range are gradual, but those facing n. are steep and rugged, with precipices in many places. The e. slopes over the Jordan Valley are also steep, in places precipitous, especially toward the s. On the tablelands and gentle w. slopes pasture land is found, wheat and barley grow, and olives and figs are cultivated. The rest of the ridge is naked rock, or is covered with wild grass and brushwood. The modern name is Jebel Fuḳū'a, but a village, Jelbōn, suggests the name Gilboa.

Gil'-e'ad (gīl'ē-ād), in A.V. of Maccabees Gāl'-ad [cf. Arab. jal'ad, hard, rough]. 1. The son of Machir and grandson of Manasseh. He founded a tribal family (Num. 26:29, 30; Josh. 17:1).

2. Father of Jephthah (Judg. 11:1).

3. A Gadite (I Chron. 5:14).

4. The mountainous country e. of the Jordan, extending from the tableland of Moab n. at least to the Yarmuk (Deut. 3:16, 17; I Sam. 31:11), and perhaps farther, since the ruggedness of the land continues unchanged n. of that river. It is divided by the Jabbok into 2 parts (Josh. 12:2). The s. half was assigned to the tribe of Gad, and the n. half was included in the territory of half Manasseh (Deut. 3:12, 13; Josh. 13:24-31). The name is still connected with a mountain s. of the Jabbok in its designation Jebel Jele'ad. The last interview between Laban and Jacob took place in Mount Gilead (Gen. 31:21, 25). It was a place well suited for cattle (I Chron. 5:9, 10); and the sight of Gilead and the land of Jazer (cf. I Chron. 26:31) suggested to the Reubenites and the Gadites, who had large flocks and herds, the expediency of applying to Moses for permission, which was conditionally granted them, of settling permanently on the e. side of the Jordan (Num., ch. 32; Josh. 13:8-11). Within the limits of Gilead grew the celebrated balm (Jer. 8:22; cf. Gen. 37:25). In an extended sense the term Gilead includes the whole region e. of the Jordan (Deut. 34:1; Josh. 22:9; Judg. 20:1; II Sam. 2:9; I Macc. 5:17, 24-27, 36; Jos. Antiq. xii. 8, 3; in ix. 8, 1, Gilead and Bashan are distinguished).

5. A mountain abutting on the valley of Jezreel (Judg. 7:3; cf. v. 1 and ch. 6:33). While Gilead in this passage may be a misreading for Gilboa, it should be borne in mind that the LXX agrees with the Heb. text in this name. The spring of Harod beside which Gideon encamped is generally identified with 'Ain Jālūd, and the stream in the vale of Jezreel is now called Nahr Jālūd, in which may be an echo of Gilead. There is perhaps better evidence than the present name. Gilead was part of Naphtali (II Kings 15:29). It may be that Naphtali extended across the Jordan to the e., but it is quite possible that Gilead denoted a rugged district of Naphtali w. of the Jordan; and if so, the correctness of the text of Judg. 7:3 is confirmed.

6. A city in the region of Gilead (Hos. 6:8; cf. ch. 12:11).

Gil'-gal (gīl'gāl) [a circle, a cromlech].

1. The first encampment of the Israelites after crossing the Jordan, and their headquarters during the conquest of Canaan; 12 memorial stones taken from the bed of the river were erected here (Josh. 4:19-24). By a wordplay the name Gilgal (rolling) is connected with the rolling away of their reproach by their circumcision after long neglect of the ordinance in the wilderness (Josh. 5:7-9). The camp was pitched between the Jordan and Jericho, and on its site arose a town, which was on the n. border of Judah (ch. 15:7). It is uncertain whether this town or another place of the same name was on Samuel's circuit (I Sam. 7:16), and where, it may be inferred, Saul was made king and the kingdom renewed (ch. 11:15). At any rate, it was at Gilgal in the Jordan Valley where a muster of the people took place to form an army which should encounter the Philistines then oppressing the land, when Saul, finding it difficult to hold the people together until Samuel should come and offer sacrifice, himself offered burnt offerings (ch. 13:4-15). By this disobedience he forfeited the privilege of founding a dynasty (vs. 13, 14). There, too, for his obstinacy in sparing Agag he was rejected from being king and God's spirit withdrew from him (chs. 15:20-23; 16:14). To Gilgal the representatives of the tribe of Judah went to welcome David back after the death of Absalom (II Sam. 19:15, 40). Like other holy places it became a focus of idolatry under the kings who succeeded Jeroboam, and it was in consequence denounced by the prophets (Hos. 4:15; 9:15; 12:11; Amos 4:4; 5:5). It is probably the house of Gilgal or Beth-gilgal mentioned after the Captivity (Neh. 12:29). The site of Khirbet al-Athlah, near which is a pool called Birket Jiljūliyah, about 1½ miles e. of Jericho fulfills the requirements of Biblical data and tradition.

2. A village from which Elijah and Elisha went down to Beth-el (Deut. 11:30; II Kings 2:1-4; 4:38[?]). It was probably the present village of Jiljilia, 7 miles n. by w. of Beth-el.

3. A town associated with Dor and Tirzah (Josh. 12:23); probably Jiljūliyah, a little n. of the brook Kānah, and 5 miles n.e. by n. of Antipatris, on the edge of the plain of Sharon.

Gil'-loh (gī'lō) [probably for original Gīlōn]. A village in the hill country of Judah (Josh. 15:51); Khirbet Gāla, 1¼ miles w. of Beit Ummar and 5 miles n.n.w. of Hebron.

Gil'-nite (gī'lō-nīt). A native or inhabitant of Giloh, as Athithophel (II Sam. 15:12; 23:34).

Gim'-el (gīm'ēl) [camel]. The 3d letter of the Heb. alphabet, to which corresponds Gr. gamma; it is pronounced like Eng. g.

Gimel stands at the head of the 3d section of Psalm 119, since each verse of the section begins with this letter in the original.

Gim'-zo (gīm'zō) [abounding in sycamores; cf. Arab. jummatz, sycamore]. A town with dependent villages situated in Judah. It was taken by the Philistines during the reign of Ahaz (II Chron. 28:18); identified with Jimzu, on an eminence about 3 miles s.e. of Lydda.

Gin. A noose or trap, laid on the ground, in which birds, beasts, and even men are caught (Job 18:9; Amos 3:5). The 2 words môkêsh and pah, of which it is the translation, are usually rendered by snare.

Gi'nath (gî'nâth). Father of Tibni (I Kings 16:22).

Gi'n'e-tho'i (gî'n'é-thô'i), in A.V. Gi'n'e-tho (gî'n'é-thô) [gardener]. A chief of the priests who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Neh. 12:4, 7). In the next generation, a father's house among the priests, which occupies the same position in the corresponding catalogue, bore the name Ginnethon (v. 16). The difference is merely that between a yodh (y) and a final nun (n). Probably Ginnethon stood originally in v. 4.

Gi'n'e-thon (gî'n'é-thôn) [gardener]. 1. A father's house among the priests in the days of the high priest Joiakim (Neh. 12:16); see GINNETHOI.

2. A priest who, doubtless in behalf of a father's house, sealed a covenant to worship Jehovah (Neh. 10:6).

Gi'r'dle. See CLOTHING and HIGH PRIEST.

Gi'r'ga-shite (gûr'gâ-shit), in A.V. pl., but once Gi'r'ga-site (gûr'gâ-sit). A tribe of Canaan (Gen. 10:15, 16; 15:21; Deut. 7:1; Josh. 3:10; 24:11; Neh. 9:8). They must not be confounded with the Gergesenes.

Gi'r'zites (gûr'zîts); in A.V. Gez'rites, in marg. Giz'rites and Ger'zites respectively. A people living s. of the Philistine country and mentioned with the Amalekites and Geshurites (I Sam. 27:8).

Gish'pa (gîsh'pâ), in A.V. Gis'pa (gîs'pâ). An overseer of the Nethinim in Nehemiah's time (Neh. 11:21).

Git'tah-he'pher (gî't'â-hê'fêr). See GATH-HEPHER.

Git'ta'im (gî't'â'im) [perhaps, a dual, 2 wine presses]. A village of Benjamin (Neh. 11:31, 33), to which the Beerothites fled probably at the time of Saul's cruelty (II Sam. 4:3). Identified with Gametel of the Tell el-Amarna tablets and located at or near Ramleh.

Git'tite (gî't'it) [of Gath]. A native or inhabitant of Gath (II Sam. 6:10, 11; 15:18, 19, 22).

Git'tith (gî't'îth) [Gittite]. A musical term (Psalms 8; 81; 84, titles). It is the feminine form of the Heb. adjective for Gittite, and it denotes a musical instrument in use in Gath, or a vintage song to the tune of which the psalm should be sung, or a march of the Gittite guard (II Sam. 15:18).

Gi'zo-nite (gî'zô-nit). The designation of Hashem, one of David's mighty men (I Chron. 11:34), pointing either to his paternity or to his birthplace. But neither man nor place with a name like Gizoh is found in the Bible; and perhaps Gizonite is a corruption of Gunite (cf. Gennouni, text of Rahlfs LXX; cf. Num. 26:48).

Gi'zrite (gî'z'rit). See GIRZITE.

Glass. 1. A mirror (Ex. 38:8; Job 37:18; I Cor. 13:12, all A.V.); see MIRROR.

2. The rendering of Heb. zêkûkîth (Job 28:17, R.V., where A.V. has crystal) and of Gr. hyalos and its adjective (Rev. 4:6; 15:2; 21:18, 21). It is probably real glass. Glass was known to the Greeks as early as the time of Herodotus, and to the Egyptians long before the Exodus.

Glean'ing. Gathering the grain which the reapers have failed to remove, or the grapes which remain after the vintage (Judg. 8:2; Ruth 2:2, 16; Isa. 17:6). For the benefit of the poor, the fatherless, the widow, and the stranger, the owner was instructed by the Law not to glean his harvest field or vineyard, nor return for a forgotten sheaf, nor gather fallen fruit (Lev. 19:9, 10; 23:22; Deut. 24:19).

A Gleaner

Glede. The common kite (Deut. 14:13); the word used to render Heb. râ'âh, which is a copyist's error for dâ'âh; see DALETH. A later scribe seems to have written dayyâh on the marg. as a correction, which afterward crept into the text (for it is not mentioned in the corresponding list in Lev., ch. 11), and is rendered kite in R.V., vulture in A.V.

Gnat. The rendering of Gr. kônôps, a small insect (Matt. 23:24), abounding in marshes and vexatious by reason of its bite, from which the Egyptians protected themselves at night by sleeping under nets (Herod. ii. 95). It is evidently some species of Culex, a genus known by its hairy antennae, plumed in the males, its proboscis, its slender body, its 2 gauzy wings, its long legs, and its blood-sucking propensities. "To strain at" in the A.V. is a misprint in the original edition of 1611 for "strain out." The earlier Eng. versions have "out," and the R.V. corrects the error of A.V., and translates to "strain out the gnat, and swallow the camel." To strain out anxiously any small insect which has accidentally fallen into the water one is about to drink, but unconcernedly to swallow a camel, is to be particular about minute points of ceremony or of duty, while practicing gross violations of the moral law.

Goad. A long pole sharpened at the point or iron-tipped, used to urge cattle forward (I Sam. 13:21). With a goad Shamgar slew 600 Philistines (Judg. 3:31). "It is hard for thee to kick against the pricks" (Acts 9:5, A.V.) is the metaphor of a recalcitrant animal injuring itself against the oxgoad. The words of the wise are compared to goads (Eccl. 12:11).

Go'ah (gô'â), in A.V. Go'ath [lowing]. A place near Jerusalem to the w. or s. (Jer. 31:39).

Goat. The rendering of a number of Heb. words in the O.T., and of more than one Gr. word in the N.T.: 'attîd, he-goat, probably as leader of the flock; tayîsh, he-goat; sâphîr, he-goat, as the leaper; 'êz, she-goat, also a goat without regard to sex; šâ'îr, he-goat, and šêrâh, she-goat, as shaggy; and the Gr. words tragos, he-goat; aîx, goat; eriphos, goat, and eriphion, a young goat, kid. Goats were tended with the sheep by the same shepherd (Gen. 27:9; 30:32), but in separate companies (Matt. 25:32). Their hair was woven into cloth (Ex. 25:4; 35:26), the flesh and milk were used for food (Lev. 7:23; Deut. 14:4; Prov. 27:27), and in extremity their hairy skin served as clothing (Heb. 11:37). They were an important item of a cattle owner's wealth (Gen. 30:33, 43; 31:1; I Sam. 25:2; II Chron. 17:11). The goat was a sacrificial animal, used for burnt offering and sin offering (Gen. 15:9; Ex. 12:5; Lev. 1:10; 4:24; Num. 7:17; 15:27; Ezra 6:17; 8:35; Heb. 9:12). The domestic goat (Capra hircus) belongs to the great family of Bovidae, or hollow-horned ruminants. The closest affinity is believed to be to the sheep, and there is a series of connecting links between the 2 animals. One of the few points of difference is that in the goat the horns are simply curved backward. Their habits are different. In Palestine the sheep may be seen grazing the tender herbage and grass, while the goats browse tender twigs and leaves. Every flock of goats has its own stately leader (cf. Jer. 50:8). The goat was very abundant in ancient Palestine, as was to be expected in a hilly and somewhat dry country. The ordinary goat of Syria is black in color and has pendant ears a foot long hanging down below the recurved horns. It is Linnaeus' Capra mambrica. His Capra hircus, variety angorensis, the Mohair goat, is also occasionally bred in the n. of Palestine.

Goat, Wild. An animal, in Heb. yā'ēl, eminent. Its refuge is among the high hills (Ps. 104:18) and rocks (Job 39:1), En-gedi being its special haunt in Palestine (I Sam. 24:2). It is a species of ibex (Capra bedou), called by the Arabs badan (beden). It is of a much lighter color than the European ibex. Its horns are more slender and recurved, wrinkled, and knotted on the front face only. It is found in Egypt, Arabia, Persia, Moab, and in the wilderness of Judea near the Dead Sea. Tristram met with it twice at its favorite spot, En-gedi, and found its teeth fossil in cave breccia on Lebanon, where it does not now occur. Wild goat is also the rendering of Heb. 'akḥō (Deut. 14:5). It may be the same species.

Go'ath (gō'āth). See GOAH.

Gob (gōb) [Heb. gēb; Aram. gubbā; pit, cistern]. A place at which war was waged with the Philistines twice in the reign of David (II Sam. 21:18, 19). Site unknown. The text is uncertain. In I Chron. 20:4 the seat of war is Gezer.

God (gōd). The Eng. word God is derived from a root meaning to call, and indicates simply the object of worship, one whom men call upon or invoke. The Gr. word which it translates in the pages of the N.T., however, describes this object of worship as Spirit; and the O.T. Heb. word, which this word in turn represents, conveys, as its primary meaning, the idea of power. On Christian lips, therefore, the word God designates fundamentally the almighty Spirit who is worshipped and whose aid is invoked by men. This primary idea of God, in which is summed up what is known as theism, is the product of that general revelation which God makes of himself to all men, on the plane of nature. The truths involved in it are continually reiterated, enriched, and deepened in the Scriptures; but they are not so much revealed by them as presupposed at the foundation of the special revelation with which the Scriptures busy themselves—the great revelation of the grace of God to sinners. On the plane of nature men can learn only what God necessarily is, and what, by virtue of his essential attributes, he must do; a special communication from him is requisite to assure us what, in his infinite love, he will do for the recovery of sinners from their guilt and misery to the bliss of communion with him. And for the full revelation of this, his grace in the redemption of sinners, there was requisite an even more profound unveiling of the mode of his existence, by which he has been ultimately disclosed as including in the unity of his being a distinction of persons, by virtue of which it is the same God from whom, through whom, and by whom are all things, who is at once the Father who provides, the Son who accomplishes, and the Spirit who applies, redemption. Only in the uncovering of this supernal mystery of the Trinity is completed the revelation of what God is. That there is no hint of the Trinity in the general revelation made on the plane of nature is due to the fact that nature has nothing to say of redemption, in the process of which alone are the depths of the divine nature made known. That the Trinity is explicitly revealed only in the N.T., is due to the fact that not until the N.T. stage of revelation was reached was the redemption which was being prepared throughout the whole O.T. actually accomplished. That so ineffable a mystery was placed before the darkened mind of man at all is due to the necessities of the plan of redemption itself, which is rooted in the trinal distinction in the Godhead, and can be apprehended only on the basis of the Trinity in Unity.

The nature of God has been made known to men, therefore, in 3 stages, corresponding to the 3 planes of revelation, and we will naturally come to know him, first, as the infinite Spirit or the God of nature; then, as the Redeemer of sinners, or the God of grace; and lastly, as the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, or the Triune God.

I. God, the Infinite Spirit. The conviction of the existence of God bears the marks of an intuitive truth in so far as it is the universal and unavoidable belief of men, and is given in the very same act with the idea of self, which is known at once as dependent and responsible and thus implies one on whom it depends and to whom it is responsible. This immediate perception of God is confirmed and the contents of the idea developed by a series of arguments known as the "theistic proofs." These are derived from the necessity we are under of believing in the real existence of the infinitely perfect Being, of a sufficient cause for the contingent universe, of an intelligent author of the order and of the manifold contrivances observable in nature, and of a law-giver and judge for dependent moral beings, endowed with the sense of duty and an ineradicable feeling of responsibility, conscious of the moral contradictions of the world and craving a solution for them, and living under an intuitive perception of right which they do not see realized. The cogency of these proofs is currently recognized in the Scriptures, while they add to them the supernatural manifestations of God in a redemptive process, accompanied at every stage by miraculous attestation. From the theistic proofs, however, we learn not only that a God exists, but also necessarily, on the principle of a sufficient cause, very much of the nature of the God which they prove to exist. The idea is still further developed, on the principle of interpreting by the highest category within our reach, by our instinctive attribution to him, in an eminent degree, of all that is the source of dignity and excellence in ourselves. Thus we come to know God as a personal Spirit, infinite, eternal, and illimitable alike in his being and in the intelligence, sensibility, and will which belong to him as personal Spirit. The attributes which are thus ascribed to him, including self-existence, independence, unity, uniqueness, unchangeableness, omnipresence, infinite knowledge and wisdom, infinite freedom and power, infinite truth, righteousness, holiness and goodness, are not only recognized but richly illustrated in Scripture, which thus puts the seal of its special revelation upon all the details of the natural idea of God.

II. God, the Redeemer of Sinners. While reiterating the teaching of nature as to the existence and character of the personal Creator and Lord of all, the Scriptures lay their stress upon the grace or the undeserved love of God, as exhibited in his dealings with his sinful and wrath-deserving creatures. So little, however, is the consummate divine attribute of love advanced, in the Scriptural revelation, at the expense of the other moral attributes of God, that it is thrown into prominence only upon a background of the strongest assertion and fullest manifestation of its companion attributes, especially of the divine righteousness and holiness, and is exhibited as acting only along with and in entire harmony with them. God is not represented in the Scriptures as forgiving sin because he really cares very little about sin; nor yet because he is so exclusively or predominatingly the God of love that all other attributes shrink into desuetude in the presence of his illimitable benevolence. He is rather represented as moved to deliver sinful man from his guilt and pollution because he pities the creatures of his hand, immersed in sin, with an intensity that is born of the vehemence of his holy abhorrence of sin and his righteous determination to visit it with intolerable retribution; and by a mode which brings as complete satisfaction to his infinite justice and holiness as to his unbounded love itself. The Biblical presentation of the God of grace includes thus the richest development of all his moral attributes, and the God of the Bible is consequently set forth, in the completeness of that idea, as above everything else the ethical God. And that is as much as to say that there is ascribed to him a moral sense so sensitive and true that it estimates with un-failing accuracy the exact moral character of every person or deed presented for its contemplation, and responds to it with the precisely appropriate degree of satisfaction or reprobation. The infinitude of his love is exhibited to us precisely in that while we were yet sinners he loved us, though with all the force of his infinite nature he reacted against our sin with illimitable abhorrence and indignation. The mystery of grace resides just in the impulse of a sin-hating God to show mercy to such guilty wretches; and the supreme revelation of God as the God of holy love is made in the disclosure of the mode of his procedure in redemption, by which alone he might remain just while justifying the ungodly. For in this procedure there was involved the mighty paradox of the infinitely just Judge himself becoming the sinner's substitute before his own law and the infinitely blessed God receiving in his own person the penalty of sin.

III. God, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. The elements of the plan of salvation are rooted in the mysterious nature of the Godhead, in which there coexists a trinal distinction of persons with absolute unity of essence; and the revelation of the Trinity was accordingly incidental to the execution of this plan of salvation, in which the Father sent the Son to be the propitiation for sin, and the Son, when he returned to the glory which he had with the Father before the world was, sent the Spirit to apply his redemption to men. The disclosure of this fundamental fact of the divine nature, therefore, lagged until the time had arrived for the actual working out of the long-promised redemption; and it was accomplished first of all in fact rather than in word, by the actual appearance of God the Son on earth and the subsequent manifestations of the Spirit, who was sent forth to act as his representative in his absence. At the very beginning of Christ's ministry the 3 persons are dramatically exhibited to our sight in the act of his baptism. And though there is no single passage in Scripture in which all the details of this great mystery are gathered up and expounded, there do not lack passages in which the 3 persons are brought together in a manner which exhibits at once their unity and distinctness. The most prominent of these are perhaps the formula of baptism in the triune name, put into the mouths of his followers by the resurrected Lord (Matt. 28:19), and the apostolic benediction in which a divine blessing is invoked from each person in turn (II Cor. 13:14). The essential elements that enter into and together make up this great revelation of the Triune God are, however, most commonly separately insisted upon. The chief of these are the 3 constitutive facts: (1) that there is but one God (Deut. 6:4; Isa. 44:6; I Cor. 8:4; James 2:19); (2) that the Father is God (Matt. 11:25; John 6:27; 8:41; Rom. 15:6; I Cor. 8:6; Gal. 1:1, 3, 4; Eph. 4:6; 6:23; I Thess. 1:1; James 1:27; 3:9; I Peter 1:2; Jude 1); the Son is God (John 1:1, 18; 20:28; Acts 20:28; Rom. 9:5; Heb. 1:8; Col. 2:9; Phil. 2:6; I Peter 1:1); and the Spirit is God (Acts 5:3, 4; I Cor. 2:10, 11; Eph. 2:22); and (3) that the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost are personally distinct from one another, distinguished by personal pronouns, able to send and be sent by one another, to love and honor each the other, and the like (John 15:26; 16:13, 14; 17:8, 18, 23; 16:14; 17:1). The doctrine of the Trinity is but the synthesis of these facts, and, adding nothing to them, simply recognizes in the unity of the Godhead such a Trinity of persons as is involved in the working out of the plan of redemption. In the prosecution of this work there is implicated a certain relative subordination in the modes of operation of the several persons, by which it is the Father that sends the Son and the Son who sends the Spirit; but the three persons are uniformly represented in Scripture as in their essential nature each alike God over all, blessed forever (Rom. 9:5); and we are therefore to conceive the subordination as rather economical, i.e., relative to the function of each in the work of redemption, than essential, i.e., involving a difference in nature.

B. B. W.

Gog (gōg). 1. A Reubenite (I Chron. 5:4).

2. The prince of Rosh, Meshech, and Tubal (Ezek. 38:2, R.V.), who is prophetically described as invading the land of Israel in the last times, and being defeated on the mountains with immense slaughter (Ezek., chs. 38; 39). He and his people and his allies serve the prophet as a type of heathenism contending against the Kingdom of God. The name may have been taken from Gyges, the chief of a Lydian princely family called the Mermnadae; he is called Gūgu by Ashurbanipal. He belonged to the royal bodyguard and was the confidant of the king. About 700 B.C. he murdered his sovereign, of the rival house of the Heraclidae, and took possession of the throne of Lydia. He had great wealth and made notable gifts to the temple of Apollo at Delphi. But he warred against the Greek cities in Asia Minor (Herod. 1. 7-15). In his old age his country was invaded by the Cimmerians. He defeated them in battle and captured several of their chiefs. But fearing renewed invasion, he sent presents to Ashurbanipal, the Assyrian king. For a long time no one could be found among the Assyrians who understood the Lydian language spoken by the ambassadors. At length a man was obtained who comprehended what they said, and the friendship of Gyges was accepted. In a short time, however, Gyges aided Egypt in its revolt against Assyria. In retaliation the Assyrian king stirred up the Cimmerians to a fresh invasion of Lydia, in which, about 662 B.C., Gyges was killed, leaving his son Ardys to ascend the throne. See GOMER, II, and MAGOG.

3. A mystic personage, akin in character to the Gog of Ezekiel, to appear immediately before the close of the present dispensation (Rev. 20:8-15).

Goi'im (goi'im) [gōyīm, nations, Gentiles]. Generally identified with Gutium, modern Kurdistan. See TIDAL.

Go'lan (gō'lān) [cf. Arab. jaul, coast, side; jaulān, dust and sand; jawabān, going around, traveling through]. A city of Bashan, within the territory of the half-tribe of Manasseh e. of the Jordan. It was assigned, with its suburbs, to the Gershonite Levites (Josh. 21:27; I Chron. 6:71), and was one of the cities of refuge (Deut. 4:43; Josh. 20:8; 21:27). Alexander Jannaeus sustained a severe defeat near this place, and on a later campaign demolished the town (Jos. War I. 4, 4 and 8). The town gave name to the small province of Gaulanitis, or Gaulonitis, as the name was also pronounced (Jos. Antiq. viii. 2, 3, various Gr. texts). This region was situated between Hermon and the Yarmuk, and extended from the neighborhood of the Jordan e. The e. border has not been determined. The district is divisible into a southern and more arable, and a northern and more rocky half. It was surveyed by Schumacher, who with other authorities considers that the site of the town was at Sahem el-Jaulān, about 17 miles e. of the Sea of Galilee, where there are extensive ruins. Gaulonitis is now known as Jaulān. It is a tableland watered by streams from Hermon and by numerous springs, and with pastures which are among the richest in Syria; yet it lies desolate.

Gold. A precious metal anciently obtained in Havilah (Gen. 2:11, 12); Sheba (I Kings 10:2; Ps. 72:15); and Ophir (I Kings 22:48; II Chron. 8:18). It was lavishly used for overlaying the furniture of the tabernacle and the Temple, and ornamenting the latter edifice itself (Ex. 25:18; I Kings 6:22, 28). It was made into idols (Ex. 20:23; 32:31; Isa. 40:19; Acts 17:29), crowns (Ps. 21:3), chains (Gen. 41:42), rings (S. of Sol. 5:14), earrings (Judg. 8:26). It was used for coinage at a comparatively early date (Ezra 2:69, R.V.; cf. Acts 3:6; 20:33). It serves as a symbol for a thing of genuine worth and great value (Lam. 4:2; Rev. 3:18).

Gol'go'tha (gōl'gō-thā) [Gr. from Aram. gul'gultā; cf. Heb. gul'gōlē, skull]. See CALVARY.

Go-li'ath (gō-li'āth) [exile, or an exile]. The giant from the Philistine city of Gath who was slain by David (I Sam., chs. 17; 21:9, 10); probably one of the Anakim (cf. Num. 13:33; Josh. 11:22). Perhaps another giant of Gath, besides the one slain by David, bore the name of Goliath (II Sam. 21:19; cf. I Chron. 20:5). See ELHANAN.

Go'mer, I (gō'mēr) [perhaps, (God) accomplishes (it), i.e., the birth of a child]. Daughter of Diblaim and wife of Hosea the prophet (Hos. 1:3).

Go'mer, II (gō'mēr). A people descended from Japheth, and inhabiting the n. (Gen.

10:2, 3; I Chron. 1:5, 6; Ezek. 38:6); probably the Cimmerians of classical history, mentioned by Homer as people of the far n. (Odyssey xi. 14). They came into Asia from the regions beyond the Caucasus (Herod. iv. 11, 12), settled in Cappadocia, and threatened the Assyrian empire, but were defeated by Esarhaddon. Turning w., they overran part of Asia Minor, fighting more than one battle with Gyges, king of Lydia, whom they killed and whose name is probably preserved in the Scripture Gog. They were afterward driven out of Asia (Lydia) by Alyattes (Herod. i. 16).

Go-mor'rah (gō-mōr'ā), in A.V. of N.T. Go-mor'ra (gō-mōr'ā) [submersion; cf. Arab. ghamara, to overflow]. A city in the plain of the Jordan (Gen. 10:19; 13:10). Like Sodom its king was defeated by Chedorlaomer and his allies and the city plundered (ch. 14:8-11). Soon afterward it was destroyed by fire from heaven on account of wickedness (Gen. 18:20; 19:24-28; Deut. 29:23; Isa. 1:9; Amos 4:11; Jer. 23:14; 49:18; Zeph. 2:9; Matt. 10:15). Various locations have been proposed, but by many scholars the site of Gomorrah is supposed to be submerged by the waters of the Dead Sea. Some would accordingly place it on the s.e. shore, s. of the Lisān, probably in the region of the mouth of the wadi el-Esāl.

For the vine of the fields of Gomorrah (Deut. 32:32), see VINE of SODOM.

Go'pher Wood. The wood of which the ark was made (Gen. 6:14). The view that Heb. gōpher is related to Heb. kōpher, Akkad. kupru, Arab. kufri, pitch, suggests trees of the pine family, perhaps the cypress.

Gorg'ias (gōr'jī-ās). A Syrian general under Antiochus IV. In 166 B.C. he led a detachment of troops from Emmaus, in the Philistine plain, where the main army was encamped, to make a night attack on Judas Maccabaeus; but Judas, having learned of the plan, withdrew his forces and led them to a successful attack on Gorgias' own camp. When Gorgias returned, his followers saw their camp in flames and fled (I Macc. 3:38 to 4:25). A little more than a year later Gorgias was commanding at Jamnia, and he met and defeated Joseph and Azarias, who in the absence of Judas had charge of the troops in Judea, and were advancing to attack the town (ch. 5:55-62).

Gorty'na (gōr-tī'nā). An important city in the southern part of Crete (I Macc. 15:23).

Go'shen (gō'shēn) [probably, mound of earth]. 1. A district of Egypt, adapted for flocks and herds, situated in the delta, a few miles to n.e. of On. It belonged to the nome called Arabia (Gen. 46:34, LXX), and formed part of the land of Ramesses (Gen. 46:28; 47:11, 27, LXX). Thither Joseph went up in his chariot to meet his father who was coming from Canaan (ch. 46:28, 29). The Hebrews were allowed to settle there (ch. 47:6), and the mass of the people were still there at the time of their oppression (Ex. 8:22).

2. A region in the s. of Judah (Josh. 10:41; 11:16); name probably derived from following (3).

3. A town in the hill country of Judah (Josh. 15:51); Dāhariyeh corresponds to this location.

Gos'pel. The Eng. word gospel is derived from Anglo-Saxon gōd-spell, good tidings. Later it was interpreted as godspell, godspel, meaning God-story, i.e., the story about God, i.e., Christ. The word as now used describes both the message which Christianity announces and the books in which the story of Christ's life and teaching is contained. A similar transition in meaning was experienced by the Gr. euangelion (whence Lat. euangelium and our evangel) rendered gospel (good tidings). In the N.T. it never means a book, as it may in English, but the message or "good tidings" which Christ and his apostles announced. It is called the gospel of God (Rom. 1:1; 1 Thess. 2:2, 9; 1 Tim. 1:11); the gospel of Christ (Mark 1:1; Rom. 1:16; 15:19; 1 Cor. 9:12, 18; Gal. 1:7); the gospel of the grace of God (Acts 20:24); the gospel of peace (Eph. 6:15); the gospel of your salvation (Eph. 1:13); and the glorious gospel (II Cor. 4:4). It was preached by our Lord (Matt. 4:23; 11:5; Mark 1:14; Luke 4:18; 7:22) and called the gospel of the Kingdom; it was also preached by the apostles (Acts 16:10; Rom. 1:15; 2:16; 1 Cor. 9:16), and by evangelists (Acts 8:25). But in the Post-apostolic Age (c. A.D. 150, Justin Martyr, Apol. i. 66) the term was also applied to the writings in which the apostolic testimony to Jesus was contained. Each one of them was called a gospel and likewise the 4 together were called the gospel. Our present English usage, therefore, exactly corresponds with that of the early Christians of the age immediately succeeding the Apostolic.

The Four Gospels. Historical evidence shows that our 4 Gospels have been attributed from the earliest times to Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, respectively, and that from the very beginning of the post-Apostolic Age they were received by the Church as authoritative documents and as containing the apostolic testimony to the life and teachings of Christ. In the 2d century they were quoted, commented upon, and described; so that there need be no doubt of their authenticity. An examination of the N.T. epistles also shows that our Gospels describe Jesus as the same kind of person, doing the same kind of works, and having the same history to which the epistles allude. They may, therefore, be confidently accepted as trustworthy reports.

The first 3 have much in common and, in general, present the life of the Lord from the same point of view. They are called the Synoptic Gospels (from Gr. synopsis, a seeing together), and in particular are quite different from John's. The Synoptics take for their chief theme Christ's ministry in Galilee; the Fourth Gospel gives prominence to his labors in Judea; though his betrayal, arrest, trial, crucifixion, and resurrection are so important that they are narrated by all. The only prior incident recorded by all the Evangelists is the feeding of five thousand. The Synoptics also say comparatively little, in so many words, of the divinity of Christ, while John especially records the Lord's self-testimony to it. They present mainly Christ's teaching about the Kingdom of God, his parables, his instruction of the common people; while John records his teaching about himself and this usually in the form of extended discourses. At the same time the Fourth Gospel assumes and implies the other 3, while they in turn are often made intelligible only by the facts which John records. Thus John 1:15 implies the fact recorded in Matt. 3:11, etc.; John 3:24 the fact given in Matt. 4:12; John, chs. 6:1 to 7:9, the whole Synoptic story of the Galilean ministry, etc. So in turn Christ's reception in Galilee and the willingness of Peter, Andrew, James, and John to leave all and follow him are only explicable by such events as are recorded in John, chs. 1 and 2; and the sudden rise of the Sabbath controversy in the Synoptics (see Mark 2:23, etc.) is likewise to be explained by the events of John, ch. 5.

Moreover, while the Synoptics have the same general point of view, each has its individual characteristics, determined by the writer's purpose and the readers whom he had in mind. Matthew, writing from the Jewish point of view, sets Jesus forth as the royal Messiah. He constantly cites in proof O.T. prophecies, and is interested to give Christ's teaching concerning the true Kingdom of God in contrast to the false views of current Judaism. Mark, writing evidently for Gentiles, and possibly for the Romans in particular, represents mainly Christ's power to save as shown in his miracles. Luke, long the companion of Paul, sets the Lord forth as the gracious Saviour, and is fond of exhibiting his favor to the fallen, the outcast, and the poor. So John has his special purpose, which is to represent Jesus as the incarnate, divine Word, revealing the Father to those who would receive him. None of the Gospels, however, aims at being a complete biography of our Lord. They are collections of his acts and words, made for the purpose of practical and doctrinal instruction. The student must construct his conception of the history of Jesus out of the materials furnished by the Gospels. They themselves were prepared with other objects in view (John 20:30, 31; cf. ch. 21:25).

The question has often been asked from what sources the 4 Evangelists derived their information. Matthew and John were apostles and therefore possessed personal knowledge of the events they record or were in a position to obtain it from those who had it. But Mark also was a companion of Paul and Peter, and is said, by very early tradition, to have embodied in his Gospel the preaching of Peter about Jesus. Luke himself assures us (ch. 1:1-4) that his knowledge was obtained from "eyewitnesses . . . of the word" and that he had made himself well acquainted with the facts. Thus the Gospels give us the testimony of the apostles. The many coincidences of language in the Synoptics confirm this. If any itinerant speaker or preacher, such as a foreign missionary home on furlough, relates at different places incidents of his experience abroad, he gradually settles into a fixed narrative through his very desire to be accurate, repeating the same stories in the same form, though now and then adding particulars which he had omitted elsewhere. It is probable that the apostles and early evangelists acted in much the same way; so that their recital became largely stereotyped. After a while parts of this narrative were put into writing for use in the newly founded churches. Thus a gospel narrative became current which, while doubtless differing in extent in different places, had much of its matter, even to the very words, in common. The verbal coincidences, therefore, of our Synoptic Gospels attest that they give us the common apostolic testimony to Jesus. The Fourth Gospel, on the other hand, contains material which at first was not so widely called for, but which John finally wrote, out of his own knowledge, when the needs of the Church seemed to demand it.

The coincidences between the Synoptics have raised, however, the further question whether any of them have directly utilized the material in the others. This question is often called the Synoptic problem. The facts which enter into its solution are very many and complex. While the 3 have much in common, Matthew and Luke have much that is not in Mark, and each of the 3 has much that is not in the others. Moreover, even in the sections which are in common the language of one Evangelist often differs as remarkably as in other points it agrees with that of his colleagues.

Many modern writers think that Matthew and Luke drew from Mark his historical narnative, making its language fundamental to their own account, arranging its material to conform to their own purposes in writing, and adding matter from other sources oral and written. In support of this view they point to the following facts: 1. There is very little in Mark apart from details that is not in Matthew or in Luke. 2. When Mark and Luke differ in order, Matthew agrees with Mark; but when Mark and Matthew differ in order, Luke agrees with Mark. 3. Matthew and Luke never agree in order against Mark; this seems to indicate that Matthew and Luke are in some way dependent upon Mark. And it is quite customary to combine with this explanation the theory that a collection of the sayings of Jesus early existed, from which also the 2 Evangelists Matthew and Luke drew. Scholars designate this collection of sayings by the symbol Q and call the theory that Matthew and Luke depended upon Mark and Q the two-document hypothesis. A further development is the four-document hypothesis, which holds that Matthew depended upon Mark, Q, and a special document, M; and that our Gospel of Luke can be traced to Mark and Proto-Luke (i.e., an earlier edition of Luke made from Q and a special source, L).

These theories concern themselves with literary criticism; a new method of investigating the N.T., form criticism (in German called Formgeschichte), seeks to go behind the written Gospels to a period of oral tradition. It is supposed that the various units which later were woven into documents were circulated for a while by word of mouth. The form critics classify these assumed units according to their form, such as pronouncement stories (e.g., Mark 3:31-35), miracle stories, parables, stories about Jesus, etc.; they suppose that the preservation and inevitable modification of these separate and self-contained fragments were secured by the practical needs and interests of the earliest communities and preachers. Not a few form critics would hold that the framework of chronological and geographical details represents a later accretion imposed upon the detached incidents and sayings. Many advocates of this method of Gospel criticism, however, overemphasize the part played by the Christian community and its leaders in originating and formulating oral tradition. Too often form critics disregard the very real factors that tended to preserve faithfully the reports of our Lord's sayings and of the events of his life.

Papias (early 2d century) says that Matthew wrote the logia (discourses, oracles, which may mean Gospel) in Heb. (i.e., Aram.). Various scholars (e.g., C. F. Burney and J. A. Montgomery) have suggested an Aram. origin of the Gospels, but the most complete presentation of this theory has been worked out by C. C. Torrey (The Four Gospels, A New Translation, 1933), who maintains that the Aramaisms in the Gospels and the first half of The Acts are not due to bilingual authors who thought in Aram. and wrote barbarous Gr., but that they are due to translations from Aram. documents no longer extant. He believes that accounts of the life, words, and works of Christ were put into writing almost immediately after the crucifixion (cf. Luke 1:1, 2). According to this theory, everything in the Gospels could have been written within 20 years of the death of Jesus, and the 4 were probably written before A.D. 70. Accordingly Mark in Aram. is dated A.D. 40. Q is believed to be an Aram. document. Matthew, who depends upon Mark, its sources, and other material, is dated slightly later. Next, somewhat earlier than Luke, comes John, who was acquainted with the Aram. sources of Matthew and Mark, if not with their actual Gospels. Luke, c. A.D. 60, used a Heb. narrative of the Nativity and infancy of Jesus and Aram. sources. According to this theory, the translator of Matthew had access to the Gr. Mark. Luke, who apparently was his own translator, had at hand the Gr. of the first 2 Gospels.

With the exception of Luke, chs. 1; 2, and John, ch. 21, the Aram. idiom is everywhere present in the Gospels; various difficulties can be clarified by turning the Gr. into Aram., and in many cases the interpretation of a word or passage is simplified by considering the meaning of the supposed Aram. original. Jesus and his disciples spoke Aram., and the Gospels reflect the atmosphere of Palestine.

To the literary critics this theory of the Aram. origins is revolutionary. Yet it is a refreshing contribution to N.T. studies, because it is based on sound philology and does not lead into the involved study of interior sources or documents. While it definitely throws light upon difficult passages, it has a special merit in projecting the written sources to a period very close to the time of our Lord and thus supporting the impression of authenticity and, by inference, the trustworthiness of the records.

In attempting to trace the history of the Synoptics we should not forget the promise made by Christ to the apostles, and meant doubtless for others who might be employed in the proclamation of the gospel. "But the Comforter, even the Holy Spirit, whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things, and bring to your remembrance all that I said unto you" (John 14:26, R.V.).

To obtain a clear idea of the life of Christ it is necessary to construct a harmony of the Gospels. This, of course, should be done with fidelity to the chronological indications, few though they are, which the Gospels contain. But it should also be remembered that the indications of time and relation are not only few, but also often doubtful of interpretation, and that, therefore, a harmony must be regarded in many points as merely approximate. Matthew's method is mainly topical, and, therefore, he seldom provides a basis for a harmony. Mark appears to be much more chronological, and his order may generally be followed; but there is much that he does not give at all. Luke follows in the 1st half of his work nearly the order of Mark, though with important differences, and he, too, is often topical in his method. But John's Gospel, by noting successive feasts which Jesus attended, provides the general framework into which the other material should be fitted. It is on this basis that the following outline and harmony have been prepared: We believe that the feast of John 5:1 was a passover; that therefore Christ's ministry included 4 passovers (John 2:13; 5:1; 6:4; 13:1), at the last of which he died. The ministry was thus three and a quarter years in length, since John, ch. 1, shows that Christ was baptized a few months before his 1st passover. Others however, denying that John 5:1 was a passover, make the ministry two and a quarter years in length. On this, as on many similar points, absolute demonstration is impossible. In the following table, moreover, the dates assigned to some of the events must likewise be regarded as open to question. It appears clear to most scholars that Herod the Great died about April 1, 4 B.C. If so, Christ was probably born in December, 5 B.C., or January, 4 B.C. We assume the date to be December 25, 5 B.C., without, however, meaning to affirm that there is any evidence for the exact day of the month. If then, when he was baptized, he was about 30

(Luke 3:23), his baptism is probably to be assigned to the latter part of A.D. 26 or the beginning of A.D. 27. We assume for it January A.D. 27. If his ministry included 4 pass-overs, he died at the passover of A.D. 30. Many complex calculations tend to confirm these dates, though they are not capable of perfect demonstration. Our view assumes that "the fifteenth year of Tiberius Caesar" (Luke 3:1) is to be dated from the time when Tiberius became coregent with Augustus in the empire (A.D. 11-12). At that time he became in the provinces the practical ruler. It is well known that our common Christian calendar dates the birth of Christ too late. See JESUS CHRIST.

Gourd. The rendering of Heb. kikāyōn in Jonah 4:6-10, the marg. of R.V. substituting Palma Christi. The plant so designated grew up in a night, sheltering the Prophet Jonah from the fierce heat of the sun; but its decay was as rapid as its growth. The LXX translates the Heb. by Gr. kolokythē, meaning the pumpkin (Cucurbita pepo), which may be considered the type of the gourd family (Cucurbitaceae). A native of Astrakhan, along the n.w. coast of the Caspian Sea, it may well have been introduced into the Ninevite region before the time of Jonah. It is in favor of the identification that it is a plant of rapid growth. But the Heb. kikāyōn is very like the Greco-Egyptian kiki, which means the castor-oil plant (Ricinus communis), sometimes called Palma Christi (Christ's palm). It is not, however, a palm, but a euphorbiaceous plant, like the little milky weeds called spurge. It is a native of India, but was cultivated in s. Asia and Egypt (Herod. ii. 94). It attains a height of from 8 to 10 feet, growing to a considerable height in a few days. The stem is purplish-red and covered with a pearl-like bloom, the leaves are peltate and palmate, the flowers are in racemes, the seed vessel has 3 two-valved cells, each one-seeded. If this was the plant which shaded Jonah, its rapid growth was miraculous.

Gourd, Wild. The rendering of Heb. pakhū'ōth, splitters, bursters (II Kings 4:39). It is the fruit of a wild plant growing in Palestine which flourishes when other vegetation is dead or dying through excessive drought. A son of the prophets gathered a lapful of the gourds near Jericho and put them into a pot to be cooked, but the moment the pottage of which they constituted the chief ingredient was put to the mouth the taste betrayed that there was death in the pot; in other words, the fruit was poisonous (II Kings 4:38-41). The plant was pretty clearly one or other of 2 species of the gourd order, the colocynth, or the squirting cucumber, probably the former. The colocynth (Citrullus colocynthis) is a prostrate gourd-like vine with tendrils; in Palestine it is wild on the maritime plain and in the Jordan Valley. It bears gourds which are 3 or more inches in diameter. If the traveler plucks the smooth gourdlike fruits and cuts them across with his penknife, he will find that they both look and smell like the cucumber. If he puts them to his lips, he will feel as if he had touched fire. The colocynth is a cathartic and is a valuable but dangerous medicine. The other claimant, the squirting cucumber (Ecballium elaterium) is a stiff and upright plant and has no tendrils; it bears little gourds, 1½ to 2 inches long, which when ripe fall suddenly when touched or shaken. Then the bitter irritating juice is squirted out and the seeds are thrown all around. It is a drastic cathartic. The squirting cucumber grows in waste places and by the roadside throughout Palestine, and its unfitness for food would probably be known to the young companion of Elisha.

Gov'er-nor. One who governs a land by authority of a supreme ruler to whom he is subordinate. Joseph when prime minister of Egypt was called its governor (Gen. 42:6; 45:26). When Nebuchadnezzar, after capturing Jerusalem, departed, he left a governor, Gedaliah, behind to rule the conquered people (Jer. 40:5; 41:2, etc.). After the Captivity, the Israelites were ruled by Persian governors: Zerubbabel, Nehemiah, and others, though Jews by birth, were Persian officials (Neh. 5:14, 18; Hag. 1:14). Pontius Pilate was governor of Judea when our Lord was crucified, and is so called (Matt. 28:14), though his specific Roman title was procurator (q.v.).

For governor of a feast, see RULER.

Go'zan (gō'zān). A town and district in Mesopotamia on the river Habor, or Khabur (II Kings 17:6; 18:11; 19:12; I Chron. 5:26; cf. Isa. 37:12). Gozan was called Guzanu by the Assyrians and is the Gauzanitis of Ptolemy, a province of Mesopotamia, on the upper reaches of the Khabur River, and along the s. slopes of Mount Masius. Ptolemy mentions a town of Media called Gauzania in its vicinity.

Grape. See VINE.

Grass. A plant belonging to the endogenous order Graminaceae, of which the ordinary grasses of the fields, or the cultivated cereals, may be considered as typical representatives. Popularly, the term grass is extended to many other endogenous plants, and even to various exogens, especially those possessing linear leaves. In Gen. 1:11, 12 the vegetable kingdom is divided into 3 great classes: grass, herbs, and trees. The word grass is used in a more limited sense when man's brief life on earth is compared to grass, which in the morning flourishes and in the evening is cut down and withers (Ps. 103:15, 16; cf. also Ps. 37:2; 90:5, 6; 92:7; 102:11; Isa. 41:6; Matt. 6:30; Luke 12:28).

Grass'hop'per. 1. The rendering of Heb. 'arbeh, the numerous or gregarious, in A.V. of Judg. 6:5; 7:12; Job 39:20; Jer. 46:23. It is undoubtedly the migratory locust, as the R.V. makes it, and as even the A.V. has it in Ex. 10:4; Joel 1:4. See LOCUST.

2. The rendering of Heb. hāgāb in Lev. 11:22; Num. 13:33; Eccl. 12:5; Isa. 40:22. It is very small (Num. 13:33) and voracious (II Chron. 7:13, locust). It perhaps derived its name from its covering the ground or hiding the sun. In Lev. 11:22, R.V. marg., it is admitted that it is unknown whether the animal was a grasshopper or a locust. The grasshopper family, now called Acrididae, consists of leaping orthopterous insects, with four-jointed tarsi, wing cases in repose placed like the two sloping sides of a roof, and long, tapering antennae. The type is the great English grasshopper (Locusta viridissima).

3. The rendering of Heb. gōb and gōbay, creeper from the earth (Nahum 3:17). It devours the grass (Amos 7:1, R.V., locust). It was probably an insect of the locust family; but of which species is unknown.

Grave. The cavity in the ground in which a body is interred. The Jews were sometimes buried in graves dug in the earth (Tobit 8:9, 18), but more commonly in caves scooped out in rocks or naturally existing (Gen. 23:9; Matt. 27:60; John 11:38). See SEPULCHER.

Grav'en Im'age. An image of wood, stone, or metal fashioned by means of a sharp cutting instrument as distinguished from one cast in a mold (Isa. 30:22; 44:16, 17; 45:20; cf. Hab. 2:18, 19). Sometimes, however, the image was first cast and then finished by the graver (Isa. 40:19; 44:10). Graven images were in use among the Canaanites before the Israelites entered the country (Deut. 7:5; 12:3). They were also used in Babylon and elsewhere (Jer. 50:38; 51:47, 52). The Second Commandment expressly forbade the people of God to make them (Ex. 20:4; Deut. 5:8; cf. also Lev. 26:1; Deut. 27:15; Isa. 44:9; Jer. 10:14; 51:17).

Graves. See ARMOR.

Gre'cians (grē'shānz). 1. The people of Greece (Joel 3:6).

2. Jews who spoke Greek as distinguished from those who used Aramaic, which in N.T. times was popularly called by the Jews Hebrew (Acts 6:1; 9:29, in R.V. Grecian Jews; cf. ch. 11:20, A.V. and R.V. marg.). See HELLENIST.

Greece (grēs), in A.V. of Daniel Gre'cia (grē'shī-ā) [Lat. Graecia, from Graeci, from Gr. Grakoi, an old name of a tribe in Epirus. The Greeks called their land Hellas and themselves, usually, Hellēnes]. A small but highly celebrated country in the s.e. of Europe. Its n. limit was never perfectly defined; it may, however, be placed at the Olympian chain of mountains. On the s. it was bounded by the Mediterranean; on the e. by the Aegean Sea; and on the w. by the Ionian Sea and the Adriatic Sea. Its position during the time when the Mediterranean was the highway of civilization gave it unequalled advantages.

The authentic history of Greece with its first written records dates from the first Olympiad, 776 B.C. Previous to that time, and including the period known as the heroic age, history is so mingled with legend that it is difficult to separate truth from myth. It seems certain, however, that the Greeks were descended from 4 tribes, which in turn claimed descent from a common ancestor, Hellen. Of these tribes, the Aeolians and the Achaeans played a prominent part during the heroic age, Homer sometimes speaking of the whole Greek people as Achaeans. The other 2 tribes, the Dorians and the Ionians, became more important in historic times, the Athenians and the Spartans being descended from them respectively.

The early historic period, from 776 to 500 B.C., may be regarded as a period of individual growth by the different states comprising the nation. These states were theoretically independent of one another, but were united by a common language and literature, by national games, and a general national development. There were also frequent though changing political alliances. During this period the foundations of Grecian architecture, art, literature, and philosophy were laid. Greece was early within the geographical knowledge of the Hebrews, who called it Javan, that is, Ionia (Gen. 10:4); but it was known merely as a country at the ends of the earth (Isa. 66:19; Ezek. 27:13; Joel 3:6).

About the year 500 B.C. Greece came into prominent notice on account of her struggle with Persia, at that time the great world power. As early as 546 Cyrus captured Sardis, the capital of Lydia. The fall of this city was followed by the subjection of the Greek cities of Asia to the Persian yoke. The Hellespont was crossed by the Persians in the reign of Darius, and Macedonia submitted in 510. But the Greek cities of Asia rose and maintained determined revolt against their conquerors during the years 500 to 495; and the Greeks of Europe defeated the Persians at Marathon in 490, and, after suffering reverses at Thermopylae, inflicted crushing defeats upon them at Salamis in 480, and at Plataea and Mycale in 479. The struggle with Persia resulted in drawing the entire nation together under the leadership of one state. The first state to attain this supremacy was Athens. After the Persian wars she held the leadership from 479 to 431 B.C. Then followed the Peloponnesian War (431-404 B.C.), which began in a quarrel between Corinth and her colonies, but finally drew into the struggle the whole naval and military strength of Greece; it was led on one side by Sparta and on the other by Athens. The war resulted in the downfall of the Athenian power and the period of Spartan supremacy (404-371 B.C.). There followed in turn the Theban supremacy, which lasted until 362 B.C. Finally (338) all Greece fell under the power of Philip of Macedon, and became thenceforth a part of the Macedonian empire.

It is under the rule of Alexander the Great that Greece comes into direct contact for the first time with Judea. On his march to Persia Alexander passed through Judea, which fell into his hands without a struggle. See ALEXANDER 1. From this time Greek influence spread rapidly and took firm hold in the countries situated around the e. end of the Mediterranean Sea; this is the Hellenistic period. Even after the Roman conquest the influence of the Greek language, culture, and philosophy remained paramount, and even influenced the Jewish religion itself. In the time of Christ the Greek language was spoken throughout the civilized world. After the death of Alexander, his empire fell into the hands of his generals, who parceled it out among themselves. At first Greece proper was held in the name of his infant son, but soon he, as well as all members of Alexander's family, were put to death, and the country became the prey of anyone strong enough to take it, until it finally fell under the dominion of Rome. The last struggle against Rome resulted in the destruction of Corinth under Mummius, 146 B.C. Now Greece was annexed to Macedonia, but later it was declared a Roman province under the name of Achaia. The division of the Roman power into the Eastern and Western empires revived Greek influence for a time. The Eastern empire survived long after the Western empire fell, but finally it came to an end in the capture of Constantinople by the Turks in 1453.

Some of the Apostle Paul's most earnest labors took place in Greece, notably in Athens and Corinth, besides his general travels through Achaia, the name at that time for ancient Greece.

Greek (grêk). 1. A native of Greece, or one of the Greek race (Acts 16:1; 17:4). When Jew and Greek are contrasted in the N.T., the term Greek is used for a foreigner in general, the Greek being looked on as the highest type of Gentile (Rom. 1:14, 16; 10:12).

2. After the Macedonian conquest of the East and the establishment of the kingdoms of Syria and Egypt, the name Greek was applied, especially by Orientals, to all who spoke the Greek language in ordinary life and enjoyed the privileges of Greek settlers in the kingdoms ruled by Alexander's successors. The Greeks who wished to see Jesus (John 12:20) were foreigners, but it is not certain that they were of the Greek race.

3. The language of the ancient Greeks. It belongs to the Indo-European family of tongues, having affinities with Sanskrit, Avestan and Old Persian, Slavonic, Teutonic, Latin, and Celtic. It excels in power of full and precise expression. Jews who spoke Greek (Acts 21:37) used the common idiom (koine) of their day. The O.T. was translated into Greek before the advent of Christ (see VERSIONS, I. 1); the N.T. is written in Greek.

Grey'hound. The rendering of Heb. zarzir, well girt or well knit in the loins, in Prov. 30:31. The greyhound is figured on the Assyrian monuments. The word may, however, denote the war horse (R.V. marg.) as ornamented with girths and buckles about the loins; or the starling, as the cognate word in Arab., Syr., and post-Biblical Heb. denotes.

Grind'ing. See MILL.

Grove. A group or clump of trees. In the A.V. it is uniformly a mistranslation of: 1. Heb. 'eshel (Gen. 21:33; cf. I Sam. 22:6). R.V. renders this a tamarisk tree. See TAMARISK TREE.

2. Heb. 'āshērāh, with its 2 plurals 'āshērīm and 'āshērōth (Ex. 34:13; and elsewhere except Gen. 21:33). See ASHERAH.

Guard. In Oriental countries, where the king, as a rule, is despotic, it is necessary that he should be continually defended by a bodyguard; such a military organization is worse than useless unless complete dependence can be placed on its fidelity. Hence, service in the bodyguard is considered specially honorable, and its captain is a high officer. Such an appointment was filled by Potiphar (Gen. 37:36; 41:12), by Benaiah (II Sam. 23:22, 23; I Chron. 18:17), by Nebuzaradan (II Kings 25:8; Jer. 39:9, 10), by Arioch (Dan. 2:14), and others. The captain of the guard and his men were often employed to inflict capital punishment on political or other offenders. In Mark 6:27, the Gr. is spekoulator, spy. Such spies constituted a division in each Roman legion, and under the empire acted as the bodyguard of a general and were employed as messengers and to seek out persons proscribed or sentenced to death.

Gud·gō'dah (gūd-gō'dá). See HOR-HAGGID-GAD.

Guest. One temporarily entertained in the house of another, even though it be only for a few hours at a feast (I Kings 1:41; Zeph. 1:7; Matt. 22:10, 11). Complete strangers were received as guests and shown great consideration (Gen. 18:1-8; 19:3; Ex. 2:20; Judg. 13:15; 19:20, 21; Job 31:32). Important houses had a guestchamber (Mark 14:14; Luke 22:11; cf. also II Kings 4:10), and at Jerusalem these rooms were freely placed at the disposal of Jews visiting the city at the annual festivals. Hospitality is enjoined in the N.T. (Heb. 13:2; cf. Matt. 25:43). Ordinary morality dictates that one should not be guest in the house of a notorious sinner; but prominent Pharisees went so far as to apply this principle indiscriminately to the acceptance of hospitality from people of the publican class (Luke 5:27-32; 19:7).

Guilt Offering. See OFFERINGS.

Gu'ni (gū'nī) [cf. Arab. jaun, black, white, or light red]. 1. A son of Naphtali, and founder of a tribal family (Gen. 46:24; Num. 26:48; I Chron. 7:13).

2. A Gadite (I Chron. 5:15).

Gur (gūr) [lion's whelp or other young animal]. An ascent near Ibleam, where Ahaziah, king of Judah, was smitten by order of Jehu and mortally wounded (II Kings 9:27). Exact situation unknown.

Gur-ba'al (gūr-bā'āl) [sojourn of Baal]. A place inhabited by Arabs (II Chron. 26:7); perhaps in the desert s. of Beer-sheba, at Huleh Ghurri.

Gym-na'si-um, in A.V. Place of Ex'er-cise. A public place in Jerusalem for athletic exercise and exhibitions, below the w. cloister of the Temple (Jos. War iv. 9, 12; vi. 3, 2; 6, 2), below the palace of the Asmonaeans (Jos. Antiq. xx. 8, 11; War ii. 16, 3), below the citadel or acropolis (II Macc. 4:12, 27; not the Syrian fortress called the Acra, which was erected later, I Macc. 1:33). It was situated near the council house, by the first or innermost wall, and at the end of the bridge which led from the Temple across the Tyropoeon Valley (Jos. War v. 4, 2; cf. vi. 6, 2). It was erected by hellenizing Jews, under the leadership of Jason, by permission of Antiochus Epiphanes (I Macc. 1:10, 14; II Macc. 4:7 seq.). The essential features of a gymnasium were: 1. An open court for boxing, wrestling, pitching quoits, and throwing the javelin (II Macc. 4:14, palaestra, discus); 2. A stadium or course for the foot race; 3. A colonnade for a place of recreation and for athletic exercises in winter (Jos. Antiq. and War, passim, xystos); 4. A bathroom. The gymnasium at Jerusalem was condemned by strict Jews because it introduced heathen customs; led Jewish youth to wear the hat of Hermes, to exercise stark naked in public, and to be ashamed of the mark of their religion; and infected even the priests and caused them to neglect their official duties (I Macc. 1:14, 15; II Macc. 4:13-17). It existed until the overthrow of the city by Titus; and was not only resorted to for athletic sports, but was also occasionally used for popular assemblies (Jos. War ii. 16, 3).

H

Ha'a-hash'ta-ri (hā'ā-hāsh'tā-rī) [the Ahash-tarite]. A Hezronite, son of Ashhur (I Chron. 4:6; cf. ch. 2:24).

Ha-ba'lah (hā-bā'yā'), and Ho-ba'lah (hō-bā'yā') [Jehovah has hidden]. Father of certain Jews claiming sacerdotal descent. Their names not being found in the register, they were put out of the priesthood (Ezra 2:61; Neh. 7:63; cf. R.V.); called Obdia in I Esdras 5:38.

Ha-bak'kuk (hā-bāk'ūk) [embrace; or perhaps the name of a garden plant; cf. Akkad. hambakūku]. A prophet of Judah. It is inferred from his psalm (Hab., ch. 3) and from the directions to the chief musician (v. 19) that he was of the tribe of Levi and one of the Temple singers; but the evidence proves nothing.

The Book of Habakkuk is the 8th of the Minor Prophets. It consists of: 1. A first complaint: his cry to God against violence and wickedness is unheeded (Hab. 1:2-4); iniquity is triumphant. The Lord's response: God is raising up the Chaldeans (vs. 5-10), but as guilty the Chaldeans shall be punished (v. 11). 2. A second complaint: God's Kingdom indeed shall not perish, and the Chaldeans shall be visited with judgment (v. 12); but yet a moral problem remains: God allows the Chaldeans to waste and destroy those who are more righteous than they. Shall this go on (vs. 13-17)? The Lord's response: the Chaldeans are puffed up and unrighteous [that fact to the eye of faith is sufficient; it dooms them (cf. Hab. 1:11; Isa. 10:12-16), and dooms all like them]; but the just shall live by his faith (Hab. 2:1-4). That truth, rightly understood, solves the problem. Moreover, faith in the certainty that God will punish wickedness enables the prophet to pronounce 5 woes against the great world power for 5 forms of wickedness (vs. 5-20). 3. A prayer of praise (ch. 3:1-19), in which after an invocation and a petition that God in wrath remember mercy (v. 2), the prophet describes God's appearance in majesty and the ensuing consternation of his enemies (vs. 3-15), and expresses the quiet confidence of faith in God (vs. 16-19).

The book is not dated, but was evidently a production of the Chaldean period. 1. The Temple is still standing (ch. 2:20), and musical service is conducted (ch. 3:19). 2. The rise of the Chaldeans to a formidable power among the nations occurs during that generation (ch. 1:5, 6), and the slaying of the nations by the Chaldeans had already begun (vs. 6, 17).

The Chaldeans had been long known to the Hebrews. They attracted renewed attention by their successful revolt from the Assyrians in 626 B.C.; and they began their great career of subjugation and attained to the leading place among the powers of the world on the fall of Nineveh in 612 B.C., and by their victory over the Egyptians at Carchemish in 605. From internal evidence it is supposed that Habakkuk prophesied during the reign of Jehoiakim (607-597 B.C.), but it is difficult to fix the precise period. Most critics date the prophecy in the early part of that reign, about the time of the battle of Carchemish. It may, however, antedate the fall of Nineveh by some years; for not only had the Chaldeans bestirred themselves in 626 B.C. but military events before the collapse of Nineveh indicated the Chaldeans as the coming world power; their subjugation of Judah had long been predicted by the Hebrew prophets (Isa. 11:11; 39:6, 7; Micah 4:10); and their fierce, warlike character, their habitual cruelty and rapacity in war, and their method of battle were known to all nations. There was thus, even before their victory at Carchemish, full justification for the declarations made in Hab. 1:5-10. If the prophecy was uttered before the Chaldean success at Carchemish, Habakkuk in ch. 1:2-4 is lamenting the carnival of wickedness which he witnessed in Israel or in the world at large.

Hab'az-zī-nī'ah (hāb'ā-zī-nī'ā'), in A.V. Hab'a-zi-nī'ah (hāb'ā-zī-nī'ā'). A Rechabite who lived long before Jeremiah (Jer. 35:3).

Hab'er-geon. A coat of mail to defend the breast and neck (II Chron. 26:14; Neh. 4:16; in R.V., coat of mail). In Job 41:26, R.V. on good grounds substitutes pointed shaft in the text, and places coat of mail in the marg. Habergeon, or coat of mail, is also used to translate a different Heb. word of uncertain meaning in Ex. 28:32; 39:23.

Ha'bör (hä'bör). A river of Mesopotamia to which captives from the 10 tribes were carried (II Kings 17:6; 18:11; I Chron. 5:26). It has been identified as the Khabur, which, flowing s. through Mesopotamia, after a course of 190 miles, meets the e. branch of the Euphrates at Karkisiyā, the ancient Circesium.

Hac'a-lī'ah (hāk'ā-lī'ā), in A.V. Hach'a-lī'ah (hāk'ā-lī'ā) [ety. uncertain; perhaps, wait for Jehovah, or Jehovah is dark (from displeasure?). Cf. Arab. ḥakala, to be dark]. The father of Nehemiah (Neh. 1:1).

Ha-chī'lah (hā-kī'lā) [dark, gloomy]. A hill in the wilderness of Ziph (I Sam. 26:1-3), s.e. of Hebron, and on the s. of the desert, not far from Maon (ch. 23:19, 24-26). David concealed himself there whilst fleeing from Saul, and there Saul afterward encamped when engaged in his pursuit.

Hach'mō-ni (hāk'mō-nī) [wise]. The founder of the Hachmonite family, the members of which are called sons of Hachmoni (I Chron. 11:11; 27:32), or simply Hachmonites (cf. II Sam. 23:8).

Ha'dad, I (hā'dād) [sharpness, fierceness]. A son of Ishmael (Gen. 25:15; in A.V., following a variant Heb. reading, Hadar; I Chron. 1:30).

Ha'dad, II (hā'dād). 1. A deity worshiped by the Aramaeans. It occurs in proper names, as in Ben-hadad, Hadadezer. The Assyrian scribes identified Hadad with their own weather-god Ramman, i.e., Rimmon.

2. A king of Edom, son of Bedad, and of the city of Avith. He smote Midian in the field of Moab (Gen. 36:35, 36; I Chron. 1:46, 47).

3. A king of Edom, whose city was Pau or Pai (I Chron. 1:50). In Gen. 36:39 he is called Hadar. See DALETH.

4. An Edomite prince, who escaped from his country when Joab, at the head of the Israelite army, was engaged for 6 months in the cruel task of cutting off every male in Edom. Hadad was then a little child and was taken by his guardians to Egypt. The king of Egypt received him with much kindness, assigned him a house and land, provided him with food, and gave him an Egyptian princess, sister of the queen, to wife. But after the death of David and Joab, the great foes of his race, he returned to Edom and became an adversary to Solomon (I Kings 11:14-22).

Had'ad-e'zer (hād'ād-ē'zēr) [Hadad is a help]. Son of Rehob and king of Zobah, in Syria (II Sam. 8:3). He is frequently called Hadadezer, the latter form being doubtless an early misreading of daleth; see DALETH. When going to recover his border at the river Euphrates, he was met and defeated by King David. The Syrians of Damascus, who afterward arrived to assist him, shared his fate. From Beth and Berothai, cities of Hadadezer, David took much brass or copper. Toi, king of Hamath, probably a Hittite by race, had formerly been at war with Hadadezer, and he congratulated David on his victory (II Sam. 8:3-13; I Chron. 18:3-10). Hadadezer renewed the war with David, became confederate with the Ammonites, and sent his army, led by his general, Shobach, to try another engagement with their common foe. David was victorious and Shobach, was among the slain.

The dependent kings who had served Hadadezer now made peace with David, and Hadadezer is heard of no more (II Sam. 10:6-19; I Chron. 19:16-19). See BEN-HADAD 2.

Ha'dad-rim'mon (hā'dād-rim'on) [Hadad and Rimmon, 2 Syrian divinities]. A city in the plain of Jezreel, near Megiddo (Zech. 12:11). Jerome says that it was the place in his day called Maximianopolis. This is now called Rummāneh, and is about a mile n.w. by w. of Taanach.

Ha'dar (hā'dār). See HADAD, I and II.

Had'a-re'zer (hād'ā-rē'zēr). See HADADEZER.

Ha'dash'ah (hā-dāsh'ā) [new]. A village in the lowland of Judah (Josh. 15:37); it may be located at Khirbet el-Judeideh between 'Araḥ el-Menshiyeh and Khirbet 'Aglān.

Ha'das'sah (hā-dās'ā) [a myrtle]. The original Jewish name of Queen Esther (Esth. 2:7).

Ha-dat'tah (hā-dāt'tā). See HAZOR-HADAT-TAH.

Ha'des (hā'dēz). See HELL 1.

Ha'did (hā'dīd) [sharp, pointed; a point]. A town of Benjamin, mentioned in connection with Lod, i.e., Lydda (Ezra 2:33; Neh. 11:34). It is commonly identified with Adda, a town built upon a hill of the Shephelah and overlooking the plain (I Macc. 12:38; 13:13; Jos. Antiq. xiii. 6, 5). Its site is located at Haditheh, 3 miles e.n.e. of Lydda.

Ha'dlai (hā'dlī) [ceasing, forbearing]. A man of Ephraim (II Chron. 28:12).

Ha-do'ram (hā-dō'rām). 1. An Arabian tribe descended from Joktan (Gen. 10:27; I Chron. 1:21).

2. A son of the king of Hamath (I Chron. 18:10). See JORAM 1.

3. An officer over Rehoboam's levy (II Chron. 10:18). See ADONIRAM.

Ha'drach (hā'drāk). A country mentioned in connection with Damascus and Hamath (Zech. 9:1). It lay on the Orontes, s. of Hamath.

Ha'gāb (hā'gāb) [a locust, grasshopper]. Founder of a family of Nethinim (Ezra 2:46).

Ha'gā-bah (hā'gā-bā) or Ha'gā-ba (hā'gā-bā) [Aram., a locust]. Founder of a family of Nethinim, distinct from that of Hagab (Ezra 2:45; Neh. 7:48).

Ha'gar (hā'gār), in A.V. of N.T. both times A'gar, like the Gr. [if Heb., flight; cf. Arab. ḥijrah, emigration, flight]. An Egyptian bondwoman of Sarah, perhaps obtained during Abraham's sojourn in Egypt (Gen. 16:1; cf. ch. 12:10). After Abraham had been 10 years in Canaan, and the promised son had not been born to him, Sarah, now 76 years old, despaired of sharing in the promise, and proposed earthly means to secure a son to Abraham and obtain the name of mother. In accordance with a custom of the times, she gave her maid to Abraham. When Hagar perceived herself to be with child she despised her mistress, and, being treated by her harshly, fled into the wilderness. There the angel of the Lord found her at a fountain between Shur and Bered, revealed to her the future of the child she was to bear, and bade her return to her mistress. Hagar called the name of the place "the well of the living one who seeth me" (Gen. 16:1-16). She then returned to her mistress and in due time gave birth to Ishmael. Some 15 years later the youth Ishmael mocked at the child Isaac. For this offense Hagar, with a skin of water on her shoulder, and Ishmael were expelled with God's approval from the family of Abraham. They wandered in the wilderness of Beer-sheba until the water was spent. The exhausted boy, whom Hagar had been supporting, was placed under the shade of a bush, and she sat down a bowshot off that she might not see him die. Again the angel of the Lord intervened, directing her to a well in the vicinity and reminding her of the promise concerning the boy. The last we hear of Hagar is her taking a wife for her son out of the land of Egypt, whence she herself had originally come (Gen. 21:1-21). For Gal. 4:21-31, see ISHMAEL.

Hag'arene' (häg'ä-rën'), Ha'garite (hä'gär-it), and Ha'gerite (hä'gër-it). See HAGRITE.

Hag'ga'i (häg'ä-i) [festal, i.e., born on a feast day]. A prophet, contemporary with Zechariah (cf. Hag. 1:1 with Zech. 1:1). He prophesied after the return from Babylon. The work on the Temple had ceased for 15 years, and Haggai was largely instrumental in arousing the people to proceed with the building (Ezra 5:1, 2; 6:14).

The Book of Haggai is the 10th of the Minor Prophets. It consists of 4 prophecies delivered within the space of 4 months in the 2d year of Darius Hystaspis, 520 B.C.

1. On the 1st day of the 6th month the prophet reproaches those who left the Temple in ruins and built ceiled houses for themselves, and he points out that God's blessing is withheld from their ordinary labor. In consequence of this exhortation, work on the Temple was resumed on the 24th day of the same month (ch. 1).

2. In the 7th month, 21st day, he encourages those who mourn over the humble character of the new building as compared with the splendor of the old edifice. He predicts that the latter glory of the house shall be greater than the former glory, for God will shake the nations and the desirable things of all nations, their silver and gold, shall come and fill the house with glory, and God will give peace in that place (ch. 2:1-9; Heb. 12:26-28).

3. In the 9th month, 24th day, he adds a sequel to the 1st prophecy. As the touch of the unclean pollutes the clean, so their former neglect of God polluted their labor and God did not bestow his blessing. But their revived zeal for God will be accompanied by fruitful seasons from the Lord (Hag. 2:10-19).

4. On the same day he adds a sequel to the 2d prophecy. When the Lord shakes the nations, he will establish Zerubbabel, who represents the royal line of David (ch. 2:20-23).

Hag'geri (häg'ë-ri). See HAGRI.

Hag'gi (häg'i) [festal, i.e., born on a feast day]. A son of Gad, and founder of a tribal family (Gen. 46:16; Num. 26:15).

Hag'gi'ah (hä-gi'ä) [a festival of Jehovah]. A Levite, a descendant of Merari (I Chron. 6:30).

Hag'gith (häg'ith) [festal]. One of David's wives, the mother of Adonijah (II Sam. 3:4; I Kings 1:5).

Hag'tog'ra-pha (häg'i-ög'ä-fä). See CANON.

Hag'ri (häg'ri), in A.V. Hag'geri. Rather an adjective, Hagrite, than a proper name (I Chron. 11:38). The parallel passage (II Sam. 23:36) reads "Bani the Gadite"; see MIBHAR.

Hag'rite (häg'rit); in A.V. Ha'garite, and once Ha'gerite, and once, in Ps. 83:6, Hag'arenes', in which passage R.V. in its text follows A.V. A nomad people who dwelt throughout all the land e. of Gilead, and were rich in camels, sheep, and asses. During the reign of Saul they were vanquished by the Israelite tribes e. of the Jordan (I Chron. 5:10, 18-22). A Hagrite had charge of David's flocks (I Chron. 27:31). They are the Agratoi of the Greek geographers.

Ha'i (hä'i). See AI.

Hail. Hail falls not merely in cold and temperate climates, but also in hot and even tropical latitudes, where snow and ice are not to be found except at great elevations. The most destructive hailstones are those which accompany a violent thunderstorm. In all places 2 or more hailstones can unite so as to make an irregularly shaped mass of ice, which, when large, becomes formidable by the momentum with which it descends. Hail occasionally falls in Egypt (Ex. 9:22-25) between December and April. It is more frequent in Palestine (Josh. 10:11; Hag. 2:17). The area affected by a hailstorm is generally a long, narrow line, so that of 2 places near each other, one may be in and the other out of the storm. Thus Goshen might escape it, whilst the adjacent district of Egypt to the w. might be in its track and suffer severely (Ex. 9:26); and a pursuing army might be untouched by the storm and yet see their fleeing foes beaten down by the falling stones (Josh. 10:11).

Hair. The natural covering and ornament of the head. In Egypt men ordinarily shaved the head, but when mourning let the hair grow (Herod. ii. 36; iii. 12). The Assyrians wore it long (Herod. i. 195), falling to the shoulders. The Israelites also wore it tolerably long; but cut it to prevent its reaching an extreme length (cf. Num. 6:5; II Sam. 14:26; Jos. Antiq. xiv. 9, 4), and the services of the barber were sometimes employed (Ezek. 5:1); but they were forbidden to cut off the edge of the hair from about the temples, so as to round it (Lev. 19:27), for that was a significant heathen custom (Herod. iii. 8). Hebrew women wore the hair long (S. of Sol. 7:5; Rev. 9:8; cf. I Cor. 11:15), binding it up or braiding it (Judith 10:3; 16:8; I Tim. 2:9; I Peter 3:3). Oil was used for the hair by both men and women (Ps. 23:5; Matt. 6:17). Herod the Great, in order to conceal his age, dyed his hair black (Jos. Antiq. xvi. 8, 1). The priests were forbidden to make any baldness upon the head (Lev. 21:5), and none of the Israelites was allowed to make a baldness between the eyes for the dead (Deut. 14:1), since this was a heathen custom. The captive woman who was chosen by a Hebrew for his wife and the leper in the day of his cleansing were required to shave the head for purposes of purification (Lev. 14:8, 9; Deut. 21:12). The Nazirite also, when the time of his service was ended, shaved his head as a sign of the fulfillment of his vow (Num. 6:18). See BEARD.

Hak'ka-tan (häk'ä-tän) [the small or the younger one]. Father of a certain Johanan (Ezra 8:12).

Hak'koz (häk'öz), in A.V. sometimes Koz, once Coz, the first syllable (the Heb. definite article) being omitted [thorn]. 1. A descendant of Aaron. His family had grown to a father's house in the time of David and was made the 7th of the 24 courses into which David distributed the priests (I Chron. 24:1, 6, 10). Perhaps it was members of this family who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel, but, failing to find their register and establish their genealogy, were put from the priesthood (Ezra 2:61, 62; Neh. 7:63, 64). They appear to have eventually succeeded, however, in establishing their right to the office (Neh. 3:21; cf. Ezra 8:33).

2. A man of Judah (I Chron. 4:8).

Ha-ku'pha (hä-kü'fä) [bent, bowed; cf. Arab. hakafa, to be curved]. Founder of a family of Nethinim (Ezra 2:51; Neh. 7:53).

Ha'lah (hä'lä). A district of the Assyrian empire to which captives from the 10 tribes were carried (II Kings 17:6; 18:11; I Chron. 5:26). Probably the district known later as Chalkitis, in Mesopotamia, near Gozan, in the basin of the Habor and the Saokoras.

Ha'lak (hālāk) [smooth, bare]. A mountain in the s. of Palestine on the way to Mount Seir (Josh. 11:17; 12:7). It is located n.e. of 'Abdeh, which is on Wadi el-Marra.

Half Shek'el. See MONEY, TRIBUTE 2.

Hal'hul (hāl'hul). A village in the hill country of Judah (Josh. 15:58). The Arabs still call the village Hāhūl, about 4 miles n. of Hebron. Tradition has located the tomb of Jonah and also that of the Prophet Gad in this place.

Ha'li (hāl'i) [ornament, necklace]. A village on the boundary line of Asher (Josh. 19:25). Khirbet 'Alia, 13 miles n.e. of Acre, has been suggested, but Tell el-'Aly, s. of Haritiyeh, seems to fit better into the context.

Hal'i-car-nas'sus (hāl'i-kār-nās'ūs). A city of Caria, renowned as being the birthplace of Herodotus and as containing the mausoleum erected by Artemisia, which was reckoned one of the 7 wonders of the world. Alexander captured and almost totally destroyed the city in 334 B.C. It contained a colony of Jews (I Macc. 15:23; Jos. Antiq. xiv. 10, 23).

Hall. A building, or large room in a building, devoted to public use. In A.V. it denotes: 1. The court of the high priest's palace (Luke 22:55; in R.V. court).

2. The official residence of the provincial governor, with its court where he sat in judgment. It was called the praetorium (Matt. 27:27; Mark 15:16; John 18:28, 33; 19:9; Acts 23:35, where R.V. has palace or praetorium). See PRAETORIUM.

Hal'le-lu'Jah, in A.V. of N.T. Al'le-lu'ia, like the Gr. [praise ye Jehovah]. A compound word used by the writers of various psalms to invite all to join them in praising Jehovah (R.V. marg. of Ps. 104:35; 105:45; 106:1, 48; 111:1; 112:1; 113:1, 9; 115:18; 116:19; 117:2; 135:1, 21; 1st and last vs. of Psalms 146 to 150; cf. A.V. marg. also). From these psalms John borrowed the term Alleluia (Rev. 19:1, 3, 4, 6).

Hal-lo'hesh (hā-lō'hēsh), in A.V. once Ha-lo'hesh (hā-lō'hēsh) [the whisperer, the enchanter]. Father of a certain Shallum (Neh. 3:12). With Nehemiah he or the representative of his family sealed the covenant to worship Jehovah (ch. 10:24).

Ham, I (hām) [perhaps, Heb. hām, hot; but cf. S. Arab. ham, protection. Hardly Egypt. km, black]. The youngest son of Noah, born after the latter's 500th year (Gen. 5:32; 6:10; 9:24). At the time of the Deluge he was married but apparently had no children (Gen. 7:7; I Peter 3:20). On the occasion of his father's drunkenness he behaved undutifully and incurred a curse to descend upon Canaan (Gen. 9:22-27). The list of peoples of s. Arabia, Ethiopia, Egypt, and Canaan (ch. 10:6-14) includes both his descendants and those acquired by conquest and political annexation.

Ham, II (hām). Egypt. Used in the Bible only in poetry (Ps. 78:51; 105:23, 27; 106:22).

Ham, III (hām) [ety. unknown; initial letter is h, but in I and II is h]. A place between Ashteroth-karnaim in Bashan and the Moabite country, where Chedorlaomer defeated the Zuzim (Gen. 14:5; cf. Deut. 2:10). The order of enumeration makes it probable that Ham was n. of Kiriathaim and the Arnon; it is no. 118 on the list of Thutmose III and is to be identified with modern Hām about 5 miles s.s.w. of Irbid in the 'Ajlūn.

Ha'man (hām'mān) [probably from name of Elamite divinity, Hamman, Humman, Humban]. Son of Hammedatha (Esth. 3:1). His father bore a Persian name, but he is called the Agagite (ch. 3:1; 9:24). Josephus (Antiq. xi. 6, 5), who is followed by some commentators, understands this appellation to mean that Haman was descended from Agag, king of Amalek, thus making him a descendant of Saul's conquered foe. The term Agagite, however, may denote a spiritual descent from an enemy of Israel, or it may refer to a place or family otherwise unknown. Exalted by the Persian king to the highest official position, he received ostentatious reverence from time-servers. But on account of his unprincipled character, perhaps also for other reasons, the Jew Mordecai deliberately withheld from him the customary signs of respect. Haman planned revenge, plotting the destruction not of Mordecai only but of all Jews in the empire. His plan was frustrated by Esther, who was prompted by Mordecai; and Haman and his sons perished (Esth. 7:10; 9:7-10). See ESTHER.

Ha'math (hām'māth), in A.V. once He'math (Amos 6:14), and once Am'a>this (ām'a-this) (I Macc. 12:25) [fortification, citadel]. 1. A city on the Orontes, n. of Hermon (Josh. 13:5), about 120 miles n. of Damascus. It was a Hittite city as is shown by a large number of Hittite inscriptions. Tol, its king, congratulated David on his victory over Hadadezer, their common enemy (II Sam. 8:9, 10; I Chron. 18:3, 9, 10). Solomon took Hamath and built store cities in the region (II Chron. 8:3, 4). It soon, however, reverted to its old inhabitants, but Jeroboam II, king of Israel, captured Damascus and Hamath, which had formerly belonged to Judah, and kept them for the 10 tribes (II Kings 14:28). About this time Amos (Amos 6:2) called the city Hamath the great. At the battle of Karkar, Hamath was allied with Ben-hadad (Adad-idri) of Damascus and Ahab against Shalmaneser III, king of Assyria; but later it was conquered by the Assyrians (II Kings 18:34; 19:13). After the capture of Samaria by the Assyrians, it joined with the remnant of the inhabitants of that city in revolt, 720 B.C. But the uprising was quickly suppressed by Sargon. Colonists from Hamath, who brought with them Ashima, their god, were placed by the Assyrians in Samaria (II Kings 17:24, 30), while some of the exiles of Israel seem to have been located in Hamath (Isa. 11:11). Afterward its history becomes merged in that of Syria, and it seems to have become subordinate to Damascus (Jer. 49:23). Ezekiel prophesied that the restored land of Israel should still extend n. to Hamath (Ezek. 47:16, 17, 20; 48:1). Hamath was known as Epi-phanias during the period of Grecian supremacy (Jos. Antiq. i. 6, 2), but is now called Hamāh.

2. The district ruled by the city (I Macc. 12:25). One of its towns was Riblah (II Kings 23:33).

The entrance of Hamath was regarded as the n. border of Israel (Num. 13:21; 34:8; I Kings 8:65). To people on the s. the term may have had special meaning and denoted the long valley of Coele Syria, between Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon, through which the road to Hamath lay. Some consider it as the pass between Lebanon and the Nusairiyeh Mountains, leading from Homs to Tripoli and thus connecting the inland region of Syria with the Mediterranean coast. Another view is that Heb. ʾēbō' (at, upon entering) is a proper name and accordingly there is assumed a place Lebo Hamath (modern Lebweh), located 14 miles n.e. of Baalbek and thus commanding the watershed between the Orontes and the Leontes.

Ha'math-ites (hām'māth-its). The people of Hamath (Gen. 10:18).

Ha'math-zo'bah (hă-măth-zo'bd). The neighbor kingdoms of Hamath and Zobah, or some small place called Hamath, belonging to the Syrian kingdom Zobah. It was captured by Solomon (II Chron. 8:3).

Ham'math (hăm'ăth), in A.V. once He'math (I Chron. 2:55) [hot spring]. 1. A fenced city of Naphtali (Josh. 19:35). Probably one with Hammothdor and Hammon, which was assigned to the Levites (Josh. 21:32; I Chron. 6:76), and to be identified with Emmaus, a village with warm baths at a little distance from Tiberias (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 2, 3; War iv. 1, 3); now called Hammām on the w. shore of the Sea of Galilee, about 1¼ miles s. of Tiberias. The water is sulphurous and medicinal.

2. The founder of the house of Rechab, a family of the Kenites (I Chron. 2:55).

Ham-me'ah (hă-mē'ā). See MEAH.

Ham-me-da'tha (hă-mē-dā'thā) [Avestan, hama, equal, +dātā, giver]. Father of Haman (Esth. 3:1).

Ham-me-lech (hă-mē-lēk) [the king]. Fathers of Jerahmeel and Malchijah (Jer. 36:26; 38:6, A.V. and R.V. marg.).

Ham'mer. A tool, called in Heb. patšish, and used for smoothing metals and for breaking rocks (Isa. 41:7; Jer. 23:29). It serves as a figure for any crushing power. Babylon was the hammer of the whole earth (Jer. 50:23). God's word is like a hammer that breaks the rock in pieces (ch. 23:29). Another name for an implement of the same class is makkēbeth, used for driving the tent pin (Judg. 4:21), in building operations (I Kings 6:7), and in the manufacture of idols (Isa. 44:12; Jer. 10:4).

Ham-miph'kad (hă-mif-kād), in A.V. Miph'kad, without the Hebrew article [appointed place]. A gate at Jerusalem, probably of the Temple (Neh. 3:31); see JERUSALEM, II. 3.

Ham-mol'echeth (hă-mōl-ē-kēth), in A.V. Ham-mol'eketh (hă-mōl-ē-kēth) [the queen]. A sister of Gilead (I Chron. 7:18). Several tribal families of Manasseh sprang from her.

Ham'mon (hăm'ōn) [glowing, warm]. 1. A frontier village of Asher (Josh. 19:28). About 10 miles s. of Tyre, n. of Cape Nakūra, near Wadi el-Hamūl, ¾ of a mile from Umm el-'Amūd, where Baal Hammon was worshipped.

2. A town of Naphtali. See HAMMATH 1.

Ham'moth-dor' (hăm'ōth-dōr') [warm springs of Dor]. See HAMMATH 1.

Ham'mu-el (hăm'ū-ēl), in A.V. Ham'u-el [perhaps, warmth of God]. A Simeonite, son of Mishma, probably of the family of Shaul (I Chron. 4:26).

Ham'mu-ra'bi (hăm'ōo-rā'bē). Formerly thought to be Amraphel (Gen. ch. 14), but this identification is no longer generally accepted. Hammurabi is the 6th king of Dyn. I of Babylon, and his reign has been variously dated: 2123-2081, 2067-2025, 1955-1913, and 1870-1830 B.C. According to more recent evidence, however, his reign extended from 1792 to 1750 or 1749 B.C. At first he held sway over a small district only; but he wrested Larsa from the Elamites and made himself lord of all Babylonia. See BABYLONIA. He sought the welfare of his subjects; repaired old canals and cut new ones in order to bring fertility to both n. and s. Babylonia, strengthened fortifications, embellished and erected temples, superintended the administration of justice, and codified the laws of the land. He had fore-runners in reform and in the codification of law among the Sumerian kings: Urukagina of Lagash (c. 2450 B.C.); Ur-Nammu (Ur-Engur) and Shulgi (Dungi) of Dyn. III of Ur. He was doubtless himself a legislator; but beyond enacting legislation, he discerned the importance of collecting the laws of the realm which pertained to the social life of the people, grouping the related ones, and giving them the widest publicity. Two hundred and eighty-two sections of his code have been preserved on a block of black diorite nearly 8 feet high.

These ancient laws of Babylonia bear a close resemblance to the enactments in the Book of the Covenant by which justice was administered in Israel (Ex. 20:23 to 23:33; cf. ch. 24:7). Not only are they codified like the later body of Hebrew legislation, but they are like many of those Hebrew statutes in beginning with the word "if." Hammurabi and Moses often reflect the same Semitic psychology, as for example in the lex talionis (Deut. 19:21). In a number of instances the 2 bodies of legislation treat of the same injury to person or property. This coincidence is, of course, not surprising, since just these mishaps and misdeeds occur in every community of men and must receive notice in any code of laws dealing with civil life. It is more remarkable that in so many instances the same classes of people, particularly the less fortunate members of society, were regarded by both Babylonians and Israelites as possessing rights that could be recognized by the state. But what is most remarkable is that in at least 14 instances the Babylonian and Hebrew laws impose the same, or practically the same, penalty for the same offense. To a remarkable degree the 2 peoples shared the same conception of justice. The Hebrew legislator hardly had the laws of Hammurabi before him; but it is probable that the Babylonian influence in the Fertile Crescent left some impression upon the Israelites. The 2 codes have a common Semitic background, which may perhaps be traced to primitive Semitic times. See MOSES.

Ham-mo'nah (hă-mō'nā) [multitude]. Symbolical name of the city near which Gog is to be defeated (Ezek. 39:16).

Ham-mo'gog' (hă-mōn-gōg') [multitude of Gog]. A name to be given to a certain valley where the hosts which Gog brings with him shall be slain and buried (Ezek. 39:11, 15).

Ham'mor (hăm'mōr), in A.V. of N.T. Em'mor, following the Gr. [an ass]. The prince of Shechem (Gen. 34:20; Josh. 24:32; Judg. 9:28); a Hivite (Gen. 34:2). His son Shechem ruined Dinah, and both father and son fell victims to the vindictiveness of her brothers Simeon and Levi (ch. 34:1-31).

Ham'ran (hăm'rān). See HEMDAN.

Ham'u-el (hăm'ū-ēl). See HAMMUEL.

Ha'mul (hăm'ūl) [pitied, spared]. Younger son of Perez, and founder of a tribal family of Judah (Gen. 46:12; Num. 26:21; I Chron. 2:5).

Ha-mu'tal (hă-mū'tāl) [probably, father-in-law is dew]. Daughter of Jeremiaiah of Libnah, wife of King Josiah, and mother of the kings Jehoahaz and Zedekiah (II Kings 23:31; 24:18; Jer. 52:1).

Han'a-mel (hăn'ā-mēl), in A.V. Han'a-meel (hăn'ā-mēl) [perhaps, God has pitied]. Son of Shallum, and cousin of the Prophet Jeremiaiah (Jer. 32:7).

Han'an (hă'nān) [gracious, merciful]. 1. One of David's mighty men (I Chron. 11:43). 2. A Benjaminite, son of Shashak (I Chron. 8:23).

3. A son of Azel, a descendant of Jonathan (I Chron. 8:38; 9:44).

4. A prophet, son of Ig'daliah. His sons had a chamber in the Temple (Jer. 35:4).

5. Founder of a family of Nethinim, members of which returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:46; Neh. 7:49).

6. A man, probably a Levite, whom Ezra employed with others to make the people understand the Law (Neh. 8:7). He seems to have sealed the covenant (ch. 10:10).

7 and 8. Two chiefs of the people, who also sealed the covenant (Neh. 10:22, 26).

9. A son of Zaccur, appointed assistant treasurer by Nehemiah (Neh. 13:13).

Han'a-nel (hän'-ä-nēl), in A.V. Ha-nan'e-el (hä-nän'-ē-él) [God has been gracious]. A tower at Jerusalem (Jer. 31:38; Zech. 14:10), near the sheep gate and the tower of Meah (Neh. 3:1; 12:39); see JERUSALEM, II. 3.

Han-a-ni (hä-nä'-ni) [gracious, or contraction of Hananiah]. 1. A son of Heman and head of the 18th of the 24 courses of musicians appointed by David for the sanctuary (I Chron. 25:4, 25).

2. Father of the Prophet Jehu (I Kings 16:1) and himself a seer. He rebuked Asa, and was by the king's orders committed to prison (II Chron. 16:7-10).

3. A brother of Nehemiah who brought him news regarding Jerusalem (Neh. 1:2). He and the governor of the castle were afterward given charge of the city (ch. 7:2).

4. A priest, son of Immer, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:20).

5. A Levite who played an instrument at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem by Nehemiah (Neh. 12:36).

Han'a-ni'ah (hän'-ä-ni'-ä) [Jehovah has been gracious]. 1. A Benjamite, son of Shashak (I Chron. 8:24).

2. A son of Heman and head of the 16th of the 24 courses of musicians formed by David for the sanctuary (I Chron. 25:4, 23).

3. One of King Uziah's captains (II Chron. 26:11).

4. Father of Jeremiah's contemporary, the prince Zedekiah (Jer. 36:12).

5. Son of Azzur of Gibeon. In the 4th year of Zedekiah's reign he prophesied a return of the captives after 2 years' captivity. Jeremiah had given forth a different prediction. As a penalty the false prophet was doomed to death, his decease occurring 2 months later (Jer., ch. 28).

6. Grandfather, or remoter ancestor, of Iri-jah, the captain of the watch who arrested Jeremiah on the charge of intending to desert to the Chaldeans (Jer. 37:13-15).

7. The Heb. name of the captive called by the Chaldeans Shadrach (Dan. 1:6, 7; I Macc. 2:59).

8. A son of Zerubbabel, and father of Pelatiah and Jeshaiiah (I Chron. 3:19, 21); perhaps the ancestor of Christ called, by transposition of the constituent parts of the name, Joanan (Luke 3:27, R.V.).

9. A son of Bebai, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:28).

10. An apothecary who helped to rebuild the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:8).

11. A priest who blew a trumpet at the dedication of the wall (Neh. 12:41).

12. A chief of the people, who with Nehemiah sealed the covenant (Neh. 10:23).

13. The governor of the castle and joint ruler with Hanani, Nehemiah's brother, over Jerusalem (Neh. 7:2).

14. A priest, head of the father's house of Jeremiah, in the days of the high priest Joiakim, a generation after the Exile (Neh. 12:12).

Hand'breadth'. The breadth of the hand, a palm (Ex. 25:25; in A.V., Ezek. 40:43, a hand broad); see CUBIT. It is used by the psalmist figuratively of human life, especially when life closes prematurely (Ps. 39:5).

Hand'ker-chief. A small cloth used by the Romans for wiping the hands and face. The Jews adopted it in the Roman period. They bound it about the head of their dead (John 11:44; 20:7; A.V., R.V., napkin). Once in Ephesus handkerchiefs were carried from the body of the Apostle Paul to the sick, and their diseases departed (Acts 19:12). The man who received 1 pound from his lord hid it in such a cloth (Luke 19:20; A.V., R.V., napkin).

Ha'nes (hä'nēz). A city of Egypt (Isa. 30:4) about 50 miles s. of Memphis, on the w. bank of the Nile, and still known as Ahnas. In the Greco-Roman period it was known as Heracleopolis Magna.

Hang'ing. A form of punishment in which, after the criminal was put to death, his body was suspended from a tree or post. It was in vogue in Egypt (Gen. 40:19, 22), among the Israelites (Deut. 21:22; Josh. 10:26; II Sam. 4:12), and the Persians (Herod. iii. 125). The hanging intensified the disgrace. Among the Israelites, the elevation of the body on the tree was a call to God to witness that the guilty one had paid just and sufficient penalty, and was a testimony of God's abhorrence of sin. But while the body remained exposed, it proclaimed that sin had been committed in Israel. It was therefore buried out of sight at nightfall (Deut. 21:23; Josh. 8:29; cf. Gal. 3:13). Suicide was sometimes committed by hanging which caused strangulation (II Sam. 17:23; Matt. 27:5). See GALLOWES.

Han'tel (hän'-ēl). See HANNIEL.

Han'nah (hän'-ä) [grace, compassion]. One of the 2 wives of Elkanah. She was her husband's favorite and was in consequence subjected to petty annoyances by the rival wife. She vowed that if she gave birth to a man-child, she would devote him to the service of Jehovah. Her wish was gratified; she became the mother of the Prophet Samuel, and carried out her vow (I Sam., ch. 1). Her song of triumph is highly poetic and was probably in the mind of the Virgin Mary when she expressed her gratitude in similar poetic strains on learning that she was to give birth to the Son of God (I Sam. 2:1-10; Luke 1:46-55).

Han'na-thon (hän'-ä-thön) [regarded with favor]. A frontier town of Zebulun (Josh. 19:14), on a road from Megiddo to Acco (El-Amarna letters), and probably to be located at Tell Harbaj on the wadi el-Melek.

Han'ni-el (hän'-ēl), in A.V. Ha'ni-el in I Chron. 7:39 [God has been gracious]. 1. Prince of the Manassites who, when the Israelites were about to enter Canaan, was appointed on the committee to divide the land (Num. 34:23).

2. An Asherite, son of Ulla (I Chron. 7:39).

Ha'noch (hä'nök), in A.V. once He'noch (I Chron. 1:33) [initiated, dedicated]. Exactly the same Heb. word as that rendered Enoch. 1. A son of Midian, and a descendant of Abraham by Keturah (Gen. 25:4; I Chron. 1:33).

2. A son of Reuben, and founder of a tribal family, Hanochites (Gen. 46:9; Ex. 6:14; Num. 26:5; I Chron. 5:3).

Ha'nun (hä'nün) [favored]. 1. A king of the Ammonites, son and successor of David's friend Nahash. The Hebrew king sent to condole with him on his father's death, and congratulate him on his own accession. Evil counselors suggested that the real object of the embassy was to spy out the Ammonite capital, and so Hanun grossly ill-treated the ambassadors, shaving off half their beards and cutting off their garments in the middle. Knowing that the outrage would be resented, he prepared for war. He obtained the Syrians as his allies, but was defeated (II Sam. 10:1 to 11:1; I Chron. 19:1 to 20:3).

2 and 3. Two Jews who repaired portions of the wall of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Neh. 3:13, 30).

Haph'a-ra'im (häf'á-rā'im), in A.V. Haph-ra'im (häf-rā'im) [two pits, double pit]. A frontier town of Issachar (Josh. 19:19), by some identified with Khirbet el-Fariyeh, 5½ miles n.w. of Megiddo, but more probably to be identified with et-Taiyibeh, n.w. of Bethshan, in the heart of Issachar.

Hap'pizzez (häp'i-zēz), in A.V. Aph'ses [the shattering]. A descendant of Aaron. His family became the 18th of David's 24 courses of the priests (I Chron. 24:15).

Ha'ra (hā'rā). A place in Assyria to which captives from the 10 tribes were carried (I Chron. 5:26). In the corresponding passages (II Kings 17:6; 18:11) the expression "the river of Gozan" directly follows "the Habor," with which it is in apposition. In both cases the verse concludes with "and in the [āre Mādāy] cities of the Medes"; instead of "cities" the LXX reads "mountains," which presupposes Heb. hārē mādāy. The reading of Chronicles apparently is due to textual corruption; a phrase has been transposed, and, with the omission of Mādāy, hārē (mountains of) became a proper name Hārā'.

Ha-ra'dah (hā-rā'dā) [trembling, fear]. An encampment of the Israelites in the wilderness, after being turned back from Rithmah (Num. 33:24).

Ha'ran, I (hā'rān). 1. A son of Terah, and brother of Abraham. He died early, in his native place, Ur of the Chaldees; but left a son, Lot, and 2 daughters, Milcah and Iscah (Gen. 11:29).

2. A Gershonite Levite, son of Shimei (I Chron. 23:9).

Ha'ran, II (hā'rān), in A.V. of N.T., Char'ran [cf. Akkad. harrānu, road, caravan, business]. 1. A city of Mesopotamia, on the Belikh, an affluent of the Euphrates, about 240 miles w. by n. from Nineveh and 280 n.e. of Damascus. It was a commercial center, being on one of the main trade routes between Babylonia and the Mediterranean; and, like Ur of the Chaldees, had the moon-god for its patron deity. Terah and Abraham sojourned in it for a time, and Terah died there (Gen. 11:31, 32; 12:4, 5). The family of Nahor settled there, and Jacob for a time resided there (chs. 28:10; 29:4, 5). The Assyrians hunted in its vicinity as early as 1100 B.C.; and they long held sway over it. A capture of the city by them is mentioned (II Kings 19:12). In 53 B.C. the Roman triumvir Crassus, the colleague of Pompey and of Julius Caesar, was defeated near Haran by the Parthian general Surena, by whose representatives he was soon afterward barbarously slain. It is now a small Arab village, still retaining the name of Harrān.

2. Son of Caleb and Ephah, of the family of Hezron (I Chron. 2:46).

Ha'ra-rite (hā-rā-rīt) [perhaps, mountain-ear]. An epithet applied to several of David's heroes (II Sam. 23:11, 33; I Chron. 11:34, 35). Probably, to judge from the context of II Sam. 23:33, it means an inhabitant of a hamlet called Harar (mountain) from its location on some peak. See ARARITE.

Har-bo'na (hār-bō'nā) and Har-bo'nah (hār-bō'nā) [Avestan, the bald man]. A chamberlain of Ahasuerus (Esth. 1:10; 7:9).

Hare. An animal (Heb., 'arnebeth) said to chew the cud, but not to part the hoof, and therefore unclean (Lev. 11:6; Deut. 14:7). The opinion of the Hebrews that the animal chewed the cud was founded on a peculiar movement of its mouth. Physiologically it is not a ruminating animal but a rodent. The common hare of Palestine (Lepus syriacus) is 2 inches shorter than the European hare (L. europaeus) and has slightly shorter ears. It frequents wooded and cultivated places. The common hare of s. Judea and the Jordan Valley (L. judeae of Gray) has very long ears and light tawny fur. Tristram enumerates 3 other species of the s. frontier: L. aegyptiacus, the Egyptian hare, in the s.e. part of Judea; L. isabillinus, in the sandy deserts of s.e. Palestine; and L. sinaiticus, with fur of a reddish hue.

Har'el (hār'ēl). A portion of the altar described by Ezekiel (Ezek. 43:15). In the text of the A.V. it is rendered altar, and in that of the R.V. upper altar. See ARIEL.

Ha'reph (hār'rēf) [reproaching; but cf. Syriac harif, sharp, keen]. A son of Caleb, and ancestor of the inhabitants of Beth-gader (I Chron. 2:51).

Har'reth (hār'rēth). See HERETH.

Har-ha'iah (hār-hā'yā). Father of the goldsmith Uzziel (Neh. 3:8).

Har'has (hār'hās). An ancestor of Shallum, husband of Huldah the prophetess (II Kings 22:14). Called Hasrah in II Chron. 34:22.

Har'hur (hār'hūr) [violent heat, fever]. The founder of a family of Nethinim, some of whom returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:51; Neh. 7:53).

Har'im (hār'im) [consecrated, inviolable; or having a slit nose]. 1. A descendant of Aaron. His family had grown to a father's house in the time of David and constituted the 3d course of the priests (I Chron. 24:1, 6, 8). Probably they were members of this family who returned from Babylon (Ezra 2:39; Neh. 7:42). A father's house among the priests in the next generation after the Exile bore this name (Neh. 12:15); see REHUM. At a later period some of this family were among those who had married foreign wives (Ezra 10:21). And later still a priest of this name, doubtless head of a father's house, signed the covenant to observe the law of God and to endeavor to prevent intermarriages with foreigners (Neh. 10:5).

2. Founder of a nonpriestly family, members of which returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:32; 10:31; Neh. 3:11; 7:35).

Har'riph (hār'rīf) [autumnal, harvested; cf. Heb. hōreph, Arab. harif, autumn]. Founder of a family, members of which returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. 7:24). A prince of this name sealed the covenant, doubtless as representative of the family (ch. 10:19). The same as Jorah (Ezra 2:18), which also means autumnal rain.

Har'lot. A prostitute (Gen. 38:15; Lev. 21:7; Deut. 23:18; Josh 2:1; Judg. 16:1). To play the harlot or to go a whoring after, often means, in Scriptural usage, to go with or after a paramour; in a figurative sense, to depart from Jehovah and give the affections and worship to other gods (Jer. 2:20; 3:1; Ezek. 16:15, 16; 23:5).

Har'-Ma-ged'on (hār-mā-gēd'ūn), in A.V. Ar-ma-ged'don [Gr., from Heb., mountain of Megiddo]. A prophetic battlefield where the kings of the whole world gather together unto the war of the great day of God (Rev. 16:16). The name is framed with evident reference to the sanguinary contests which took place near the town of Megiddo; the 1st, that in which Sisera and the Canaanites were defeated at the waters of Megiddo (Judg. 5:19), the 2d, that which resulted in the death of Ahaziah, king of Judah, at Megiddo (II Kings 9:27), and the 3d, that in which King Josiah was killed when in conflict with the army of Necho (II Kings 23:29; Zech. 12:11). The historical associations with Megiddo in the past were seized upon by the prophet to supply a name appropriate in a description of the future sorrows and triumphs of God's people.

Har'ne-pher (hār'nē-fēr) [perhaps, Egypt., Horus is good]. An Asherite, son of Zophah (I Chron. 7:36).

Ha'rod (hār'rod) [trembling, terror]. A well near which Gideon pitched while his adversaries, the Midianites, were by the hill of Moreh, in the valley (Judg. 7:1). It is commonly identified with 'Ain Jālūd, on the n.w. side of Mount Gilboa, about a mile e. by s. of Jezreel.

Ha'rod-ite (hār'rod-it). An inhabitant of the town of Harod (II Sam. 23:25), probably to be identified with Khirbet Khareidān about 3¼ miles s.e. of Jerusalem.

Har'ro'eh (hā-rō'ē). See REAIAH.

Ha'ro-rite (hār'ro-rīt). Rather Harodite (q.v.) (I Chron. 11:27; cf. II Sam. 23:25). The second r (resh) probably arose through confusion with d (daleth).

Ha-ro'sheth (hā-rō'shēth) [carving]. A town now fully called Harosheth of the Gentiles or nations. Sisera had his residence there (Judg. 4:2, 13, 16). It is Tell 'Amār below el-Harithiyeh, located at a small village on the n. bank of the Kishon, at the point where the stream passes through a narrow gorge to enter the plain of Acre; it is 16 miles n.n.w. of Megiddo.

Harp. Rendering of Heb. kinnōr; and in the N.T. of Gr. kithara (lyre, lute). It was a stringed musical instrument of the harp kind, small enough to be carried about (Isa. 23:16), and was played with the fingers (I Sam.

Ancient Egyptian Harp

16:23; Jos. Antiq. vii. 12, 3), or with a plectrum. It was played by Jubal, an antediluvian, of the race of Cain (Gen. 4:21), was known to Laban (ch. 31:27), was the instrument with which David soothed Saul during his fits of melancholy madness (I Sam. 16:16). The prophets and others used it for sacred purposes (I Sam. 10:5; Ps. 43:4; 49:4), and it was played in the Temple orchestra (I Chron. 25:1, 3); see MUSIC. It was employed also in festive entertainments (Job 21:12). Harlots sometimes carried it about with them (Isa. 23:15, 16). It was the instrument which the captive Jews hung on the Babylonian willows (Ps. 137:2). Two kinds were in use in Egypt: a larger, of the height of a man, and a smaller, which was easily carried. The Hebrews were acquainted with the harp, but it is not certain that the word kinnōr really means harp. The Seventy regarded it rather as a lyre or lute, than a harp, for they render the Heb. word by kithara.

Har'row. An agricultural implement consisting of a wooden frame armed with teeth of wood or iron (II Sam. 12:31). It is drawn over plowed land to level it and break the clods preparatory to sowing the seed, and to cover the seed when sown. It may be that the Heb. word in II Sam. 12:31 denotes threshing-sledges (cf. Amos 1:3). The Israelites broke the clods in some manner (Job 39:10; Isa. 28:24; Hos. 10:11), but it is doubtful whether they used a harrow.

Har'sha (hār'shā) [dumb, silent]. Founder of a family of Nethinim, some of whom returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:52; Neh. 7:54).

Hart. A stag, or male deer, 5 years old, and which has developed its sur-royal or crown antler. It is the rendering of Heb. 'ayyāl (deer), a wild, clean animal (Deut. 12:15; 14:5; I Kings 4:23; Ps. 42:1; S. of Sol. 8:14). See DEER.

Ha'rum (hār'rum). A man of Judah, father of Aharhel (I Chron. 4:8).

Ha-ru'maph (hā-rōō'māf) [having a slit nose]. Father of a certain Jedaiiah (Neh. 3:10).

Ha-ru'phite (hā-rōō'fīt). The designation of Shephatiah, a Benjamite, who joined David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:5). The kere has ū, as above, but the kethib has ī, making the word Hariphite, a member of the family of Hariph (cf. Neh. 7:24).

Ha'ruz (hār'ruz) [gold; but cf. S. Arab., covetous, eager]. Father-in-law of King Manasseh (II Kings 21:19).

Har'vest. The period of harvest in ancient Palestine may be divided into 2 portions: that of barley and that of wheat harvest, the former preceding the latter by about a fortnight (Ruth 2:23). Its beginning was consecrated by the bringing of the sheaf of first fruits (Lev. 23:10). It began in the lowlands before the crops were ripe on the hills. In the hot Jordan Valley barley harvest commenced in April, when the Jordan was full (Josh. 3:15; cf. ch. 5:10), directly after the rainy season (I Sam. 12:17, 18; Prov. 26:1). Wheat harvest lingered in the uplands to the month of June. It was a hot time of the year (Prov. 25:13; Isa. 18:4). When the harvest was completed and the produce gathered in, there were great rejoicings (Isa. 9:3). The feasts of unleavened bread, of weeks or harvest, and of ingathering, had all a relation to the season of reaping. See YEAR.

Has'a-dī'ah (hās'-ā-dī'ā) [Jehovah has been gracious]. A son of Zerubbabel (I Chron. 3:20).

Has'e-nu'ah (hās'-ē-nū'ā). See HASSENUAH.

Hash'a-bī'ah (hāsh'-ā-bī'ā) [Jehovah has reckoned, devised, imputed]. 1. A Merarite Levite, descended through Amaziah, and an ancestor of Jeduthun [Ethan] (I Chron. 6:44, 45). Perhaps he is the descendant of Bunni mentioned as ancestor of Shemaiah (I Chron. 9:14; Neh. 11:15).

2. A Merarite Levite, son of Jeduthun and head of the 12th company of musicians appointed by David for the sanctuary (I Chron. 25:3, 19).

3. A Kohathite Levite of the family of Hebron, and inspector for the country w. of Jordan (I Chron. 26:30; cf. ch. 23:12).

4. A Levite, son of Kemuel, prince of the tribe of Levi in David's reign (I Chron. 27:17).

5. A chief of the Levites during the reign of Josiah (II Chron. 35:9).

6. A Merarite Levite, who joined Ezra at the river of Ahava, and was apparently one of the 12 who were entrusted with the treasure which was being conveyed to Jerusalem (Ezra 8:19, 24). Probably it was he who sealed the covenant (Neh. 10:11), and who was a chief Levite and one of the Temple musicians (Neh. 12:24).

7. The ruler, in Nehemiah's time, of half Keilah. He repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:17).

8. A Levite, descended from Asaph (Neh. 11:22).

9. A priest, head of the father's house of Hilkiah, in the time of Joiakim the high priest (Neh. 12:21).

Ha-shab'nah (hā-shāb'nā) [perhaps for Hashabneiah]. One of those who with Nehemiah sealed the covenant (Neh. 10:25).

Hash'ab-nei'ah (hāsh'-āb-nē-i'ā), in A.V. Hash'ab-ni'ah (hāsh'-āb-nī'ā) [perhaps, Jehovah has taken account of me]. 1. Father of a certain Hattush (Neh. 3:10).

2. One of those Levites who by their exhortations prepared the returned exiles for sealing the covenant with Jehovah (Neh. 9:5).

Hash-bad'da-nah (hāsh'-bād'-ā-nā), in A.V. Hash-bad'ā-na (hāsh'-bād'-ā-nā). One of those who stood beside Ezra when he addressed the returned exiles (Neh. 8:4).

Ha'shem (hā'shēm). A Gizonite, mentioned in the catalogue of David's mighty men (I Chron. 11:34). See JASHEN.

Hash-mo'nah (hāsh-mō'nā). A camping ground of the Israelites in the wilderness (Num. 33:29, 30).

Ha'shub (hā'shūb). See HASSHUB.

Ha-shu'bah (hā-shōō'bā) [esteemed; consideration]. A son of Zerubbabel (I Chron. 3:20).

Ha'shum (hā'shūm) [cf. Arab. ḥathim, flat-nosed]. Founder of a family, members of which returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:19; 10:33; Neh. 7:22). The representative of the family, or a person of this name, stood beside Ezra while the latter addressed the people (Neh. 8:4), and then sealed the covenant (ch. 10:18).

Ha-shu'pha (hā-shōō'fā). See HASUPHA.

Has'i-dae'ans (hās'i-dē'ānz), in A.V. As'i-de'ans and As'i-de'ans [Gr. Asidaioi from Heb. Hāsīdīm, pious]. A party among the Jews who held strenuously to the old faith (I Macc. 2:42). They joined Mattathias, and later cooperated with Judas Maccabaeus in most of his plans (I Macc. 2:42; II Macc. 14:6), although contrary to his judgment they sought peace from the Syrians (I Macc. 7:13).

Has'mo-nae'an (hāz'mō-nē'ān) [Gr. Asamōnaios, from Heb. Hashmōnay, probably the family name of the house of Mattathias]. A descendant of Hashman, a priest of the family of Joarib (Jehoiarib) and ancestor of the Maccabees (Jos. Antiq. xii. 6, 1; cf. I Macc. 2:1; I Chron. 24:7). The title Hasmonaeon is commonly employed in Jewish literature to designate the family from Mattathias to Herod the Great and Aristobulus (Jos. Antiq. xiv. 16, 4; xx. 8, 11).

Has'mo-nae'ans (hāz'mō-nē'ānz), Pal'ace of the. A palace in Jerusalem erected by the Hasmonaeon princes, opposite the w. court of the Temple, on an elevation which commanded a view of the city and the sanctuary (Jos. Antiq. xx. 8, 11). It stood near the Xystus and overlooked it (Jos. War ii. 16, 3). It is probably the royal palace that was reckoned 1 of the 2 fortresses of Jerusalem, the Baris being the other, and in which Herod the Great resided before the erection of his palace in the upper city (Jos. Antiq. xiv. 13, 9; xv. 3, 7; 8, 4 and 5). This latter building excelled it in magnificence and as a fortress. So late as A.D. 60 the last prince of the Herodian house used it as a residence, Agrippa II, the King Agrippa of Acts 25:13 (Jos. Antiq. xx. 8, 11; War ii. 16, 3). It was probably the palace burned by the seditious Jews at the beginning of the war with the Romans (Jos. War ii. 17, 6).

Has'rah (hāz'rā) [perhaps, want]. See HARHAS.

Has'se-na'ah (hās'-ē-nā'ā), and without the definite article Se-na'ah [perhaps, hated]. The sons of Hasseanaah rebuilt the fish gate of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:3). Of the children of Senaah, some 3,000 returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:35; Neh. 7:38). The context suggests that it is the name of a place; Eusebius and Jerome identified it with Magdalsenna, about 7 miles n. of Jericho. About 7 miles from Jericho on the side of the mountain is a stronghold Khirbet el-'Auja el Fōka which commands the road from the Jordan Valley to Baal-hazor; near by is Sheikh-Terūni with which Senaah may probably be identified.

Has'se-nu'ah (hās'-ē-nū'ā), in A.V. Has'e-nu'ah, and, without the article, Se-nu'ah [perhaps, hated]. 1. A Benjamite, father of Hordaviah (I Chron. 9:7).

2. Parent of a certain Judah (Neh. 11:9).

Ha'shub (hā'shūb), in A.V. of Nehemiah Ha'shub [perhaps, hypocoristic, thought of (by God)]. 1. A son of Pahath-moab. He repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:11).

2. A Jew who repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem opposite to his house (Neh. 3:23). It was probably either he or No. 1 who signed the covenant (ch. 10:23).

3. A Merarite Levite, father of Shemaiah (I Chron. 9:14; Neh. 11:15).

Has'so-ph'e'reth (hās'-ō-phē'rēth). See SOPH-ERETH.

Ha-su'pha (hā-sū'fā), in A.V. once Ha-shu'pha [made bare]. Founder of a family of Nethinim, members of which returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:43; Neh. 7:46).

Hat. The rendering of Aram. karbēlā (Dan. 3:21; in R.V. mantle). See CLOTHING.

Ha'thach (hă'thăk), in A.V. Ha'tach (hă'tăk) [Avestan, hat (good)+ka]. A chamberlain of King Ahasuerus, who was appointed to attend Esther (Esth. 4:5, 10).

Ha'thath (hă'thăth) [terror]. A son of Othniel (I Chron. 4:13).

Ha-ti'pha (hă-ti'fă) [Aram., captive]. One who founded a family of Nethinim, members of which returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:54; Neh. 7:56).

Ha-ti'ta (hă-ti'tă) [Aram., dug up, furrowed]. A porter who founded a family, members of which returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:42; Neh. 7:45).

Ha'til (hă'til) [cf. Arab. ḥaṭla, to be talkative]. One of Solomon's servants, who founded a family, the members of which returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:55, 57; Neh. 7:57-59).

Ha'tin (hă'tin), Horns of [Arab. Ḥarn Ḥaṭṭin, horn of depressions or hollows]. A two-peaked hill on the road from Tiberias on the Sea of Galilee to Cana and Nazareth. According to a tradition of the Latin Church dating from the 13th century, it was the scene of the delivery of the Sermon on the Mount, but we have no means of confirming so late a tradition.

Ha'tush (hă'tūsh). 1. A man of Judah, son of Shemaiah, and family of Shecaniah (I Chron. 3:22).

2. A chief of the priests, who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Neh. 12:2, 7).

3. Head of a father's house, of the sons of David, who returned with Ezra to Jerusalem (Ezra 8:2).

4. A son of Hashabneiah. He repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:10).

5. A priest who with Nehemiah sealed the covenant (Neh. 10:14).

Ha'u-ran' (hă'ōō-răn') [probably, black land (as basaltic region); cf. Arab. dialect haur, black]. A region s. of Damascus and bordering on Gilead (Ezek. 47:16, 18). In the Greco-Roman period it designated a smaller district. It was then known as Auranitis, and was one of 4 provinces, having Trachonitis on the n. and Gaulonitis and apparently Batanea toward the n.w. (Jos. Antiq. xvii. 11, 4; xviii. 4, 6; War i. 20, 4; ii. 6, 3; 17, 4). Thus it probably consisted of the plain lying between Gaulonitis and the present Jebel Hauran, perhaps including the latter. About the year 23 B.C. Auranitis with Trachonitis and Batanea was bestowed on Herod the Great by Augustus. When Herod's kingdom was divided, these districts constituted the major part of Philip's tetrarchy (Luke 3:1; Jos. Antiq. xvii. 11, 4). The surface is flat, broken only by a few volcanic mounds. The soil is so fertile that the Hauran is the granary for the whole region round. Many towns and villages, mostly deserted, exist within its limits, some of them "the giant cities of Bashan," built of basalt.

Ha-vi'lah (hăv'i-lă) [sandy; cf. Heb. höl, sand]. A district of Arabia, peopled in part by Cushites and in part by Joktanites, a Semitic people (Gen. 10:7, 29; I Chron. 1:9, 23). The association of Havilah with Hazarmaveth and other places points to a locality in central or s. Arabia. To Havilah belonged the river Pishon; and the region was rich in gold, aromatic gum, and precious stones (Gen. 2:11, 12). Some prefer to identify it with Haulan (Khawlān), in the w. part of Arabia, n. of Yemen. How far n. Havilah extended is not clear. From the record of Saul's warfare with the Amalekites it may be inferred that the Arabian desert for several hundred miles n. of al-Yamamah bore the name Havilah (I Sam. 15:7; cf. Gen. 25:18).

Hav'roth-jair (hăv'ōth-jă'ir), in A.V. Ha'voth-jair (hă'vōth-jă'ir) [tent villages or encampments of Jair]. Unwalled towns in the n.w. part of Bashan, in the region of the Argob, where this tract approaches the country of the Geshurites and Maacathites, and where the boundaries between the rugged land, Gilead, and the open, sandy land, Bashan, insensibly merge into each other (Deut. 3:4, 14). They were captured by Jair, a Manassite. Their number was liable to fluctuation because they lay in a debatable land (I Chron. 2:23, R.V. marg.). They are to be carefully distinguished from the 60 walled cities in the heart of Bashan, and likewise in the Argob (Deut. 3:4, 5; I Kings 4:13). Since the boundary between Gilead and Bashan was not clearly defined by nature, it never was conventionally, and places on this undefined border are referred to as in Gilead or in Bashan according to the momentary point of view of the narrator. The conquest of Bashan by the Israelites included the capture of the unwalled towns in the Argob on this indefinite border; and when their capture by Jair is related in connection with the conquest of Og's kingdom, which was carried on from Edrei in Bashan as the center, the Havroth-jair are described as in Bashan (Deut. 3:14; Josh. 13:30). When, however, the e. country is before the mind of a sojourner in the Jordan Valley or in Canaan w. of the river, he naturally speaks first of Gilead, and sometimes even uses that designation broadly for the entire highland e. of the river, or he may speak of a conquest of Gilead which was not narrowly confined to the distinctively rugged land. From this point of view he is apt to refer to the towns on the undefined border of Gilead and Bashan as in Gilead (I Chron. 2:21-23; indefinitely, Num. 32:40, 41; I Kings 4:13). It is clear that the Havroth-jair and the Argob were not the same.

Hawk. The rendering of Hebrew nēs (Job 39:26). It was ceremonially unclean (Lev. 11:16; Deut. 14:15), and included more than one species of the smaller predatory birds, as the sparrow hawk (Accipiter nisus) and the kestrel (Falco tinnunculus). The former abounds in Lebanon and the hilly parts of Galilee in summer, and in Judea and the Arabah in winter; the latter, which is properly a falcon instead of a genuine hawk, is abundant in every part of Palestine throughout the year.

Haz'ael (hăz'ă-ēl) [God has seen]. A Syrian courtier whom Elijah was directed by Jehovah to anoint king over Syria (I Kings 19:15). Some years later, between 845 and 843 B.C., Ben-hadad, who then reigned over that country, with Damascus for his capital, hearing that Elisha was in the city, sent Hazael to ask the prophet whether he should recover from a serious illness from which he then suffered. Elisha told Hazael that his master would not recover and that he himself would be king of Syria and would perpetrate great cruelties on the people of Israel. When Hazael returned to Ben-hadad, he told him that the prophet foretold his recovery, and next day assassinated him and reigned in his stead (II Kings 8:7-15, R.V.). In 842 the Assyrian king Shalmaneser warred against Hazael and exacted tribute. In 838 Shalmaneser again warred with him. Toward the close of Jehu's reign over Israel, Hazael smote the country of the Hebrews e. of the Jordan (II Kings 10:32); and in the succeeding reign, crossing the river, he mightily oppressed the Israelites (ch. 13:4-7), invaded the country of the Philistines, took Gath, and was only deterred from attacking Jerusalem by a rich present consisting of the dedicated treasures of the Temple (ch. 12:17, 18). The house of Hazael (Amos 1:4) is Damascus.

Ha'za'lah (hā-zā'yá) [Jehovah has seen]. A man of Judah, family of Shelah (Neh. 11:5).

Ha'zar-ad'dar (hā-zār-ād'ār). See ADDAR.

Ha'zar-e'nan (hā-zār-ē'nān) and Ha'zar-e'nōn (hā-zār-ē'nōn) [village of fountains]. A village on the n. boundary of Palestine (Num. 34:9; Ezek. 47:17; 48:1), probably Kiryatein on the route from Damascus to Palmyra.

Ha'zar-gad'dah (hā-zār-gād'á) [village of good fortune]. A town in the extreme s. of Judah (Josh. 15:27), perhaps Khirbet Ghazza, s.w. of Rās Zuweira.

Ha'zar-hat'ti'con (hā-zār-hāt'i-kōn). See HAZER-HATTICON.

Ha'zar-ma'veth (hā-zār-mā'veth) [village of death]. A body of Joktanites who peopled a district in Arabia (Gen. 10:26; I Chron. 1:20). A region in Arabia Felix, in the s. of the peninsula, is still called by the Arabs Had(h)ramaut, which corresponds etymologically to Hazarmaveth.

Ha'zar-shu'al (hā-zār-shō'āl) [fox village]. A town in the extreme s. of Judah, assigned to the Simeonites (Josh. 15:23; 19:3; I Chron. 4:28). It was occupied after the Captivity (Neh. 11:27); perhaps to be identified with el-Waṭān, between Beer-sheba and Tell es-Saba', s.e. of the former.

Ha'zar-su'sah (hā-zār-sū'sá), in pl. Ha'zar-su'sim (hā-zār-sū'sim) [village of a mare, mares]. A village belonging to the Simeonites (Josh. 19:5; I Chron. 4:31). As a possible site Sblat Abū Sūsein near Tell el-Far'a has been suggested, but perhaps Sūsiyeh (near Tell Mā'in) 2 miles e. by n. of Eshtemoa is better.

Haz'azon-ta'mar (hāz'á-zōn-tā'mēr), in A.V. once Haz'e'zon-ta'mar [Hazazon (sandy surface) of the palm tree]. Cf. En-gedi (II Chron. 20:2). It has also been identified with Tamar (Ezek. 47:19; 48:28) or Thamara, whose site probably is marked by Kurnūb, 20 miles w.s.w. of the s. end of the Dead Sea on the road from Hebron to Elath.

Ha'zel. The rendering in Gen. 30:37, A.V., of Heb. lūz, better translated in R.V., the almond tree.

Haz'e'lel-po'ni (hāz'ē-lēl-pō'nī). See HAZELELPONI.

Haz'er-hat'ti'con (hāz'ēr-hāt'i-kōn), in A.V. Hazar-hat'ti'con [the middle Hazer or village]. A town on the border of the Hauran (Ezek. 47:16).

Ha'ze'rim (hā-zē'rīm) [villages]. Habitations of the Avvim (Deut. 2:23); in the R.V. properly translated by villages.

Ha'ze'roth (hā-zē'rōth) [enclosures, courts]. An encamping ground of the Israelites in the wilderness beyond Kibroth-hattaavah (Num. 11:35) and on this side of Paran (Num. 12:16; 33:17; Deut. 1:1). It was there that Miriam and Aaron murmured against Moses (Num., ch. 12). 'Ain Hudra (or Khudra), about 36 miles n.e. of Mount Sinai, was suggested by Burckhardt, and adopted by Robinson and others, as the site.

Haz'e'zon-ta'mar (hāz'ē-zōn-tā'mēr). See HAZAZON-TAMAR.

Ha'zi-el (hā'zī-ēl) [probably contraction of Jahaziel]. A Gershonite Levite, son of Shimei (I Chron. 23:9).

Ha'zo (hā'zō). A son of Nahor and Milcah (Gen. 22:22). The name is probably preserved in the hilly region Hazū, which Esarhaddon traversed, not remote from the Hauran.

Ha'zor (hā'zōr) [an enclosure]. 1. The capital of the Canaanite kingdom in the n. of Palestine, ruled over in Joshua's time by Jabin. According to Josephus, it was situated above the waters of Merom (Jos. Antiq. v. 5, 1). The town was taken by Joshua and burnt (Josh. 11:1-13; 12:19). It was rebuilt, and was assigned to the tribe of Naphtali (Josh. 19:36). In the days of Deborah and Barak it was ruled by another King Jabin. On the defeat of his general, Sisera, he attempted to continue the war against the Israelites, but was ultimately overcome and slain (Judg. 4:1-24; I Sam. 12:9). It is doubtful whether this or some other Hazor was the town fortified by Solomon (I Kings 9:15), but it was certainly the place so named whose inhabitants were carried into captivity to Assyria by Tiglath-pileser (II Kings 15:29). In the neighboring plain Jonathan defeated Demetrius (I Macc. 11:67; in A.V. Nasor; Jos. Antiq. xiii. 5, 7). Robinson identified Hazor with Tell Khūreibeh, 3½ miles w. of the waters of Merom, but more recent evidence favors Tell Wakkās or Tell el-Kedah, about 3¼ miles w. of the Bridge of Jacob's Daughters.

2. Hazor, in the extreme s. of Judah, near Kedesh (Josh. 15:23), may be identified with el-Jebariyeh upon the wadi Umm Ethnān near Bir el-Hafir, which is about 8¼ miles s.e. of el-'Aujā.

3. Kerieth-hezron (Josh. 15:25, R.V.). Generally identified with Khirbet el-Karyatein about 4½ miles s. of Tell Mā'in. A.V. and J.V. do not have the compound name, which Père Abel also rejects.

4. A village of Benjamin (Neh. 11:33). Conder identifies it with Khirbet Hazzur, 4 miles n.n.w. of Jerusalem, and between Beit Hanina and Nebi Samwil.

5. A region in the Arabian desert, e. of Palestine. Jeremiah prophesied its plundering by Nebuchadnezzar (Jer. 49:28-33). Berosus states that Nebuchadnezzar conquered Arabia (Jos. Apion i. 19). The name is probably a collective and refers to the settled village life of the community in contrast to that of the nomads.

Ha'zor-ha-dat'tah (hā'zōr-hā-dāt'á), in A.V. punctuated as 2 places, Ha'zor, Ha-dat'tah (hā'zōr, hā-dāt'á) [if the 2d word is Aram., the name means new village]. A town in the s. of Judah (Josh. 15:25), apparently near Hazor 3; perhaps at el-Hudeira, s.e. of Tuwāni toward the Dead Sea.

Haz'zelel-po'ni (hāz'ē-lēl-pō'nī), in A.V. Haz'e'lel-po'ni [give shade, thou who turnest toward me]. A woman of Judah, daughter of the ancestor of the men of Etam (I Chron. 4:3).

He (hā). The 5th letter of the Heb. alphabet; pronounced like English h. It stands at the head of the 5th section of Psalm 119, since each verse in the section begins with this letter in the original.

Head'band. The rendering of Heb. kishshūr, (Isa. 3:20, in R.V. a sash; Jer. 2:32, attire).

Heath. The rendering of the Heb. words 'ar'ār (Jer. 17:6; but R.V. marg., following the LXX, has tamarisk), in Arab., juniper, J. oxycedrus (Post), and 'arō'ēr (Jer. 48:6); both of which involve the idea of nakedness. Heath is a shrub, with minute, narrow, rigid leaves. The species Erica verticillata, a low shrub with racemed, pink, sweet-scented flowers, grows on the w. slopes of Lebanon (Post).

Hea'then [Anglo-Saxon, dweller on the heath]. The word suggests the fact that the gospel first rooted itself in towns, the inhabitants of which became Christians, while the dwellers on heaths remained worshippers of false divinities. The word pagan, from Lat. paganus, belonging to a village, rustic, has a somewhat similar connotation.

One of a people who do not worship the God of the Bible, especially if they are addicted to idolatry. It is a frequent rendering of Heb. gōy and Gr. ethnos, each of which means nation or people. E.R.V. employs the word heathen only in O.T. and then only when the character of the Gentile nations is clearly referred to; as in speaking of the abominations of the heathen (II Kings 16:3; Ezek. 23:30), their filthiness (Ezra 6:21), their ignorance of the truth, opposition to the true religion, barbarous trampling upon it and upon the people of God, and consequent exposure to the righteous indignation of Jehovah (Ps. 79:1, 6, 10, but not Ps. 115:2; also in Jer. 10:25; Lam. 1:3, 10; Ezek. 34:28, 29; 36:6, 7, 15; in these passages A.V. has heathen, and A.R.V. nations).

Heav'en, often The Heav'ens. 1. The sky, the expanse around the earth. It embraces all that is apart from the earth (Gen. 2:1); hence heaven and earth comprehend the universe (Gen. 1:1; 14:19; 24:3; Jer. 23:24; Matt. 5:18). Beyond the visible firmament was the primeval watery mass (Gen. 1:7, 8; Ps. 148:4); which is not further referred to in the account of creation, but out of which it is reasonable to believe the heavenly bodies were formed. These upper waters remained in Hebrew thought along with other Babylonian conceptions. In the visible heavens are the stars and planets (Gen. 1:14-17; Ezek. 32:7, 8). In the part of it next the earth is the atmosphere, in which clouds float, through which birds fly, and from which rain descends (Gen. 1:20; 7:11; 8:2; 27:28; II Sam. 21:10; Ps. 147:8; Lam. 4:19); see FIRMAMENT. The Hebrews, by a familiar idiom, spoke of the heaven of heavens (Deut. 10:14; I Kings 8:27), meaning the heavens in their widest extent. The later Jews were fond of dividing the heavens into 7 different strata. No fixed, definite conception of these several regions prevailed. The highest was regarded as God's dwelling place. Paul describes Christ as ascending far above all the heavens (Eph. 4:10); and he relates an experience, whether in vision or reality he knew not, in which he was caught up into the 3d heaven and into paradise (II Cor. 12:1-4).

2. The place where God's immediate presence is manifested (Gen. 28:17; Ps. 80:14; Isa. 66:1; Matt. 5:12, 16, 45, 48; 23:9), where the angels are (Matt. 24:36; 28:2; Mark 13:32; Luke 22:43), and where the redeemed shall ultimately be (Matt. 5:12; 6:20; 18:10; Eph. 3:15; I Peter 1:4). Christ descended from heaven (John 3:13), and ascended thither again (Acts 1:11), where he maketh intercession for the saints and whence he shall come to judge the quick and the dead (Matt. 24:30; Rom. 8:34; I Thess. 4:16; Heb. 6:20; 9:24).

3. The inhabitants of heaven (Luke 15:18; Rev. 18:20).

Heave Offer-ing. Every hallowed thing which the Israelites heaved, i.e., took up, took away, from a larger mass and set apart for Jehovah (Lev. 22:12; Num. 5:9; 18:8; 31:28, 29). In general it comprehended: 1. From the most holy things, the portions of the meal offerings, sin offerings, and guilt offerings which were not required to be burned on the altar. These parts were perquisites of the priests, and were eaten by them in the precincts of the sanctuary (Num. 18:9, 10; cf. Lev. 6:16). 2. From the holy gifts, Num. 18:11-19: (a) The heave offering of all wave offerings. It was assigned to the priest's family, for use as food by all the members, male and female, provided they were ceremonially clean (v. 11). (b) The first fruits of the oil, wine, and grain (Num. 18:12; cf. vs. 24, 30; Deut. 18:4; Neh. 10:39). A basketful of these first fruits was presented to Jehovah by the offerer and then spread as a feast for the offerer and his family as the guests of the Lord (Deut. 26:2, 10, 11; cf. ch. 12:6-12). Except this basketful the whole of the first fruits belonged to the priestly families, but could be eaten only by those members of the household who were ceremonially clean (Num. 18:13; Deut. 18:4). (c) Every devoted thing (Num. 18:14). (d) The flesh of every unredeemed firstling (Num. 18:15-18). 3. The tithe (Num. 18:21-24), which was assigned as a perquisite to the Levites.

Particular heave offerings were: 1. From peace offerings the right thigh and 3 cakes. 1 out of each oblation (Lev. 7:14, 32-34). 2. From the ram of consecration, used at the induction of the priests into office, the right thigh (Ex. 29:27). It belonged to a peace offering, and accordingly was given to the priests (v. 28); but at the induction of Aaron, the first of the priestly line, it was burnt (Ex. 29:22-25; Lev. 8:25-28). 3. From the first dough, made from the new meal of the year, a cake (Num. 15:20, 21).

He'bel (hē'bēl) [rope, territory]. In marg. of R.V. and text of J.V. (Josh. 19:29); according to this interpretation, a place mentioned in connection with Hosah and Achzib.

He'ber (hē'bēr) [fellowship, associate]. 1. A son of Beriah, grandson of Asher, and founder of a tribal family (Gen. 46:17; Num. 26:45).

2. A Kenite, descendant of Moses' brother-in-law or father-in-law Hobab, and the husband of Jael, who slew Sisera (Judg. 4:11-24).

3. A man registered with Judah, descended from Ezra, and ancestor of the men of Socoh (I Chron. 4:18).

4. A Benjamite, descended from Shaharaim through Elpaal (I Chron. 8:17).

For 2 others bearing this name in A.V., see EBER.

He'brew (hē'brōō) [one from the other side, a crosser, a nomad; or pertaining to Eber].

1. According to Biblical history, the Hebrews were men from the other side of the Euphrates (cf. Gen. 12:5 with ch. 14:13; Josh. 24:2, 3). The name may have denoted this, or it may have been originally a patronymic formed from Eber, and have designated all his descendants, including the Israelites (Gen. 10:21), until the increasing prominence of the Israelites led to restricting its use to them; see EBER.

The Heb. word 'ibri (Hebrew) is regarded by many scholars as cognate with Akkadian ḥabiru, or ḥapiru (pl., ḥabirū), which occurs in the cuneiform literature from one end of the Near East to the other from about the last quarter of the 26th century B.C. to the 11th. It also appears in Egypt as 'apiru. The Habirū were aliens and soldiers of fortune. In Babylonia they were mercenaries; among the Hurrians of Nuzi (Nuzi) they had to sell themselves into virtual slavery in order to make a living. Originally the name seems to have been not an ethnic term, but an appellative. According to the Tell el-Amarna letters, the Habirū were invading Palestine, and Abdi-Hiba of Jerusalem made frantic appeals to Akhnaton (alone, c. 1375-c. 1366 B.C.) for help. The situation corresponds in general to that of the time of the invasion under Joshua. Doubtless the Israelites belonged to the group called Habirū, but not all Habirū were Israelites. See EGYPT, III. 8.

Hebrews in the plural was applied to the Israelites (Gen. 40:15; I Sam. 4:6; 13:3; II Cor. 11:22). In N.T. times it was used specially of those Jews who spoke Hebrew or rather Aramaic in distinction from the Hellenists, their fellow countrymen who spoke Greek (Acts 6:1). A Hebrew of the Hebrews was a thorough Hebrew; as, for example, a person of Hebrew parentage on both the father's and the mother's side (Phil. 3:5).

2. The language spoken by the Hebrews (II Kings 18:26, 28; Isa. 36:11, 13), and called the lip (language) of Canaan (Isa. 19:18), is a member of the Semitic group. Abraham found it in Canaan upon his arrival in the land. The tablets from Tell el-Amarna, the Moabite stone, and Phoenician inscriptions have shown that at least the Canaanites, the Phoenicians, and the Moabites, if not even the adjacent tribes, spoke a language not very different from Hebrew. A form of proto-Hebrew written in a cuneiform alphabet is found in the Ras Shamra tablets of the 14th or 15th century B.C.

The Heb. alphabet consists of 22 consonants. Originally the language was written without vowel points, these not being introduced earlier than the 6th century A.D., or perhaps even a little later. They were the work of certain Jewish scholars called Masoretes, whose headquarters were at Tiberias. With the exception of portions of the books of Daniel and Ezra and a few verses elsewhere in Aramaic, the whole of the O.T. was written originally in Hebrew.

Languages have their periods of growth, and likewise there was a development previous to Biblical Hebrew and during O.T. times. Furthermore there were dialects in ancient Hebrew (cf. Shibboleth and Sibboleth, Judg. 12:5, 6). The Biblical language before the Babylonian Captivity is comparatively pure; during the Exile and in postexilic times Aramaic exerted a decided influence on Hebrew and finally superseded it as the spoken vernacular. Hebrew, however, remained the language of religion and of the schools. The Mishnah (c. A.D. 200) is written in the later Hebrew of antiquity. A further development is Rabbinic Hebrew, the language used by the Jewish theologians on Talmudic subjects and in Biblical exegesis. Thus Hebrew continued through the Middle Ages as a learned tongue. Its final form is Modern Hebrew, which is now spoken in Palestine and recognized as an official language in that land.

The Aramaic in the time of our Lord had taken the place of Hebrew as the colloquial language (Mark 5:41), and had usurped its name; accordingly Aramaic is meant by the Hebrew language, or the Hebrew tongue, or the Hebrew, or simply Hebrew, in John 5:2; 19:13, 17, 20; Acts 21:40; 22:2; 26:14; Rev. 9:11.

He'brews (hē'brōōz), The Epistle to the. The 14th of the N.T. epistles as they are arranged in the Eng. Bible. That it was addressed to Jewish Christians is quite generally accepted. They were in danger of returning to Judaism through the pressure of outward trial and opposition (Heb. 2:1; 3:12; 4:1, 11; 5:12; 6:6; 10:23-25, 29). They had been early converts (ch. 5:12) and had received the gospel from its first preachers (ch. 2:3). They had long ago been persecuted (ch. 10:32-34) and had often ministered to the saints (ch. 6:10; 10:34). There is no reference to Gentile members in their churches, and their danger lay in a return not so much to the Law as to the ritual. These allusions best suit the Hebrew Christians of Palestine, and to them doubtless, with perhaps other Jewish believers of the East, the epistle was addressed. Some critics, however, maintain that it was directed to Gentile Christians, or to Christians regardless of their origin, or even to a small group in Rome.

Its authorship has always been disputed. Even in the ancient Church opinion was divided, though the canonicity and authority of the book were recognized. The early Eastern Church received it as Pauline, though it was felt to be unlike the rest of Paul's epistles, and theories were advanced to explain the difference. Clement of Alexandria thought that perhaps Luke translated it from a Heb. original written by Paul. In the early Western Churches its Pauline authorship was doubted and denied, and Tertullian attributed it to Barnabas. Origen in the 3d century said that only God knows who wrote it, but finally the Eastern opinion, though uncritical, became the universally accepted one. The book is anonymous. Ch. 2:3, however, seems to imply that the author was not an apostle. It certainly implies that he was not one of the original apostles, and it is unlike Paul to represent himself as receiving the gospel from others (cf. Gal. 1:11-24). From Heb. 13:18, 19 we may infer that the writer was well known to his readers and was unhappily separated from them. In ch. 13:23 the reference to Timothy is not sufficient to indicate the author, nor does the expression "they of Italy" (ch. 13:24) prove his locality, though the natural inference is that he was in Italy.

The evidence of the contents and style also impresses different minds in different ways. It certainly is not a translation of a Heb. original. Its doctrine has much in common with Paul, though the truth is put in a slightly different way. Its language has a large classic element in it, and its style has seemed to most critics unlike the apostle's, being smoother, often more elegant, and less impetuous. The omission of any address also is unlike Paul's usage elsewhere; and the author seems to have used exclusively the LXX, while Paul constantly shows his familiarity with the Hebrew as well. Since no good evidence points to Paul as the author, many suggestions as to authorship have been advanced. Because of the literary elegance of the epistle, Luther ascribed it to Apollos (Acts 18:24). Another plausible view is that which attributes it to Barnabas, who has at least some ancient testimony in his favor, and who in The Acts appears as the mediator between the Jewish Christians and Paul. No early MS. attributes it to Paul, and consequently A.R.V. has the heading "The Epistle to the Hebrews." The following analysis will exhibit the thought of the epistle:

I. The author begins by stating the superiority of Christianity to all previous and possible revelation because of the superior dignity of Christ to all previous and possible organs of revelation (ch. 1), a fact which should warn us not to forsake the gospel (ch. 2:1-4). Nor should the humiliation of Christ appear a difficulty, since just by it he becomes our Saviour and high priest (ch. 2:5-18). Christ, therefore, is of superior dignity even to Moses (ch. 3:1-6), and the warnings against unbelief in the older revelation which were addressed to Israel are doubly applicable against unbelief in the final revelation of the gospel (chs. 3:7 to 4:13).

II. The epistle then unfolds the value of Christ's high-priestly office (ch. 4:14-16); explaining its nature and showing that Christ did, and that it was predicted he would, exercise it (ch. 5); and, after gently, yet vigorously, rebuking them for their failure to grasp the full truth of the gospel (ch. 6), unfolding the superiority of Christ's priesthood, as typified in Melchizedek, to the Levitical, the consequent abrogation of the latter with its ritual, and the all-sufficiency of Christ's (ch. 7).

THE SACRED MOSQUE AT HEBRON

This is the supposed site of the Cave of Machpelah, where Abraham and Sarah were buried.

III. Then the epistle shows that Christ's priesthood must now be necessarily exercised in heaven, so that his invisibility should be no difficulty to them. In this heavenly ministry Christ fulfills the types, realizes the promises and remedies the imperfections of the earthly ritual (chs. 8:1 to 10:18).

IV. The 4th section (chs. 10:19 to 12:29) urges them to live up to these truths by an enduring faith. The writer exhorts to renewed confidence in Christ and to the maintenance of their Christian associations (ch. 10:19-25); depicts the hopelessness which would follow apostasy (ch. 10:26-31); incites them by recalling their former zeal (ch. 10:32-39), the examples of the Hebrew heroes of faith (ch. 11) and of Christ himself (ch. 12:1-3); and bids them consider their trials as but the chastening of the Lord preparatory to a glorious salvation (ch. 12:4-29).

V. In ch. 13 are added some specific exhortations.

This epistle is the only one in which the title of priest is applied to Christ, though of course the substance of the doctrine is elsewhere taught; it represents Christianity as the completion and goal of the old dispensation; the clear announcement of that way of salvation previously taught by type and ritual. It gives the argument, therefore, most likely to establish Hebrews in the faith, and without it the N.T. teaching would be obviously incomplete.

Internal evidence bearing upon the date of composition in all probability favors c. A.D. 65-68, for the present tense used to describe the Levitical ritual (chs. 9:6 seq., 9, 22, 25; 10:1, 8; 13:11) implies a date prior to the destruction of the Temple in A.D. 70. Some scholars, however, who date the book c. 80-90, maintain that the author wrote of that ritual from an idealized point of view, basing his description solely upon the Pentateuch. At any rate, the epistle was known to Clement of Rome (A.D. 96); and Timothy, who was born probably c. A.D. 25, was still living (ch. 13:23). G. T. P. (Rev., H. S. G.)

He'bron (hē'brōn) [union, league]. 1. A Levite, son of Kohath and founder of a tribal family (Ex. 6:18; I Chron. 6:2); see HEBRONITES.

2. A town in the hill country of Judah (Josh. 15:48, 54), called originally Kiriath-arba (fourfold city, or Tetrapolis) (Gen. 23:2; Josh. 20:7); see ARBA. It was built 7 years before Zoan, in Egypt (Num. 13:22), and existed at least as early as the days of Abraham, who for a time resided in its vicinity, under the oaks or terebinths of Mamre (Gen. 13:18; 35:27). Sarah died there, and Abraham bought the cave of Machpelah for a sepulcher. He purchased it from the Hittites who then occupied the town (ch. 23:2-20). Isaac and Jacob for a time sojourned at Hebron (Gen. 35:27; 37:14). It was visited by the spies, who found Anakim among its inhabitants (Num. 13:22). Its king, Hoham, was one of the 4 kings who allied themselves with Adoni-zedek against Joshua, but who were defeated, captured, and slain (Josh. 10:1-27). Hebron itself was afterward taken and its inhabitants destroyed (vs. 36-39). This account is supplemented by ch. 11:21, 22, where it is recorded that at that time Joshua cut off the Anakim from Hebron, Debir, Anab, and all the hill country, and utterly destroyed their cities. After this 1st general campaign, however, the survivors of the old population gradually returned from their hiding places and retreats, and in the course of a few years rebuilt many of the ruined towns. Among those who thus returned were remnants of the 3 families of Anakim who had dwelt at Hebron. Here they were found re-established after the conquest of Canaan (Josh. 14:12). Caleb claimed that district as his own; and when the tribe of Judah took possession of its allotted territory after the death of Joshua, Caleb retook Hebron (Judg. 1:10, 19, 20; and, apparently by anticipation, Josh. 15:13-19). Hebron had dependent villages (Josh. 15:54), was assigned to the priests, and was one of the cities of refuge (Josh. 20:7; 21:10-13; I Chron. 6:54-57). David sent thither part of the recaptured spoil of Ziklag (I Sam. 30:31), and afterward reigned in it for 7½ years (II Sam. 2:1-3, 11, 32; 5:1-5; I Kings 2:11; I Chron. 29:27), several of his sons being born there (II Sam. 3:2-5; I Chron. 3:1-4). Abner was buried there (II Sam. 3:32), and the head of Ish-bosheth was placed in the same grave (ch. 4). It was at Hebron that Absalom raised the standard of rebellion (ch. 15:7-10). It was fortified by Rehoboam (II Chron. 11:5, 10). During the Captivity, when the Edomites occupied the s. of Judah, Hebron, among other places, fell into their hands. It was recaptured from them by Judas Maccabaeus. At that time it had a fortress with towers and was the head of other towns (I Macc. 5:65). It is not mentioned in the N.T. Hebron is now called el-Khalil. It is one of the oldest towns in the world which is still inhabited, instead of being simply a ruin. Hebron is situated in a valley and on an adjacent slope, 3,040 feet above the level of the ocean. It is 19 miles s.s.w. of Jerusalem, and 13½ s.s.w. of Bethlehem. There are 25 springs of water and 10 large wells near Hebron, with vineyards and olive groves.

3. A town of Asher (Josh. 19:28, A.V.), but R.V. Ebron is closer to the Heb. original; see EBRON.

He'bron-ites (hē'brōn-its). The descendants of Hebron, the Kohathite (Num. 3:27; I Chron. 26:30, 31).

He'g'ai (hē'gā-ī) and He'ge (hē'gē) [perhaps, the sprinkler, from Avestan haēk, to sprinkle]. One of the chamberlains of King Ahasuerus. He was the keeper of the women (Esth. 2:3, 8, 15, A.R.V. marg., Hegee).

Heif'er. A young cow (Gen. 15:9; Deut. 21:3; I Sam. 16:2); see Cow and PURIFICATION.

Heir. Inheritance early became a custom. Abraham was acquainted with it (Gen. 15:3, 4). Only sons of a legal wife, not those of a concubine, had the right of inheritance. Ishmael, son of the bondwoman, might not inherit with the son of the free woman (ch. 21:10); and Abraham dismissed with presents the sons whom he had begotten by concubines (ch. 25:5, 6). Still, all Jacob's sons were accorded equal rights. Daughters sometimes inherited like sons (Job 42:15). By the Mosaic Law a man's property was divided on his death among his sons, the eldest obtaining double the portion assigned to his younger brothers (Deut. 21:15-17). When there were no sons, the property went to the daughters (Num. 27:1-8), who, however, were required to abstain from marrying out of their own tribal family (Num., ch. 36; Tobit 6:10-12). If circumstances demanded that a man of other family marry a sole heiress, the children of such a marriage appear to have taken the name of the mother's father (I Chron. 2:34-41; Ezra 2:61). Failing both sons and daughters, the inheritance went to the father's brother, and after him to the nearest of kin (Num. 27:9-11). Greek and Roman rule introduced new customs and made testaments and testators familiar to the Jews (Heb. 9:16, 17). In a figurative sense, believers are heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ (Rom. 8:17).

He'lah (hē'lā) [ornament, necklace]. One of the 2 wives of Ashhur, the ancestor of the men of Tekoa (I Chron. 4:5, 7).

He'lam (hē'lām). A place e. of Jordan, where David defeated Hadarezer, king of Syria (II Sam. 10:16-19). Probably to be identified with Alema (I Macc. 5:26), which is 'Alma in the plain of Hauran.

He'l'bah (hē'l'bā) [fatness, a fertile region]. A city within the territory of Asher, from which the Canaanites were not driven out; probably the same as Ahlab (Judg. 1:31). Identified with Maḥalliba of the Assyrians, which is Khirbet el-Maḥālīb, n.e. of Tyre. Cf. Josh. 19:23, R.V. marg., "from Hebel," which in Heb. is mehebel and may stand for a place Mahalab.

He'l'bon (hē'l'bōn) [fat, fertile]. A city of Syria, celebrated for its wines (Ezek. 27:18). It is commonly identified with Khabūn, 13 miles n.n.w. of Damascus. The village is situated in a narrow valley shut in by steep, bare cliffs and long, shelving banks 2,000 to 3,000 feet high. The bottom of the glen is occupied by orchards, and far up the mountain slopes are terraced vineyards. Along the terraces and in the valley below are extensive ruins. The wine was celebrated in Assyria, Babylonia, and Persia.

He'l'da-i (hē'l'dā-i) [durable, transitory]. 1. A Netophathite, descended from Othniel. He was David's captain for the 12th month (I Chron. 27:15). Doubtless the person called Heled in I Chron. 11:30 (cf. Heleb, II Sam. 23:29).

2. An exile who returned from Babylon (Zech. 6:10), called also Helem (v. 14).

He'leb (hē'lēb) [fatness]. The name given to Heled (II Sam. 23:29).

He'led (hē'lēd) [duration, world]. The son of Baanah, a Netophathite, and one of David's mighty men (I Chron. 11:30). See HELEB and HELDAI.

He'lek (hē'lēk) [portion, lot]. A son of Gilead, and founder of a tribal family of Manasseh (Num. 26:30; Josh. 17:2).

He'lem, I (hē'lēm) [health, strength]. An Asherite, brother of Shamer (I Chron. 7:35), and probably the person called Hotham in v. 32.

He'lem, II (hē'lēm). The same as Heldai 2 (Zech. 6:10, 14).

He'leph (hē'lēf) [permutation, change]. A frontier town of Naphtali (Josh. 19:33). Van de Velde identified it with Beit Līf, in the mountains of Galilee, midway between Kadesh and Rās el-Abiad.

He'lez (hē'lēz) [perhaps, strength; or (God) has delivered]. 1. A Palitite or Pelonite, David's captain for the 7th month (I Chron. 27:10).

2. A man of Judah, descended from Hezron (I Chron. 2:39).

He'li (hē'lī) [Gr. form of Eli]. The father of Joseph, the husband of Mary, but by another view he is the father of Mary, the mother of Jesus. The latter interpretation is reached by punctuating the Gr. differently and understanding Jesus as "being son (as was supposed of Joseph) of Heli" (Luke 3:23). See GENEALOGY.

He'l'ka-i (hē'l'kā-i) [probably contraction of Hilkiah]. A priest, head of the father's house Meraioth (Neh. 12:15).

He'l'kath (hē'l'kāth) [portion, a field]. A town on the boundary line of Asher (Josh. 19:25), assigned, with its suburbs, to the Gershonite Levites (ch. 21:31). Called in I Chron. 6:75 Hukok, which is probably a corruption of the text. Formerly identified with Yerkā, 8½ miles e.n.e. of Acre, but Alt favors Tell el-Harbaḡ.

He'l'kath-haz'zu-rim (hē'l'kāth-hāz'ū-rim) [field of sharp flints or sword-edges]. A name given to the scene of the combat, at the pool of Gibeon, between 12 Benjamites of Ish-bosheth's party and the same number of David's men (II Sam. 2:16).

Hell. 1. The place of the dead. It is one rendering of Heb. She'ol and Gr. Haidēs. A.R.V. of O.T. places Sheol in the text in Deut. 32:22; Ps. 55:15; 86:13, while A.V. has hell. In N.T. R.V. puts Hades in the text (cf. Ps. 16:10 with Acts 2:27). The two words are also rendered grave in A.V. (Gen. 37:35; Isa. 38:10, 18; Hos. 13:14; and A.V. of I Cor. 15:55; in R.V., death). The etymology of the words is in doubt. Sheol is represented as insatiable (cf. Prov. 27:20, R.V.; 30:15, 16). Hades, when pronounced without the aspiration, means the unseen. Both words denote the place of the dead. The evidence is not clear, but it may be safely affirmed that for centuries the Hebrews shared the common Semitic conception of Sheol. This conception was vague and undefined. There was consequently room for the imagination to play, and fancy was fond of supplying all manner of details; and care must be taken not to confound fancies with faith. The ancient Hebrews, like other Semites, thought of Sheol as beneath the earth (Num. 16:30-33; Ezek. 31:17; Amos 9:2). They pictured it as entered through gates (Isa. 38:10), a dark, gloomy region, where the inhabitants pass a conscious, but dull, inactive existence (II Sam. 22:6; Ps. 6:5; Eccl. 9:10). They regarded it as the place whither the souls of all men without distinction go (cf. Gen. 37:35; Ps. 31:17; Isa. 38:10), where punishments may be suffered and rewards enjoyed, and from which a return to earth was not an impossibility (I Sam. 28:19; Heb. 11:19). It is important to note, however, that in authoritative Hebrew doctrine Sheol was open and naked to God (Job 26:6; Prov. 15:11), that God was even there (Ps. 139:8), and that the spirits of his people, and their condition in that abode, were ever under his watchful eye. This doctrine of God's knowledge of his people after death, presence with them, and unceasing love for them, involved the blessedness of the righteous and the woe of the wicked after death, and 2 places of abode for them, the righteous being with the Lord and the wicked being banished from his presence. This doctrine lay also at the basis of the related teaching of the eventual resurrection of the body, and the life everlasting. The doctrine of future glory, and even of the resurrection of the body, was cherished in O.T. times (Job 19:25-27; Ps. 16:8-11; 17:15; 49:14, 15; 73:24; Dan. 12:2, 3). A foundation for it was early afforded by the translation of Enoch and Elijah; it is not certain to what extent, if any, the Hebrews were influenced by the Egyptians, who had definite teaching regarding the future life and the relation of morality in the present life to happiness beyond the grave. But it remained for Christ to bring immortality to full light, and, by revealing the bliss of the saved soul even out of the body in his presence, to dispel all gloom from the future abode of his saints (Luke 23:43; John 14:1-3; II Cor. 5:6-10; Phil. 1:23). See PARADISE.

2. The place of woe. In this sense it is the rendering of Gr. Geenna in Matt. 5:22, 29, 30; 10:28; 18:9; 23:15, 33; Mark 9:47; Luke 12:5, and James 3:6. This word is the Gr. form of Heb. Gē Hinnōm, valley of Hinnom, where children were burnt to Molech. From the horrible sins practiced in it, its pollution by Josiah, and perhaps also because of its burnt in it, the valley of Hinnom became a type of sin and woe, and the name passed into use as a designation for the place of eternal punishment (Matt. 18:8, 9; Mark 9:43). From the scenes witnessed in the valley, imagery was borrowed to describe the Gehenna of the lost (Matt. 5:22; cf. ch. 13:42; Mark 9:48). In II Peter 2:4, "to cast down to hell" is the rendering of the verb tartaroō, meaning "to cast down to Tartarus." The Tartarus of the Romans, the Tartaros of the Greeks, was their place of woe, situated as far below Hades as Hades was below heaven. Gehenna and Tartarus are both the place of punishment for the lost.

Hel'len-ist (hēl'en-ist). One, not of the Greek nation, who spoke Greek. The term is used specially of Jews who had adopted the Greek tongue, and with it often Greek practices and opinions (R.V., marg., Acts 6:1 and 9:29). The text calls them Grecian Jews; the A.V. simply Grecians.

Hel'met. See ARMOR.

He'lon (hē'lōn) [strong, valorous]. Father of Ellab, prince of Zebulun (Num. 1:9; 2:7; 7:24, 29; 10:16).

Hem. The edge, border, or margin of a garment (Ex. 28:33, 34; 39:24-26, in the R.V. skirts; and Matt. 9:20; 14:36, in the R.V. borders). The Jews attached a certain sacredness to the hem, fringe, or border of their garments.

He'mam (hēm'mām). See HOMAM.

He'man (hēm'mān) [faithful]. 1. A sage whose reputation for wisdom was high in Solomon's reign (I Kings 4:31). He belonged to the tribe of Judah (I Chron. 2:6). He composed a meditative psalm (Psalm 88, according to its 2d title).

2. A singer in David's reign, a son of Joel, a grandson of the Prophet Samuel, of the Levite family of Korah (I Chron. 6:33; 15:17). He was also appointed to sound a brazen cymbal (v. 19). He rose to prominence among David's musicians (ch. 16:41, 42).

3. A.R.V. (Gen. 36:22) for Hemam (A.V. and E.R.V., which agree with the Heb.); cf. Vulgate Heman and LXX Haiman.

He'math (hēm'māth). See HAMATH for Amos 6:14, A.V., and HAMMATH for I Chron. 2:55, A.V.

Hem'dan (hēm'dān) [pleasant, desirable]. A Horite, the eldest son of Dishon (Gen. 36:26). In the parallel passage, I Chron. 1:41, the Heb. text and R.V. have Hamran, which A.V. erroneously represents by Amram. The 2 Heb. words differ only in the 3d consonant. The difference is undoubtedly due to a scribe who confused r (resh) and d (daleth). Hemdan probably is the original form.

Hem'lock. See GALL 2 and WORMWOOD.

Hen (hēn) [grace, favor, kindness]. A son of Zephaniah (Zech. 6:14). But in R.V. marg. Hen is translated, "For the kindness of the son of Zephaniah," in which case that son's name disappears.

He'na (hē'nā). A city captured by the Assyrians (II Kings 18:34; 19:13; Isa. 37:13). It is mentioned with Sepharvaim and Ivvah, and is commonly identified with the town of ānah on the Euphrates, at 42° E. longitude from Greenwich. The Targum understands Hena and Ivvah as verbs: "He has driven away and overturned." But Ivvah, if the same as Avva (II Kings 17:24), was a town. See AVVA.

Hen'a-dad (hēn'ā-dād) [probably, favor of Hadad]. Founder of a Levitical family, whose sons supported Zerubbabel at the time the foundations of the Temple were being laid (Ezra 3:9), and assisted in rebuilding the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:18).

Hen'na [Arab. hinna']. The rendering of Heb. kōpher in the LXX and in R.V. of S. of Sol. 1:14 and ch. 4:13. It is translated in the A.V. camphire. Henna is a plant of the Lythraeaceae or loosestrife order (Lawsonia alba or inermis), with opposite entire leaves, and fragrant yellow and white flowers in corymbs or clusters (S. of Sol. 1:14). The Greeks called it kypros, from the island of Cyprus, where it grew. In Palestine its special seat was the virtually tropical region of En-gedi (S. of Sol. 1:14) and Jericho (Jos. War iv. 8, 3). The leaves and young twigs are made into a fine powder, converted into paste with hot water, and used by Oriental women and wealthy men to dye the finger and toe nails and the soles of the feet a reddish orange color.

He'noch (hē'nūk). See ENOCH for I Chron. 1:3, A.V., and HANOCH for I Chron. 1:33, A.V.

He'pher (hē'fēr) [pit, well]. 1. A town west of the Jordan (Josh. 12:17). The name belonged to a district also, probably near Socoh (I Kings 4:10). Maisler identifies it with Tell Ibsār on the wadi el-Hawārith in the plain of Sharon.

2. A son of Gilead, founder of a tribal family of Manasseh (Num. 26:32; 27:1; Josh. 17:2).

3. A man of Judah, son of Ashhur of Tekoa (I Chron. 4:6).

4. A Mecherathite, and one of David's worthies (I Chron. 11:36). See, however, remarks under UR, II.

Heph'zi'bah (hē'f'zī-bā) [my delight is in her]. 1. Mother of King Manasseh (II Kings 21:1).

2. A symbolical name to be given to Zion (Isa. 62:4).

He'res (hē'rēz) [sun]. 1. An eminence in the district of Ajalon (Judg. 1:35). The meaning and a comparison with Josh. 19:41, 42 render the opinion probable that Mount Heres is identical with the town Ir-shemesh, that is, Beth-shemesh.

2. The ascent of Heres (Judg. 8:13, R.V.); the spot e. of the Jordan from which Gideon returned after the defeat of Zebah and Zalmunna.

3. An Egyptian city; Isa. 19:18, marg. of A.V. and R.V., "city of the sun," i.e., Heliopolis. See ON, II.

He'resh (hē'rēsh) [dumb, silent]. A Levite (I Chron. 9:15).

Her'es-y. 1. A party, sect, or faction (Acts 5:17; 15:5); strong party spirit, even when this is not produced on one side or the other by departure from sound doctrine (I Cor. 11:19, A.R.V. factions; Gal. 5:20, A.R.V. parties).

2. A doctrine or a sect consequent upon departure from sound doctrine (II Peter 2:1, R.V. marg., sects of perdition).

He'reth (hē'rēth), in A.V. Ha'reth, the Heb. pausal form. A forest in Judah, in which David for a time lurked while his life was being sought by Saul (I Sam. 22:5).

Her'mas (hūr'mās). A Christian at Rome to whom Paul sent his salutations (Rom. 16:14).

Her'mes (hūr'mēz). 1. The Greek god corresponding to the Roman Mercury (Acts 14:12, R.V. marg.). See MERCURY.

2. A Christian (not the same as Hermas) at Rome, to whom Paul sent his salutations (Rom. 16:14).

Her-mog'e-nes (hūr-mōj'ē-nēz) [Gr., sprung from Hermes]. An inhabitant of the Roman province of Asia, who finally, with many others, turned away from the Apostle Paul (II Tim. 1:15).

Her'mon (hūr'món) [sacred mountain]. A mountain called by the Sidonians Sirion, and by the Amorites Senir or Shenir (Deut. 3:8, 9). The last name belonged especially to a part of the mountain (I Chron. 5:23). Another name for it was Sion (Deut. 4:48). It constituted the n.e. limit of the Israelite conquests under Moses and Joshua (Deut. 3:8, 9; Josh. 11:3, 17; 12:1; 13:5, 11; I Chron. 5:23). It figures in Hebrew poetry, being coupled with Tabor (Ps. 89:12), Zion (Ps. 133:3), and Lebanon (S. of Sol. 4:8), really, however, overtopping them all. It constitutes the s. end of the Anti-Lebanon chain, and rises to the elevation of 9,166 feet above the sea. It may be seen from many parts of Palestine. The view from the top is magnificent; from it one can see Lebanon, the plain around father's nor by the mother's side was Herod a real Jew, though the Idumaeans, who had been conquered 125 B.C. by John Hyrcanus, and compelled to be circumcised and adopt Judaism, had now become nominally Jews.

Antipater was made procurator of Judea by Caesar in 47 B.C. (Jos. Antiq. xiv. 8, 3 and 5). He had 5 children, Phasaëlus, Herod, Joseph, Pheroras, and a daughter Salome (Jos. Antiq. xiv. 7, 3). Phasaëlus, the eldest son, was made governor of Jerusalem and vicinity by his father, and Galilee was committed to Herod, who was then 25 years old (Jos. Antiq. xiv. 9, 2). After the murder of Antipater, 43 B.C., Mark Antony visited Syria and appointed the 2 brothers tetrarchs, committing the public affairs of the Jews to them (Jos. Antiq. xiv. 13, 1). They were afterward sorely pressed by Antigonus, last king of the Maccabaeen family, and by the Parthians. Phasaëlus fell into the hands of the latter and committed

Mount Hermon as Seen from Lebanon

Damascus, Tyre, Carmel, the mountains of Upper Galilee, the plains of Lower Galilee, Lake Hüleh and the Sea of Galilee. The summit has 3 peaks, that on the s.e. being the highest. Having these peaks it is described as the Hermons (Ps. 42:6, R.V.); but the word in this passage may denote the Hermon range in general. The summit of the mountain is covered with snow all the year round, wavy white furrows descending from the crest in the lines of the several valleys. The proper source of the Jordan is in Hermon. Some one of its solitary recesses may have been the scene of our Lord's transfiguration, but this is disputed. Hermon is now called Jebel esh-Sheikh.

Her'mon-ites (hūr'món-its). Natives or inhabitants of Mount Hermon (Ps. 42:6, A.V.; in R.V., the Hermons).

Her'od (hēr'ūd). The name of several rulers over Palestine and the adjacent regions or portions of them. Three are mentioned in the N.T. by the name of Herod and 1 by the name of Agrippa.

1. HEROD THE GREAT. He was the 2d son of the Idumaeen Antipas, or Antipater, by his wife Cypros, who was of the same race (Jos. Antiq. xiv. 1, 3; 7, 3). Thus, neither by the suicide to avoid being put to death by them (Jos. Antiq. xiv. 13, 10). The Romans were now induced by Antony to espouse the cause of Herod; and war ensued with Antigonus and the Parthians, in the course of which Herod's brother Joseph was slain in battle (Jos. Antiq. xiv. 15, 10), Jerusalem was captured and Herod became king of Judea in 37 B.C.

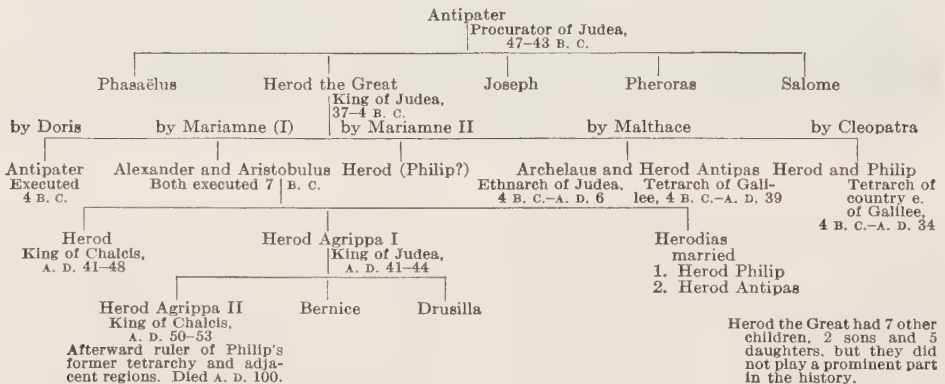

The surviving children of Antipater were now Herod, Pheroras, and Salome. Salome married her uncle Joseph (Jos. Antiq. xv. 3, 5; War i. 22, 4). After he had been put to death for adultery, 34 B.C., she married Costobarus, an Idumaeen of good family whom Herod made governor of Idumaea and Gaza (Jos. Antiq. xv. 7, 9; War i. 24, 6). She divorced him (Jos. Antiq. xv. 7, 10), and against her will was married to Alexas, a friend of Herod's (Jos. War i. 28, 6). During the whole of Herod's reign, she engaged in intrigues against members of his family; but she was faithful to him, and he bequeathed to her Jamnia, Ashdod, and Phasaëlis near Jericho (Jos. Antiq. xvii. 6, 1; 8, 1; 11, 5). She accompanied Herod's son Archelaus to Rome, when he went thither to obtain imperial sanction to ascend the throne. Her ostensible purpose was to assist him in prosecuting his claim, but her real object was to thwart him (Jos.

War ii. 2, 1-4). She died about A.D. 10, when Marcus Ambivius was procurator (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 2, 2). Pheroras, the youngest of the 4 sons of Antipater (Jos. Antiq. xiv. 15, 4), lived nearly as long as Herod. He was partner in the kingdom, had the title of tetrarch, and enjoyed the revenue accruing from the country e. of the Jordan (Jos. War i. 24, 5). He was more than once accused of plotting the death of Herod, and matters came to a crisis shortly before the latter's death; but Pheroras died without being brought to trial (Jos. Antiq. xvii. 3, 3).

Herod the Great had 10 wives from first to last (Jos. Antiq. xvii. 1, 3; War i.; xviii. 4). His 1st wife was Doris, a woman of an obscure family in Jerusalem. She bore him 1 son, Antipater, who took an active part in the events of Herod's reign, plotting against his younger half-brothers to secure the kingdom for himself. Herod, just before the capture of Jerusalem, by which he became king, married his 2d wife, the beautiful and chaste Mariamne (I), granddaughter of Hyrcanus. She bore him 3 sons, Alexander, Aristobulus, and the youngest son who died without issue, and 2 daughters, Cypros and Salampsio. Mariamne was put to death in 29 B.C. (Jos. Antiq. xv. 7, 4). About 24 B.C. he married Mariamne (II), daughter of Simon, whom he raised to the high priesthood (Jos. Antiq. xv. 9, 3; xviii. 5, 4). Herod also took to wife his 2 nieces, whose names are not given and who died childless, Malthace a Samaritan, Cleopatra of Jerusalem, Pallas, Phaëdra, and Elpis. With the 2 unnamed nieces and last 3 of known name history is not specially concerned. The descendants of the others are more important. Of Mariamne (II), Herod (Philip) was born (cf. Matt. 14:3; Mark 6:17; Luke 3:19; Jos. Antiq. xviii. 5, 4); Malthace became mother of Archelaus, Herod Antipas, and a daughter Olympias; and Cleopatra bore Herod and Philip.

came the father of 5 children, several of whom played an important part later in the history. Of these 2 young men, sons of the beloved Mariamne (I), Antipater, the first-born of Herod, was jealous. His jealousy was aroused against his half-brothers by the evident intention of his father to overlook his right as first-born in their favor (Jos. War i. 22, 1), and he and his clique at court poisoned the mind of Herod against them. At length, about 7 B.C., Herod had them put to death, named Antipater his heir and appointed Herod, son of Mariamne II, next in succession (Jos. Antiq. xvi. 11, 7; xvii. 3, 2; War i. 29, 2). This order conformed to birth, his sons Archelaus and Antipas, Herod and Philip, being doubtless younger than Herod, son of Mariamne II. Antipater next accused Herod's sister, Salome, and his sons, Archelaus and Philip, who were in Rome being educated, of plotting the murder of Herod; but the crime charged against Salome was brought home to himself. He and his uncle Pheroras, Herod's brother, were accused of seeking the king's life. Pheroras died, but Antipater was cast into prison. Herod's suspicions were thereby aroused that Antipater had falsely accused Alexander and Aristobulus, who had already been executed, and he altered his will, appointing Antipas to be his successor, and passed over Archelaus, the elder brother, and Philip, as he still held them in suspicion (Jos. War i. 32, 7). Soon afterward he ordered Antipater to be slain and altered his will again, giving the kingdom to Archelaus, making Antipas tetrarch of Galilee and Perea, and Philip tetrarch of Batanea, Trachonitis, and Auranitis, and bestowing several cities on his sister Salome (Jos. Antiq. xvii. 8, 1; War i. 33, 7). Herod's disposition of his affairs was observed at his death, except that Archelaus was finally confirmed by the emperor Augustus not as king but as ethnarch of Judea (Jos. Antiq. xvii. 11, 4 and 5).

The domestic troubles of Herod began early in his reign in the hatred which he incited in the beloved Mariamne (I) toward himself; and they culminated in the last decade of his reign, when his sons had reached manhood. The domestic history eventually revolves about the 8 young men: Antipater, son of Doris; Alexander and Aristobulus, sons of Mariamne (I); Herod (Philip) son of Mariamne (II); Archelaus and Antipas, sons of Malthace; and Herod and Philip, sons of Cleopatra. Alexander married Glyphyra, daughter of Archelaus, king of Cappadocia. Two sons were born to them whose history is not important (Jos. Antiq. xvi. 1, 2; War i. 24, 2). Aristobulus married his 1st cousin, Bernice, daughter of Herod's sister, Salome, and be-

Herod, son of Mariamne (II), married, or had married, Herodias, daughter of his half-brother, the dead Aristobulus. She, however, left him and married another half-brother of his, Herod the tetrarch, and her former husband disappears from history. So does Herod, son of Cleopatra and brother of Philip, the tetrarch. See HERODIAS and PHILIP 5. Aristobulus, as already mentioned, had married his cousin, Bernice, daughter of Salome, and had begotten 5 children (Jos. War i. 28, 1). They were Herod, Agrippa, Aristobulus, Herodias, and Mariamne (III). Herod married Mariamne (IV), daughter of Olympias, daughter of Herod the Great and the Samaritan Malthace; Agrippa married Cypros, daughter of Salampsio and Phasaëlus the younger, son of Herod the Great's brother, Phasaëlus; Aristobulus married Jotape, daughter of a king of Emesa; Herodias married 2 uncles in succession, as already noted; and, it may be inferred, Mariamne III married Antipater, son of Doris (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 5, 4; War i. 28, 5; cf. 4). Three of these children of Aristobulus are persons of note—namely, Herod, Agrippa, and Herodias. Herodias was the woman who crowned her infamies by telling her daughter to demand the head of John the Baptist on a charger. Herod was made king of Chalcis, and after his wife's death took his niece, Bernice, Agrippa's daughter, to wife. Agrippa became King Agrippa I. He married, had 1 son and 3 daughters. Three of these children are mentioned in Scripture, Agrippa II and the 2 notorious women, Bernice and Drusilla.

Besides this domestic history of the rise of the family to power and the intrigues among its members, there is the political history of Herod's reign. Soon after he had been made ruler in Galilee, which was in 47 or 46 B.C., he came in contact with the sanhedrin through his summary execution of some robbers without the sanhedrin's formal permission. He was summoned for trial and appeared with an armed bodyguard, intimidating the council. He was acquitted for lack of evidence. Herod sought to be, for his own interest, on good terms with the successive representatives of the warring factions into which the Roman people were then divided. He obtained a generalship from Sextus Caesar, president of Syria, a relative of the great Julius Caesar; and then, after a time, gained the favor of Cassius, the most malignant of the great dictator's assassins. Then he cast in his lot with Mark Antony, one of the murdered man's chief avengers; nor was even this his last change of sides. About 41 B.C. Herod was made tetrarch of Galilee by Antony. When after fresh vicissitudes, he went to Rome in 40 B.C., as a fugitive rather than a visitor, his patron induced the Roman senate to appoint him king of the Jews. It was not, however, till 37 B.C. that, with the assistance of Sosius, a general of Antony's, he succeeded in taking Jerusalem and commencing his actual reign. By his marriage at this time with Mariamne, granddaughter of Hircanus and daughter of Alexander, son of Aristobulus, he became allied with the royal Hasmonæan family (Maccabees). He now endeavored further to strengthen his position by the removal of possible rivals. The principal members of the party of Antigonus, 45 in number, were sought out and put to death. Soon afterward Mariamne's brother, Aristobulus, a boy of 17, whom Herod had just raised to the high priesthood, was drowned in a bath by Herod's orders, within a year after his elevation to the pontificate; and about 31 B.C. her grandfather, although 80 years old, was put to death (Jos. Antiq. xv. 1, 2; 3, 3, 6, 2). Herod's attention was called from these atrocities by the new crisis which had arisen. His patron Antony was totally defeated by Octavius (Augustus) in the sea fight at Actium on Sept. 2, 31 B.C. The position of Herod was now critical, but he made a manly and judicious speech to the victorious Octavius, and was forgiven for his partisanship toward Antony. He was given the friendship of the man he had offended and retained it through most of his life, besides having his dominions increased (Jos. Antiq. xv. 6, 5-7; 10, 3). The murder of a wife's brother and her grandfather did not tend to increase her attachment to her husband, and by and by variance arose between Herod and Mariamne. It increased, till it culminated at length in the queen's being falsely accused and executed. Remorse followed in due course and almost, if not altogether, deprived the king of reason (Jos. Antiq. xv. 7, 7; War i. 22, 5).

Partly to divert his mind from gloomy remembrances, partly to please Octavius, now the emperor Augustus, he built theaters and exhibited games, although both of these acts were inconsistent with Judaism. He also rebuilt, enlarged, and beautified a place named Strato's Tower, calling it, after his imperial patron, Caesarea. It ultimately became the Roman capital of Palestine (Jos. Antiq. xv. 8, 5; 9, 6; cf. Acts 23:23, 24). Then to conciliate the Jews, between 19 and 11 or 9 B.C., he rebuilt and beautified the Temple.

The birth of Jesus Christ took place at the close of Herod's life, after he had removed his rivals from other families by violent deaths and when his domestic troubles were at their height. He had slain his sons Alexander and Aristobulus, and more recently Antipater, for plotting against his life; and now he was told that a child of David's line had just been born to be king of the Jews. The slaughter of the infants who came into the world about the same time and place was such a method of meeting the difficulty as would suggest itself to one with Herod's propensity to bloodshed (Matt., ch. 2). It was one of the last acts of his life. Seized at length with loathsome and mortal disease, he repaired to Callirhoe, the hot sulphur springs of the Zerka, the water from which runs into the e. part of the Dead Sea. They came to be called, in consequence, by many, the baths of Herod; but they did not do the king much good (Jos. Antiq. xvii. 6, 5). He felt that he was dying and that there would be rejoicing when he passed away. He therefore told his sister Salome and her husband Alexas to shut up the principal Jews in the circus at Jericho, and put them to death whenever he expired, that there might be mourning at, though of course not for, his death. Then, about 4 B.C., he passed away, in the 70th year of his age and the 34th of his reign, counting from the time when he actually obtained the kingdom. When news of his demise arrived, the circus prisoners were set free, and the death of the tyrant was welcomed as a relief instead of being attended by mourning, lamentation, and woe (Jos. Antiq. xvii. 6, 5; 8, 2; War i. 33, 5).

2. HEROD THE TETRARCH. A son of Herod the Great by his Samaritan wife called Malthace. He was, therefore, half Idumæan and half Samaritan, perhaps without a single drop of Jewish blood in his veins. He was called indifferently Antipas and Herod (Jos. Antiq. xvii. 1, 3; xviii. 5, 1; 6, 2; War ii. 9, 1), and it is customary to distinguish him from the other Herods of the family as Herod Antipas. He was the full brother of Archelaus, and was younger than Archelaus (Jos. Antiq. xvii. 6, 1; War i. 32, 7; 33, 7). He was educated with him and his half-brother Philip at Rome (Jos. Antiq. xvii. 1, 3). By the 2d testament of his father, the kingdom was bequeathed to him (Jos. Antiq. xvii. 6, 1); but by his father's final will he was appointed tetrarch of Galilee and the kingdom was given to Archelaus (Jos. Antiq. xvii. 8, 1). On his father's death he competed with his brother for the kingdom, but received only the tetrarchy of Galilee and Perea (Jos. Antiq. xvii. 11, 4; Luke 3:1). He erected a wall around Sepphoris and made it his metropolis. Betharamphtha in Perea he walled, and built a palace there. It was named Livias and Julias, after the wife of Augustus (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 2, 1; War ii. 9, 1); see BETH-HARAN. He also built Tiberias (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 2, 3). He married a daughter of Aretas, king of the Nabataean Arabs, whose capital was Petra; but afterward, while lodging at Rome with Herod Philip, his half-brother, he indulged a guilty passion for his entertainer's wife, Herodias, and arranged to divorce his lawful consort and take Herodias instead. This immoral transaction was carried into effect. Herodias was Herod's evil genius, and she made a tool of him, as Jezebel had done of Ahab. Aretas resented the injury inflicted upon his daughter, and he commenced a war against Herod and waged it successfully (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 5, 1). Herodias was the prime mover in the murder of John the Baptist (Matt. 14:1-12; Jos. Antiq. xviii. 5, 2). Because of his cunning, the tetrarch was described by our Lord as "that fox" (Luke 13:31, 32). But the tetrarch had a following, for mention is made of the leaven of Herod (Mark 8:15); see HERODIANS. When the fame of Jesus began to spread abroad, the uneasy conscience of Herod made him fear that John had risen from the dead (Matt. 14:1, 2). He was present at Jerusalem at the time of the crucifixion, and Jesus was sent to him by Pilate. He thought that now he would have the opportunity of seeing a miracle performed, but he was disappointed. The same day he was reconciled to Pilate, whereas they had before been at variance (Luke 23:7-12, 15; Acts 4:27). The advancement of Herodias' brother Agrippa to be king, while her husband remained only tetrarch, aroused the envy of this proud woman, and she prevailed upon Herod to go with her to Rome and ask for a crown. Agrippa, however, sent letters after them to the emperor Caligula, accusing Herod of being secretly in league with the Parthians, and Herod was in consequence banished to Lyons in Gaul, A.D. 39, where he died (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 7; but according to War ii. 9, 6, Spain was the place of exile).

3. HEROD THE KING. Josephus calls him simply Agrippa. Both names are generally combined, and he is designated Herod Agrippa I, to distinguish him from Herod Agrippa II, before whom Paul was tried. Agrippa I was the son of Aristobulus, son of Herod the Great and Mariamne, granddaughter of Hyrcanus. He was educated in Rome with Drusus, son of the emperor Tiberius, and Claudius (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 6, 1 and 4); but the death of Drusus and lack of funds led to his return to Judea (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 6, 2). In A.D. 37 he made another journey to Rome to bring accusations against Herod the tetrarch (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 5, 3; War ii. 9, 5). He did not return when his business was transacted, but remained in the metropolis, cultivating the acquaintance of people who might be of use to him in the future. Among others, he ingratiated himself with Caius, son of Germanicus, who shortly became the emperor Caligula (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 6, 4; War ii. 9, 5). For rash words spoken in favor of Caius, Tiberius cast him into chains; but 6 months later Caius became emperor and appointed Agrippa to be king of the tetrarchy which his late uncle Philip had governed, and also of the tetrarchy of Lysanias (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 6, 10). In A.D. 39 the emperor banished Herod the tetrarch and added his tetrarchy, which was Galilee, to the kingdom of Agrippa (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 7, 2). Agrippa left his kingdom for a time, and resided at Rome (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 8, 7). During this sojourn at the capital he prevailed upon the emperor to desist from his determination to erect his statue in the Temple at Jerusalem (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 8, 7 and 8). When Caligula was assassinated, and Claudius, against his own will, chosen in his place, Agrippa, who was then at Rome, acted as negotiator between the senate and the new emperor, whom he persuaded to take office. As a reward, Agrippa had Judea and Samaria added to his dominions, which now equalled those of Herod the Great (Jos. Antiq. xix. 3-5; War ii. 11, 1-5). He commenced to build a wall about the n. suburb of Jerusalem, so as to include it in the city, but was ordered to abandon the work (Jos. Antiq. xix. 7, 2). He slew James, the brother of John, with the sword (Acts 12:1, 2), imprisoned Peter (vs. 3-19, and at Caesarea, immediately after he had accepted divine honor, was miserably eaten up of worms (Acts 12:20-23; Jos. Antiq. xix. 8, 2). He died A.D. 44, in the 54th year of his age, leaving 4 children, of whom 3 are mentioned in Scripture, Agrippa, Bernice, and Drusilla (Jos. War ii. 11, 6).

4. AGRIPPA, commonly known as Herod Agrippa II. He was son of Herod Agrippa I, and consequently great-grandson of Herod the Great, and was the brother of the notorious women Bernice and Drusilla (Jos. War ii. 11, 6). At the time of his father's death, A.D. 44, he was 17 years old, and residing at Rome, where he was being brought up in the imperial household (Jos. Antiq. xix. 9). The emperor Claudius was dissuaded from appointing him to the throne of his father on account of his youth, and Judea was placed under a procurator. Agrippa remained in Rome. He successfully seconded the efforts of the Jewish ambassadors to obtain the imperial permission to retain the official robes of the high priest under their own control (Jos. Antiq. xx. 1, 1). When his uncle Herod, king of Chalcis, died about A.D. 48, Claudius presently bestowed his small realm on the w. slope of Anti-Lebanon on Agrippa (Jos. Antiq. xx. 5, 2; War ii. 12, 1), so that he became King Agrippa. He espoused the cause of the Jewish commissioners who had come to Rome to appear against the procurator Cumanus and the Samaritans, and he prevailed upon the emperor to grant them an audience (Jos. Antiq. xx. 6, 3; War ii. 12, 7). In A.D. 52 Claudius transferred him from the kingdom of Chalcis to a larger realm formed of the tetrarchy of Philip, which contained Batanea, Trachonitis, and Gaulanitis, the tetrarchy of Lysanias, and the province of Abilene (Jos. Antiq. xx. 7, 1; War ii. 12, 8). His constant companionship with his sister Bernice about this time began to create scandal (Jos. Antiq. xx. 7, 3). In A.D. 54 or 55 Nero added the cities of Tiberias and Taricheae in Galilee and Julias in Perea to its dependent towns to his dominion (Jos. Antiq. xx. 8, 4). When Felix had been succeeded by Festus as procurator of Judea, Agrippa went to Caesarea to salute him, accompanied by Bernice. Paul was then in confinement. Festus laid his case before the king, and on the morrow the apostle was permitted to plead his cause before the procurator, the king, and Bernice. He was entirely successful in clearing himself (Acts 25:13 to 26:32). Soon afterward Agrippa built an addition to the palace of the Hasmonaeans at Jerusalem (Jos. Antiq. xx. 8, 11). Later still he enlarged and beautified Caesarea Philippi, and established theatrical exhibitions at Berytus (Jos. Antiq. xx. 9, 4). When the troubles which culminated in the Jewish war began, Agrippa endeavored to dissuade the Jews from making armed resistance to Florus the procurator and the Romans (Jos. War ii. 16, 2-5; 17, 4; 19, 3). When the war broke in its fury, he fought by the side of Vespasian and was wounded at the siege of Gamala (Jos. War iii. 9, 7 and 8; 10, 10; iv. 1, 3). After the capture of Jerusalem he removed with Bernice to Rome, where he was invested with the dignity of praetor. He died A.D. 100.

Her'od (hēr'ūd), Pal'ace of. A palace-fortress erected by Herod the Great about the year 24 or 23 B.C. (Jos. Antiq. xv. 9). It stood at the n.w. corner of the upper city, adjoined the towers of Hippicus, Phasaëlus, and Mariamne on their s., and formed with them a stronghold which excited the admiration of even the Romans (Jos. War v. 4, 4; 5, 8; vi. 8, 1; 9, 1). Its site is the modern citadel by the Jaffa Gate. The 3 towers were built of white stone. Hippicus was square, with sides 25 cubits in length. To the height of 30 cubits it consisted of solid masonry; over this was a reservoir, 20 cubits deep; and over this again a two-story house, 25 cubits in height, surmounted by battlements 2 cubits high with turrets 3 cubits higher. The entire altitude of the tower was 80 cubits. Phasaëlus was larger. Its stock was a cube of solid masonry measuring 40 cubits in each direction, surmounted by a cloister, and that in turn by a palatial tower. Its entire height was about 90 cubits. It was completed about the year 10 B.C. (Jos. Antiq. xvi. 5, 2). Mariamne had half the dimensions of Phasaëlus, save that it was 50 cubits high. It was magnificently adorned by Herod as befitted a tower named in honor of his wife. The palace proper on the s. of these towers was entirely walled about to the height of 30 cubits, and was further protected by turrets which surmounted the wall and stood at equal distances from each other. Within were open courts with groves of trees and numerous apartments, among which 2 were conspicuous for size and beauty, and were called Caesareum and Agrippium, after Herod's friends (Jos. Antiq. xv. 9, 3; War i. 21, 1; v. 4, 4). The palace was occupied by Sabinus, the procurator of Syria (Jos. Antiq. xvii. 10, 2 and 3; War ii. 3, 2 and 3). In it Pilate erected golden shields in honor of the emperor Tiberius; and it is expressly called the house of the procurators (Philo Legat. ad Gaium xxxviii. and xxxix.). The procurator Florus took up his quarters in this building, erected his tribunal before it, and sentenced men to scourging and crucifixion (Jos. War ii. 14, 8 and 9). It was burned by the seditious Jews at the beginning of the war with the Romans. The 3 mighty towers, however, withstood the flames and were allowed by the conqueror to stand as a witness to the kind of city the Romans had overthrown (Jos. War ii. 17, 8; vii. 1, 1).

Herō'dī'ans (hê-rō'dī-ânz). Various views have been expressed about the Herodians, but according to the present evidence it seems clear that they were not a religious sect or a political party. In Galilee they had joined with the Pharisees in plotting against Jesus' life (Mark 3:6; cf. ch. 8:15). It does not seem probable that they were members of the domestic staff of Herod, for the Pharisees would hardly seek their associates from among the menials of the court. Once the Pharisees and the Herodians combined at Jerusalem to entangle our Lord about paying tribute to Caesar (Matt. 22:16; Mark 12:13). From this connection it may be inferred that they were not court officers; the Pharisees would doubtless have felt that officials would serve rather to intimidate than to entrap Jesus. Court officers in the East are not accustomed to inquire of those beneath them about the legality of the taxes which are levied. The Herodians probably were Jews of influence and standing who were well disposed to the Herodian rule and consequently also to that of the Romans, who supported the Herods. They were on the side of Herod in a land where many people were definitely opposed to that regime.

Herō'dī'as (hê-rō'dī-ās). Daughter of Aristobulus, and half-sister of Herod Agrippa I. She was married to Herod, the son of Herod the Great by Mariamne, the high priest Simon's daughter. This husband is called Philip in the N.T., but is not entitled a tetrarch (Matt. 14:3; Mark 6:17). He was a different person from Philip the tetrarch. It is customary to speak of him as Herod Philip, which was probably his full name. See PHILIP 4. His half-brother, Herod the tetrarch, indulged a guilty passion for Herodias, and divorcing his wife, a daughter of King Aretas of Arabia, married Herodias while her first husband was still alive (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 5, 1, 4; 6, 2; 7, 2; War ii. 9, 6). John the Baptist reproved the guilty pair, on which Herodias plotted his death. When her daughter Salome had gained Herod's favor by dancing before him at a gathering of the dignitaries of his tetrarchy, she extorted from him a promise to give her the head of John the Baptist. The king was sorry but, for his oath's sake, complied with her wishes (Matt. 14:3-12; Mark 6:17-29; Luke 3:19, 20). On the banishment of the tetrarch, Herodias went with him into exile (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 7, 2; War ii. 9, 6).

Herodias' daughter Salome married Philip the tetrarch, son of Herod the Great. After his death she married her first cousin, Aristobulus, son of King Agrippa's brother Herod and great-great-grandson of Herod the Great (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 5, 4).

Herō'dī'on (hê-rō'dī-ôn). A Christian at Rome whom Paul called his kinsman, and to whom he sent a salutation (Rom. 16:11).

Her'on. The rendering of Heb. ʿônāphāh (Lev. 11:19, in marg. of R.V. ibis; Deut. 14:18). The bird so designated was held to be typical of a family, for it is followed by the words "after its kind." The heron family (Ardeidae) is placed under the Grallatores or Waders. The birds which it includes are generally of large size. They have a long bill, long bare legs adapted for wading, a large hind toe, and large wings, their flight, however, being comparatively slow. Their food is principally fish and reptiles. The buff-backed heron (Ardea bubulcus), often called the white ibis, is the most abundant. These birds live and breed in vast numbers in the swamps of Lake Hüleh, and they associate with cattle in the pastures, where several purple ibises may usually be seen with them. The common heron (Ardea cinerea) occurs on the Jordan and its lakes, on the Kishon, and on the seacoast of Palestine. With it are found also the purple heron (Ardea purpurea) and several egrets.

He'sed (hê'séd) [mercy, grace]. Father of Ben-hesed, one of Solomon's purveyors (I Kings 4:10).

Hesh'bon (hêsh'bôn) [reckoning, account]. The city of Sihon, the Amorite king, but apparently taken originally from the Moabites (Num. 21:25-30, 34). It was assigned by Moses to the Reubenites, and after the conquest was rebuilt by the men of that tribe (Num. 32:37; Josh. 13:17). But it stood on the boundary line between Reuben and Gad (Josh. 13:26), came to be possessed by the latter, and was assigned as a town of Gad to the Levites (Josh. 21:39; I Chron. 6:81). The Moabites held it in Isaiah's and Jeremiah's times (Isa. 15:4; 16:8, 9; Jer. 48:2, 33, 34). Later still it was in the possession of Alexander Jannaeus and Herod the Great (Jos. Antiq. xiii. 15, 4; xv. 8, 5). It is still known as Heshbān, a ruined city standing on an isolated hill, between the Arnon and the Jab-bok, about 7½ miles n. of Mādabā. A great reservoir, a little e. from the ruins of Hesh-bon, is probably one of the pools which were outside the town walls (S. of Sol. 7:4).

Hesh'mon (hêsh'môn). A town in the extreme s. of Judah (Josh. 15:27).

Heth (hêth). See CHEETH and HITTITES.

Heth'lon (hêth'lôn). A place on the n. boundary of Palestine, as prophesied by Ezekiel, near the entering in of Hamath (Ezek. 47:15; 48:1; cf. Num. 34:8). It may be identified with Heitela, n.e. of Tripoli.

Hez'e-ki (hêz'ê-kī). See HIZKI.

Hez'e-ki'ah (hêz'ê-kī'á), in A.V. once Hiz-ki'ah (Zeph. 1:1), once Hiz-ki'jah (Neh. 10:17), in A.V. of N.T. Ez'e-ki'as, the Gr. form [Jehovah has strengthened or is strength]. 1. Son of Ahaz, king of Judah. He was associated with his father in the government in 728 B.C. Since Ahaz was incapacitated for active participation in the affairs of state, Hezekiah was made active ruler. Hezekiah is said to have begun to reign at the age of 25 (II Kings 18:2; II Chron. 29:1). He was a devoted servant of Jehovah and commenced his reign by repairing and cleansing the Temple, reorganizing its religious services and its officers, and celebrating a great passover, to which he invited not merely the 2 tribes, but the 10 (II Chron. 29:1 to 30:13). He removed the high places, cast down the images, and broke in pieces the brazen serpent which Moses had made, but which had become an object of idolatrous worship.

Hezekiah gained a victory over the Philistines and in other ways became great and prosperous. In his 4th regnal year, 724 B.C., Salmanser commenced, and in 722 B.C. Sargon completed, the siege of Samaria, carrying the 10 tribes into captivity (II Kings 18:9, 10). In 714 B.C., according to the method of reckoning already employed by the Hebrew annalist, began the series of Assyrian invasions which formed a marked feature of Hezekiah's reign and terminated disastrously for Assyria. The Biblical account of these events is presented as a connected narrative. It falls into 3 sections: the beginning of the invasions about 714 (II Kings 18:13; Isa. 36:1; probably II Chron. 32:1-8; cf. invasion of Philistia in 712-711, Isa. 20:1); the main campaign of 701, in its 1st stage (II Kings 18:14-16), and in its final stage (II Kings 18:17 to 19:35; II Chron. 32:9-21; Isa. 36:2 to 37:36); and the end of the troubler in 681 (II Kings 19:36, 37; Isa. 37:37, 38). Sargon was still on the throne of Assyria in 714, but he had placed his son Sennacherib in high military position before that date, and Sennacherib may have led the troops of his father which in 720 or 715 and the beginning of 714, probably at the latter date, "subjugated Judah" according to the Assyrian account, when the main army of Assyria was waging war to the n. and e. of Assyria. Apparently immediately after the beginning of these invasions, in 714, Hezekiah was sick, probably from a carbuncle, and nigh unto death, but was granted a new lease of life for 15 years (II Kings 20:1-11; Isa., ch. 38). To inquire into the sign which Hezekiah received at this time was the ostensible object of an embassy from Merodach-baladan, king of Babylon. The real object was to persuade Judah's king to join the great confederacy which was being secretly formed against the Assyrian power. Hezekiah was quite elated by the coming of the Babylonian ambassadors and displayed to them his financial resources; but the Prophet Isaiah warned him that the people of Judah would be carried captive to that same place from which the ambassadors had come (II Kings 20:12-19; II Chron. 32:31; Isa., ch. 39). Hezekiah joined the confederacy. Sargon, who was an able general, broke in upon the allies before their plans were matured. His expedition against Ashdod, conducted by his tartan (Isa. 20:1), took place in 712 and was occasioned by the refusal of Philistia, Judah, Edom, and Moab to pay tribute. In 710 he dethroned Merodach-baladan and made himself king of Babylonia.

In 705 Sargon was murdered and his son Sennacherib ascended the Assyrian throne. This change of rulers was the signal for new uprisings. To quell revolt in the w., Sennacherib advanced as far as the country of the Philistines in 701, conquering Phoenicia on the way and receiving envoys from Ashdod, Ammon, Moab, and Edom, suing for peace. Many towns still held out, and Sennacherib proceeded against Joppa, Beth-dagon, Ashkelon, and other places. Turning e., he captured Lachish, pitching his camp there and receiving tribute from the terrified Hezekiah. This tribute consisted of 30 talents of gold, 300 or, according to the Assyrian scribe who perhaps computes by a lighter standard, 800 talents of silver. Besides this, according to the Assyrian report, were precious stones, costly woods, articles of ivory, daughters of Hezekiah, women of the palace, and others. To obtain the precious metals, Hezekiah stripped the doors and pillars of the Temple of their plating. News, however, reached Sennacherib while still at Lachish of an alliance between the Philistine towns and Egypt and Ethiopia (II Kings 18:21, 24), and, unwilling to have so strong a fortress as Jerusalem in his rear, he sent a detachment from his army to garrison the city. Hezekiah had heard of the advance of the southern army and of the sturdy resistance of Ekron to the Assyrians. His faith in Jehovah also revived under the exhortations of Isaiah, and he refused to admit the Assyrian troops into the city. In the meantime the Assyrian king had broken camp at Lachish and fallen back on Libnah (II Kings 19:8). Hearing of Hezekiah's new attitude of defiance, he dispatched messengers with threatening letters to him, vowing future vengeance; and, not daring to meet the Egyptians and Ethiopians while Ekron and Jerusalem were in his rear, he retreated to Eltekeh, where a battle took place. The Egyptians were repulsed, but the spoils of victory were inconsiderable. Sennacherib now turned his attention to the hostile towns in the vicinity. His devastation and his advance toward Jerusalem were only terminated by the sudden plague which smote his army, whereby in one night 185,000 of his warriors perished (II Kings 19:35, 36). See SENNACHERIB.

Besides Isaiah, Hosea and Micah were contemporaries of Hezekiah (Hos. 1:1; Mic. 1:1). The king died about 693 B.C., leaving his son Manasseh to ascend the throne (II Kings 20:21; II Chron. 32:33).

2. An ancestor of the Prophet Zephaniah (Zeph. 1:1; in A.V. Hizkiah).

3. A son of Neariah, akin to the royal family of Judah (I Chron. 3:23, A.V.; in R.V. Hizkiah).

4. A man some of whose descendants through Ater returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:16; Neh. 7:21). Probably it was the representative of his family who signed the covenant under Nehemiah's rule (Neh. 10:17; in A.V. Hizkiah).

He'zi-on (hē'zī-ōn) [vision]. Father of Tabrimmon and grandfather of Ben-hadad, king of Syria (I Kings 15:18).

He'zir (hē'zēr) [swine, boar]. 1. A descendant of Aaron. His family had grown to a father's house in the time of David and became the 17th course of the priests (I Chron. 24:15).

2. A chief of the people who with Nehemiah sealed the covenant (Neh. 10:20).

Hez'ra-i (hēz'rā-i). A Carmelite, one of David's mighty men (II Sam. 23:35, A.V.; Hezro, R.V.); here A.V. follows the kere. The difference is due to a scribal confusion of yodh (y) and waw [vav] (w). In I Chron. 11:37 both A.V. and R.V. have Hezro.

Hez'ro (hēz'rō). See HEZRAI.

Hez'ron (hēz'rōn), in A.V. of N.T. Es'rom (Matt. 1:3), which follows the Gr. [enclosure]. 1. A place on the s. boundary of Judah, not far from Zin and Kadesh-barnea (Josh. 15:3; Num. 34:4). It was very near Addar, if not the same site. Probably to be located at Khirbet el-Kedeirāt on a wadi bearing the same name. It was a station between Jerusalems and Ezion-geber. For Kerieth-hezron (Josh. 15:25, R.V.), see HAZOR 3.

2. A son of Reuben, and founder of the Hezronite family (Gen. 46:9; Ex. 6:14; Num. 26:6; I Chron. 5:3).

3. Son of Perez, of the tribe of Judah, and founder of a tribal family (Gen. 46:12; Num. 26:21; Ruth 4:18; I Chron. 2:5).

Hid'da-i (hid'ä-i) [cf. Heb. hōd, splendor, majesty]. A man from the brooks of Gaash. He was one of David's heroes (II Sam. 23:30). Called in I Chron. 11:32, Hurai, probably by confusion of resh (r) for daleth (d).

Hid'de-kei (hid'ë-këi) [Heb. Hiddekel, Akkad. Idiklat, Sumerian Idigna; Old Pers. Tigrä, Gr. Tigris]. The river Tigris (Gen. 2:14; Dan. 10:4). It is called Dijlah in modern Arabic. Its principal sources in central Armenia spring from the s. slope of Anti-Taurus. The w. source flows by Diarbekr, winding for above 150 miles. The 2 e. sources, known as Bitlis Chai and Bohtan Chai, rise s. of Lake Van, and are about 100 miles long. After the junction of these streams the river proceeds nearly e.s.e., through the Kurdistan Mountains, gradually increased by various affluents, especially the greater and lesser Zab and the Diyalah from the e. side, with smaller feeders from the w. side, finally joining the Euphrates. In antiquity it emptied through its own mouth into the Persian Gulf. In its course it passes the ruins of Nineveh, which lie on the left or e. bank, nearly opposite Mosul on its right side. Lower down it separates Bagdad into 2 portions; and afterward passes the ruins, first of Ctesiphon, the Parthian capital, and then those of Seleucia, which, under the Greek dynasty, became the rival of Babylon. The whole course of the Tigris to the junction with the Euphrates is 1,146 miles, only a little more than half the length of the sister stream.

Hi'el (hi'ëi) [probably, God liveth]. A native of Beth-el, who, in Ahab's reign, fortified Jericho, bringing down on himself the fulfillment of Joshua's imprecation. His eldest son died, perhaps was sacrificed, when the foundation of the city was laid, and his youngest son when the gates were set up (I Kings 16:34; Josh. 6:26).

Hi'erap'olis (hi'ër-äp'ö-lis) [Gr., sacred city]. A city in Asia Minor, in the valley of the Lycos near the confluence with the Meander. Not far distant were Colossae and Laodicea (Col. 4:13). It was a seat of worship of the Syrian goddess Atargatis, and was celebrated for its warm baths.

Hig-ga'ion (hi-gä'yön) [a deep sound; meditation]. A musical term occurring in Ps. 9:16. The word is used elsewhere in the sense of solemn sound, meditation (Ps. 19:14; 92:3; Lam. 3:63).

High Pla'ces. Localities selected as shrines for the worship of God or of false divinities, or the shrines themselves. They were established on lofty heights (Num. 22:41; I Kings 11:7; 14:23), within or near towns (II Kings 17:9; 23:5, 8), and even in valleys (Jer. 7:31; cf. Ezek. 6:3). The Canaanites possessed them, and the Israelites were strictly enjoined to destroy them when they entered Canaan (Num. 33:52; Deut. 33:29). The Moabites also had high places (Num. 21:28; 22:41; Josh. 13:17, see the name Bamoth-baal; Isa. 15:2; Jer. 48:35). Licentiousness was often connected with the worship on the high places (Hos. 4:11-14), and immorality was common on the way to those shrines (Jer. 3:2; cf. II Chron. 21:11).

A suitable area, of a size determined by circumstances, was prepared by leveling the ground. On it stood an altar (I Kings 12:32), which, as at Petra, might be a part of the living rock left standing, with steps to approach it, when the spot was leveled. Near the altar was a wooden Asherah; and not far off was a pillar or a row of pillars, consisting of unhewn stones, 6 feet or more in length, set on end, as at Gezer and Petra (I Kings 14:23; Jer. 17:2; see ASHERAH and PILLAR). Houses were often connected with these sanctuaries (I Kings 12:31; II Kings 23:19), for sheltering the idol (II Kings 17:29, 32), and presumably for other purposes also. Benches around the sides of the area or a chamber afforded a place for the worshippers to sit and partake of the sacrificial feast (I Sam. 9:12, 13, 22). Priests were attached to the high place (I Kings 12:32; II Kings 17:32), who burned incense and offered sacrifice (I Kings 13:2; cf. chs. 3:3; 11:8).

At times the worship of Jehovah was conducted by the Israelites on high places; but this was forbidden by law, which insisted upon one altar for all Israel. The purpose of this law was to foster the national spirit and guard against schism, to prevent the people from worshipping at idolatrous shrines and losing or corrupting the religion of Jehovah, and to secure the support of a national sanctuary which would enable the worship of Jehovah to be conducted on a scale of magnificence commensurate with his glory and equal, if not superior, to the pomp displayed at the heathen temples. The worship of Jehovah at other altars was legitimate only during the time that the national sanctuary had temporarily ceased, during the period when Jehovah had forsaken Shiloh and the Temple was not yet erected (Ps. 78:60, 61, 67-69; I Kings 3:2, 4; II Chron. 1:3). Altars and sacrifices elsewhere than at Jerusalem were also legitimate in the Northern Kingdom when the pious were precluded from attendance at Jerusalem, and could not worship Jehovah at all, unless according to the earlier custom (I Kings 18:30-32); see ALTAR. Solomon, sinfully complying with the wishes of his heathen wives, erected high places in the mount of corruption for Ashtoreth, Chemosh, and Milcom or Molech (II Kings 23:13). Jeroboam, to counteract the influence of the national sanctuary at Jerusalem, made a house of high places at Beth-el and ordained priests (I Kings 12:31, 32; 13:33), purposing the adoration of Jehovah, but by idolatrous symbols (chs. 12:28-33; 13:2). These places were denounced by the prophets (I Kings 13:1, 2; Hos. 10:8). Schismatic high places existed not merely at Beth-el, but also at other cities in Samaria (I Kings 13:32; II Kings 17:32; II Chron. 34:3). The action of Asa and Jehoshaphat in the Kingdom of Judah with regard to high places was ineffective (I Kings 15:14; 22:43; II Chron. 14:3; 15:17; 17:6). Jehoram, Jehoshaphat's son, made high places in the mountains of Judah (II Chron. 21:11). So did Ahaz, and that too for the worship of false divinities, where he sacrificed and burned incense (ch. 28:4, 25). Hezekiah broke them down (II Kings 18:4, 22), but they were re-erected by Manasseh (II Kings 21:3; II Chron. 33:3), and again removed by Josiah (II Kings 23:5, 8, 13). The high places were denounced by the prophets (Ezek. 6:3), and emphasis was laid on the fact that Zion was Jehovah's dwelling place, his sanctuary and holy mountain (Isa. 2:2, 3; 8:18; 18:7; 33:20; Joel 2:1; 3:17, 21; Amos 1:2; Micah 4:1, 2).

High Priest. The supreme pontiff and the representative of the nation before Jehovah. Aaron was appointed to this office after the establishment of the covenant at Sinai and after the erection of the tabernacle had been authorized (Ex. 27:21; ch. 28). The reference in Ex. 16:33, 34, where Moses bids Aaron lay up a pot of manna before the Lord, is not an anticipation of this call; for the command was probably issued by Moses at a later time, at least it was obeyed by Aaron at a later time, and is recorded here because the entire story of the manna is related here (vs. 31-35). The first hint that it was important for the sons of Aaron to be admitted to the privilege enjoyed by the elders of Israel was given after the covenant had been proclaimed (Ex. 24:1, 9). The distinction accorded them, however, did not suggest the national priesthood to them. Aaron was not the priest of the nation at this time; he was the prophet of Moses. The addition of his sons to the commission appointed to witness a manifestation of God's glory might suggest that Aaron's present office was to be inherited by his sons. At any rate it foreshadowed their call to future work. The legal head of the house of Aaron held the office of high priest; and the succession was probably determined by primogeniture, unless legal disabilities interfered (Lev. 21:16-23). Political considerations, also, not infrequently played a part in his selection (I Kings 2:26, 27, 35). His age when he might assume office was 20, according to tradition. Aristobulus, however, officiated when he was 17 (Jos. Antiq. xv. 3, 3). He must govern his conduct by special laws (Lev. 21:1-15). His duties were the oversight of the sanctuary, its service, and its treasure (II Kings 12:7 seq.; 22:4); the performance of the service on the Day of Atonement, when he was obliged to enter the Holy of Holies; and the consultation of God by Urim and Thummim. Besides these distinguishing duties, he was qualified to discharge any priestly function; and it was customary for him to offer sacrifices on Sabbaths, new moons, and annual festivals (Jos. War v. 5, 7). He presided also over the sanhedrin when religious questions were before that body (Matt. 26:57; Acts 5:21). His official garments, besides the raiment of white linen which he wore in common with other priests (see PRIEST), were: 1. Breastplate: square, made of gold, and blue, purple, scarlet, and fine twisted linen, set with 4 rows of precious stones, 3 in a row, each inscribed with the name of a tribe. Within the breastplate were the Urim and Thummim (q.v.). 2. Ephod: an embroidered vestment of the same rich materials as the breastplate. It was intended for the front and back of the body, and was made in 2 parts clasped together at the shoulder by onyx stones. Each stone bore the names of 6 tribes. The ephod carried on its front the breastplate, and was bound about the waist by a girdle of gold, blue, purple, scarlet, and fine twisted linen. 3. Robe of the ephod: which was longer than the ephod, and worn underneath it, entirely blue, sleeveless, and adorned below with a fringe of alternate pomegranates and golden bells; see BELL. 4. Miter: a cap or turban, made of linen and surmounted, in later times at least, by another of blue, and this in turn by a triple crown of gold. A gold plate, bearing the inscription "Holiness to Jehovah," was fastened to the front by a blue ribbon (Ex., ch. 28; Eccclus. 45: 8-13; Jos. Antiq. iii. 7, 1-6; cf. I Macc. 10:20).

The high priest wore this official garb when discharging his peculiar duties, except that on the Day of Atonement he laid it aside while he entered the Holy of Holies to make atonement for the priesthood and the sanctuary. The mode of consecration is described in Ex., ch. 29. Among other ceremonies the sacred oil was poured upon his head (Ex. 29:7; Lev. 8:12; Ps. 133:2), and hence by way of distinction he is designated the anointed priest (Lev. 4:3, 5, 16; 21:10; Num. 35:25). There is some uncertainty concerning the difference of consecrating the high priests and the common priests (Ex. 29:21; Lev. 8:30); but rabbinical tradition makes the distinction consist in the quantity of oil used. It was poured abundantly on the head of the high priest and sparingly upon the heads of the ordinary priests. At first the high priesthood was for life, but Herod, and afterward the Romans, jealous of the power which a life tenure of the office gave to the high priest, made and unmade the pontiffs at will. Jesus is the High Priest of our profession, of whom the Jewish dignitary of the same designation was only the type (Heb. 3:1-3; 8:1-6; 9:24-28). For the chief priests of the N.T., see PRIEST, end of the article.

THE LINE OF THE HIGH PRIESTS

I. From the establishment of the Aaronic priesthood to the Exile. The Biblical catalogues are 2 (I Chron. 6:1-15; Ezra 7:1-5), each of which omits links of the genealogy, as is quite usual in Hebrew genealogical tables.

Ark removed from Kiriath-jearim and deposited in the house of Obed-edom (II Sam. 6:1-11; I Chron. 13:13, 14). Transferred to the city of David (II Sam. 6:12-15). Zadok and Abiathar the priests assist (I Chron. 15:11, 12). Ark placed in a tent and an altar erected (II Sam. 6:17; cf. ch. 7:2). Zadok and Ahimelech, son of Abiathar, are named as the priests during a certain period of David's reign (II Sam. 8:17; I Chron. 18:16). The date is uncertain; it is not improbably after Absalom's revolt.

Zadok and Abiathar are called the priests (II Sam. 15:35; 17:15; 19:11; 20:25). Their sons who serve as messengers are Ahimaaz and Jonathan respectively (II Sam. 15:27, 36). In the attempt to debar Solomon from the succession and advance Adonijah,

THE LINE OF THE HIGH PRIESTS—Continued

Zadok is loyal to David (I Kings 1:8).

Abiathar favors Adonijah (I Kings 1:7).

Zadok and Ahimelech, son of Abiathar, superintend the division of the priests into courses (I Chron. 24:3, 6, 31). They do this as the active heads of their respective fathers' houses. In consequence of a 2d conspiracy in favor of Adonijah, made after Solomon had ascended the throne, Zadok is put into the place of Abiathar (I Kings 2:26, 35).

By the deposition of Abiathar, the house of Eli falls (I Kings 2:27), and Zadok is sole high priest.

Abimaaz.

Azariah (I).

Amariah, chief priest in the reign of Jehoshaphat, about 853 B. C. (II Chron. 19:11).

Jeholada, in the reigns of Athaliah and Joash, dying in the reign of Joash at the age of 130 years (II Kings 11:4–19; 12:2; II Chron. 22:10 seq.; 24:15).

Zechariah, son of Jeholada, perhaps high priest, slain by Joash between 819 and 805 B. C. (II Chron. 24:20, 22).

Johanan.

Azariah (II), who officiated in the Temple at Jerusalem about 750 B. C., in the reign of Uzziah (I Chron. 6:10; II Chron. 26:17).

Urijah, about 732 B. C., in the reign of Ahaz (II Kings 16:10).

Azariah (III), about 727 B. C., in the reign of Hezekiah (II Chron. 31:10, 13).

Amariah.

Ahitub.

Meraloth (I Chron. 9:11; Neh. 11:11).

Zadok.

Shallum or Meshullam (I Chron. 6:12; 9:11).

Hilkiah, in the 18th year of the reign of Josiah, 621 B. C. (I Chron. 9:11; II Chron. 34:8, 9).

Azariah (IV).

Seraiah.

Jehozadak, who was carried captive to Babylonia by Nebuchadnezzar in 586 B. C. (I Chron. 6:15).

Interval of 50 years during the Exile.

II. From the Exile to the Maccabean priests.

Jeshua, son of Jehozadak, who returned from captivity with Zerubbabel, and was high priest from at least 538 to 520 B. C. (Ezra 2:2; 3:2; Neh. 12:10; Hag. 1:1; Zech. 1:7; 3:1; 6:11).

Joiakim (Neh. 12:10, 12), in the days of [Artaxerxes (Jos. Antiq. xi:5, 1).

Eliashib, in the 20th year of Artaxerxes, 445 B. C., and still in office after 433 B. C. (Neh. 3:20; 12:10; 13:4, 6, 7).

Joiada.

Jonathan (Neh. 12:11), or rather Johanan (vs. 22, 23), in Gr. John, high priest, as early as 411 B. C. (Elephantine papyri) and in the reign of Artaxerxes [Mnemon] (Jos. Antiq. xi:7, 1; cf. 5, 4), who occupied the throne from 404 to 359/8 B. C.

Jaddua, high priest when Alexander the Great visited Jerusalem, 332 B. C., and died about the same time as Alexander, 323 B. C. (Neh. 12:11; Jos. Antiq. xi:8, 4 and 5 and 7).

Onias, contemporary of Arius, who was king of Sparta from about 309 to 265 B. C. (I Macc. 12:7, 20; Jos. Antiq. xi:8, 7).

Simon the Just, son of Onias.

Eleazar, son of Onias and brother of Simon, in the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus, who reigned from 285 to 246 (Jos. Antiq. xii:2, 5).

Manasseh, uncle of Eleazar (Jos. Antiq. xii:4, 1).

Onias II, son of Simon the Just, in the time of Ptolemy Euergetes, who reigned from 246 to 221 (Jos. Antiq. xii:4, 1).

Simon II, son of Onias II (Jos. Antiq. xii:4, 10).

Onias III, son of Simon II, in the time of Seleucus IV, called Philopator, who reigned from 187 to 175 B. C. (II Macc., ch. 3; Jos. Antiq. xii:4, 10).

Joshua, in Gr. Jesus, son of Simon II, who assumed the name Jason, induced Antiochus Epiphanes, who reigned from 175 to 163 B. C., to depose Onias (II Macc. 4:7–26). After holding office about 3 years, Jason was supplanted, about 171 B. C., by Menelaus, called also Onias, son of Simon II (Jos. Antiq. xii:5, 1; xv:3, 1). According to II Macc. 4:23, he was the brother of Simon the Benjamite. Menelaus held office 10 years (Jos. Antiq. xii:9, 7), and was put to death in the time of Judas Maccabaeus (II Macc. 13:1–8).

Jakim, with the Gr. name of Alcimus, who was not of the high priestly line, although of the stock of Aaron, put in office by Demetrius, 161 B. C., and retained office 3 years (I Macc. 7:5–9, 12–25; 9:1, 54–56; Jos. Antiq. xii:9, 7; xx:10, 1).

Vacancy of 7 years (Jos. Antiq. xx:10, 1).

III. The Maccabean priest-kings.

Jonathan, of the priestly family of Joarib (I Macc. 10:20, 21; I Chron. 24:7), made high priest in 152 B. C. by Alexander Balas, who was contending for the Syrian throne (I Macc. 10:18–21), and held office for 7 years in round numbers (Jos. Antiq. xx:10, 1).

Simon, his brother, for 8 years.

John Hyrcanus, son of Simon, for 30 years.

Aristobulus, son of Hyrcanus, for 1 year.

Alexander Jannaeus, son of Hyrcanus, for 27 years.

Hyrcanus II, son of Alexander, for 9 years.

Aristobulus, son of Alexander, for 3 years, 3 months.

Hyrcanus II, a 2d time, for 24 years, from 63 B. C.

Antigonus, son of Aristobulus, for 3 years, 3 months, until Herod the Great took possession of Jerusalem in 37 B. C. (Jos. Antiq. xiv:16, 4; xx:10, 1).

IV. From the accession of Herod the Great until Jerusalem was taken by Titus. During this period there were 28 high priests (Jos. Antiq. xx:10, 1), one being generally removed to make way for his successor.

Appointed by Herod the Great, king from 37 to 4 B. C.:

Hananel, in Latinized Gr. Ananelus (Jos. Antiq. xv:2, 4).

Aristobulus, grandson of Hyrcanus, for 1 year, about 35 B. C. (Jos. Antiq. xv:3, 1 and 3).

Hananel, a 2d time (Jos. Antiq. xv:3, 3).

Jesus, son of Phabet (Jos. Antiq. xv:9, 3).

Simon, son of Boethus (Jos. Antiq. xv:9, 3), from about 24 to 5 B. C.

Matthias, son of Theophilus and son-in-law of Boethus (Jos. Antiq. xvii:4, 2) [Joseph, son of Ellemus, high priest for 1 day as his assistant (Jos. Antiq. xvii:6, 4)].

Joazar, son of Boethus (Jos. Antiq. xvii:6, 4; 13, 1).

THE LINE OF THE HIGH PRIESTS — Continued

- Appointed by Archelaus, who ruled from 4 B. C. to A. D. 6:
Eleazar, son of Boethus, who did not abide long in office (Jos. Antiq. xvii. 13, 1).
Jesus, son of Sie (Jos. Antiq. xvii. 13, 1).
 Appointed by Quirinius, president of Syria:
Annas, or Ananus, son of Seth, who obtained the office in A. D. 6 or 7, Joazar, whom the multitude had made high priest, being put down (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 2, 1; cf. 1, 1).
 Appointed by Valerius Gratus, procurator of Judea A. D. 14–25:
Ismael, son of Phabi, who held office but a short time (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 2, 2).
Eleazar, son of Annas, for 1 year (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 2, 2).
Simon, son of Camithus, for 1 year (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 2, 2).
Joseph Caiaphas, son-in-law to Annas, from about A. D. 18 to 36 (John 18: 13; Jos. Antiq. xviii. 4, 3).
 Appointed by Vitellius, president of Syria:
Jonathan, son of Annas, in A. D. 36 (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 4, 3; cf. xix. 6, 4; xx. 8, 5).
Theophilus, son of Annas, in A. D. 37 (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 5, 3).
 Appointed by King Herod Agrippa I, who reigned from A. D. 41 to 44:
Simon Cantheras, son of Boethus (Jos. Antiq. xix. 6, 2).
Matthias, son of Annas (Jos. Antiq. xix. 6, 4).
Elionaeus, son of Cantheras (Jos. Antiq. xix. 8, 1).
 Appointed by Herod, king of Chalcis, who died in A. D. 48:
Joseph, son of Camydu (Jos. Antiq. xx. 1, 3).
Ananias, son of Nedebeaus (Jos. Antiq. xx. 5, 2), sent in bonds to Rome during the procuratorship of Cumanus, but acquitted and still in office in A. D. 57, 2 years before Felix was succeeded by Festus (Acts 23:2; 24:1, 27).
 Appointed by King Agrippa II:
Ismael, son of Phabi (Jos. Antiq. xx. 8, 8), about A. D. 59, who went to Rome and was detained there as hostage (Jos. Antiq. xx. 8, 11).
Joseph, called Cabi, son of the former high priest Simon (Jos. Antiq. xx. 8, 11).
Annas, son of Annas, for 3 months in A. D. 62 (Jos. Antiq. xx. 9, 1).
Jesus, son of Dammaeus (Jos. Antiq. xx. 9, 1).
Jesus, son of Gamaliel (Jos. Antiq. xx. 9, 4; cf. War iv. 5, 2).
Matthias, son of Theophilus, appointed about A. D. 64 (Jos. Antiq. xx. 9, 7).
 Made high priest by the people during the war:
Phanas, or Phannias, son of Samuel (Jos. War iv. 3, 8; cf. Antiq. xx. 10, end).

Hil'en (hî'lên). See HOLON.

Hil-ki'ah (hîl-ki'á) [Jehovah is the portion (cf. Ps. 16:5)]. 1. A Levite, son of Amzi, descended from Merari (I Chron. 6:45, 46).

2. Another Merarite Levite, son of Hosah (I Chron. 26:11).

3. Father of Eliakim, who was over the household in Hezekiah's reign (II Kings 18:18, 26; Isa. 22:20; 36:3).

4. A priest, father of Jeremiah (Jer. 1:1).
 5. Father of Jeremiah's contemporary Gemariah (Jer. 29:3).

6. The high priest contemporary with Josiah, who aided the king in his reformation of religion and found the Book of the Law (II Kings 22:4–14; 23:4; I Chron. 6:13; II Chron. 34:9–22). See JOSIAH 1.

7. A chief of the priests who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:7). In the next generation a father's house bore this name (v. 21).

8. One of those who stood by Ezra when he read the Law to the people (Neh. 8:4).

Hill. The name is generally applied to a natural eminence smaller than a mountain and larger than a mound; but the terms are relative, the same height being sometimes known by both names (Isa. 31:4), or called a mountain in one locality and a hill in another (Rev. 17:9). Hill is chiefly the rendering of Heb. gib'ah and Gr. bounos. Not infrequently it is also employed in the A.V., and much less frequently in the R.V. (Ps. 2:6; 3:4; 15:1; 24:3; 42:6; Matt. 5:14; Luke 4:29), to translate Heb. hâr and Gr. oros, which are usually rendered mountain.

Hil'tel (hîl'el) [he has praised]. Father of Abdon the judge (Judg. 12:13, 15).

Hin. A Hebrew liquid measure, containing in early times 1.62 gallons, later 1.78 gallons, U. S. wine measure (Ex. 29:40; Jos. Antiq. iii. 8, 3). See MEASURE, III.

Hind. A female stag, in Heb. 'ayyalâh (Gen. 49:21; Job 39:1; Ps. 18:33; Prov. 5:19; S. of Sol. 2:7; Jer. 14:5). See HART.

Hinge. In ancient times in the East heavy doors turned on pivots, which were constructed on the upper and lower corners of one side and inserted in sockets. The socket is probably more especially referred to in I Kings 7:50. See also Prov. 26:14.

Hin'nom (hîn'ôm), Val'ley of; known also as the valley of the son of Hinnom or of the children of Hinnom. A valley at Jerusalem, near the gate of potsherds (Jer. 19:2, R.V. marg.; not east gate as in A.V.). The boundary between Judah and Benjamin passed from En-rogel by the valley of the son of Hinnom to the S. side of Jerusalem, and thence to the top of the mountain which faces the valley of Hinnom from the W., and is at the outermost part of the vale of Rephaim (Josh. 15:8; 18:16). If the term "shoulder of the Jebusite (the same is Jerusalem)" includes the hill on the W. of the Tyropoeon Valley, and not merely the Temple hill; in other words, if the term denotes the plateau which juts out S. between the great encircling wadies, and which was not only crowned by the citadel of the Jebusites, but also occupied by their dwellings without the walls and by their fields, then the description in The Book of Joshua identifies the valley of Hinnom with at least the lower part of the valley which bounds Jerusalem on the S., and is now known as the wadi er-Rabâbi, near its junction with the ravine of the Kidron. At the high place of Tophet, in the valley of Hinnom, parents made their children pass through the fire to Molech. Ahaz and Manasseh were guilty of this abomination (II Chron. 28:3; 33:6). Jeremiah foretold that God would visit this awful wickedness with sore judgment, and would cause such a destruction of the people that the valley would become known as the valley of slaughter (Jer. 7:31–34; 19:2, 6; 32:35). Josiah defiled the high place to render it unfit for even idolatrous rites and thus to stop the sacrifices (II Kings 23:10). From the horrors of its fires, and from its pollution by Josiah, perhaps also because offal was burnt there, the valley became a type of sin and woe, and the Heb. name Gē ben-Hinnôm (Gē-Hinnôm), corrupted into Gehenna, passed into use as a designation for the place of eternal punishment.

Hip-po-pot'a-mus [Gr., river horse]. See BEHEMOTH.

Hî'rah (hî'râ) [cf. Arab. hîr, nobility]. An Adullamite, a friend of Judah (Gen. 38:1, 12).

Hī'ram (hī'rām) ; in Chronicles Hu'ram, except in the Heb. text of II Chron. 4:11b; 9:10, where the kere has ū, and the kethib ī. In Heb. the name is also written Hlrom (I Kings 5:10, 18; 7:40, R.V. marg.) [probably for 'āhīrām (Heb. and Phoenician), the Brother is exalted]. 1. A king of Tyre. According to the citation which Josephus makes from the Phoenician historian Dios, and from the Tyrian annals which Menander translated, Hiram succeeded his father Abibaal, reigned 34 years, and died at the age of 53 (Jos. Antiq. viii. 5, 3; Apion i. 17, 18). He enlarged the city of Tyre by constructing an embankment on the e. side, built a causeway to connect the city with the island on which the temple of Jupiter or Baal-samem stood, dedicated a golden pillar in this temple, rebuilt old sanctuaries, roofing them with cedars cut on Lebanon, and erected temples to Hercules and Astarte. He was a friend of both David and Solomon (I Kings 5:1; II Chron. 2:3). Sometime after David had captured the stronghold of Zion, Hiram sent an embassy to him; and, when David desired a palace, Hiram furnished the cedar timber and the masons and carpenters (II Sam. 5:11). This was evidently before the birth of Solomon (II Sam. 7:2, 12; 11:2). When Solomon ascended the throne, Hiram sent congratulations. For a consideration he furnished cedar and fir for building the Temple, and skilled workmen to assist in preparing the timber and stone (I Kings 5:1-12; II Chron. 2:3-16). He also advanced 120 talents of gold (I Kings 9:14), and joined Solomon in sending to Ophir for the precious metal (I Kings 9:26-28; II Chron. 9:21). In partial payment for his contributions, he was offered 20 towns in Galilee, which however he refused (I Kings 9:10-12; II Chron. 8:1, 2); see CABUL. 2. The chronological statements of Josephus and the Bible have never been reconciled. Josephus' statement that the Temple was begun in Hiram's 11th year (Jos. Antiq. viii. 3, 1) or 12th (Jos. Apion i. 18) need not receive serious consideration; for it is probably a calculation of his own and not a citation from the archives. Either the 34 years assigned as the duration of Hiram's reign or the text of I Kings 9:9-12 may be corrupt. The passage in Kings is parallel to II Chron. 8:1, and this latter passage does not require the assumption that Hiram lived to the end of the 20 years wherein the Temple and the royal palace were built.

2. An artificer, whose father was a Tyrian; his mother was a widow of Naphtali (I Kings 7:13, 14) but by birth a woman of Dan (II Chron. 2:14). He extended the bronze or copper work in connection with Solomon's Temple, as the pillars, the laver, the basins, the shovels (I Kings 7:13-46; II Chron. 2:13, 14). The title father (II Chron. 2:13; 4:16) probably denotes a master workman or a counselor.

His'to-ry. Biblical history is the record of that series of events which form the basis for the religion of the Bible. It may be divided into 4 periods: I. An account of the creation of the universe, showing God's relation to the world, and introducing human history. II. A sketch of human history, showing God's relation to the human race, and introducing the history of the chosen people. III. The history of the chosen people, showing God's dealing with them and the preparation for the Advent of Christ. IV. The history of the establishment of the Christian Church, which is to reach all nations. Inter-Biblical history falls between sections III and IV.

I. An account of the creation of the universe, showing God's relation to the world, and introducing human history (Gen. 1:1 to 2:3). See CREATION and SABBATH. The great doctrine is that God is the Creator and Lord of all things. This account, which teaches monotheism, denies materialism and polytheism. In taking for granted that God is personal and omnipotent, it makes reasonable his supernatural manifestation in human history.

II. A sketch of human history, showing God's relation to the human race, and thus laying a foundation for introducing the history of the chosen people (Gen. 2:4 to 11:26). The events of this period fell almost entirely into the prehistoric period. The period is divided into 2 parts by the Flood. The narrative is symmetrical; 10 generations before the Flood, from Adam to Noah inclusive, and 10 generations after the Flood, from Shem to Abraham inclusive (chs. 5; 11:10-26). The postdiluvian period is divided into 2 parts at Peleg, in whose days the earth was divided. From Shem to Peleg inclusive are 5 generations, and from Reu to Abraham inclusive are 5. In the antediluvian period are detailed the covenant with Adam, its failure through man's disobedience, the downward course of man in sin, his punishment by a flood, and the deliverance of Noah. In the postdiluvian period are related the new and unconditioned covenant with Noah, the new command laid upon man, the increasing population, the growing independence of men from God, their punishment by confusion of speech and dispersion. The genealogy of the Sethitic-Semitic line to Abraham is recorded, and at the same time its common origin with the other families of the earth is made plain. The locality where the recorded events occurred was the basin of the Tigris and Euphrates Rivers; at least, every definite geographical reference is to this region (chs. 2:14; 8:4; 10:10; 11:2, 28). From this center the people spread on all sides, especially toward the w. and s.w., where the course of migration was not blocked by great mountains (ch. 10). By the close of the period the inhabited world, so far as it was within the sphere of history, extended from the Caspian Sea, the mountains of Elam and the Persian Gulf on the e., w. to the isles of Greece and the opposite shore of Africa, and from the neighborhood of the Black Sea on the n. to the Arabian Sea on the s. The length of the period from Adam to Abraham was at the lowest calculation 1,946 years, but it must have been much longer; see CHRONOLOGY, I. With the personal history of man began those theophanies, rare indeed though they were (Gen. 3:8 seq.), which are important in the history of revelation. During this period man made progress in civilization. He had been created with capacity, and was commanded to subdue nature. He advanced from the unclothed state, passing beyond rude garments of leaves and afterward of skins (chs. 2:25; 3:7, 21) to woven clothing; from a food of fruits that grew of itself to food obtained by agriculture and herding (chs. 1:29; 4:2); from uncertain abodes to movable tents, settled habitations (ch. 4:17, 20), and large cities built of brick (ch. 11:3, 4); from the family to the tribe and the kingdom (ch. 10:10); from no implements to tools of metal and instruments of music (ch. 4:21, 22). In this period also simple speech became diversified dialects and languages (chs. 10:5; 11:1, 6, 9). Man recognized the duty of walking before God in holiness of life (chs. 3:2, 3, 10; 4:7; 5:22; 6:9); distinguished between clean and unclean animals (chs. 7:2; 8:20); erected altars and worshiped God by bloody and bloodless offerings (chs. 4:3, 4; 8:20); and prayed to God in his character of Jehovah (ch. 4:26). Religion, however, suffered decadence (ch. 6:2, 5), and idolatry became widespread (Josh. 24:2). See especially GENESIS, EDEN, ADAM 1, SATAN, SERPENT 1, ABEL, I, CAIN 1, ENOCH 3, FLOOD, NOAH, I, BABEL.

III. The history of the chosen people, showing God's dealing with them and the preparation for the Advent of Christ. This period differs from the preceding in the shifting of the central locality from the valley of the Tigris and Euphrates to Palestine. Canaan becomes the center of the history. The duration of the period, regarded as having begun with Abraham's birth, was reckoned by Ussher at 1,996 years, and so stands on the margin of many editions of the A.V. There are certainly errors in this calculation; but whether they equalize themselves, or whether the total length should be several centuries more or less, cannot be determined as yet from the Biblical and other data. At the beginning of this period, and on several occasions later, besides the ordinary ways in which God reveals himself to man and to the prophets, he appeared in theophanies. This period also embraces 3 of the 4 great miracle epochs; namely, at the deliverance of the people from Egypt and their establishment in Canaan under Moses and Joshua, during the mortal struggle between the worship of Jehovah and Baal worship in the time of Elijah and Elisha, and during the Babylonian Captivity. These miracle epochs were separated from each other by centuries during which there were, with extremely rare exceptions, no miracles. This period may conveniently be divided into sections according to the progressive stages in the outward development of the people of God.

III. 1. An independent tribe in Canaan under Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. The patriarch was the priest and responsible ruler of the tribe. The history is reviewed in the articles on ABRAHAM, VISIONS, THEOPHANY, MELCHIZEDEK, ISAAC, JACOB.

III. 2. A folk of 12 tribes for a long time in Egyptian bondage. See EGYPT, III, JOSEPH 1, MIRACLE, EXODUS, MARAH, MANNA, QUAIL, REPHIDIM.

III. 3. A nation, constituted at Sinai, and independent. Led to Sinai the people became a nation by accepting the covenant which God proposed, and which was contained in ten commandments, and formed the constitution of the nation. Jehovah is king, who henceforth dwells in the tabernacle in the midst of his people, reveals his will to prophet and priest, and exercises the legislative, judicial, and executive offices through laws which he reveals, judgments which he pronounces, and officials whom he raises up. The nation was

(a) A brotherhood of 12 tribes under a religious constitution, and with a common sanctuary (Ex., ch. 19 to I Sam., ch. 7). The high priest was the chief representative and was aided by prophets and occasional leaders, like Moses. See SINAI, THEOCRACY, TENT OF MEETING, TABERNACLE, LEVITES, LEVITICUS, CAMP.

Leaving Sinai the Israelites journeyed to Kadesh. On account of their lack of faith, they were turned back into the wilderness, where they sojourned 38 years; see NUMBERS, WILDERNESS OF THE WANDERING, KORAH 4. At length they encompassed the land of Edom and found a crossing at the head of the Arnon Valley. The conquest of the country e. of the Jordan followed; see SIHON, OG. The camp was then pitched in the Jordan Valley; see SHITTIM 1, BALAAM, BAAL-PEOR, MIDIAN 2, DEUTERONOMY. On the death of Moses, the Jordan was crossed and Canaan conquered and possessed; see JOSHUA 1, CANAAN, SHILOH. After the settlement of the Israelites in Canaan, Joshua died, and was succeeded at intervals by other persons of ability and influence, 15 in number, who led the people against their enemies and exercised governmental functions; see JUDGES, BOOK OF, SAMUEL. Unifying forces were at work during the times of the Judges, and a national feeling existed and sometimes manifested its strength; but still the people too often allowed natural barriers and petty jealousies and local interests to separate them. There are bright examples of godliness and filial piety, but along with these is the spectacle of a people easily seduced to idolatry; see JUDGES, BOOK OF. During this entire period the weaknesses and defects of the human parties to the covenant were disclosed. At the very beginning of the period lack of faith in God was shown at Kadesh, the existence of tribal jealousy was manifested in the rebellion of Korah and his company against the high priesthood of Aaron and the political supremacy of Moses, and the readiness of the people to lapse into idolatry became apparent in the affair of the golden calf and in their enslavement by the seductions of Baal-peor. The great political blunders of the period were the league made by Joshua with the Gibeonites, and the failure of Israel to occupy Jerusalem. These defects and blunders were of far-reaching consequence in the history of Israel.

(b) A monarchy of 12 tribes. The people had failed to foster the centralizing influences which their religion designedly provided, allowed senseless tribal jealousies to sunder them, and accustomed themselves to turn from God to idols. The threatening attitude of neighboring nations made them realize the need of organization, a strong government, and a military leader. Samuel was old. They turned away from the good provision which God had made, but which they had neglected, and demanded an earthly king. By the side of the high priest and the prophet there was now a permanent earthly ruler, with supreme political power, instead of the Judges whom God was wont to raise up. Saul was the first king, but on account of his overestimate of his position, his failure to recognize the superior functions of the high priest and prophet, he was denied the privilege of founding a dynasty; and finally his willful transgression of God's explicit command led to the rejection of him from being king, and to the withdrawal of God and God's prophet from him. David was then chosen; see SAMUEL, BOOKS OF, SAUL 2, DAVID. Under David the 12 tribes were reunited after 7 years of civil war, Jerusalem was taken from the Jebusites and made the political and religious capital, the borders of the kingdom were extended by conquest far to the n.e. of Damascus, and the acquired country was laid under tribute. Deputies were placed in Edom also. See JERUSALEM, III. 1; 2. David was succeeded by Solomon, under whom the Temple was erected, Jerusalem greatly embellished and its fortifications extended, and the fame of Israel enhanced. But his exactions made the people discontented, and on his death the failure of his son to discern the gravity of the situation incited 10 tribes to revolt from the house of David; thus Judah and Benjamin constituted the Southern Kingdom. See SOLOMON, REHOBAM, ISRAEL 3.

(c) A monarchy consisting chiefly of the tribe of Judah, 10 tribes having revolted and formed a rival schismatic apostate kingdom. The causes which led to this revolt were long standing and many; see ISRAEL 3. The Kingdom of Judah possessed the greater strength. It had material strength: the stronger natural position, the capital, the organized government, and the worship to which the people were accustomed. It had moral strength: the consciousness of adhering to the legitimate line of kings, which has ever been a mighty force in history, the true religion with its elevating influence, the sense of loyalty to Jehovah, and a line of godlier kings. It had the providential care of God, who was preserving the knowledge and worship of himself among men and was preparing the way for his Messiah. The religious history of Judah during

This period was marked by a decline in the days of Rehoboam (I Kings 14:22), and again in the days of his son Abijam (ch. 15:3), and yet again in the days of Jehoram and Ahaziah (II Kings 8:27). The cause of this religious deterioration was the corruption introduced by Solomon and intermarriage with idolaters. Rehoboam's mother was an Ammonitess, for whom Solomon had built a high place to Milcom, and who had sacrificed to this abomination of her people. Jehoram was son-in-law of Ahab and Jezebel. Each of these periods of religious decay was followed by reformation, the 1st under King Asa and the 2d under Jehoash, but Jehoash himself afterward turned away from the Lord, and another religious revival became necessary, only to be followed by the dominance of idolatry later under the pernicious influence of Ahaz. The encroachments of the Assyrians on the Hebrew people began in this period. The divided nation, largely degenerate in religion, was not in condition to offer effective resistance; and by slow but steady advance, which began in the days of Ahab, the Assyrians pushed their conquest until they had overthrown the Northern Kingdom. See ISRAEL 3, SAMARIA, SARGON.

(d) The monarchy of Judah sole survivor. The Southern Kingdom was now exposed to the attacks of the Assyrians, and later of their successors, the Chaldeans (Babylonians); see HEZEKIAH 1, SENNACHERIB, MANASSEH 4, NEBUCHADNEZZAR. The religious condition also of the people was not good, although great prophets like Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Micah were laboring to advance the truth. Its kings, with the exception of Hezekiah and Josiah, did not render true and steadfast allegiance to Jehovah, and the people were like-minded. There was an idolatrous party in the state which had been triumphant in the reign of Ahaz. Idolatry was deep-rooted among the people, and the reforms of any king affected the nation only superficially. Foreign idolaters were also in the land. The nation drifted to destruction. The army of Nebuchadnezzar visited Jerusalem at brief intervals during the course of 2 decades, several deportations of Jews to Babylonia took place, and the city was taken and burned in 586 B.C. The Hebrew people had failed to conserve the elements of national strength, and to abide under the shadow of the Almighty, and they fell. See JUDAH 2.

III. 4. A subject people. (1) Judah in the Babylonian Exile. See CAPTIVITY, II.

(2) Judah in Palestine. In the 1st year of his reign over Babylon, 539-538 B.C., Cyrus issued an edict which permitted the Jews to return to Palestine and rebuild the Temple. Forty-three thousand embraced the opportunity and returned under Zerubbabel. This colony was

(a) A province of the Persian empire, subordinated to the province Beyond-the-river. It remained such for 200 years. Twice it enjoyed local governors of its own, appointed by the Persian monarch; see ZERUBBABEL and NEHEMIAH 3. But for the greater part of the time its civil affairs were subject to the jurisdiction of the Persian satrap beyond the river. He had authority to appoint a deputy for Judah and to call on the Jews for men or money. But the local administration was left to the high priest, and he gradually came to be regarded as the political as well as the religious head of the nation. Immediately on the Return of the exiles from Babylon the foundations of the Temple were laid. The work was pushed on under the exhortations of the prophets Haggai and Zechariah despite interruptions and opposition, and the building was completed in 515 B.C. The walls were erected under the supervision of Nehemiah by authority of Artaxerxes in 444 B.C.; see JERUSALEM, III. 2. At this time also Ezra the priest was in the city, zealous for the Law of God, and successfully laboring for the purity of religion; see EZRA 3 and CANON. About 365 B.C. there was a dispute between 2 brothers about the high priesthood, which ended by one killing the other within the precincts of the Temple. In connection with this affair Bagoses, general of the army of Artaxerxes Mnemon, entered the Temple (Jos. Antiq. xi. 7, 1). In March or April, 334 B.C., Alexander of Macedon crossed the Hellespont, defeated the Persian satraps, then marched on, and the next year gained a victory over the Persian monarch Darius Codomannus at Issus, a defile near the n.e. angle of the Mediterranean Sea, laid Syria at his feet, and entered Jerusalem. After an almost uninterrupted career of conquest, extending e. as far as the Punjab, Alexander died at Babylon in June, 323 B.C. See ALEXANDER 1.

(b) Judea subject to Egypt. Ptolemy Soter wrested Palestine from Syria, to which it had fallen after Alexander's death, in 320 B.C., and the Ptolemies retained it, except for occasional brief periods, until 198 B.C., when Antiochus the Great defeated the Egyptian general Scopas near Paneas (Baniās); see PROLEMY. During these 122 years the Jews were governed by their high priest subject to the king of Egypt. At this time the Hebrew Scriptures were translated into Greek at Alexandria in Egypt. See VERSIONS, I. 1.

(c) Judea subject to Syria. Antiochus the Great wrested Palestine from Egypt in 198 B.C. by his victory over Ptolemy V (Euphron) at Paneas. The Syrians not only supported the Grecian party among the Jews which attempted to Hellenize the nation, but they also endeavored by force to impose idolatry upon the Jews. The sacrilegious tyranny of the Syrians became intolerable to the pious portion of the nation, and led to the Maccabean revolt in 166 B.C. See GYMNASIUM, JASON 2, ANTIOCHUS 1, 2.

A period of independence under the Maccabean priest-kings followed; see MACCABEES. It lasted from 166 B.C. until Pompey took Jerusalem in 63 B.C.; but the Maccabees were allowed to hold the throne until 40 B.C., when Herod the Great was appointed king of Judea by the Roman senate. He began his actual reign by the capture of Jerusalem in 37 B.C. During this period the Pharisees and Sadducees became recognized parties, exerting great political and religious influence. See PHARISEES, SADDUCEES, COUNCIL.

(d) Under the Romans. During this period the affairs of Judea were administered by appointees of the Romans; first by Herod the Great, then by Archelaus, and afterward by procurators, except from A.D. 41-44, when Herod Agrippa I reigned as king; see JUDAEA, HEROD, PROCURATOR. The maladministration of these officials exasperated the people and drove them to revolt. Obstinate war raged from A.D. 66 until the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. The remnant of the Jewish people who remained in Palestine were denied access to their capital and had no longer a national existence. While the Jews still constituted a nation under the Romans, in the days of Herod the king, Jesus of Nazareth was born and a new period of Biblical history began.

IV. The history of the establishment of the Christian Church, which is to reach all nations. 1. Christ's preparation for the establishment of his Church, by example, teaching, and redemption. See JESUS CHRIST, GOSPEL, APOSTLE.

2. The Church among the Jews. The Church was founded by the risen Christ. On the Day of Pentecost, the promised Spirit was given, and the Church's work was initiated by Peter's sermon, increase of believers, and baptism; see WEEKS, FEAST OF, HOLY SPIRIT, TONGUE, BAPTISM, CHURCH. During the next few years, 6 perhaps, the Church experienced the difficulties incident to the imperfections of believers and to persecution; but it grew steadily in purity and numbers. See ANANIAS 1, DEACON, STEPHEN. The persecution which arose on the death of Stephen scattered the brethren abroad, and the evangelization of the Jews in Palestine and Syria began. The gospel was carried to Samaria and to the cities on the seacoast from Gaza to Caesarea. See PHILIP 7. For the purpose of persecuting the believers who were now found in the Jewish colony in Damascus, Saul went thither, and was converted, and was told that he was to be a teacher of the Gentiles. The vision of Peter at Joppa, and its complement in the conversion of Cornelius and his baptism with the Holy Spirit, opened the eyes of the Church to the truth, already theoretically known, that the Holy Spirit is for all believers, Jew and Gentile. See CORNELIUS. At Antioch Jewish believers from the West, who had been driven from Jerusalem by the persecution which had arisen on the death of Stephen, began to preach Jesus to the Greeks also (Acts 11:20, R.V.), and now the followers of Jesus began to be called Christians, no longer being identified with the Jews. The Church was now ready to undertake the evangelization of the Gentiles; the truth of the equality of all believers was known, a man had been raised up to work among the Gentiles, and the first beginnings had been made.

3. The Church among Jews and Gentiles. Paul and Barnabas, called by the Holy Ghost, began the evangelization of Jews and Gentiles in Asia Minor. The question about the obligations of Gentile converts arose. The Council at Jerusalem took a firm stand for Christian liberty, refused to impose circumcision and the observance of the Mosaic Law upon Gentile converts, and only insisted upon certain moral duties and certain matters of expediency which it was necessary to emphasize on account of the state of public opinion. The rights of Gentile Christians were now secure. On a Second Missionary Journey, Paul, under the direction of the Spirit, came to Troas, and was called by a vision to extend his labors to Europe, and the evangelization of Europe from Philippi to Rome ensued. See PAUL, JOHN 7, PETER.

Hittites (hit'tits) [Heb. Hitti, pl., Hittim; also Heb. Heth]. For a number of years Orientalists reckoned with 2 centers of great empires: the valley of the Nile and that of the Tigris-Euphrates. From 1871, when inscriptions were found at Carchemish which represented a new element, the Hittites began to be recognized as the founders of a 3d great Oriental empire, which flourished in Asia Minor between c. 1900 and c. 1200 B.C.

The racial affinities of the Hittites are not clearly understood. One type frequently seen on the monuments of Egypt has the large nose; it seems that the modern Armenians are the lineal descendants of 1 group of this nation. The Hittites were short and stocky and had thick lips. The large nose and re-treating forehead are also represented on the Hittite monuments. The Hittites were not Semites. According to the monuments they wore heavy clothing, coats that reached down to the knees, and high woolen headdress. They wore shoes which were turned up at the toes, which suggests that they came from the snowy mountains. It is inferred from their appearance that they were a people from a cold climate. In fact, the plateau of Anatolia varies from 4,000 to 3,000 feet above sea level.

Historically a sharp distinction must be made between the Hittite Empire and the Hittite states of n. Syria and s.e. Asia Minor. Archaeologically the word Hittite applies to remains of the remarkable and unique culture found in Asia Minor, n. Syria, and n. Mesopotamia. In spite of all the similarity between the Asia Minor Hittite monuments and those from n. Mesopotamia and n. Syria (including the Taurus region), there are some factors that suggest a general separation of the 2 groups. The Anatolian Hittite culture seems to have centered in Cappadocia, the pottery of which shows many affiliations with Troy.

Probably as early as 2500 B.C. the Hittites (Nasians) came into Asia Minor, where they met the Anatolian aborigines, who spoke Hattic, a non-Indo-European tongue. It may be that they were preceded in this invasion by a people (Luwi, Luwians) that spoke Luian or Luish, a language related to Indo-European. The Luwians occupied most of s. Asia Minor, entering not later than the early part of the 3d millennium; in the 18th century B.C. a Luwian dynasty was ruling as far e. as Carchemish. The name Hittite is derived from Hatti (i.e., Anatolia), the capital of which was Hattushash. In the 20th century B.C. colonies were established by an Akkadian dynasty of Ashur (Assur) in Asia Minor, but this influence was rather short-lived. The expansion of the Hittites (Nasians), who had been in Cappadocia before 2000 B.C., may explain this decadence of Assyrian power.

It is now generally agreed that Hittite is somehow related to the Indo-European languages. It seems that Hittite and primitive Indo-European are connected by virtue of a common descent from a parent speech, which may be called Indo-Hittite. This language developed into 2 branches: pre-Hittite, the forerunner of Hittite, and pre-Indo-European, out of which developed Indo-European, which in turn is the parent language of Sanskrit, Iranian, Armenian, Greek, Latin, Celtic, Slavic, and Teutonic.

The real key to the Hittite problem was discovered by Hugo Winckler of Berlin, who in 1906-1907 and 1911-1912 discovered at Boghazköi (the site of ancient Hattushash) about 10,000 clay tablets inscribed in cuneiform characters. Here were represented a number of languages: Sumerian, Akkadian, Hattic, Hittite (Nasi or Nesi), Luian or Luish (the tongue of Arzawa and closely related to Hittite), Palaic, and Hurrian. The inscriptions on the Hittite monuments are written in Hittite hieroglyphs.

The word Hittite (sing. and pl.) occurs 47 times in the O.T., while Heth, which means the same thing, is found 14 times. Probably these words do not always refer to the same group within this extensive confederation of peoples. The Hittites are often mentioned in the list of nations inhabiting Canaan before the Conquest (cf. Gen. 15:20; Ex. 3:8; Deut. 7:1; 20:17; Josh. 3:10; 11:3; 24:11). Abraham purchased the cave of Machpelah from Ephron the Hittite (Gen. 23:10-18). Esau took Hittite wives (Gen. 26:34), and later the Israelites intermarried with the Hittites (Judg. 3:5, 6). When Ezekiel addressed the unfaithful Jerusalem, he said (ch. 16:3): "Thy birth and thy nativity is of the land of the Canaanite; the Amorite was thy father, and thy mother was a Hittite" (cf. ch. 16:45). David had Hittite associates (I Sam. 26:6), and he married Bath-sheba, the wife of Uriah the Hittite (II Sam. 11:2-27). Solomon had Hittite women in his harem (I Kings 11:1). Solomon impressed Hittites, among other peoples of his realm, into his system of forced labor (I Kings 9:20-22; II Chron. 8:7-9).

Apparently the Hebrew did not regard the Hittites as a homeless, nondescript people; they recognized a land of the Hittites (Josh. 1:4). The kings of the Hittites are mentioned in the same sentence with those of Aram (I Kings 10:29; II Chron. 1:17). As a sign of their greatness they are placed in the same category with the Egyptians (II Kings 7:6).

The Hittite kingdom was essentially a feudal aristocracy; the king was crowned by the nobles during the Old Kingdom or First Empire (c. 1900–1650 B.C.). King Pitḫanas ruled (c. 1900 B.C.) in Kushshara or Kussaras (modern Gıaour Kalesi, s.w. of Angora); he captured Nēsas (Nyssa) to the s. of the Halys River. His son Anittas, who succeeded him, waged 2 successful wars against the city of Hattushash. Then Piulisti (Bijustis), king of Hatti, whose capital was at Hattushash, formed a new coalition against Anittas, and all the countries between the Black and Mediterranean Seas joined Hatti. Again Anittas was successful, and he conquered all of Asia Minor. Nēsas was his capital, and Kushshara was a 2d capital merely in name.

Later a great conqueror Labarnash (c. 1680) ruled in Kushshara and undertook expeditions beyond Asia Minor. He was succeeded by Hattushilish I (1650), who in turn was followed by Murshilish I (1620). The latter transferred the capital to Hattushash and conquered Halpa (Aleppo). In a raid he plundered Babylon and put an end to the Amorite dynasty of Hammurabi (c. 1595). But there were also internal disorders and finally, c. 1570, a great king Telepinush tried to reorganize the shattered kingdom. He came to the throne after 3 usurpers and fixed the royal succession on a hereditary basis. Probably Hittite law was codified at this time.

There followed a dark period in Hittite history; in 1482 Thutmose III of Egypt defeated the Hittites at Megiddo, and they had to pay him tribute. He went as far as Aleppo and crossed the Euphrates. The Taurus Mountains were now the s. boundary of the Hittite territory.

The New Kingdom or Second Empire extended from c. 1450 to c. 1200 B.C. The government remained a hereditary monarchy. About 1430 the Hittites again entered international politics. During the reigns of Tudḫaliḫash II, Hattushilish II, and Tudḫaliḫash III, the Mitannians still had the upper hand, but Shuppiluliumash (c. 1395–1355), the son of Tudḫaliḫash III, reconquered Anatolia and made n. Syria between the Euphrates and the Mediterranean to the Lebanons again a part of the empire. Except for a small buffer state e. of the Euphrates, Mitannu became subject to the Hittites, who now were a first-rate military and political power. By 1350 the Hittite empire was the most powerful state in w. Asia. Murshilish II, the son of Shuppiluliumash, was one of the most enterprising and warlike rulers of the ancient East.

During Dyn. XIX the Egyptians under Sethi I again came into clash with the Hittites in Syria. Muwatallish fought the battle of Kadesh with Ramesses II c. 1295, and the Egyptians were forced to evacuate n. Syria. In c. 1279 Hattushilish III (c. 1295–1260) concluded a treaty with Ramesses II on terms of equality. The Hittite king visited Egypt to celebrate the marriage of his eldest daughter to Ramesses II.

Already under Shuppiluliumash there were contacts between the Hittite empire and Aḫḫiḫā (Aḫḫiḫawā), the Achaean empire on the Greek mainland with its capital at Orchomenos. At first the Achaean kings appear as allies or even vassals of the Hittite Great King; in other words they were also rulers of a region in s. Asia Minor. But more and more they seem to have opposed the Hittite rule in that land, until under Tudḫaliḫash IV (1260–1230) and Arnuwandash II (c. 1230–1215), they openly defied Hittite rule. About 1200 B.C. the Hittite empire fell at the hands of an invasion by an Aegean people, probably the Thracians and the Phrygians.

The Hittites not in Asia Minor were now grouped around Carchemish as their capital, where they came into contact with the Assyrians. Tiglath-pileser I fought with them and other peoples of w. Asia. Ashur-nasir-pal (885–860) received tribute from Sangara, king of Carchemish. Finally, 717 B.C., Carchemish fell into the hands of Sargon II. Thus n. Syria and e. Asia Minor were gradually absorbed by Assyria. The Hittites had been the cultural link between the Tigris-Euphrates Valley and Europe.

Hiv'ites (hiv'its) [cf. Heb. ḥavvāh, tent-village; Arab. ḥiwā', collection of tents]. One of the races of Canaan before the conquest of the country by the Hebrews (Gen. 10:17; Ex. 3:17; Josh. 9:1). They scattered into several communities. A body of them dwelt at Shechem in the time of Jacob (Gen. 33:18; 34:2), and their descendants still had influence in the city several generations after the conquest (Judg. 9:28). A body of them also dwelt in Gibeon and its vicinity. They obtained a treaty of peace from Joshua by stratagem, but on their deceit being discovered, they were made hewers of wood and drawers of water (Josh., ch. 9). They had also an extensive settlement, probably their principal one, at the foot of Lebanon, from Mount Hermon to the entering in of Hamath (Josh. 11:3; Judg. 3:3). In these n. mountain regions they had villages of their own as late as the time of David (II Sam. 24:7). Those of Palestine proper were, with the other Canaanites who remained in the land, required to render bond service to Solomon in connection with his extensive building operations (I Kings 9:20–22; II Chron. 8:7, 8).

It may be asked, however, whether the Hivites as a people ever had a real or separate existence. It is an established fact that Horites or Hurrians lived in central Palestine and Syria at an early date. There is a confusion between Hivite and Horite in the Heb. text of Gen., ch. 36; v. 2 makes Zibeon a Hivite, but in vs. 20 and 29 he is a Horite. Gen. 34:2 reads Hivite, for which the LXX has Horite. The same is true in Josh. 9:7 (LXX, v. 13). Except for 1 letter, Heb. ḥiwvī (Hivite) and ḥōrī (Horite) look alike in the unpunctuated text, and it is possible that we have a verbal confusion between resh (ר) and waw [waw] (ו) [w [v]]. If this be the case, Horite is the original name. It is possible, however, that there was a Horite subdivision known as the Hivites, whose name supplanted the general designation on account of a popular etymology which considered the Horites as cave dwellers.

Hiz'ki (hiz'kī), in A.V. Hez'e-ki [my strength, or a contraction of Hezekiah (q.v.)]. A Benjamite, son of Elpaal (I Chron. 8:17).

Hiz-ki'ah (hiz-ki'ā). See HEZEKIAH 2.

Hiz-ki'jah (hiz-ki'já). See HEZEKIAH 4.

Ho'bab (hō'bāb) [beloved]. The father-in-law of Moses, according to the Heb. (Masoretic) text (Judg. 4:11, A.V., J.V.). But the father-in-law of Moses was Reuel, or Jethro (Ex. 3:1; 4:18; 18:1, 2, 5, 6). Hobab is definitely stated to have been the son of Reuel (Num. 10:29; Raguel, A.V.), and if the Masoretic vocalization is ignored, and regard paid to the Heb. consonants only, the Heb. words may equally well be translated 'Hobab the brother-in-law of Moses' (Judg. 1:16; 4:11, R.V.). Moses' father-in-law Reuel, or Jethro, visited Moses in the camp at Rephidim and returned to his own land (Ex. 18:1, 5, 27). A year later, when the Israelites were about to advance from Sinai, Moses urged Hobab, the son of Reuel, to accompany them and aid them with his knowledge of the desert. Hobab finally consented (Num. 10:29; Judg. 1:16;

4:11). It seems, therefore, that Hobab is not the same person as Reuel. After the conquest of Canaan, his family settled in Judah, s. of Arad, and were still there in the time of Saul and David (Judg. 1:16; I Sam. 15:6; 27:10; 30:29). Hobab belonged to the Kenites (Judg. 1:16; 4:11), a family of the Midianites.

Ho'bah (hō'bā). A town to the n. of Damascus. Hobab was the extreme limit to which Abraham pursued the defeated e. kings (Gen. 14:15). Wetzstein mentions a place of this name between Tadmor and Homs, about 50 miles n. of Damascus.

Hod (hōd) [majesty]. An Asherite, son of Zophah (I Chron. 7:37).

Hod'a-vi'ah (hō'dā-vī'ā), in A.V. once Ho-da'lah (hō-dā'yā) (I Chron. 3:24) [praise ye, or thank ye Jehovah]. 1. A son of Elioenai, descended through Shecaniah from David (I Chron. 3:24).

2. One of the heads of the half tribe of Manasseh e. of the Jordan (I Chron. 5:24).

3. A Benjamite (I Chron. 9:7).

4. A Levite, founder of a family, some members of which returned from Babylon (Ezra 2:40). He is called Judah (ch. 3:9), probably from the same root (cf. Gen. 29:35; 49:8); and the kethib of the Heb. text in one place is Hodevah, and the kere Hodeiah (Neh. 7:43 and R.V. marg.).

Ho-de'iah (hō-dē'yā). See HODAVIAH 4.

Ho'desh (hō'dēsh) [new moon]. A wife of Shaharaim (I Chron. 8:9).

Ho-de'vah (hō-dē'vā). See HODAVIAH 4.

Ho-dī'ah (hō-dī'ā), in A.V. of Nehemiah Ho-dī'jah (hō-dī'jā) [Jehovah is majesty, or praise (thou) Jehovah]. 1. A man who was reckoned as belonging to the tribe of Judah, perhaps because of his marriage with the sister of Naham (I Chron. 4:19, R.V.). A.V. does not give a correct rendering of the Heb. text.

2. One of the Levites employed by Ezra to explain the Law to the people (Neh. 8:7), and to assist on the day of penitence and prayer (ch. 9:5). He was probably one of the 2 Levite Hodiahs who sealed the covenant (ch. 10:10 or 13).

Hog'lah (hōg'lā) [cf. Arab. ḥajal, part-ridge]. A daughter of Zelophehad (Num. 26:33).

Ho'ham (hō'hām). A king of Hebron, who entered into a league against Joshua, and was defeated, captured, and executed (Josh. 10:1-27).

Holm Tree. The evergreen oak (Quercus ilex), the rendering of Heb. tirzāh, in the only passage where it occurs (Isa. 44:14; in A.V. cypress); the Vulgate renders it by ilex.

Ho'lon (hō'lōn) [probably sandy]. 1. A town in the hill country of Judah (Josh. 15:51), given, with its suburbs, to the priests (ch. 21:15). Called also Hilen (I Chron. 6:58). Not identified.

2. A Moabite town (Jer. 48:21), perhaps Hiron.

Holy. The ordinary Heb. word for holy is kādōsh, separated, consecrated. It is represented in the N.T. by the Gr. word hagios. It is used for what is set apart from a common to a sacred use, as the utensils and ministers of the sanctuary, and certain days (Ex. 20:8; 30:31; 31:10; Lev. 21:7; Num. 5:17); for what is separated from ceremonial defilement (Ex. 22:31; Lev. 20:26) or immorality (II Cor. 7:1; I Thess. 4:7), including false worship and heathen practices (Lev. 20:6, 7; 21:6). In a larger sense God is holy, for he is separated from all other beings by his infinite perfections, by his being, wisdom, power, holiness, justice, goodness, and truth, the glory of which fills the earth (Isa. 6:3). Even holy angels ascribe holiness to him (Isa. 6:3).

Holy Ghost. See HOLY SPIRIT.

Holy Place. See TABERNACLE, TEMPLE.

Holy Spir'it. The Spirit of God, the third person of the Trinity. The word spirit now more correctly expresses the idea than does the term ghost, which has narrowed its meaning, and commonly denotes a disembodied spirit wandering on earth. The name Holy Spirit is used 3 times only in the O.T. (Ps. 51:11; Isa. 63:10, 11), but there are numerous references to his work. The Spirit of God is the divine principle of activity everywhere at work in the world, executing the will of God. The Spirit is sent forth by God (Ps. 104:30) and given by God (Num. 11:29; Isa. 42:1, 5). The Spirit brooded over chaotic matter in the beginning and is everywhere present (Gen. 1:2; Ps. 139:7), and is thus immanent and the energy in cosmic processes; is the source of physical, intellectual, and moral life (Gen. 6:3; Job 32:8; 33:4; 34:14; Ps. 104:30; cf. Isa. 42:5); is able to produce supernatural effects (I Kings 18:12; II Kings 2:16). He abides with the people of God (Isa. 63:11; Hag. 2:5), and bestows varied powers for the work of the Kingdom: strength (Judg. 3:10; 14:6, 19; 15:14; I Sam. 11:6; 16:13; I Chron. 12:18), skill (Ex. 31:3), wisdom (Num. 27:18), in short, everything needful for the work of the kingdom (Isa. 11:2; Zech. 4:6). He instructed the people of God (Neh. 9:20) by inspiring the prophets (Num. 24:2; I Sam. 10:6; Micah 3:8; Zech. 7:12). He works upon the heart of the individual child of God. It was foretold that this work would be especially powerful and widespread in the Messianic period, when the Spirit shall be poured out on the people of God (Isa. 44:3), will give to them a new heart and a new spirit (Ezek. 36:26), produce sorrow for sin (Zech. 12:10), and even be poured out on all flesh (Joel 2:28). The Spirit is grieved when men resist his holy work (Isa. 63:10; cf. Ps. 106:33). Jesus promised that on his departure the Spirit should come and dwell with every believer, clothe with power, guide and teach the Church, bear witness of Christ and glorify him, convict the world of sin, righteousness, and judgment (Luke 24:49; John 7:37-39; 14:25, 26; 15:26; 16:7-14; Acts 1:8). The Holy Spirit is known as the Comforter in John 14:16, 26; 15:26; 16:7 (cf. R.V. marg., Advocate, Helper, Paraclete).

The N.T. treats of Messianic times and the dispensation of the Spirit, and consequently the Spirit is mentioned much oftener in the N.T. than in the O.T. All the attributes of the Spirit revealed in the O.T. are more fully disclosed in the N.T. in operation. The doctrine of the Spirit advances beyond the teaching of the O.T. chiefly in becoming more definite in respect to his personality. Though the word spirit is neuter in Gr. and fem. in Heb., yet the Spirit is sometimes called who, not which, the masc. form of the pronoun being used (Eph. 1:13, 14; cf. John 16:13). The Spirit further speaks in the 1st person, using the pronouns I and me (Acts 10:19, 20; 13:2); is associated with the Father and the Son in the baptismal formula and the apostolic benediction (Matt. 28:19; II Cor. 13:14); can be grieved (Eph. 4:30).

Memorable acts of the Spirit at the beginning of the Christian dispensation are the miraculous conception of Jesus by the Holy Spirit (Matt. 1:18-20); the descent of the Spirit upon Jesus at his baptism, in the form of a dove visible to him and to John the Baptist (Matt. 3:16; Mark 1:10; John 1:32), and the effusion of the Holy Spirit in the likeness of tongues of fire on the Day of Pentecost, and the accompanying gift of languages (Acts

2:2-4). See GOD, INSPIRATION, WEEKS, FEAST OF.

Ho'mam (hō'mām) [cf. Heb. hāmam, make a noise, confuse, discomfit]. Son of Lotan, and grandson of Seir (I Chron. 1:39). The name appears in Gen. 36:22 as Hemam. The difference in the Heb. is slight, and is doubtless due to a misreading. The latter name has yodh where the former has waw (vau, vav). The LXX has Haiman in both places, thus favoring yodh.

Ho'mer [a heap]. A measure for dry substances and liquids. It contained 10 baths or ephahs (Ezek. 45:11, 14) and 100 omers (Ex. 16:36). It held 10.48 bushels in early times, but later 11.49 bushels, U.S. measure. See EPHAH, I, MEASURE, III.

Hon'ey. A sweet, thick fluid collected by bees from flowers and fruit and deposited in the cells of a comb (Judg. 14:8; Ps. 19:10); much esteemed as an article of food (Gen. 43:11; II Sam. 17:29), and eaten as found in the comb or as prepared in various ways (Ex. 16:31; I Sam. 14:26). Wild honey was deposited by bees in rocks, trees, and other places (Deut. 32:13; Judg. 14:8; I Sam. 14:25; Matt. 3:4). Because it acts like a leaven, producing fermentation, honey might not be used in offerings made by fire unto the Lord (Lev. 2:11). An artificial honey or syrup was prepared from dates (Jos. War iv. 8, 3).

Canaan was described as flowing with milk and honey (Ex. 3:8, 17).

Hook. The Hebrews and contemporary peoples used hooks of various kinds: 1. Curtains were hung by means of hooks, those employed about the tabernacle being made of gold and silver (Ex. 26:32, 37; 27:10).

2. By means of fleshhooks meat was lifted from the pot (Ex. 27:3; I Sam. 2:13, 14), and on firmly fixed hooks slain animals were hung up (Ezek. 40:43, but the word rendered hook in this passage may rather mean ledge or slab (cf. R.V. marg. and J.V.)).

3. Hooks resembling thorns, and sometimes called so in Hebrew (Amos 4:2), were used in fishing (Job 41:1; Hab. 1:15). See FISHING.

4. A large hook was thrust through the mouth of a fish or other aquatic animal, and attached by a cord to a stake, when it was desired to keep it alive (Job 41:2; Ezek. 29:4). A similar hook was used for leading about lions and other beasts (II Kings 19:28; Ezek. 19:4, in A.V. chains; cf. ch. 38:4), and for a like purpose were inserted in the lips of captives (II Chron. 33:11, R.V. marg.). See illustration under BLINDNESS.

5. Pruning hooks were used by vinedressers (Isa. 2:4; 18:5).

Hoo'poe. See LAPWING.

Hoph'ni (hōf'ni) [cf. Heb. hōphen, hollow of hand, and Arab. hafnah, handful]. A son of Eli. He and his brother Phinehas discharged the priest's office in the old age of Eli, but showed themselves unworthy of the sacred office by scandalous behavior. Eli mildly remonstrated when summary proceedings were required; and, in consequence, the divine judgment was pronounced against him and his house. When it was resolved that the Ark of God should be taken to the battlefield, Hophni and Phinehas, who as officiating priests were its custodians, accompanied it, and were both slain in the disastrous battle which followed (I Sam. 2:22 to 4:22).

Hor (hōr) [mountain]. 1. A mountain on the border of the Edomite country, where Aaron died and was buried (Num. 20:22-29; 33:37-39; Deut. 32:50). Josephus says that it was one of the mountains surrounding Petra (Jos. Antiq. iv. 4, 7). Tradition has settled on Jebel Hārūn, meaning Aaron's Mountain, a great two-topped eminence of sandstone, about 4,800 feet high, on the e. side of the Arabah, nearly midway between the s. extremity of the Dead Sea and the n. end of the Gulf of 'Akabah. It is the highest and wildest of the whole Edomite range. Petra is close by, to the w.; but the ruined city is not visible from the summit. On its summit stands a tomb, nominally that of Aaron; but the upper part of it, at least, is only a modern Mohammedan mosque. The tradition, however, is open to serious question. Jebel Hārūn is in the midst of Edom and not on its border, as was Hor. If Edom extended to the Gulf of 'Akabah, the Israelites could not reach the traditional mountain without crossing Edom, which they were forbidden to do (Deut. 2:8). Jebel Maderah, about 15 miles n.e. of Kadesh, is a more likely site, being on the direct route from Kadesh across Edom to Moab. The solemn transaction (Num. 20:22-29) carried out "in the sight of all the congregation" could have been done on Jebel Maderah, while Jebel Hārūn is too high for the people to see what took place.

2. A mountain on the n. boundary of Palestine, between the Mediterranean Sea and the entering in of Hamath (Num. 34:7, 8). It was probably a prominent peak of Lebanon.

Ho'ram (hō'rām). A king of Gezer, defeated and slain by Joshua (Josh. 10:33).

Ho'reb (hō'rēb) [drought, desert]. The mount of God in the peninsula of Sinai (Ex. 3:1; 18:5), where the Law was given to Israel. The names Horeb and Sinai refer to the same mountain (for example, Horeb in Ex. 17:6; 33:6; Deut. 1:2, 6, 19; 4:10, 15; 5:2; 9:8; 18:16; 29:1; I Kings 8:9; 19:8; II Chron. 5:10; Ps. 106:19; Mal. 4:4; but Sinai in Ex. 19:11, 18, 20, 23; 24:16; 31:18; 34:2, 4, 29, 32; Lev. 7:38; 25:1; 26:46; 27:34; Deut. 33:2; Judg. 5:5; Neh. 9:13). In Eccles. 48:7 the 2 are equated in Hebrew parallelism. According to critical scholars the use of the 2 names in the Pentateuch goes back to variations in the documentary sources (Horeb in E and D; Sinai in J and P).

Ho'rem (hō'rēm) [enclosed, sacred]. A fenced city of Naphtali (Josh. 19:38); probably a ruin like Khirbet Katamūn near Jebel Haramūn, s. of Yārūn in Upper Galilee.

Ho'resh (hō'rēsh) [forest]. A locality, probably at the time overgrown with bush, where David lurked (I Sam. 23:16, R.V. marg.). It may be identified with Khirbet Khoreisa, about 2 miles s. of Tell Zif.

Hor'hag-gid'gad (hōr'hā-gid'gād), in A.V. Hor'ha-gid'gad (hōr'hā-gid'gād) [hollow or cavern of Gidgad]. An encampment of the Israelites in the wilderness (Num. 33:32). The same as Gudgodah (Deut. 10:6, 7; cf. Num. 33:31-33). It may be located on Wadi Ghadghad, a tributary of Wadi Jerāfi, n. of Kuntilet el-Jerāfi, n.n.w. of the Gulf of 'Akabah.

Ho'ri (hō'rī) (see HORITE). 1. A Horite tribe descended from Lotan, and called by the general name of the stock to which it belonged (Gen. 36:22).

2. Father of Shaphat the spy (Num. 13:5).

Ho'rite (hō'rīt), in A.V. of Deut. Ho'rims (hō'rīmz). The inhabitants of Mount Seir, and hence called the children of Seir (Gen. 36:20). They were defeated by Chedorlaomer and his allies (Gen. 14:6). They were governed by chieftains (ch. 36:29, 30). They were subsequently destroyed by the posterity of Esau (Deut. 2:12, 22).

Formerly the word was derived from Heb. hōr (hole, cave), and the name was explained as meaning troglodytes or cave dwellers. This popular ety. no longer meets with general acceptance since the discovery of the Hurrians (Khurrians) as an ethnic element in the Near East. The Hurrians were a non-Semitic people from the mountains, who probably about the beginning of the 2d millennium migrated into n. and n.e. Mesopotamia. Later they spread into the fertile lowlands of Mesopotamia and Syria, eventually reaching Palestine and the borders of Egypt. They preceded the Israelites in Palestine, and the middle Euphrates was one of the centers of their culture. The kingdom of Mitannu or Hanigalbat on the upper Euphrates was really Hurrian, although the rulers were at first Indo-European and later Hittites. The Assyrian culture of the early 1st millennium is the heir of that of the Hurrians of the 2d. Hurrian Nuzu was destroyed by the Assyrians between 1425 and 1375 B.C., probably c. 1400.

Hor'mah (hōr'má) [a devoted place, destruction]. The town Zephath, called Hormah after its destruction. It was situated in the s. country, toward the border of Edom, near Ziklag. When the Israelites after their loss of faith presumed to advance from Kadesh toward Canaan, the Amalekites and Canaanites came down, smote them, and drove them as far as Hormah, as the district was called from its devastation some 38 years later (Num. 14:45; Deut. 1:44). On the 2d departure of the Israelites from Kadesh, after the lapse of these 38 years, while they were encamped at Mount Hor, the Canaanites under the king of Arad again attacked them and made some captives. Israel vowed their destruction if Jehovah would aid, devastated their cities, and called the wasted region Hormah, desolation (Num. 21:1-3).

It was allotted to Judah, but was afterward transferred to Simeon (Josh. 15:30; 19:4). After the death of Joshua, Judah assisted Simeon to take the town. It was inhabited by Canaanites; and had either escaped destruction when the region was first devastated in fulfillment of the vow (Num. 21:2), or it had been rebuilt by fugitives who returned. At any rate, it was still included in the old vow; and it was now devoted to destruction, man and beast were slain, and the town was henceforth called Hormah (Judg. 1:17). Joshua had already defeated its king, who probably was absent from his city, assisting men of his own race at Hebron at the time of his defeat. Joshua had similarly defeated the king of Jerusalem and the king of Gezer when they were away from their cities (Josh. 12:14; cf. ch. 10:10, 33). After the town had been destroyed, it was inhabited by Simeonites (I Chron. 4:30). It was hospitable to David when he lived as an outcast, and to his friends there David sent of the spoils of Ziklag (I Sam. 30:30). It is probably to be located at Tell es-Seba' (also called Tell el-Mshash'), about 3 miles e. of Beer-sheba.

Horn. Since Palestine, especially its s. portion, was a pastoral country, the Israelites were very familiar with the horns of animals. In early times they converted them into trumpets (Josh. 6:13), or into flasks for such substances as oil (I Sam. 16:1, 13; I Kings 1:39). When God exalts the horn of an individual, the meaning is that he confers great power and prosperity (I Sam. 2:10; Ps. 89:24); but when one exalts or lifts up the horn, it means that he indulges in arrogance and insolence (Ps. 75:4, 5). The horn is the emblem of strength and denotes political power, the image being drawn from bulls which push with their horns (Ps. 132:17; Jer. 48:25), and in prophetic language signifies a kingdom or kings (Dan. 7:8, 11, 21; Zech. 1:18, 19; Rev. 17:12, 16).

Horns of the altar were projections resembling horns placed at the corners of the altar of burnt offering (Jos. War v. 5, 6). They were smeared with the blood of the sacrifice (Ex. 29:12; Lev. 4:7), and the bodies of the victims offered in sacrifice appear to have been bound to them (Ps. 118:27), and offenders clung to them for safety from punishment (I Kings 2:28).

Horn was also used to denote a peak (Isa. 5:1 marg.). The Horns of Hattin are the traditional Mount of Beatitudes. See HATTIN, HORNS OF.

Hor'net. The rendering of Heb. šir'āh, according to the ancient versions. The hornet (Vespa crabro) is of the same genus as the wasp, but larger and more formidable. Either the common hornet or a closely allied species is common in Palestine. Hornets were to be sent to drive out the Canaanite nations before the Israelites (Ex. 23:28; Deut. 7:20; Josh. 24:12; Wisd. of Sol. 12:8). It is doubtful whether hornet is here used in a literal or a figurative sense. Probably the solution to the difficulty is to be found in the Egyptian hieroglyphs. The sovereignty of the Pharaoh over united Egypt was expressed by a hieroglyphic combination n-sw-byt (king of Upper and Lower Egypt), which means literally "he who belongs to the sedge of Upper Egypt and the bee of Lower Egypt." The sign for byt is a bee, which, however, resembles a hornet and is thus interpreted by some scholars. At any rate, the hornet may with good reason refer to Egypt, which had penetrated Palestine at an early time, under Thutmose III had conquered the land, but had temporarily lost it through the invasion of the Habiru and the Hittites. During the period of the Judges it seems that the Israelites were oppressed by their foes when Egypt was weak, but that the land had rest when Egyptian power was strong. By this interpretation the Egyptian conquest and spoilage of Palestine with the subsequent breakdown of authority facilitated the conquest by the Israelites under Joshua.

Hor'ona'im (hōr'ō-nā'im) [2 caverns or ravines]. A Moabite city at the foot of a declivity, and apparently not far from Zoar (Isa. 15:5; Jer. 48:3, 5, 34; Moabite Stone, 31, see MOABITE STONE). Doubtless the town Ornae, which Alexander Jannaeus took from the Arabians, and his son Hyrcanus restored to Aretas (Jos. Antiq. xiii. 15, 4; xiv. 1, 4). It may be el-'Arāk, which is about 1,640 feet below the level of the plateau and provided with springs, gardens, and numerous grottos.

Hor'o'nite (hōr'ō-nit). A native or inhabitant of Horonaim or, more probably, of Beth-horon (Neh. 2:10, 19).

Horse. The horse was domesticated in early antiquity somewhere e. of the Caspian Sea by Indo-European nomads. Later the Kassites and the Hittites imported it on a large scale and introduced it into w. Asia. Horses were used for military purposes c. 1900 B.C., and horse-drawn chariots were known c. 1800 in Asia Minor and Syria. Mention is made of its rider in the time of Jacob (Gen. 49:17). Mountainous Palestine was not well adapted for its use, and in early times it was principally employed in the maritime plain and in the valley of Jezreel. The horse was found in Egypt (Gen. 47:17; Ex. 9:3), whither it was introduced by the Hyksos. When the Exodus took place, Pharaoh's pursuing army was equipped with chariots and horses (Ex. 14:9; 15:19). They existed also in the force of the n. Canaanites led by Sisera, Jabin's commander-in-chief (Judg. 4:15; 5:22). In Deut. 17:16, the king who was to be elected when monarchy was established among the Israelites was forbidden to multiply horses; however Solomon imported them in great numbers from Egypt, paying for each animal 150 shekels of silver. He afterward exported them to the kings of the Hittites and those of the Syrians (I Kings 10:28, 29; II Chron. 1:16, 17; 9:28). Horses later became common in Israel and Judah (II Kings 9:18; Isa. 2:7), and were used in battle (I Kings 22:4; II Kings 3:7; 9:33). Foreign kings rode on horseback (Esth. 6:8), while it was considered lowly in a sovereign to sit upon an ass (Zech. 9:9), and accorded with the simple manners of the early Hebrew patriarchs, judges, and kings (Gen. 22:3; Judg. 10:4; 12:14; I Kings 1:33). Horses were sometimes dedicated to the sun for the purpose of drawing the chariots of the sun-god (II Kings 23:11). They are frequently mentioned in the prophecies of Zechariah (Zech. 1:8; 6:2, 3; 10:5; 14:20), and in the book of Revelation (Rev. 6:2, 4, 5, 8; 19:11, etc.). See LINEN 6.

Horse'leech'. A large leech (Haemopsis sanguisuga), common in Palestine. The leech was known to the Hebrews by the name 'alākāh (Prov. 30:15); in Arab. it is called 'alākāh, because it clings to the flesh. It is noted for its insatiable appetite for blood. In the proverb it is used figuratively. Its 2 insatiable daughters are perhaps named in the 1st line of v. 16. The marg. of the R.V. substitutes vampire, which refers to certain female specters that are superstitiously believed to haunt graves and suck human blood. The ground for this interpretation is that in Arab. 'aulāk is the name of a demon or goblin, and 'alūk is equivalent to ghoul.

Hō'sah (hō'sā) [refuge, seeking refuge]. 1. A porter in the time of David (I Chron. 16:38; 26:10).

2. A village on the frontier of Asher, and apparently s. of Tyre (Josh. 19:29). Probably to be identified with Palaetyros, or Tyre on the mainland.

Ho-san'na [Gr. hōsanna, from Heb. hōshī'āh nnā' (Ps. 118:25, hiph'il imperative), save, now; or save, pray. The imperative form hōsha' (Ps. 86:2; Jer. 31:7), however, seems to be the basis of Gr. hōsanna]. An acclamation of the multitude on the occasion of Jesus' triumphal entry into Jerusalem. It occurs 6 times in the Gospels: twice absolutely (Mark 11:9; John 12:13); twice followed by the native "to the son of David" (Matt. 21:9, 15); and twice by the phrase "in the highest" (Matt. 21:9; Mark 11:10). The derivation of the word from the imperative plus nnā' is favored by the fact that the 3 Gospels in this connection quote Ps. 118:26. Verse 25 of this psalm is said to have been repeated once on each of the 1st 6 days of the feast of tabernacles, during the solemn procession around the altar of burnt sacrifice, and 7 times on the 7th day. The word originally had a supplicatory sense, but, as the context in the Gospels shows, it had become an ejaculation of joy or a shout of welcome. Augustine accordingly regards it as an interjection of admiring joy, and the Anglo-Saxon versions render it "Hail." A Scottish note defines it: "Alss mekill as to say, Gyff health, prosper, gud lucke."

Ho-se'a (hō-zē'd), in A.V. of N.T. O'see (ō'zē), like the Gr. form; the same word as Oshea or Hoshea (Num. 13:8, 16, A.V. and R.V.), the 1st name of Joshua, and as Hoshea, king of Israel (II Kings 15:30) [save, salvation; or a short form of Hoshaiāh]. A prophet, son of Beeri, whose predictions were uttered in the reigns of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah, and Jeroboam II, king of Israel (Hos. 1:1). The dating by Jeroboam (Hos. 1:1) is supported by internal evidence (ch. 1:4), which clearly states that the house of Jehu (to which Jeroboam belonged) is still on the throne. References to the disorders and assassinations in the Northern Kingdom which followed the death of Jeroboam may be detected in chs. 7:3, 16; 8:4, and the conditions depicted in chs. 5:8 to 6:6 may reflect the Syro-Ephraimitic War (734-733 B.C.; cf. II Kings 15:29 to 16:9; I Chron. 5:26; II Chron. ch. 28; Isa. 7:1-9). It has been assumed by some critics that the chronology of the kings of Judah (Hos. 1:1) has been added to represent Hosea as a contemporary of Isaiah (Isa. 1:1), and that the work of Hosea was closed c. 734-733. Yet the dates (Hos. 1:1) are reasonable and within the limits of possibility. Assuming that Hosea prophesied during as many as 12 or 13 years of Jeroboam's reign, and that he lived to see the overthrow of Samaria in 722 B.C., his ministry extended over a period of 40 years. Hosea was doubtless a citizen of the Northern Kingdom, for he speaks of "our king" and "the land," meaning Northern Israel, without feeling the need of a restrictive adjective (chs. 1:2; 7:5); and he prophesied to the people of that kingdom. He was a contemporary of Isaiah, who labored in Judah (cf. Hos. 1:1 with Isa. 1:1); he began his prophetic activity in the reign of Jeroboam II, when Jeroboam and Uzziah were contemporaries, that is, before 746 B.C., or c. 750. Hosea was also a contemporary of Amos in the Northern Kingdom and of Micah who prophesied in Judah.

The Book of Hosea is the 1st of the Minor Prophets in the order of their arrangement. It consists of 2 portions, chs. 1 to 3 and 4 to 14. The 1st part belongs to the earlier period of the prophet's ministry; for ch. 1 at least dates from the reign of Jeroboam II, or within 6 months after its close, before the destruction of the house of Jehu (ch. 1:2-4). These first 3 chs. furnish the key to the whole book, in which the unfaithfulness of Israel to Jehovah during the entire national history is pressed home on the conscience (chs. 4:1 to 5:7; 6:4 to 7:16; 8 to 11), the necessity of chastisement is shown, and the unquenchable love of Jehovah for his erring people is earnestly taught (chs. 6:1-3; 12 to 14). In chs. 1 to 3 the unfaithfulness of Israel and the Lord's patience and forbearance are set forth under the analogy of an adulterous wife. The logical order of thought of chs. 1 to 3 is: chs. 1:1-9; 3:1-5; 2:2-23; 1:10 to 2:1.

Regarding the account of the prophet's marriage interpreters have been divided in opinion from ancient times.

I. Some say that it was all a vision, a transaction in a trance or a dream but never carried out in real life.

II. Closely allied to the preceding, and like it based on an objection to a literal interpretation, is the view which makes it a parable, or an allegory, or a figurative mode of speech. It has been argued that we are dealing with an allegorical and not a real incident, for the following reasons: 1. It is impossible that God would have commanded a prophet to enter into such a revolting alliance, and one that was apt to lessen his influence with the better part of the people as a marriage with a harlot would do. 2. The Law of Moses (Lev. 21:7) forbade a priest to marry an unchaste woman, and although the prophets were not priests, it has been assumed that God would hardly direct a prophet to marry an unclean woman. 3. The action of the first chapter, if real, would require years for its performance, involving not only the prophet's marriage but also the birth of several children, and the symbolic lesson would be lost. This 3d objection, however, cannot be taken too seriously. A prophet's call may be progressive; years of experience would fortify him in certain convictions; or his sorrow, which extended over a number of years, would give him more time to make a comparison between the unfaithfulness of Gomer to himself and that of Israel to God.

Now against the preceding views (I and II) we may present the following reasons: 1. What is morally and religiously objectionable in actual practice becomes no more defensible by being presented as a vision or a parable. 2. If this had not been a real incident in Hosea's life, his parable would have put a blot upon the life of his children, defamed the character of Gomer, who was innocent of adultery, and have brought ridicule upon the prophet and misunderstanding at home. 3. Hosea gives no indication that he is giving us an allegory or a parable. 4. The name Gomer bath-Diblain gives no symbolical meaning. 5. No symbolism can be attached to the fact that the 2d child is a girl and not a boy. 6. Realism was used by the earlier prophets (cf. Ahijah, I Kings, ch. 11, and Zedekiah, ch. 22:11). 7. Prophets were accustomed to give symbolical names to real children (cf. the names of Isaiah's children, Isa. 7:3; 8:3). 8. Hosea 1:2-4, 6 refers to Hosea in the 3d person, while in ch. 3:1-3 the prophet speaks in the 1st person; the narrative of an actual happening could reasonably be presented in this form, but it is difficult to see why an allegory or a parable should be thus divided. 9. An experience such as that of Hosea furnishes the best explanation of his message: it was the outcome of the sufferings of his own heart.

III. Another view is that an actual marriage took place, but within this theory there are many divergent views. How shall we justify the 1st word of God to Hosea, "Go, take unto thee a wife of whoredom and children of whoredom"? The older supporters of the literal theory maintained that such a thing may be justified by the express command of God, or that it was well worth the end, viz., the salvation of a lost soul. But it would be a rather horrible thing to have God command Hosea against his own desire to marry an impure woman for whom the prophet has no love. We can in this case, however, reconcile the idea of God's plan with that of the freedom of choice. At the time of his marriage Hosea had not known the impure tendencies of Gomer. Later, when he discovered her real nature, it seemed to him as if he had married her in obedience to a call from God. In other words, he understands his impulse for her as a command from God, of which, however, at the time he was not conscious. According to this view, he would have to understand the command (Hos. 1:2) in a prophetic sense. Although he exercised his freedom of choice when he fell in love with Gomer and married her, in the end he realized that this bitter experience was all a part of God's plan. Education and piety do not always govern a man in the right choice of a wife. Hosea may have erred to his later regret, but subsequently he saw in what was his own choice the plan of God through which he became a messenger unto Israel.

Although there are various views within the theory of a real marriage, it seems most reasonable to assume that the disposition toward adultery in Gomer did not manifest itself until after her marriage. This explanation has a number of advantages: 1. It accepts the narrative as being the simple recital of biographical facts, while at the same time it does away with all the moral difficulties involved in views which regard Gomer as an acknowledged harlot or a devotee of Baal worship previous to her marriage. 2. It furnishes a reasonable basis for Hosea's love for Gomer. 3. It most easily explains the processes through which Hosea came to a realization of the mutual relationship of Jehovah and Israel. 4. It is supported by ch. 3, where Hosea takes back his wife who had been guilty of adultery; if the prophet had married her with full knowledge of an immoral life on her part, he would not have been justified in holding her conduct against her.

The question may be raised as to when Hosea found out about his wife's infidelity: before the birth of Jezreel or after the event. Probably before, for he foretells doom for Israel on the basis of the 1st child's name. The 1st child belonged to Hosea (ch. 1:3), but we have no positive evidence to determine the paternity of the other 2. Even though ch. 1 contains a he-account and ch. 3 has an I-account of the prophet's domestic life, there is no doubt that in both cases the woman is Gomer. The I-account goes back to the prophet himself, while the he-account may have been composed by one of his disciples on the basis of documents or of knowledge of the circumstances.

The names of the children are significant. Jezreel means "El (God) soweth," and has in this connection (ch. 1:4, 5) an ominous import of sowing destruction based on a historical background. In this plain Sissera was defeated (Judg. 4:13 seq.); in the same region Gideon fought the Midianites and the Amalekites (Judg. 6:33 seq.; 7:1 seq.). Here also conflicts took place between the Philistines and the Israelites (I Sam. 29:1 seq.). Most ominous of all was the fact that it was the scene of the massacre of the house of Ahab by Jehu; here also Ahaziah, king of Judah, was mortally wounded by Jehu's men (II Kings, chs. 9; 10). Now it will be the scene of vengeance upon the house of Jehu (Hos. 1:4, 5). Lo-ruhamah (v. 6) means literally, "She will not be shown compassion." Lo-ammi (v. 9) signifies, "Not my people." Just as Gomer had been unfaithful to Hosea, so Israel had been unfaithful to the covenant that God had made with it, and figuratively speaking was guilty of adultery. The love of Hosea for Gomer is a symbol of the abiding love of God for his people. Just as Gomer was disciplined when Hosea took her back, so faithless Israel had to undergo discipline (ch. 3:3-5). The period of punishment, however, is a means of reformation (ch. 2:14-23), and Israel will again know God and return to him. The name Jezreel, although still to be understood literally, now refers in a good sense to sowing the people anew in the land (ch. 2:23). In the other 2 names the negative prefix is dropped (ch. 2:1, 23), and now they signify: "She has been shown compassion" and "My people." Harmony then exists between God and Israel, and this is extended even to the realm of nature (ch. 2:21-23).

The 2d part of The Book of Hosea, consisting of chs. 4 to 14, is not a series of discourses, nor even one continuous sermon, but is a summary of his prophetic teaching, prepared by him toward the close of his ministry or by one of his disciples after his death. The prophecy thus contains the gist of his public addresses. The prophecies of chs. 4 to 14 were for the most part uttered originally when Assyria was filling Israel with great dread. There are occasional indications of date; ch. 10:14 may refer to Shalmaneser V, king of Assyria (728-722 B.C.). The frequent references of the prophet to the dallying of the government, now with Assyria and now with Egypt, may be interpreted as representing Israel's politics at the time of Pekah and Hoshea (chs. 5:13; 7:11; 8:9; 14:3; cf. Hos. 12:1 with II Kings 17:3, 4); accordingly it may be that the rebuke of Israel for its foreign policy was uttered during the reigns of its last 2 kings. At any rate, the superscription (Hos. 1:1) should not be rejected.

The paragraphs into which chs. 4 to 14 are divided in the R.V. form units of thought complete in themselves, as follows:

1. Chs. 4:1 to 6:3. The thought that binds the various utterances together is sin and the need of repentance. The people are arraigned for gross iniquity (ch. 4), and the princes and priests as being the leaders in sin (ch. 5). The arraignment is followed by a beautiful exhortation to repentance and the promise of God's return in favor (ch. 6:1-3).

2. Chs. 6:4 to 10:15. The unifying thought is the grievous punishment that must come for heinous sin. Halfhearted repentance does not satisfy God (ch. 6:4-11). The immoral life and shameless excess of the mighty is manifest to God (ch. 7:1-7). Israel's stupidity and folly in seeking aid from the powers of the world; for its foolishness it shall be chastised (vs. 8-16). The invader is near because of Israel's idolatry and schism (ch. 8:1-7). Israel has drawn judgment upon itself by dallying with Assyria, by religious abuses, and by trusting in human means (vs. 8-14). Israel's infidelity (ch. 9:1-9), and consequent punishment (vs. 10-17). Israel, flourishing like a vigorous vine, only increases its idolatry; but judgment shall spring up as abundant and as destructive as the noxious weed (ch. 10:1-8). Israel's sin compared to that of Gibeah (vs. 9-11). Whatsoever one sows, that shall one also reap (vs. 12-15).

3. Chs. 11 to 13. A passage characterized by yearning and expostulation. Jehovah's love for Israel is the unquenchable love of a father for his child, even for a wayward child (ch. 11:1-11). Jacob relied upon his own strength and shrewdness at first, but finally importuned God and prevailed; therefore turn from earthly alliances to thy God (ch. 11:12 to 12:6). Ephraim is a dishonest tradesman, and, having become rich, excuses himself of sin; but Jehovah will cast him out of his home, he who saved Israel from Egypt will now punish (ch. 12:7-14). Ephraim's idolatry condemned (ch. 13:1-8), and its consequence declared (vs. 9-16).

4. Ch. 14. Exhortation to repentance, confession, and humble supplication, and the promise of Jehovah's gracious acceptance of the penitent and bestowal of richest blessings.

It may be observed that chs. 4:1 to 9:9, which inveigh against the heathenish cult and the political conditions of the time, are brought together without a definite principle of order. But the rest of the book (chs. 9:10 to 14:9), in historical retrospect derives the sinfulness of Israel out of the past. The prophet recognizes the fact that the religion of Israel is a historical religion and that it has its roots in the past. This section may be summarized as follows: ch. 9:10-14 recalls Israel's defection to Baal of Peor (Num., ch. 25); ch. 9:15-17 traces the evil conditions of the time to Gilgal, where was inaugurated the kingdom under Saul (I Sam. 11:14, 15; 13:7-15; 15:10-35); ch. 10:1-8 is directed against the cultic and political errors which began with Israel's prosperity and found expression in the worship of the calves and in the Northern Kingdom; ch. 10:9-15 inveighs against the Kingdom of Israel, which began at Saul's residence in Gibeah (I Sam. 11:4) and the threat of the dire results of war; ch. 11:1-11 goes back to the Exodus, accuses Israel of ingratitude, but closes with divine mercy; chs. 11:12 to 12:14, in assailing Israel, draws illustrations from the life of Jacob, beginning with his prenatal state, and shows how the sins of the time were typified in the patriarch (reference is made again to the Exodus and the simplicity of ancient life); ch. 13:1-11, Ephraim has fallen through the worship of Baal and of images, but the God of the time of the Exodus is unchanging; ch. 13:12-16, the iniquity of Israel and the threat of terrible punishment; ch. 14:1-8, an appeal to repentance and the promise of divine grace; ch. 14:9, a final exhortation to take to heart the words of the book. Although the order of events from antiquity is not chronological, the appeal to history by the prophet plays an important part in his teaching.

In chs. 4 to 14 the text in many places is corrupt, which produces difficulties in interpretation. Some critics have denied to Hosea the genuineness of the references to Judah, to the restoration of Israel to God's favor and its return to its native land (e.g., chs. 1:10 to 2:1), and to the sole legitimacy of the Davidic monarchy (chs. 1:4; 3:5; 8:4). Concerning the 3 classes of passages to which exception has been taken: 1. The references to Judah. An occasional side glance at Judah, a people so intimately connected with his own, must not be denied to the prophet; especially since he saw the moral conditions in Judah becoming similar to those of Ephraim. For example, the elimination of Judah from chs. 5:8 to 6:6 would completely destroy the sense of the passage. 2. The references to a restoration of Israel to God's favor and the return of the people to their own country. (a) A reference to restoration to God's favor is demanded by the symmetry, since each section of chs. 1 to 3, and greater sections of the book as a whole, end with promises (chs. 1:10 to 2:1; 2:14-23; 3:5). (b) It is the custom of prophecy not to close with the threatening of doom and leave the people to despair, but to let the light of hope break through the dark clouds and irradiate the great future. (c) Continuing the picture of the destruction of Israel in battle for its sins, the verses of hope (chs. 1:10 to 2:1) represent the victory of united Israel and Judah over their foes. (d) Thought was turned to the possibility of a return both by the prospect of imminent exile for the nation, and also presently by the knowledge that many Israelitish captives were in Assyria (II Kings 15:29; I Chron. 5:26; Isa. 9:1). 3. The references to the legitimacy of the Davidic monarchy and the illegitimacy of northern Israel's kings. (a) To question these it is necessary to reject the genuineness not only of these prophecies in Hosea, but also of the prediction of the universal dominion of the Davidic king which was uttered in northern Israel by a contemporary prophet of Judean birth (Amos 9:11). (b) To the believer in the moral government of the universe the failure and fall of one dynasty after another in then, during the preceding 2 centuries, was conclusive evidence of their rejection by God; and the continuance of the Davidic monarchy confirmed the prophetic words, spoken in the Southern Kingdom concerning that line, and was itself independent proof that God had chosen the house of David.

Hosea strikes a modern note when he deplores the ignorance of the people: "My people are destroyed for lack of knowledge: because thou hast rejected knowledge, I will also reject thee" (ch. 4:6; cf. chs. 4:1; 5:4; 6:3, 6; 11:3). If we remember that Hosea means by the knowledge of God an impression of facts implying a change of both temper and conduct, it is very easy to pass to his doctrine of repentance. According to Hosea, repentance is a turning around and going back to God; it is the effect of a knowledge of God—a knowledge not of new facts, but of facts which have been present for a long time and which ought to have been appreciated before. Because Hosea's doctrine of God's love is so rich, so fair, and so tender, his doctrine of repentance is so full and gracious. His appreciation of God's love is presented in such a way that sin appears the more heinous since it really implies sinning against God's love.

Amos is the prophet of justice and social righteousness; Hosea, the prophet of love. They are not contradictory, rather supplementary. We need both in the economy of revelation. Yet the prophet, who so beautifully depicts the love of God (Hos. 14:4-8), also shows his wrath and threatens dire punishment (cf. chs. 5:10, 14; 7:12-16; 8:5, 13; 9:7-17; 11:5, 6; 13:7, 8). In ch. 11:8, 9, Hosea presents the exhaustless mercy of God which no sin of man can bar or wear out. The master thought of Hosea's message is that God's mighty and inextinguishable love for Israel will not rest satisfied until it has brought all Israel into harmony with itself.

Ho-sha'iah (hō-shā'yā) [Jehovah has saved]. 1. Father of Jezeiah and Azariah (Jer. 42:1; 43:2).

2. A man, doubtless a prince of Judah, who walked immediately behind the chorus of those who gave thanks in the procession at the dedication of the 2nd Temple (Neh. 12:32).

Hosh'a-ma (hōsh'ā-mā) [probably for Jehoshama, Jehovah has heard]. One of the family or descendants of King Jeconiah (I Chron. 3:18).

Hoshe'a (hō-shē'ā), in A.V. of Num. 13:8, 16 O-she'a (ō-shē'ā) [save]. 1. The earlier name of Joshua, the son of Nun, which was changed by Moses into Joshua (Num. 13:8, 16). See JOSHUA 1.

2. Son of Azariah and prince of Ephraim in David's reign (I Chron. 27:20).

3. A son of Elah. With the connivance of Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, he conspired against Pekah, king of Israel, slew him, and ascended the throne (II Kings 15:30). His reign lasted about 9 years, from about 730 to 722 B.C. He did evil in the sight of Jehovah, but still was better than the average of the preceding kings. Shalmaneser, king of Assyria, made an expedition against him. Not being able to repel the invader, Hoshea paid tribute (ch. 17:3); but knowing that the powerful kingdom of Egypt looked with jealousy on the approach of the Assyrians to its frontiers, he soon sought assistance from Egypt. Trusting that aid would be forthcoming, he withheld the annual tribute from Assyria (v. 4). Shalmaneser again invaded the Israelite territory, took Hoshea captive, and laid siege to Samaria. See SHALMANESER 3. The city was reduced to great straits, but it held out 3 years. At the end of the 3 years Shalmaneser died and was succeeded by Sargon, who claims the honor of capturing the city. He carried the leading inhabitants into captivity, and placed them in Halah and in Habor, by the river of Gozan, and in the cities of the Medes (vs. 5, 6). This event is known as the captivity of the 10 tribes. It was not any special wickedness on the part of Hoshea that brought it on. The cup of Israel's iniquity had been filling for centuries, and Hoshea's iniquities only added the last drop which made the cup full to overflowing (vs. 7-23). See SAMARIA 1, SARGON, ISRAEL 3.

4. One of those who sealed the covenant (Neh. 10:23).

5. The Hebrew name of the Prophet Hosea. See HOSEA.

Host. A multitude, especially when organized; an army (Gen. 21:22; Judg. 4:2) or the division of an army (Ex. 7:4; in A.V. armies; 12:41; Num. 2:3; in A.V. armies; I Kings 2:5); the angels, constituting a heavenly host (I Kings 22:19; Ps. 148:2; Luke 2:13); and the stars (Deut. 4:19; II Kings 23:5). The Semites comprehended heaven and all its forces and beings, heaven and all that is therein, in the phrase host of heaven; and in the phrase host of the earth, they included the earth and all that is therein, the forces of nature like wind, lightning, heat and cold, and things animate and inanimate (Gen. 2:1; Ps. 33:6).

The title Lord of hosts has sometimes been explained as meaning that Jehovah is the God of the armies of Israel. In proof, David's words to Goliath are cited: "Thou comest to me with a sword, and with a spear . . . but I come to thee in the name of Jehovah of hosts, the God of the armies of Israel" (I Sam. 17:45). The Prophet Isaiah is also quoted, who says: "Jehovah of hosts will come down to fight upon mount Zion" (Isa. 31:4). But this does not comprehend the full meaning of the term. Jehovah did fight for his people; he was indeed "Jehovah strong and mighty, Jehovah mighty in battle." But the Lord of hosts was more than the war-god of Israel. The Greek translators grasped the true meaning of the title and rendered it Pantokrator, the Almighty. The word hosts which is used in the title refers to the armies of the universe. The designation pictures the universe, in its spiritual and material aspects, as forming a vast army, in numerous divisions, of various kinds of troops, in orderly array under the command of Jehovah. One division consists of the angels. It was the Lord, the God of hosts, who appeared to Jacob at Beth-el when he beheld the ladder and the angels of God ascending and descending (Gen. 28:12, 13; Hos. 12:4, 5).

"Who in the skies can be compared unto Jehovah?"

Who among the sons of the mighty is like unto Jehovah,

A God very terrible in the council of the holy ones,

And to be feared above all them that are round about him?

O Jehovah God of hosts,

Who is a mighty one, like unto thee, O Jehovah?"

(Ps. 89:6-8; cf. A.V.). Another host consists of the stars, in their beautiful order and wonderful array. Jehovah is their commander. Isaiah bids those who would know God to go forth, and lift up their eyes on high and see (Isa. 40:26; 45:12). Yet another host consists of all the forces of nature; they stand at the bidding of Jehovah, worshiping and serving him (Neh. 9:6). The Lord of hosts sends sword, famine, and pestilence (Jer. 29:17). "The Lord, which giveth the sun for a light by day and the ordinances of the moon and of the stars for a light by night, which stirreth up the sea that the waves thereof roar, the Lord of hosts is his name" (Jer. 31:35). The Greeks, looking at the heavens above them, and at the earth around them, called what they saw "cosmos," the beauty of harmony. The Romans, discovering the same harmonious relations and movements, named the entirety of creation a "universe," combined as one. To the poetic imagination of the Hebrews, with their knowledge of the omnipotent reigning God, the regularity and order everywhere apparent suggested an army in vast, numerous, and varied divisions, acting under the command of one will. The Lord of hosts, he is the king who alone commands. See SABAOth.

Ho'tham (hō'thām) [seal, signet ring]. 1. An Asherite, son of Heber, family of Beriah (I Chron. 7:32).

2. An Aroerite, 2 of whose sons were among David's mighty men (I Chron. 11:44); A.V., Hothan.

Ho'than (hō'thān). See HOTHAM 2.

Ho'thēr (hō'thēr). A son of Heman, David's seer and singer (I Chron. 25:4).

Hour. See DAY 2 and NIGHT.

House. In Palestine and other parts of the East the houses of the common people, who constitute more than  $\frac{3}{4}$  of the population, have only 1 story, and sometimes only 1 room. The interior is frequently divided into 2 portions, 1 several feet higher than the other.

The door from the outside leads into the lower portion, which is occupied by the cattle. Troughs for their feed are arranged along the side of the platform where the family dwells. This higher floor is reached by a short flight of steps. Sometimes there is a loft above the stable for guests. These several apartments are not walled off from each other. The walls of the house are often of mud or sun-dried brick, even when, as in Palestine, stone is procurable (cf. Job 24:16; Ezek. 13:10-16). The roofs are made of branches of trees, canes, palm leaves, etc., covered with a thick stratum of earth. Materials so flimsy cannot long resist the heavy rains which at certain seasons fall in warm countries.

The houses of the better class are generally built, as of old, in a quadrangle, around a central courtyard, which in certain cases may contain a fountain, or even a well (II Sam. 17:18). The upper chamber is an important room in the 2d story, sometimes constituting all there is of a 2d story, being built above the general level of the roof (Judg. 3:20; I Kings 17:19; II Kings 4:10; Mark 14:15; Acts 1:13; 9:37). The roofs of the houses are flat and are generally surrounded by battlements according to Mosaic Law (Deut. 22:

8). They are well adapted for storing and drying agricultural produce (Josh. 2:6), for walking to and fro (II Sam. 11:2), for conversation (I Sam. 9:25, 26), for idolatrous worship (II Kings 23:12), or for religious meditation and prayer (Acts 10:9). There is a staircase outside the house, by which the roof can be reached without entering the building (cf. Matt. 24:17; Mark 13:15). Although roofs for the most part are flat, there have been discovered cases of gabled roofs. The windows are generally narrow, and mostly open into the courtyard instead of facing the street.

Hô'za-i (hō'zā-i) [perhaps, (Jehovah) is seeing]. Writer of a history which treated of King Manasseh (II Chron. 33:19). In A.V., following the LXX, Heb. Hôzāy has been translated as if it were a common noun, and the book cited appears as a collection of sayings by the seers (cf. v. 18). The LXX seems to be based on a Heb. form hahōzīm.

Huk'kok (hūk'ök) [hewn in, decreed]. A town on the boundary line of Naphtali (Josh. 19:34). Yakūk, about 6 miles w. by n. of Tell Hüm, is generally accepted as the site.

Hu'kok (hūk'ök). See HELKATH.

Hul (hül) [circle, circuit]. The 2d son of Aram (Gen. 10:23; I Chron. 1:17). As a geographical region, the name may possibly be identified with Hül'i'a which is mentioned by Ashur-nasir-pal in connection with Mount Masius.

Hul'dah (hül'dā) [weasel, mole]. A prophetess, who lived in the 2d quarter of Jerusalem (II Kings 22:14). She was the wife of Shallum, keeper of the wardrobe, and was held in the highest esteem. She lived during the reign of Josiah, and prophesied the destruction of Jerusalem, but added that on account of Josiah's piety he should die before the coming of the catastrophe (II Kings 22:12-20; II Chron. 34:20-28).

Hum'tah (hüm'tā) [place of lizards or, perhaps, fortress]. A town in the hill country of Judah (Josh. 15:54). Site unknown.

Hunt'er and Hunt'ing. Hunting was a favorite pastime of ancient kings (Gen. 10:9). The Babylonian and Assyrian monarchs delighted in it and were proud of their achievements, recording their success in inscriptions, and depicting their deeds in sculpture to adorn the walls of their palaces. In Palestine game existed during the entire Biblical period in certain localities, as in the wilderness of Judah, the thickets of the Jordan, the more notable forests, and the s. country (Gen. 25:27; Jos. Antiq. xvi. 10, 3). Many of the animals recognized as clean and fit for food were wild and could be obtained only by hunting. When the animal was slain, its blood was poured out upon the earth and not eaten (Deut. 12:15, 16, 22). Hunting was practiced in order to exterminate noxious beasts (Ex. 23:29; I Kings 13:24), to secure food (Gen. 27:3; Ecclus. 36:19), and as sport (Jos. War i. 21, 13). People hunted alone or in companies (Jer. 16:16), on foot or on horseback (Jos. War i. 21, 13), and on the great plains in chariots. The hunter used bow and arrows (Isa. 7:24) and the spear (Jos. Antiq. xvi. 10, 3). Decoys were employed (Jer. 5:26, 27), and nets and traps (Job 18:10; Ecclus. 27:20) and pits (II Sam. 23:20; Ezek. 19:4, 8). Babylonians, Assyrians, and Persians kept dogs trained for the chase.

Hu'pham (hū'fām). A son or more remote descendant of Benjamin, and founder of a tribal family (Num. 26:39). Called Huppim (Gen. 46:21; cf. I Chron. 7:12, 15), and perhaps Huram (I Chron. 8:5). Hiram would seem to be descended from Bela or Gera. Huppim is not registered with either Bela, Becher, or Jediahel in I Chron. 7:12, unless he is descended from Bela through Ir or Iri (v. 7).

Hup'pah (hūp'd) [perhaps, (Jehovah) is a covering]. A descendant of Aaron. His family became the 13th course of the priests (I Chron. 24:13).

Hup'im (hūp'im). See HUPHAM.

Hur (hūr) [whiteness, splendor]. 1. A man of Judah, family of Hezron, house of Caleb (I Chron. 2:18, 19). He was the grandfather of Bezaleel (I Chron. 2:20; Ex. 31:1, 2). With Aaron, he supported the arms of Moses during the fight with the Amalekites (Ex. 17:10-12). He was associated with Aaron in the government of the Israelites while Moses was absent in Mount Sinai (ch. 24:14). Josephus, writing many centuries after the event, calls Hur the husband of Miriam, Moses' sister (Jos. Antiq. iii. 2, 4). The O.T. is silent on the subject.

2. One of 5 kings of Midian slain by Moses (Num. 31:8; Josh. 13:21).

3. Father of Solomon's purveyor in Mount Ephraim (I Kings 4:8).

4. Father of a certain Rephaiah (Neh. 3:9).

Hu'ra'i (hū'rā-i). One of David's mighty men from the brooks of Gaash (I Chron. 11:32). Called Hiddai in II Sam. 23:30.

Hu'ram (hū'rām). 1. A king of Tyre (II Chron. 2:3). See HIRAM.

2. A Tyrian artificer (II Chron. 4:11, 16). See HIRAM.

3. A Benjamite, perhaps a son of Bela (I Chron. 8:5). See HUPHAM.

Hu'ri (hū'ri). A Gadite (I Chron. 5:14).

Hu'shah (hū'shā) [haste, emotion]. A town of Judah, to judge from I Chron. 4:4; 27:11; probably Hūsan, s.w. of Bethlehem.

Hu'shai (hū'shī) [hasty, hastening]. An Archite, one of David's 2 leading counselors. He remained faithful to his sovereign during Absalom's rebellion, and effectually defeated the counsel of Ahithophel (II Sam. 15:32-37; 17:5-16). See AHITHOPHEL and BAANA 2.

Hu'sham (hū'shām) [haste]. A man of the land of the Temanites, who succeeded Jobab as king of Edom (Gen. 36:34, 35; I Chron. 1:45, 46).

Hu'shath-ite (hū'shāth-it). An inhabitant of Hushah (II Sam. 21:18; 23:27).

Hu'shim (hū'shīm). 1. The son of Dan (Gen. 46:23). Called in Num. 26:42, Shuham. The difference is due to a transposition of the consonants.

2. A Benjamite family, sons of Aher (I Chron. 7:12).

3. One of the 3 wives of the Benjamite Shahraim (I Chron. 8:8, 11).

Husk. A kind of food eaten by swine, and which the Prodigal Son in his poverty was glad to share (Luke 15:16). It is the pod of the carob tree (Ceratonia siliqua), and is also called locust bean and St. John's bread. The tree is a handsome evergreen, attaining a height of 30 feet, thornless, and with leaves like the ash. The legumes are borne in great profusion, and are often a foot long. When green they are used for cattle and swine and in times of great famine are eaten by people. A sirup is made of the pulp of the pods.

Huz (hüz). See Uz.

Huz'ab (hüz'āb). According to the interpretation of A.V. the name of the queen or a poetic term for Nineveh (Nahum 2:7). The Targum understands it to mean "the queen," and so it is rendered by J.V. But in A.V. marg. it is rendered, "That which was established," or, "There was a stand made." A.R.V. translates, "And it is decreed." Both these renderings make Huzzab simply a part of the Heb. verb yāṣab, to place or establish.

Hy'a'einth, or in modified form Ja'einth.

1. The name of a color (Rev. 9:17).

2. A precious stone, constituting the 11th foundation of the New Jerusalem (Rev. 21:20; R.V. marg., sapphire) and one of the 12 jewels in the high priest's breastplate (Ex. 28:19, R.V.; marg., amber).

Hy'e'na. An animal which feeds on offal (Ecclus. 13:18). The striped hyena (Hyæna striata) is common in every part of Palestine, living in caves and tombs, coming forth after dark to rifle graves or otherwise seek after prey. The valley of Zeboim in I Sam. 13:18 means the valley of hyenas.

Hy'me-nae'us (hī'mē-nē'ūs) [Gr., pertaining to Hymen, the god of marriage]. One who made shipwreck of his faith, blasphemed, and was excommunicated by Paul (I Tim. 1:20). He declared that the resurrection was already past. Philetus was associated with him in this error (II Tim. 2:17, 18).

Hymn. A spiritual meditation designed, or at least suitable for, singing or chanting in the worship of God. The book of Psalms is the earliest hymnbook in existence. Other magnificent Hebrew religious odes are the songs of Moses (Ex. 15:1-19; Deut. 32:1-43), Deborah (Judg., ch. 5), Hannah (I Sam. 2:1-10), Mary (Luke 1:46-55), and Zacharias (Luke 1:68-79). The last 2 are known as the Magnificat and the Benedictus respectively, from the 1st word of the Lat. translation. The Hebrew psalms were often sung to the accompaniment of music (II Chron. 29:27, 28; cf. I Chron. 16:42). In the N.T. 3 terms are used for Christian songs: psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs or odes (Eph. 5:19; Col. 3:16). The hymn which Christ and his disciples sang after supper on the night of the betrayal (Matt. 26:30) was doubtless the hallel (Psalms 113 to 118), which was sung by the Jews at the celebration of the passover. The early Christians sang hymns in public worship and privately as a means of worshipping God and of edification and comfort (Acts 16:25; I Cor. 14:26; Eph. 5:19; Col. 3:16). Fragments of early Christian hymns, known as such from the meter in the Gr. text, are preserved in Eph. 5:14; I Tim. 3:16; cf. Rev. 15:3, 4. At the beginning of the 2d century, in the reign of Trajan, the Christians of Bithynia were reported by Pliny the Younger as singing songs to Christ as God (Pliny Epis. x. 96).

Hy's'op [Gr. hyssōpos, hyssōpon, from Heb. 'ēzōb]. A plant of Egypt and Palestine (Ex. 12:22), well adapted for sprinkling. It springs out of walls, and is small in comparison with the cedar of Lebanon (I Kings 4:33). It is aromatic, and was largely used, under the Law, often in bunches, with cedar wood and wool, for ceremonial purification (Lev. 14:4, 6, 49-52; Num. 19:6, 18; Ps. 51:7; Heb. 9:19). A sponge filled with vinegar was put upon hyssop and raised to the lips of Jesus when he was on the cross (John 19:29). The common hyssop (Hyssopus officinalis) is a sweet-smelling plant, belonging to the order

Pod and Branch of the Carob Tree

Lamiaceae or Labiatae, or Mints. It is a small bushy herb which grows to a height of 12 or 18 inches, and has small, hairy, lanceolate leaves. But Tristram states that its area is the s. of Europe, the Danubian province, and Siberia. Moreover, the statement of 2 of the Evangelists (Matt. 27:48; Mark 15:36) that the sponge of vinegar offered to Jesus was put upon kalamos, a reed which the common hyssop does not produce, has led some interpreters to think that a different plant from the common hyssop is intended, perhaps the caper plant (Capparis spinosa), but this view has little to commend it.

Rabbinic tradition identifies Heb. 'ēzōb with Arab. ḡa'tar (Origanum, marjoram, or thyme), which may be Origanum maru. This plant is common in Palestine, growing on walls and rocks. Its thick, hairy leaves and hairy branches can be made into a bunch, and would hold liquids for sprinkling. The leaves and head of this plant have a pungent, aromatic flavor. Like peppermint, at first it tastes hot, but this is followed by a cooling, refreshing feeling. The addition of this herb to the vinegar or sour wine on the sponge would aid in alleviating the suffering of one on the cross. A bunch of hyssop may have accompanied the sponge upon the reed. This plant seems to fulfill the requirements of both the O.T. and the N.T. passages. One MS. reads hyssōi for hyssōpōi (John 19:29); in that case the passage means: "So they put a sponge full of vinegar upon a javelin."

I

Ib'har (ib'hār) [He (God) chooses]. One of King David's sons born at Jerusalem (II Sam. 5:15; I Chron. 14:5).

I'bis. A bird (Lev. 11:19, R.V. marg.), allied to the herons and storks. It was formerly venerated by the Egyptians. See HERON.

Ib'le'am (ib'lē-ām). A city in the territory of Issachar, given to the tribe of Manasseh; but the Canaanite population was not expelled (Josh. 17:11, 12; Judg. 1:27). Near it Ahaziah, king of Judah, was mortally wounded by the followers of Jehu (II Kings 9:27). Zechariah, king of Israel, was slain there (II Kings 15:10, text of Lucian). It is generally identified with Bileam, a town of Manasseh given to the Levites (I Chron. 6:70); Bel'ameh, a ruin 1¼ miles s. of Jenin and about 13 miles e. of n. of Samaria (cf. Belmen, Belmair, Judith 4:4; 7:3).

Ib'ne'iah (ib'nē'yā) [Jehovah builds up]. A Benjamite, son of Jeroham and head of a father's house (I Chron. 9:8).

Ib-ni'jah (ib-ni'jā) [Jehovah builds up]. A Benjamite, father of Reuel (I Chron. 9:8).

Ib'ri (ib'ri) [a Hebrew]. A son of Jaaziah (I Chron. 24:27).

Ib'sam (ib'sām), in A.V. Jib'sam [fragrant, balsam]. A man of Issachar, family of Tola (I Chron. 7:2).

Ib'zan (ib'zān) [cf. Arab. 'abās, swift (of a horse)]. A judge who ruled over Israel, or part of it, for 7 years. He was a native of Bethlehem, apparently that in Zebulun, was buried in his native place, and was succeeded by a Zebulunite. He had 30 sons and 30 daughters (Judg. 12:8-10).

Ich'a-bod (ik'ā-bōd) [inglorious, no glory]. Son of Phinehas and grandson of Eli. The name commemorated the fact that the glory had departed from Israel, for the Ark of God was taken (I Sam. 4:19-22).

I-co'ni-um (i-cō'ni-ūm). A city of Asia Minor, which is described by Xenophon as the last city in Phrygia to one traveling e. (Anabasis i. 2, 19). Under the Roman and Greek empires Iconium was considered the capital of Lycaonia. It was situated in a fertile spot in the high, waterless plain of Lycaonia. Barnabas and Paul visited it on the First Missionary Journey both going and returning (Acts 13:51; 14:1-6, 19-22; cf. 16:2; II Tim. 3:11). It has had an unbroken history and is now known as Konya (Konia).

Id'a-lah (id'ā-lā). A border town of Zebulun (Josh. 19:15), Khirbet el-Huwāra, about ½ of a mile s. of Beit Lahm.

Id'bash (id'bāsh) [honey-sweet]. A man of Judah (I Chron. 4:3).

Id'do, I (id'ō) [Heb. 'iddō; cf. Arab. 'adda, to happen unexpectedly, to overwhelm]. The chief at Casiphia through whom Ezra, when conducting a company of exiles from Babylonia to Jerusalem, obtained the contingent which was lacking of Levites and Nethinim for the service of the Temple (Ezra 8:17-20).

Id'do, II (id'ō) [Heb. Yiddō, probably, loving, beloved]. 1. Son of Zechariah, and a chief in David's reign of the half tribe of Manasseh e. of the Jordan (I Chron. 27:21).

2. A man induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:43). In A.V. the name is written Jadau, a form arising from the translators' pronouncing the consonants of the kethib (but only one d) with the vowels of the kere. Jaddai (text of J.V., and marg. of R.V.) is the kere.

Id'do, III (id'ō) [Heb. 'iddō, 'iddō, ye'dō, ye'di, decked, adorned]. 1. A Levite, a descendant of Gershon (I Chron. 6:21). Apparently called Adaiah synonymously (v. 41).

2. Father of Ahinadab, Solomon's purveyor at Mahanaim (I Kings 4:14).

3. A seer who wrote a book of visions concerning Jeroboam and in which events of Solomon's reign were related (II Chron. 9:29), a book on genealogies, in which deeds of Rehoboam were recorded (ch. 12:15), and a history which treated of King Abijah's acts (ch. 13:22).

4. Grandfather of the Prophet Zechariah (Zech. 1:1, 7; cf. Ezra 5:1; 6:14). He is not unreasonably believed to be identical with Iddo, a chief of the priests who returned with Zerubbabel to Jerusalem and whose name is that of a father's house in the next generation. The head of this house at the time mentioned is a priest named Zechariah (Neh. 12:4, 16).

Idol. An image, a sculpture, or other representation of any person or being, intended as an object of worship, or as the embodiment and efficient presence of a deity (Ex. 20:4, 5, 23; Judg. 17:3; I Sam. 5:3, 4; Rom. 1:23). Idols were made of silver, gold (Ps. 115:4; 135:15), wood, or other material (Isa. 44:13-17). When metallic, they were fashioned by running melted metal into a mold, in which case they were called molten images; or they consisted of plates of metal over a wooden core fashioned with a graving tool. When of wood or stone, they were made by graving tools or other instruments, and were called graven images. The process of manufacture is described in Isaiah and Jeremiah (Isa. 40:19, 20; 44:9-20; Jer. 10:9). Some were small, especially those designed as household gods or teraphim (Gen. 31:34; 35:1-4); some were as large as a human being (I Sam. 19:16); some, such as that erected by Nebuchadnezzar in the plain of Dura, were colossal (Dan. 3:1).

About A.D. 300 images were introduced into some Christian churches for instruction and ornament only. In 736 the Eastern emperor Leo issued edicts against them. In 780 the empress Irene introduced image worship into the Eastern Church, and in 787 the Second Council of Nice gave them ecclesiastical sanction.

Idol-a-try. Idolatry was practiced at a comparatively early period of man's history. The immediate ancestors of Abraham worshiped other gods (Josh. 24:2) in addition to Jehovah, it may be believed, and doubtless by means of idols. Laban had images, which Rachel was too justly accused of stealing (Gen. 31:30, 32-35). The Egyptians made figures of the gods to serve as objects of worship, and in the innermost sanctuary of their temples lay the symbol of a god (Herod. ii. 63, 138). The Canaanite nations had idols which the Israelites, on succeeding to the land, were ordered to destroy (Ex. 23:24; 34:13; Num. 33:52; Deut. 7:5). The Second Commandment was directed against idolatry (Ex. 20:4, 5; Deut. 5:8, 9), forbidding man to bow down to images, sculptures, statues, and pictures. And the teachers of Israel followed up this injunction by pointing out and ridiculing the impotency of idols (Ps. 115:2-8; Isa. 2:3, 18-21; 40:19, 20; 44:9-20; Jer. 10:3-5). Their helplessness was discovered when the Ark of the Lord was in the Temple of Dagon (I Sam. 5:3-5). The apocryphal book of Bel and the Dragon treats of the deceitful practices of the priests in the idol temples. Of the nations with whom the Israelites were brought into contact during Scripture times, all but the Persians were idolaters, and they did not worship Jehovah. When the Israelites borrowed idolatrous practices from the neighboring nations, 2 well-marked stages were traceable in the progress of error. At first they attempted to worship Jehovah by means of images; see JEROBOAM 1. Then they departed entirely from Jehovah, and the idols they made were designed to represent other divinities; see BAAL 1. In N.T. times church members who lived in heathen communities were required to take precautions to avoid compromising themselves with idolatry. The Council of Jerusalem enjoined that they should abstain from the flesh of animals that had been sacrificed to idols (Acts 15:29). Paul gave the same injunction, but explained that in the case of those who had no faith in idols, abstinence was designed to avoid casting a stumbling block in the path of the weaker brethren (I Cor. 8:4-13). If receiving hospitality at any house, and meat which might possibly have been offered to an idol was set on the table, the Christian guest was not required to ask any questions for conscience' sake; but if he was expressly told that the food had been offered to an idol, then he was to abstain. The same rule was to be carried out with regard to food purchased for the household in the ordinary market (I Cor. 10:18-33).

Id'u-mae'a (id'ū-mē'ā), in A.V. of O.T. and Apocrypha Id'u-me'a (id'ū-mē'ā) [Gr., pertaining to Edom]. The name used by Greeks and Romans, in slightly different spelling, for the country of Edom (Mark 3:8; and in A.V. only, Isa. 34:5, 6; Ezek. 35:15; 36:5). After the fall of Jerusalem, in 586 B.C., the Edomites began to press n. (Ezek. 36:5). They themselves were driven from Petra w. by the Nabataeans, who were established there by 312 B.C. and who before the middle of the 2d century B.C. were occupying, not only s. Judah, but also Hebron and the country to its n. as far as Bethzur (I Macc. 4:29; 5:65). Judas Maccabaeus warred against them successfully; and John Hyrcanus, about 126 B.C., completely subjugated them and placed them under a Jewish governor (Jos. Antiq. xiii. 9, 1).

I'e'zer (i-ē'zēr). See ABIEZER 1.

I'e'zer-ite (i-ē'zēr-it). See ABIEZERITE.

I'gal (i'gāl), in A.V. once I'ge'al (I Chron. 3:22) [he (God) redeems]. 1. The spy sent forth by the tribe of Issachar to search out the Land of Canaan (Num. 13:7).

2. One of David's mighty men, the son of Nathan (II Sam. 23:36). He occupies the same position in the catalogue as does Joel in I Chron. 11:38, and it is natural to identify the 2. But the relation of the 2 lists at this point is difficult to determine; and as Igal and Joel are differently described, they may be different persons, nephew and uncle.

3. A son of Shemaiah, a descendant of King Jehoniah (I Chron. 3:22).

Ig'da-lī'ah (ig'dā-lī'ā) [great is Jehovah]. Father of the Prophet Hanan (Jer. 35:4).

I'ge'al (i'gē-āl). See IGAL.

I'im (i'im) [heaps, ruins]. 1. A town e. of the Jordan (Num. 33:45, A.V.; in R.V. Iyim); it may be the Moabite fortress Mahaiy, about 7 miles e. of Dhat Rās. See IYE-ABARIM.

2. A town in the extreme s. of Judah (Josh. 15:29); Deir el-Ghawī, near Umm Deimneh.

I'je-ab'a-rim (i'jē-āb'ā-rīm). See IYE-ABARIM.

I'jon (i'jōn) [a ruin]. A fortified city of Naphtali, one of those captured by Ben-hadad, king of Syria, at the instigation of Asa (I Kings 15:20; II Chron. 16:4). Its inhabitants were subsequently carried into captivity by Tiglath-pileser (II Kings 15:29). Robinson located it at Tell Dibbin, a hill 110 feet high, on the e. border of Merj 'Ayūn, meadow of springs. The site is about 8 miles n.n.w. of Banias.

Ik'kesh (ik'ēsh) [crooked, perverse]. Father of David's captain and mighty man Ira (II Sam. 23:26; I Chron. 11:28).

I'lai (i'lā-i). One of David's mighty men (I Chron. 11:29), called Zalmon in II Sam. 23:28.

Il-yr'i-eum (i-lir'i-kūm). A country bounded on the n. by Pannonia, on the s. by Epirus, on the e. by Macedonia, and, when it included Dalmatia, on the w. by the Adriatic Sea. It is traversed from n.w. to s.e. by the Noric, Carnic, and Julian Alps, constituting the most e. portion of the great Alpine chain. Along the coast are excellent harbors and numerous islands. The Illyrian race inhabiting the region were wild mountaineers, who were a thorn in the side of their neighbors, the Macedonians; and, when they descended to the seacoast, they so practiced piracy as to bring them into collision with the Romans, who, in 229 B.C., began to conquer them, and finally made Illyricum, or Illyria, a province of the empire. The Apostle Paul preached the gospel "from Jerusalem, and round about even unto Illyricum" (Rom. 15:19). In the later years of the Roman Empire the name Illyricum gained a much wider meaning.

Im'age. See IDOL.

Im'al-cu'e (i-māl-kū'ē), in A.V. Si-mal-cu'e. An Arabian who brought up the young Antiochus, son of Alexander Balas (I Macc. 11:39); in Jos. Antiq. xiii. 5, 1 called Malchus. The name doubtless contains the Arab. word malik, king.

Im'la (im'lā) or Im'lah (im'lā) [he (God) is full, or fills (fulfills)]. Father of the Prophet Micaiah (I Kings 22:8, 9; II Chron. 18:7, 8).

Im-man'u-el (i-mān'ū-ēl), in A.V. of N.T. Em-man-u-el, the Gr. form [God with us]. A son whom "the maiden" should bear (Isa. 7:14, R.V. marg.). Before the son is born, or at the time of his birth, historical events will justify naming him "God with us"; before he attains to years of moral determination, the land of n. Israel and Damascus will be forsaken, and unexampled punishment will be inflicted on Judah (Isa. 7:16,17); and hence during the years of his moral maturity, he shall eat the products of a land that has been wasted by the nations (vs. 15, 18 seq.). Isaiah had in mind that worthy son of David about whom prophecy had begun to cluster, for: 1. He foretells the birth of a son, not simply of a child. 2. He utters this prophecy to the house of David in view of God's rejection of the faithless successor of David who then occupied the throne. 3. On the natural interpretation of ch. 8:8, which observes the previous use of Immanuel as the name of the son, which does justice to the pronoun of the 2d person in the clause preceding Immanuel, and which affords an easy transition to the succeeding verse, Immanuel is a person; and if so, he is a native of Judah and sufficiently great to be singled out as a representative, for Judah is spoken of as the land of Immanuel; and he is a powerful personage, for because of him the rage of the nations is vain (v. 9 seq.). 4. The Messiah is definitely before the prophet's mind in ch. 9:6, 7 and ch. 11:1; and violence is required to separate these prophecies from that of ch. 7. The Messianic hope was awake at this period of history. 5. The use of the article with maiden is adequately explained. Isaiah uses it to designate the young woman, unknown by name, yet definite, who is to be the mother of the Messiah (cf. Micah 5:3). 6. Looking back, Matthew (Matt. 1:22, 23) sees the fulfillment of this prophecy in the birth of Jesus.

The prophet is, therefore, thinking of David's son who might appear at any time. But he is not predicting the birth of Hezekiah and expecting him to be the Messiah for: 1. Hezekiah was already born. This prophecy was delivered in 734 B.C., and Hezekiah was on the throne, a vigorous ruler in 727 B.C. 2. After the lapse of a year and when Hezekiah was a youth, the prophet still continues to look forward to the future for the going forth of the shoot out of the root of Jesse. 3. Hezekiah did not eat curds and honey; the processes which issued in the spoliation and subjection of the land had only begun in Hezekiah's time. If vs. 18-25 of Isa., ch. 7, are included in the prophecy, the fly of Egypt did not come upon Judah in Hezekiah's day. Even v. 17 presents a picture which belongs to the remoter future. Days such as had not been were not brought upon Ahaz and his people; only the beginning of the process which resulted in the predicted calamity was seen.

Immanuel was a sign. Before the child reached moral self-determination, the lands of Rezin and Pekah were to be forsaken (Isa. 7:16). Immanuel was not a sign to compel faith in Ahaz, but one that called for faith. Like many other signs of the O.T., it called for present faith and occurred only when the prophecy was fulfilled (e.g. Ex. 3:12).

The birth, infancy, and youth of the Messiah are described as actually passing before the prophet's sight; but the prophet himself did not understand that the Messiah was necessarily to be born immediately, for when the Messiah did not appear within a year, Isaiah shows no signs of disappointment, loses no faith in the prophetic revelation, continues his activity, makes still greater disclosures regarding Immanuel, and enjoys the continued confidence of his fellow countrymen.

The promise of immediate deliverance from the advancing enemy (Isa. 7:3-11) is confirmed by an appeal to an event which might occur sooner or later. But whether occurring at once or long subsequently, it is confirmatory, because it implies the deliverance promised to Ahaz. The assurance, already given by God (II Sam. 7:11-17), that the Messiah should be born of the royal family of David was a sign to the house of David, including Ahaz, that the purpose of Rezin and Pekah to destroy the kingdom and place a new king over the people should not stand (Isa. 7:13, 14). And the remoter the sign, that is the remoter the birth of the Messiah, the stronger was the guarantee of the long continuance of the royal family of Judah.

The birth and infancy of Immanuel measure the progress of the predicted events. "I see his birth, who is God's guarantee of the continued existence and deliverance of Judah, as though it is already at hand. I do not know the times and the seasons, but it is revealed to me as a sign to you, and as though about to occur. As such it contains a measure of time for the immediate future. Before the child comes to the years when one chooses between right and wrong, the northern land shall be forsaken. At the time of life when one's moral faculties have matured, he, the scion of the royal house of Judah, will dwell in a wasted land." Any child would serve for measuring the time; but the child chosen is the Messiah because the prophecy of deliverance rested upon the promises which centered in the Messiah.

Now let us consider the period. 1. Before the child attained the age when man's moral faculties are mature the Northern Kingdom was desolate. In fact, before a child born in the year of this meeting between Isaiah and Ahaz could have reached moral maturity the land of the north was desolate. The meeting is known to have taken place in 734 B.C. In 732 Damascus and the district governed by it fell into the hands of the Assyrians. The 2½ tribes of Israel e. of the Jordan and Naphtali were carried off at the close of the Syro-Ephraimite War (734-733), Samaria fell, and a large body of its inhabitants were deported in 722 (721). At Christ's appearance, the 10 tribes no longer existed as a nation, and no longer occupied the land of their fathers. 2. Ahaz himself had gone to Damascus, had done homage to the Assyrian king, and had acknowledged that Judah was a tributary state to Assyria. Judah itself was not actually devastated, but it had bowed itself down to the foreign yoke. From this time onward, with the exception of short intervals, it was in a sense subject to the dominant world power, and it was looked upon by the great empire of each period as a dependency; whenever Judah claimed independence it was visited sooner or later by the imperial power, which claimed sovereignty, and was punished and wasted. Its nationality was not blotted out and the royal family was not destroyed nor overlooked; but Judah was, generally speaking, a dependency. When Christ actually appeared, Judah was still acknowledging a foreign sovereign. In other words, all the processes foretold by Isaiah began in the lifetime of Ahaz, and their results were in full force when the Messiah actually appeared.

Im'mer (im'ēr) [sheep, lamb]. 1. A descendant of Aaron. His family had become a father's house in the time of David, and was made the 16th course of priests (I Chron. 24:1, 6, 14). The ruler of the house of God in the days of Jeremiah, and an antagonist of the prophet, apparently belonged to this house (Jer. 20:1), and doubtless they were members of this family who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:37; Neh. 11:13). Two priests of this house were among those who about a century after the Return were guilty of marrying foreign wives (Ezra 10:20). A little later another son of Immer took part in the honorable work of rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:29).

2. A person or a place in Babylonia whence exiles returned. He or the exiles failed, however, to prove their genealogy (Ezra 2:59; Neh. 7:61).

Im'na (im'ná) [he (God) keeps off, i.e., defends; cf. Arab. mana'a]. An Asherite, a son of Helem (I Chron. 7:35).

Im'nah (im'ná), in A.V. once Jim'na (Num. 26:44), and once Jim'nah (Gen. 46:17) [probably, good fortune; cf. Arab. yumnah, good luck, happiness]. 1. Son of Asher and founder of a tribal family (Num. 26:44; I Chron. 7:30; Gen. 46:17).

2. A Levite, father of Kore, in Hezekiah's reign (II Chron. 31:14).

Im'rah (im'rā) [he (God) resists]. An Asherite, son of Zophah (I Chron. 7:36).

Im'ri (im'ri) [contraction of Amariah]. 1. A man of Judah, son of Bani, and a descendant of Perez (I Chron. 9:4).

2. Father of the Zaccur who rebuilt part of the wall of Jerusalem after the Captivity (Neh. 3:2).

Incarnat'ion [Late Lat. incarnatio, from incarnari, to be made flesh]. The union of divinity with humanity in Christ. He was conceived by the power of the Holy Spirit and was born without sin, of the Virgin Mary. The Son of God became man by taking to himself a true body and a rational soul. In assuming a true human body and proper human nature, he became subject to the limitations of the flesh; but he is at once truly God and truly man, and although he has two distinct natures, he is only one person.

While the mediator between God and man (I Tim. 2:5), on the one hand had to be God in order to be perfect, it was also requisite that he should be man "that he might advance our nature, perform obedience to the law, suffer and make intercession for us in our nature, have a fellow-feeling for our infirmities; that we might receive the adoption of sons, and have comfort and access with boldness unto the throne of grace. . . . It was requisite that the Mediator, who was to reconcile God and man, should himself be both God and man, and this in one person; that the proper works of each nature might be accepted of God for us, and relied on by us, as the works of the whole person" (Larger Catechism, 39, 40). (Cf. Matt. 1:18 to 2:21; Luke 1:26 to 2:52; John 1:1-14; Matt. 26:38; John 11:33; II Cor. 8:9; Gal. 4:4; Phil. 2:6-8; I John 5:20; Rom. 3:24-26; 8:34; Eph. 1:6; Titus 2:14).

Incense. Fragrant substances as gums and spices designed to be burned, especially in religious worship. Sweet incense was used extensively as an element in the Israelite ritual (Ex. 25:6; 35:8, 28; 37:29). The ingredients were stacte or opobalsamum, onycha, galbanum, and pure frankincense in equal proportions, tempered with salt. It was not allowed to be made for ordinary purposes (Ex. 30:34-38; Lev. 10:1-7). An altar of incense was fashioned of acacia wood overlaid with pure gold. It belonged to the oracle (I Kings 6:22), but was set in the Holy Place, just outside the veil which concealed the Holy of Holies; and each morning when the high priest dressed the lamps, he burned incense on it (Ex. 30:1-9; Luke 1:8-10); see ALTAR. Once a year on the great Day of Atonement, he brought the incense within the veil, and, burning it on a fire in a censer in the Most Holy Place, enveloped the mercy seat in a cloud of the odoriferous smoke which it sent forth (Lev. 16:12, 13). When the altar was dedicated, each of the princes brought a gift of incense carried in a spoon (Num. 7:14, 20, etc.). Where so many animal sacrifices were offered as there were in the courts, both of the tabernacle and the Temple, the smell of blood must have polluted the atmosphere, and doubtless burning of incense effected a sanitary influence. But it had also a symbolic reference. It availed to make atonement (Num. 16:46, 47), for it was typical of the intercession of the appointed high priest. The psalmist requested that his prayer might be set forth before Jehovah as incense (Ps. 141:2); the worshippers prayed outside the Temple while Zacharias offered incense within its walls (Luke 1:10); and in an apocalyptic vision an angel burned incense on the golden altar, the smoke ascending with the prayers of saints (Rev. 8:3-5). The worshippers of false divinities, no less than those who adored the true God, burned incense (II Chron. 34:25; Jer. 48:35). It seems that the so-called sun images (Lev. 26:30; II Chron. 14:5; 34:4, 7; Isa. 17:8; 27:9; Ezek. 6:4, 6) really were pagan altars of incense.

Indi'a (in'di-á) [Heb. Hōddū, from Old Pers. hīndav, Avestan hindav, hōdav, India; cf. Sans. Sindhu, Indus River]. A district on the lower Indus, conquered by Darius the Great and incorporated with the Persian empire (Herod. iii. 94; iv. 44; Persepolis inscription). It formed the e. limit of the Persian empire (Esth. 1:1; 8:9; cf. Herod. iv. 40). Alexander the Great crossed the Indus on his career of conquest. The occurrence of the name in I Macc. 8:8 is suspicious, and so Luther substituted Ionia. At any rate Judas Maccabaeus was misinformed if he was told that the Romans had taken India from Antiochus.

In'gath'er'ing, Feast of. See TABERNACLES, FEAST OF.

In'her'it'ance. See HEIR.

Ink'horn'. A horn or anything similar for holding ink. It was carried at the side (Ezek. 9:2). The inkhorn is still in use in the East. It consists of a case of wood, horn, or metal, with a head at one end for holding the ink, and a long shaft in which the reeds for writing are kept. The case is worn stuck in the girdle.

Inn. An Oriental inn bears little resemblance to an Occidental hotel. The inn was not so necessary in primitive times. Travelers readily found reception in the houses of the hospitable (Ex. 2:20; Judg. 19:15-21; II Kings 4:8; Acts 28:7; Heb. 13:2). The public inn was a mere place of shelter for man and beast,

Like the modern khans, it was probably a large, quadrangular court, with a well in the center and rooms around the sides for travelers, chambers for goods, and stalls for cattle. The rooms were destitute of furniture. The traveler spread his mat on the floor, if he had one; if not, then his shawl-like mantle sufficed for mattress and covering. He also provided food for himself and fodder for his cattle. Free lodging places of this sort were erected by liberal wealthy men for the benefit of wayfarers (cf. Jer. 41:17). Rarely was there a host from whom food could be purchased (Luke 10:34, 35).

In'spi-ra'tion [Lat. inspirare, to breathe into]. The terms inspiration and inspired are used in English with great latitude of meaning, and this latitude is reflected to some extent in their usage in the English Bible. The word inspiration occurs, however, only twice written Scriptures, by virtue of which they are the word of God, and are clothed with all the characteristics which properly belong to the word of God. In accordance with the teaching of this classical passage, Scripture is uniformly recognized, throughout the N.T., as the very word of God, and is treated as possessing all the qualities which would naturally flow from its divine origin. Thus it is currently cited by the exclusive titles Scripture, the Scriptures, the Oracles of God (Rom. 3:2) or the Living Oracles (Acts 7:38, R.V.), and its words are ordinarily adduced by the authoritative formula, "It is written." Its divine character is explicitly expressed in the constant ascription of the words cursorily quoted from it to God as their author (Matt. 1:22; 2:15; Acts 13:34; Rom. 1:2; I Cor. 6:16), or more specifically to the Holy Spirit (Acts 1:16; 4:25, R.V.; 28:25; Heb. 3:7; 9:8; 10:

Courtyard of an Oriental Inn

in the English Bible, and in both cases in a religious sense (Job 32:8, A.V.; breath, R.V.; II Tim. 3:16). In the former passage the word is used loosely to give expression to the broad fact that men are not independent of God as intellectual beings, but that for small and great, old and young, alike, it is "the breath [or inspiration] of the Almighty [that] giveth them understanding." In the latter passage the word inspired is used in its more proper and specific sense as a direct predicate of the written Scriptures, affirming that quality of divinity in them by virtue of which they are "profitable" for the great ends for which they are given. The Scriptures which the apostle had particularly in mind in this passage were the sacred books of the Jews, what we call the O.T.; but the affirmation he makes will naturally hold good of all writings which rightly share the high title of Scripture with them. The quality which he thus makes the fundamental characteristic of Scripture is expressed in the original Greek not by the simple word inspired, but by a compound word, God-inspired, possibly of his own coinage, by which the divine source of the inspiration is emphasized. He adduces this fundamental quality of Scripture as the ground on which the unique value of the Scriptures rests: "All scripture," he says, "is given by inspiration of God, and is [therefore] profitable," etc. (A.V.), or, "Every scripture [seeing that it is] inspired of God is also profitable," etc. (R.V.). Inspiration, according to the apostle, is, therefore, the fundamental quality of the 15); and that, even when they are not ascribed to God in the original passages, but are spoken of or even addressed to him, and can be thought his only because they are part of the Scripture text (Matt. 19:5; Acts 4:24, 25; 13:34, 35; Heb. 1:6-10; 4:4, 7; 7:21; 10:30). While on the other hand the human writers of Scripture are said to have spoken "in" the Holy Spirit (Matt. 22:43; Mark 12:36, both R.V.), and are treated as merely the media through whom God the Holy Spirit speaks (Matt. 1:22; 2:15; Acts 1:16; 4:25; 28:25; Rom. 1:2). Accordingly, the very words of Scripture are accounted authoritative and "not to be broken" (John 10:34, 35; Gal. 3:16); its prophecies sure (John 19:36, 37; 20:9; Acts 1:16; II Peter 1:20); and its whole contents, historical as well as doctrinal and ethical, not only entirely trustworthy, but designedly framed for the spiritual profit of all ages (Rom. 4:23; 9:17; 15:14; I Cor. 9:10; 10:11; Gal. 3:8, 22; 4:30; II Tim. 3:16; I Peter 2:6; cf. II Chron. 17:9; Neh. 8:1). That the books of the N.T. are given to the Church as equally Scripture with those of the O.T., and share with them in all their divine qualities, is shown by the equal claim to authority which is made for them (I Cor. 7:40; 14:37; Gal. 1:8; II Thess. 3:4, 14); the similar representation of their authors as the organs of God (I Cor. 2:13, 16; 7:40; I Thess. 2:13; 4:2); and the inclusion of N.T. books along with those of the O.T. under the common sacred title of Scripture (I Tim. 5:18; II Peter 3:16).

B. B. W. (rev., H. S. G.)

In'stant and In'stant-ly. As an adjective or adverb, used in A.V., in the obsolete sense of earnest or steadfast (Luke 7:4; Acts 26:7; Rom. 12:12; II Tim. 4:2).

Iob (yōb), in A.V. Job. See JASHUB 1.

Iph·de'iah (if-dē'yá), in A.V. Iph'e-de'iah (if-ē-dē'yá) [Jehovah redeems]. A Benjamite, son of Shashak (I Chron. 8:25).

Iph'tah (if'tá), in A.V. Jiph'tah [he (God) opens or sets free]. A town of Judah (Josh. 15:43). Site unknown.

Iph'tah-el (if'tá-ēl), in A.V. Jiph'tah-el [God opens or sets free]. A valley on the boundary line between Zebulun and Asher (Josh. 19:14, 27). The name is perhaps found in Jotopata, the modern Tell Jefât, 9 miles n. by w. of Nazareth.

Ir (ir). See IRI.

I'ra (i'rá) [perhaps, watchful, but cf. Heb. 'ayyr, young ass]. 1. Priest or chief minister to David; a Jairite (II Sam. 20:26) or a man of Jattir (Syriac text and suggested by Lucian's).

2. One of David's mighty men, a Tekoite, son of Ikesh (II Sam. 23:26; I Chron. 11:28).

3. An Ithrite, one of David's mighty men (II Sam. 23:38; I Chron. 11:40).

I'rad (i'räd). A descendant of Cain (Gen. 4:17, 18).

I'ram (i'räm) [perhaps, watchful, aroused]. A chieftain of Edom (Gen. 36:43; I Chron. 1:54).

I'ri (i'ri) and probably Ir [perhaps, watchful, or, my watchman]. A Benjamite, family of Bela (I Chron. 7:7, 12).

I'ri'jah (i-ri'já) [Jehovah sees or provides]. A captain of the guard. During the temporary departure of the Chaldeans from the siege of Jerusalem, he arrested Jeremiah, who was going out at the gate of Benjamin, on the charge of attempting to desert to the enemy (Jer. 37:13).

Ir-na'hash (ir-nā'hāsh) [city of a serpent; probably originally, city of copper]. A town listed with the tribe of Judah (I Chron. 4:12). The marg. renders city of Nahash (cf. II Sam. 17:25). Ge-harashim (valley of craftsmen), in I Chron. 4:14, suggests that Ir-nahash means city of copper. If that valley be Wadi 'Arabah with its many copper and iron mining and smelting sites, it is probable that Ir-nahash is to be identified with the large Iron Age mining and smelting site of Khirbet Nahas (Copper Ruin), located near the n. end of Wadi 'Arabah.

I'ron, I. Tubal-cain, of the race of Cain, worked in brass and iron (Gen. 4:22). As early as the Mosaic period there were axes and other instruments of iron (Num. 35:16; Deut. 19:5 marg.). Og's bedstead was made of iron (Deut. 3:11). In the time of Joshua, vessels were made of the metal (Josh. 6:19, 24); and chariots of iron for war purposes were in use (Josh. 17:16), continuing through the period of the Judges, and on to later times (Judg. 1:19; 4:3, 13). Of iron were made armor and weapons, as spearheads and breastplates (I Sam. 17:7; Rev. 9:9); agricultural implements, as harrows and threshing instruments (II Sam. 12:31; Amos 1:3); builder's tools and nails (I Kings 6:7; I Chron. 22:3); graving tools (Job 19:24; Jer. 17:1); barbed irons for fishing (Job 41:7); gates, bars, fetters (Ps. 105:18; 107:10, 16; 149:8; Isa. 45:2; Acts 12:10); idols (Dan. 5:4). Iron was imported from Tarshish, Greece, and the n., doubtless from the vicinity of the Black Sea (Jer. 15:12; Ezek. 27:12, 19). It was obtainable in Palestine (Deut. 8:9), being abundant on the Lebanon mountains. According to available evidence, the first smelting of iron took place c. 1400 B.C., possibly in the Hittite highlands of Asia Minor. The ore was reduced in furnaces (Deut. 4:20; I Kings 8:51) which, to judge from those in use in Lebanon, were built of stone, about 10 feet in height and 3 in diameter. Charcoal was used in them, and the fire was blown by bellows (Ezek. 22:20; cf. Jer. 6:29). It would seem that the Philistines had learned the use of iron in the n. and closely guarded the methods of working it (I Sam. 13:19-22). It was only after Saul and David had broken the Philistine power that the metal came into common use in Israel. See SMITH, EZION-GEBER.

I'ron, II (i'rōn) [perhaps, possessing a view, conspicuous]. A fortified city of Naphtali (Josh. 19:38); probably the present village of Yārūn, 10 miles w. from the Lake of Hūleh.

I'rpe·el (ir-pē-ēl) [God heals]. A town of Benjamin (Josh. 18:27). Conder thinks it probably the village Rāfāt, 6½ miles n. by w. of Jerusalem.

I'r-she'mesh (ir-shē'mēsh) [city of the sun]. A town of Dan (Josh. 19:41), the same as Beth-shemesh.

I'ru (i'rō) [perhaps, watchful]. A son of the celebrated Caleb (I Chron. 4:15); probably to be read Ir, the -u being the Heb. conjunction and.

I'saac (i'zāk) [he (God) laughs; perhaps, may El (God) smile (favorably upon me in my distress); cf. Ras Shamra literature, where El laughs]. The son of Abraham and Sarah, born in the s. country, doubtless at Beer-sheba (Gen. 21:14, 31), when his father was 100 years old and his mother about 90 (chs. 17:17; 21:5). When the promise was made that Sarah should bear him a son, Abraham laughed questioningly (ch. 17:17-19). Later when Sarah heard the promise from the mouth of the stranger stopping at the camp, she laughed incredulously (ch. 18:9-15); and when the child was born she joyfully confessed that God had prepared laughter for her and her friends (ch. 21:6). To commemorate these events and the faithfulness of God, Abraham called the boy's name Isaac, "one laugheth" (v. 3). He was circumcised on the 8th day (v. 4); and being the child of promise and legal heir he had higher privileges than Ishmael, Abraham's son by the handmaid (chs. 17:19-21; 21:12; 25:5, 6). To exhibit and develop Abraham's faith, God commanded him to offer Isaac as a burnt offering. Isaac was then a youth (ch. 22:6), perhaps 25 years old, as Josephus says; but he filially acquiesced in the purpose of his father. When Abraham had laid him upon the altar, and thus shown his readiness to give all that he possessed to God, the angel of the Lord forbade the sacrifice and accepted a ram instead, thus testifying against child sacrifices, practiced by the Canaanites and many other idolatrous peoples, and teaching to all men that human sacrifices are an abomination to the Lord (ch. 22:1-18).

Isaac dwelt in the s. country, at Beer-lahai-roi (ch. 24:62). In disposition he was retiring and contemplative, affectionate also, and felt his mother's death deeply (vs. 63, 67). He married at the age of 40 years, but his 2 sons were not born until he was 60 (ch. 25:20, 26). Because of a famine he moved 50 miles n., to Gerar (ch. 26:1, 6). There Jehovah appeared to him, telling him not to go to Egypt and reaffirming the Abrahamic covenant (vs. 2-5). It had been the settled policy of Abraham, whenever he was in foreign parts (ch. 20:13), to represent Sarah as his sister; and Isaac, in similar peril at Gerar, likewise tried to pass off Rebekah as his sister, but without success (ch. 26:6-11; cf. ch. 12:10-20). Leaving Gerar, Isaac pitched his camp in the valley of Gerar (ch. 26:17), and opened again the wells that his father had dug. Thence he removed to Beer-sheba (Heb. bē'ēr-sheba'), which long remained his headquarters (chs. 26:23; 28:10). Jehovah appeared to him during the night and encouraged him; and he erected an altar, as his father had done (ch. 26:24, 25). Abimelech, the king of Gerar, visited him and entered into a treaty with him (vs. 26-31). This sworn agreement gave a new occasion for linking the memory of an oath with the name of the place; cf. Heb. sheba' (seven), shāba' (to swear), shēbū'āh (oath); Shibah (Heb. shib'āh) (ch. 26:33; cf. ch. 21:31).

Esau, the elder of Isaac's 2 sons, was his favorite, although God had declared that the elder should serve the younger. Jacob was Rebekah's favorite (ch. 25:28). When Isaac was much over 100 years old (cf. ch. 27:1 with chs. 25:26; 26:34), Rebekah and Jacob took advantage of his age and blindness. Thus deceived as to the identity of person, Isaac transferred the Abrahamic blessing to the younger son. Soon after, at the instigation of Rebekah, who wished to save Jacob from the murderous wrath of Esau, but feigned a different reason, Isaac sent Jacob to Laban in Paddan-aram to get a wife (chs. 27:46 to 28:5).

Some 20 years later Isaac was residing near Hebron, where he had sojourned in his father's later life (ch. 35:27; cf. ch. 23:2). There he died at the age of 180 years (ch. 35:28, 29), and was buried by his 2 sons beside his parents and his wife in the cave of Machpelah (ch. 49:30, 31). The N.T. alludes to Isaac as a child of promise (Gal. 4:22, 23), and cites his tent life and his blessing Esau and Jacob as evidences of his faith (Heb. 11:9, 20).

I-sa'iah (ī-zā'yá), in A.V. of N.T. E-sa'ias, the Gr. form [Jehovah has saved]. A prophet of Judah in the reigns of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah (Isa. 1:1; cf. chs. 6:1; 7:3; 14:28; 20:1, 2; 36 to 39). He was the son of Amoz, who must not be confounded with the Prophet Amos. He lived in Jerusalem, and prophesied concerning Judah and Jerusalem; his prophecies concerning Samaria, Damascus, Philistia and other nations being subordinate to those which directly concerned Jerusalem, and being introduced because of their relation to Zion and the people of God. It is now generally acknowledged that the vision which he saw in the year that King Uzziah died (ch. 6) marked his call to the prophetic office. By the year 734 B.C. Isaiah was a married man (Isa. 8:3), with a son named Shear-jashub, which means "A remnant shall return" (ch. 7:3, R.V. marg.). A 2d son was afterward born to him, whom by divine direction he called Maher-shalhash-baz, which means "The spoil speedeth, the prey hasteneth" (ch. 8:1, R.V. marg.). The names of both sons enshrine prophecies. Isaiah's wife is called a prophetess (ch. 8:3), probably merely because she was the wife of a prophet.

Isaiah spoke much on the relations of Israel, both as a church and as a body politic, to the world. In regard to political relations he urged king and people to put trust in Jehovah and avoid entangling alliances with earthly powers (ch. 8:12-14; etc.). In 734 B.C., when Syria and Israel joined forces in order to capture Jerusalem, and put an appointee of their own upon the throne, Isaiah declared Jehovah's purpose that the attempt should fail, and he vainly endeavored to persuade Ahaz to rely on Jehovah and not put confidence in heathen princes (ch. 7). Ahaz unwisely rejected this advice, called in Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, and became his vassal (II Kings 16:7-10); see TIGLATH-PILESER. Under Hezekiah the prophet's counsel was treated with more respect. The Assyrians invaded Judah in Hezekiah's 14th year, about 714 B.C. (II Kings 18:13; Isa. 36:1). Shortly afterward, in the same year, Hezekiah fell dangerously sick, and Isaiah foretold his recovery (II Kings 20:1-11). Then followed the embassy of Merodach-baladan, 712 B.C. (Isa., ch. 39; II Kings 20:12, 13), the conquest of Ashdod by Sargon's army, 711 B.C. (Isa., ch. 20), and the expeditions sent against Jerusalem by Sennacherib, 701 B.C. (II Kings 18:14). During the last-named crisis, Isaiah's prophecies and encouraging words nerved the government to refuse the Assyrian demands (II Kings 18:13 to 19:36).

The time and manner of Isaiah's death are not known with certainty. Hezekiah died c. 693 B.C. The murder of Sennacherib and accession of Esarhaddon, which occurred in 681 and 680, are recorded (Isa. 37:38). Doubtful Jewish tradition affirms that Isaiah was martyred by Manasseh, having been sawed asunder, and some have supposed that Heb. 11:37 alludes to the manner of his death. The date involved is not impossible, for Isaiah may have begun his ministry about or after 740 B.C., prophesied in the reigns of the 4 kings, Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, survived Hezekiah, and written his acts (II Chron. 32:32), heard of the murder of Sennacherib, and have suffered martyrdom in or after the 18th year of Manasseh, at the age of not more than 80 years. At any rate, in writing his history of Uzziah's reign (II Chron. 26:22), Isaiah probably used records and other authoritative sources for the earliest part of the reign.

The Book of Isaiah is divisible as follows:

I. Chs. 1 to 12, prophecies relating to the Kingdoms of Judah and Israel and belonging to various occasions from c. 740 to 701 B.C. 1. Introduction (ch. 1). 2. A prophecy against Jerusalem (chs. 2 to 4), with a continuation or closely related prophecy (ch. 5). The denunciation culminates in ch. 4 with the effect of the Judgment and a picture of the glory of Messianic times. This prophecy may have been delivered during the prosperous times of the joint reign of Uzziah and Jotham. 3. The vision of ch. 6, which stands in close relation to the Book of Immanuel (chs. 7 to 12).

II. Chs. 13 to 23, 10 burdens on the nations, divided by ch. 20, which is of international import, into 2 series of 5 burdens each.

III. Chs. 24 to 27. These chapters are intimately connected and present a vivid picture of a great judgment upon the whole world (ch. 24), and followed by Judah's triumph and blessedness (chs. 25 to 27).

IV. Chs. 28 to 33, a group of discourses dealing for the most part with the relation of Judah to Assyria. The earlier ones insist on the shortsightedness of revolting from Assyria and trusting to Egypt for aid; the latter foretell the trouble in which, through neglect of Isaiah's warnings, Judah and Jerusalem would be involved, and their subsequent deliverance.

V. Chs. 34; 35, the contrasted future of Edom and of Israel.

VI. Chs. 36 to 39, a historical section, differing (except for the addition of ch. 38:9-20) only verbally from II Kings 18:13, 17 to 20:19. This passage narrates certain important events in which Isaiah was concerned: 1. Sennacherib's double demand (chs. 36:2 seq.; 37:7 seq.) for the surrender of Jerusalem, Isaiah's prediction of its deliverance followed by fulfillment (chs. 36; 37). 2. Hezekiah's sickness, his prayer and cure, song of thanksgiving (ch. 38). 3. Embassy from Merodach-baladan, Isaiah's reproof of King Hezekiah, and prediction of spoliation by the Babylonians.

VII. The Book of Consolation (chs. 40 to 66), which treats of Israel's restoration from exile in Babylon. The prominent figure in these chapters is the servant of the Lord (see SERVANT OF JEHOVAH).

Some critics have attempted to treat chs. 1 to 35 according to a threefold scheme or pattern such as is found in The Book of Ezekiel and in the LXX of Jeremiah: 1. threats against the prophet's own people; 2. threats against foreign nations; 3. promises for his own people. The outlines of such a scheme may be discerned: chs. 1 to 12 contain threats against Judah and Jerusalem; chs. 13 to 23 (or 27), mainly threats against foreign nations; within chs. 24 (or 28) to 35, promises are found in chs. 33 to 35, but chs. 28 to 32 also contain many promises. It must be admitted, however, that this scheme is not so definite as it is in Ezekiel and in the LXX of Jeremiah, and it does not aid us in understanding the process of the formation of these chapters.

Critics differ a great deal in their views of the growth or formation of chs. 1 to 39, especially since they consider some passages as later than Isaiah's time, and they also make room for the work of redactors. Without endorsing the views of these scholars, it may be of interest to note that they doubt the genuineness of some of the passages of promise or of the ideal commonwealth (chs. 11:10-16; 14:1, 2; 29:16-24; 30:18-26; 32:1-8). It has been argued that the ideas of these sections correspond to a time subsequent to that of Isaiah. There is also dispute concerning ch. 2:2-4, which is parallel to Micah 4:1-4. It is not certain which prophet is the author, and both may have drawn from an anonymous source. While critics do not agree about ch. 9:1-6, the better works regard it as genuine; in the case of ch. 11:1-9 there is also considerable disagreement.

Critics have regarded the following as later additions to the work of Isaiah: chs. 13:2-22 (which they date shortly before 539 B.C.); 14:4b-21; 15; 16; 21:1-10; 24 to 27; 33 to 35. It should be borne in mind, however, that critics are far from unanimous in their opinions and that they differ greatly in their reasons and in the dates they assign to these passages.

The last 27 chapters of The Book of Isaiah have to be considered separately. The traditional view, which is still held by some scholars, ascribes them to Isaiah, but at the present time the great majority of even conservative critics ascribe them to Deutero-Isaiah, or chs. 40 to 55 to Deutero-Isaiah and chs. 56 to 66 to Trito-Isaiah.

In favor of unity of authorship, the following arguments have been presented: 1. There has not been shown a single word of known late date, nor a single foreign element which there is any reason to believe was not current in Jerusalem in the days of Isaiah. Every word, phrase, and form is found in earlier Hebrew literature or may be explained by the history of the times. As to the style being peculiar, change of style is consistent with unity of authorship. The style of Shakespeare changed. His literary activity lasted but 25 years, yet 4 distinct periods are discernible in his plays, marked by differences of style. The literary activity of Isaiah was continued through at least 40 years and perhaps 60. And is the style so peculiar after all? Those who deny the Isaianic authorship find it incumbent upon them to explain the similarity of style. 2. To the argument that the allusions, which are made in these chapters to the condition of Jews and Gentiles, reveal the time of the Exile, it is replied: (a) The prophets frequently transport themselves to the future and describe what they are predicting as already past; for instance, although Zebulun and Naphtali had been ravaged and their inhabitants carried into captivity, Isaiah says of them: "The people that walked in darkness have seen a great light" (ch. 9:2). (b) The explicit references to Babylon, the Exile, and the restoration are few. (c) Isaiah and his contemporary prophets were already living in anticipation of the Babylonian Exile. There is scarcely an event connected with the Exile, to which the author refers, but was known to the Israelites in the time of Isaiah. The prophets of the time predicted the destruction of Jerusalem and the Temple (Amos 2:5; Micah 3:12; Isa. 3:8; 6:11), the desolation of the land of Judah (Hos. 8:14; Amos 9:11, 14; Isa. 3:25, 26; 6:11, 12; 32:13), the captivity of the people of Judah (Isa. 11:12; Micah 1:14-16). This captivity was to be in Babylon (Isa. 39:6, 7; cf. ch. 11:11; Micah 4:10). There should be a return from exile (Joel 3:1; Isa. 11:11). Jerusalem and the Temple should be rebuilt (Micah 4:2; although the destruction of Jerusalem had been foretold, Micah 3:12; cf. Joel 3:16-20), and many people would come to Jerusalem to worship (Isa. 2:2-4; 11:10; 18:7; Micah 4:1-3). (d) The spiritual condition of the people, as exhibited in these chapters, is that of the time of Isaiah; idolatry under every green tree (Isa. 57:5; 1:29; II Kings 16:4) and among the oaks (Isa. 57:5; 1:29; Hos. 4:13) and in gardens (Isa. 65:3; 66:17; 1:29); the slaying of children in the valleys (Isa. 57:5; II Chron. 28:3; 33:6; II Kings 23:10); ascending a high mountain to offer sacrifice (Isa. 57:7; II Chron. 28:4; Hos. 4:13; cf. Ezek. 6:13); hypocrisy (Isa. 58:2-4; 29:13); Sabbath-breaking (Isa. 58:13; Amos 8:5; Jer. 17:19-27); bloodshed and violence (Isa. 59:3, 7; 1:15; Micah 7:2); falsehood, injustice, and oppression (Isa. 59:3, 4, 6, 7, 9; 5:7, 23; 10:1, 2; Micah 2:1, 2; 7:3); neglect of the Temple worship (Isa. 43:23, 24; II Chron. 28:24; 29:27; II Kings 15:4; II Chron. 27:2; II Kings 15:35). Burning incense upon bricks (Isa. 65:3) was appropriate to a worship derived from either Egypt, Assyria, or Babylonia, and was practiced in Jerusalem before the Exile (II Kings 23:12; Jer. 19:13). Swine's flesh was offered and eaten (Isa. 65:4) by the Egyptians on the festival of Selene and Dionysus (Herod. ii. 47, 48) and commonly enough by the Babylonians. 3. To the argument that the statements concerning the condition of the people agree with the historical facts, whereas those which relate to the future have fallen far short of fulfillment, it is replied that the assertion applies with equal force to the acknowledged writings of the Prophet Isaiah. He foretold the destruction of the cities, the utter desolation of the land, and the removal of the inhabitants far hence (Isa. 6:11, 12). This was fulfilled to the letter. But he prophesied also the flocking of the Gentiles to the standard of Jesse's son, the return of the captive people of God from all parts of the world, the drying up of rivers which were obstacles in the course of the march, a highway from Assyria for the remnant of the people, the wolf dwelling in peace with the lamb (Isa. 11:6-16; see also Amos 9:11-15; Micah 5:4; 7:12). These are the same predictions as those which in the latter portion of the book are pointed to as the extravagant utterances of an enthusiast and as having fallen short of fulfillment. Unless these numerous passages be excised, the acknowledged Isaiah, and often his contemporaries also, living 2 centuries before the fall of Babylon and the hopes which that event are supposed to have awakened, wrote in precisely the same manner as the author of the last section.

A special ground on which the denial of the genuineness of the last 27 chapters rests is the mention of Cyrus by name (ch. 44:28; 45:1; cf. also Ezra 1:1; II Chron. 36:22, 23). So also Josiah was foretold by name (I Kings 13:2). Unusual conditions obtained when Isaiah wrote these closing chapters. With the Exile impending, the faithful needed some special proof of the prophet's assurance of return. This assurance was in Cyrus. When Cyrus should actually arise, Israel would know that their redemption drew nigh. Calvin says that when Cyrus would be informed of the prediction of his name, it would make a profound impression upon him and induce him to permit the exiles to return to Palestine. If predictive prophecy is possible, if it was ever uttered by holy men taught by the Holy Spirit, then the name of Cyrus could have been penned by Isaiah. Otherwise the words, as they stand, were not uttered until nearly 200 years after Isaiah.

It has further been urged that these chapters are known only as a part of Isaiah and that it seems strange that the author of such noble literary and religious passages should have been forgotten. The fact that chs. 40 to 66 are joined to Isa., chs. 1 to 39, may point to a common authorship. The oldest literary witness (Ecclus. 48:24, 25) ascribes this section to Isaiah. It may also be said that the author of chs. 40 to 66 does not show the familiarity with the land or religion of Babylonia which we should expect from a man living among the exiles. This ignorance of detail shows that the prophet's standpoint among the captives is ideal rather than real. The Bible Commission of the Roman Catholic Church, June 29, 1908, was opposed to the critical-rationalistic exegetes and concluded that the philological argument is not convincing and that the prophet does not address the people in exile as contemporaries.

Fairness in scholarship, however, demands that the theories of divided authorship receive due consideration, especially since recent commentaries and books on O.T. Introduction generally recognize a Deutero-Isaiah (Second Isaiah) and in many cases a Trito-Isaiah (Third Isaiah).

Toward the close of the 11th century A.D. a Jewish commentator of Cordova in Spain, Moses ibn Chiquitilla, suggested that the 2d half of The Book of Isaiah (chs. 40 to 66) was the work of a prophet near the end of the Babylonian Exile. The Masoretes also felt that some important transition took place at ch. 40:1, since the verse begins with a capital nun (n). In 1782 Eichhorn came to the conclusion that chs. 40 to 66 were not written by Isaiah, but would have to be ascribed to a prophet of the 6th century. Döderlein had already, in 1775, begun a new book with ch. 40. Since that time the critical explanation has gained favor among O.T. scholars and is today the prevailing one.

A number of allusions in chs. 40 to 66 clearly indicate that the writer's apparent position is in the period of the Exile, and it seems reasonable to assume that such was also his actual position. Predictive prophecy must be admitted on various occasions, but a prophet to be understood must address himself to his contemporaries in the 1st instance. If Isaiah wrote these chapters, he transported himself about 200 years, or at the least 160 years, into the future, gathered around himself all the elements of a definite and complex historical situation, and forecast from it a future still more distant. If Isaiah is the author of this section, he ignored his contemporaries and alluded to circumstances of which they were not cognizant. The interpretation is simplified and seems more reasonable if a later authorship for these chapters is accepted.

The circumstances outlined in these chapters suggest a period of affliction. Jerusalem and the cities of Judah lie in ruins (chs. 44:26; 51:3; 52:9; 58:12; 61:4; 63:18; 64:9-11). The nation is subject to foreigners, is in captivity, and this state of affairs has been existing for some time (chs. 42:14, 22, 24, 25; 52:2-5; 58:12; 63:19). In the first 39 chs., the name of Assyria or Assyrian occurs about 40 times, but only once in the 2d half of the book (ch. 52:4), and then in connection with Egypt; in contrast Babylon comes to the front, whose rulers, the Chaldeans, are the oppressors (chs. 43:14; 47:1, 5; 48:14, 20). Cyrus the Persian, who destroyed the kingdom of the Medes (cf. ch. 41:25), will conquer Babylon (chs. 44:28; 45:1). In contrast to the predicted Babylonian Exile (ch. 39:5-7), the people will be delivered from oppression (ch. 52:2, 3) through the conquest of Babylon (chs. 43:14; 48:14); this takes place under a definite personality (chs. 41:2, 3, 25; 46:11; 48:14), whose name is Cyrus (chs. 44:28; 45:1). After the conquest of Babylon there follows a return through the wilderness (ch. 43:19-21), and Jerusalem and the Temple are rebuilt (chs. 44:26-28; 49:8; 51:3; 58:12; 60:10; 61:4). There is renewed prosperity of the nation (chs. 40:9-11; 41:27; 46:13; 66:22-24), which is typical of the future Messianic period.

Some critics think that the section chs. 40 to 55 consists of 2 parts: 1. Chs. 40 to 48, in which Cyrus is the central point of interest. 2. Chs. 49 to 55, in which we hear nothing of the Persian king and the capture of Babylon. Accordingly they would date the 1st section directly before or after the capture of Sippar in 539 B.C. and chs. 49 to 55, after the capture of Babylon in the same year, when Deutero-Isaiah was disappointed and the hope of immediate return was not realized. Others, however, assume that chs. 49 to 55 were written not merely after the edict for the Return, but actually in Palestine. Cyrus' edict for the return of the Jews to Palestine was issued from Ecbatana and not from Babylon. Yet it does not seem wise to make this division in chs. 40 to 55. The language is poetical, and we are hardly justified in drawing a line of demarcation between ch. 48 and ch. 49. The close of the section (ch. 55:8-13) seems to go back to the beginning (ch. 40:3-5), and this suggests that the section is a unit. The best that can be done is to date these chapters between c. 550, the rise of Cyrus, and 539, when Babylon fell into his hands. It cannot be determined where the author lived, but most probably he was among the exiles. There is no allusion to Deutero-Isaiah as a speaker, and it has been suggested that he wrote for an unseen public. Some scholars also see the work of a redactor in chs. 40 to 55. These suggestions, however, lie in the realm of conjecture. Within this section (chs. 40 to 55) fall the so-called Songs of the Servant of Jehovah: chs. 42:1-4(7); 49:1-6; 50:4-9; 52:13 to 53:12.

Even though there is a trend among critics to find a unity of authorship in chs. 40 to 55, the problem in Trito-Isaiah (chs. 56 to 66) is more complicated. While these scholars recognize the dependence of these latter chapters upon chs. 40 to 55, the question is whether they all hail from Trito-Isaiah or from several writers. It seems that chs. 60 to 62; 57:14-19; 66:6-16 show such a strong relationship that they must come from one poet, Trito-Isaiah. The problem, however, seems different in chs. 56:1-8; 58; 65; 66:5, 17-24, and likewise chs. 56:9 to 57:13 are regarded as not belonging to the imitator of Deutero-Isaiah; the same is asserted to be the case in chs. 59; 63:1 to 64:11; 66:1-4.

The language is poetical, and it is difficult to determine a date from internal evidence. Elissfeldt names 2 periods: the middle of the 5th century, the time of Malachi; or the last 3d of the 6th century, the time of Haggai and Zechariah; he gives decided preference to the latter period. Yet he doubts whether all the poems can be dated from that era. Thus he says that chs. 63:7 to 64:11 may be decades older and have been composed shortly after 587; ch. 57:7-13 may be older than 587, and likewise ch. 57:1-6. On the other hand, since foreign cults were practiced by the population remaining in Palestine, the latter passage may be later. Elissfeldt concludes that the passages of chs. 60 to 62; 57:14-19; 66:6-16, which were written by an imitator of Deutero-Isaiah, i.e., Trito-Isaiah, fit especially well into the time of Haggai and Zechariah and give us the background for their Messianic hopes. Critics have to admit, however, that their views are only possibilities, and they cannot answer how the poems in the collection of chs. 56 to 66 were combined. Those who argue for the unity of chs. 56 to 66 also have difficulties both in chronology and in the order of the contents. So critics find refuge in a redactor without being able to discover his principle of order. Driver, however, maintains that chs. 40 to 66 form a continuous prophecy dealing throughout with a common theme: Israel's restoration from exile in Babylon.

The question may be raised how these sections, chs. 40 to 55 and chs. 56 to 66, were appended to the work of Isaiah. One may propose a mechanical theory, that the anonymous sections were written on the same roll with Isaiah and thus finally joined to Isaiah. According to the Babylonian Talmud (Baba Bathra, 14b) this was the order of the prophets: Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Isaiah, the Twelve; and this may favor such a mechanical theory. On the other hand, it is more probable that chs. 40 to 55 were joined to chs. 1 to 35 (39) and chs. 56 to 66 joined to chs. 40 to 55; the similarity of style and subject matter would facilitate ascription to 1 author. Chs. 1 to 39 and chs. 40 to 66 have in common the experience of a heroic faith in God and, in consequence, a similarity of language (cf. the Holy One of Israel, chs. 1:4; 5:19, etc., with ch. 41:14, 16, 20, etc.). It has been assumed by some that Deutero-Isaiah (chs. 40 to 55) and the parts of chs. 56 to 66 which are based on his work were issued as a pseudepigraph under Isaiah's name, but this is all conjecture.

In 1928, C. C. Torrey maintained that there never was a time when chs. 40 to 66 formed a separate book. On the other hand, he holds that chs. 34; 35; 40 to 66 constitute a collection of 27 poems, which are the work of a single author, the Second Isaiah, who wrote in Palestine near the end of the 5th century B.C. His theory, however, requires him to delete ch. 44:28 as an interpolation; he also excises Babylon and Chaldeans in chs. 43:14; 48:14, 20. In ch. 45:1 he omits Cyrus as a probable interpolation, because it disturbs the meter in Hebrew. He believes that the second Temple was in existence at the time of the Second Isaiah and that the majority of his contemporaries were lukewarm in their faith. But the prophet had 3 supports for his confidence: Jehovah's omnipotence; Jehovah's choice of Israel as the servant of the Lord; the prophet's vision of the possibility, through divine help, of arousing the Jewish people and through them all mankind to a living faith and better life.

If anyone favors the views of a Deutero-

Isaiah and a Trito-Isaiah, he can hold that opinion without lowering his conception of Scripture. The ancient Hebrews did not make very much of authorship. The name Isaiah may be applied to the whole book in a general sense without implying that Isaiah is the author of all. The point that is most important is not who wrote all the parts of the book, but what are its contents? Does it have spiritual values? Does it reveal God's dealings with man? It should also be borne in mind that Deutero-Isaiah and Trito-Isaiah may have been divinely inspired just as much as Isaiah. The later writers in the book may have been pupils of Isaiah's thought and therefore have been identified ideally and spiritually with Isaiah. At any rate, there is a unity in The Book of Isaiah which cannot be overlooked.

Is'cah (is'ká). A daughter of Haran and sister of Milcah (Gen. 11:29), and consequently sister of Lot (v. 27). Iscah has been regarded as another name of Sarai (Jos. Antiq. i. 6, 5; Targum of Jonathan); but in that case Sarai would have been Abraham's niece and not his half-sister (Gen. 20:12).

Is-car'i-ot (is-kär'i-öt) [Gr., probably from Heb. man of Kerioth]. A designation of Judas the traitor (Matt. 10:4; Luke 6:16), which belonged to his father Simon before him (John 6:71; 13:26, R.V.). It was used to distinguish him from the other apostle called Judas (Luke 6:16; Acts 1:13, 16). It seems to mean that Judas was a native of Kerioth in the s. of Judah (Josh. 15:25); some favor Koreae, on the n.e. border of Judea (Jos. Antiq. xiv. 3, 4; War i. 6, 5). In the Codex Bezae the word is written apo Karyōtōu everywhere in the Fourth Gospel, and is so written in John 6:71 in Codex Sinaiticus. Accordingly Judas was probably a Judean. Thus he would be the only apostle from Judea, for the rest were Galileans.

Ish'bah (ish'bá) [he praises, or may he (God) be calm, allay (his wrath)]. A man of Judah, ancestor or head of the inhabitants of Eshtemoa (I Chron. 4:17).

Ish'bak (ish'bāk) [he leaves behind; cf. Aram. shebak, to leave behind; or he outruns; cf. Arab. sabaka, to precede, outstrip, overtake]. An Arab tribe descended from Abraham through Keturah (Gen. 25:2).

Ish'bi-be'nob (ish'bi-bē'nōb). A Philistine giant who was on the point of killing David, but was himself slain by Abishai (II Sam. 21:16, 17). There is a textual difficulty in this name. The kethib has, "And they abode [or tarried] in Nob" (perhaps for Gob, v. 18), but by that interpretation the name of the giant is lost.

Ish'-bo'sheth (ish'bō'shēth) [man of shame]. One of Saul's younger sons, originally called Esh-baal (the Lord's man, or man of Baal), which was changed to Ish-bosheth, either during his lifetime when the glory of his house departed, or rather in later times when the name Baal fell into disrepute through its idolatrous associations (cf. II Sam. 2:8 with I Chron. 8:33; 9:39). He was not present at the battle of Gilboa; or, if present, he escaped the slaughter on that disastrous day. On the death of Saul, David obtained the sovereignty over Judah, but the other tribes refused him allegiance and proclaimed Ish-bosheth king as successor to his father Saul. Ish-bosheth was then aged about 40, and reigned 2 troubled years (II Sam. 2:8-10). His capital was at Mahanaim, e. of the Jordan (ch. 2:8, 12). He was unsuccessful in the war which he waged with David to secure the undisputed sway over the 12 tribes (chs. 2:12 to 3:1). He brought a serious charge against his main supporter, Abner, who thereupon offered his services to David and, on David's making demand on Ish-bosheth, conducted David's wife Michal back to him (ch. 3:6-21). When Abner was murdered at Hebron, Ish-bosheth lost heart (ch. 3:27; 4:1). He was soon afterward assassinated and his head carried in triumph to David. But by David's order the severed head was honorably interred in Abner's tomb at Hebron, and the assassins were put to death for their crime (ch. 4:5-12). With the death of Ish-bosheth the dynasty of Saul came to an end, although a grandson of Saul's remained (ch. 4:4).

Ish'hod' (ish'hōd'), in A.V. I'shod [man of majesty]. A Manassite whose mother was Hammeleketh (I Chron. 7:18).

Ish'i, I (ish'ī) [Heb. 'ishī, my husband]. A name by which the Israelites call Jehovah, when they return to their allegiance. It supercedes the synonymous one Baal (my lord or husband), since the word Baal had come into ill repute because it suggested a heathen god or an identification of Jehovah with Baal (Hos. 2:16, 17).

Ish'i, II (ish'ī) [Heb. yish'i, saving, salutary]. 1. A man of Judah, son of Appaim, house of Jerahmeel (I Chron. 2:31).

2. A man of Judah, father of Zoheth (I Chron. 4:20).

3. A Simeonite whose sons led a band which overcame the Amalekites of Mount Seir and seized on their settlements (I Chron. 4:42).

4. Head of a father's house of the half tribe of Manasseh e. of the Jordan (I Chron. 5:24).

I-shi'ah (i-shī'ā). See ISSHIAH.

I-shi'jah (i-shī'jā). See ISSHIJAH.

Ish'ma (ish'mā) [perhaps contraction of Ishmael]. A man of Judah, descended from Hur (I Chron. 4:3, 4).

Ish'ma-el (ish'mā-ēl) [God hears]. 1. The son of Abraham by Hagar the Egyptian maid; born when Abraham was 86 years old, after he had been 10 full years in Canaan (Gen. 16:3, 15; cf. ch. 12:4). He was the child of worldly wisdom, not of faith; he was born of parents who, in the face of God's promise, were blinded by seeming impossibilities and sought by earthly means to enable God to fulfill his engagements. When the rite of circumcision was instituted for the family of Abraham, Ishmael, then 13 years of age, was circumcised (ch. 17:25). The next year Isaac was born, when his mother was past age, the child of promise, a rebuke to unbelief (ch. 21:5). At his weaning, the customary feast was made, when Ishmael was seen to be mocking. This was the first occasion in the family of Abraham that those born after the flesh in doubt of God's way mocked at the heirs of promise; and Paul seizes upon the allegory in the incident (Gal. 4:22-31). This misbehavior of Ishmael led to the expulsion of him and his mother. They wandered in the wilderness of Beer-sheba till both were nearly perishing with thirst. The angel of the Lord directed Hagar to some water among the shrubs, and the life of herself and her son was preserved. Ishmael grew up in the wilderness of Paran, s. of Canaan, where he lived by his bow. Eventually he married a wife from Egypt, his mother's ancestral home (Gen. 21:3-21). In fulfillment of a promise made by God to Abraham, Ishmael became the progenitor of 12 princes (chs. 17:20; 25:12-16); see ISHMAELITE. He had also a daughter, who was married to Esau (ch. 28:9; 36:10). Ishmael took part with Isaac in burying their father Abraham (ch. 25:9). He himself died at the age of 137 (ch. 25:17).

2. A descendant of Jonathan (I Chron. 8:38; 9:44).

3. A man of Judah, father of the high judicial functionary Zebadiah (II Chron. 19:11).

4. A son of Jehohanan. He took part in the successful conspiracy against Athaliah (II Chron. 23:1).

5. A son of Nethaniah, who belonged to the seed royal of Judah. When Nebuchadnezzar departed from Palestine, after the capture of Jerusalem, he left behind him as governor of Judah a certain Jew called Gedaliah, who promised protection to any of the conquered people who placed themselves under his rule. Among others Ishmael came, but with hostile intent. Instigated by the king of the Ammonites, he assassinated Gedaliah, massacring at the same time the people with him. After further murders he carried off captives, including the king's daughters, and finally attempted to make his way to the Ammonite country. Johanan, son of Kareah, and others went forth to fight with him. They found him at Gibeon. His captives turned to Johanan, but he himself succeeded in escaping with 8 men to the king of Ammon, who had instigated his crimes (II Kings 25:25; Jer. 40:7-16; 41:1-18).

6. A son of Pashhur, who was induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:22).

Ish'ma-el-ite (ish'mā-ēl-ī), in A.V. often Ish'meel-ite, an orthography true to the Hebrew. A descendant of Ishmael. The Ishmaelites had Egyptian blood, as well as the blood of Abraham, in their veins. Twelve princes sprang from Ishmael (Gen. 17:20; 25:12-16). He may have had more sons, and possibly some of those enumerated were grandsons. Twelve was an approved number and was carefully preserved as the number of the tribes of Israel. The Ishmaelites in their twelvefold division dwelt in settlements and in movable camps in the desert of n. Arabia, in the region included between Havilah, Egypt, and the Euphrates (Gen. 25:18; Jos. Antiq. i. 12, 4). Occasionally 1 of their tribes acquired permanent residence and civilization, as the Nabateans; but they mostly possessed the character of their ancestor and dwelt like "a wild ass" of the desert (Gen. 16:12). Like Ishmael, too, they were celebrated for their skill with the bow (Isa. 21:17). To Ishmaelites traveling as carriers between Gilead and Egypt, or, more definitely, to "certain Midianites, merchants," in the caravan, Joseph was sold by his brethren (Gen. 37:25-28). In Ps. 83:6 they are mentioned with Edomites, Moabites, and Hagarenes.

In a wider sense, the nomadic tribes of n. Arabia generally; either because the Ishmaelites were the chief people of the desert, and their name came to be used as a synonym for any nomad of the region, or because an Ishmaelite confederacy had been formed which included tribes of other blood (Judg. 8:24; cf. chs. 7:25; 8:22, 26; Judith 2:23). All the Arabs, after the example of Mohammed, claim descent from Ishmael.

Ish'ma'lah (ish-mā'yā), in A.V. once Is'ma'lah (I Chron. 12:4) [Jehovah hears]. 1. A Gibeonite who joined David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:4).

2. Son of Obadiah and head in David's reign of the Zebulunites (I Chron. 27:19).

Ish'me-el-ite (ish'mē-ēl-ī). See ISHMAELITE.

Ish'me-rai (ish-mē-rī) [Jehovah keeps]. A Benjamin, son of Elpaal (I Chron. 8:18).

I'shod (i'shōd). See ISSHOD.

Ish'pah (ish'pá), in A.V. Is'pah [cf. Heb. shapháh, to sweep or lay bare, bald]. A Benjamite, son of Beriah (I Chron. 8:16).

Ish'pan (ish'pán). A Benjamite, son of Shashak (I Chron. 8:22).

Ish'tob (ish'tób) [men of Tob]. See Tob.

Ish'u-ah (ish'û-á). See ISHVAH.

Ish'ui-ai (ish'û-i) and Ish'ui-i (ish'û-i). See ISHVI.

Ish'vah (ish'vá), in A.V. Ish'u-ah and Is'u-ah [probably, he is equal (of birth) or worthy]. The 2d son of Asher (Gen. 46:17; I Chron. 7:30). He probably died childless; or, if he had descendants, they did not constitute a tribal family or perpetuate his name (cf. Num. 26:44).

Ish'vi (ish'vî), in A.V. Ish'ui-ai, Ish'ui-i, and Jes'ui-i [probably for Heb. yishyô = yishyâhu, man of Jehovah, a change from Esh-baal; but cf. Ishvah]. 1. The 3d son of Asher, and founder of a tribal family (Gen. 46:17; Num. 26:44; I Chron. 7:30).
2. A son of Saul (I Sam. 14:49).

Isle, Is'land. The rendering of Heb. î, meaning: 1. Habitable land, as opposed to water (Isa. 42:15). 2. An island in the ordinary sense of the word (Jer. 47:4). 3. A maritime country, even when constituting part of a continent; the coast land of Palestine and Phoenicia (Isa. 20:6, in R.V. coast land; cf. ch. 23:2, 6), and the coasts and islands of Asia Minor and Greece (Gen. 10:5). 4. The remotest regions of the earth and their inhabitants (Isa. 41:5; Zeph. 2:11). This employment of the term may have arisen: (a) By synecdoche, the isles of the Mediterranean being remote and scarcely known. (b) From the current belief that the world was surrounded with water, so that the most distant region was the coast land of the world ocean.

Is'ma-chi'ah (is'má-k'á) [Jehovah supports]. An overseer connected with the Temple in Hezekiah's reign (II Chron. 31:13).

Is'ma'iah (is-má'yá). See ISHMAIAH.

Is'pah (is'pá). See ISHPAH.

Is-ra-el (iz'râ-él) [popularly, he strives with God; but rather, God strives or let God rule (or God rules)]. 1. The name given to Jacob when he was returning from Mesopotamia and just about to cross the brook Jabbok, where he expected to meet Esau (Gen. 32:22-32); see JACOB.

2. The whole body of the descendants of Jacob at any one time. This use of the word began in his own lifetime (Gen. 34:7). It was common during the wilderness wanderings (Ex. 32:4; Deut. 4:1; 27:9), though the designation Children of Israel was yet more frequent both during this and the former period. Down to the death of Saul, Israel and the Children of Israel, when used as a national designation, comprehended the Hebrews generally, without distinction of tribes. There were, however, geographical and other causes already at work which tended to separate Judah from the rest of Israel; and the distinction had come to be recognized before the actual division of the people into 2 kingdoms took place (I Sam. 11:8; 17:52; 18:16); see JUDAH. It was used also under the united monarchy (I Kings 11:42). In the parallelism of Hebrew poetry it often corresponds in the 2d line of the couplet to Jacob in the 1st (Num. 23:7, 10, 21; 24:5; Ps. 14:7). After the Exile the reference is frequently to the people of the various tribes who returned to Jerusalem (Ezra 9:1; 10:5; Neh. 9:2; 11:3).

3. The tribes which acted independently of Judah. The split of the Hebrew people into 2 kingdoms occurred on the death of Saul. The n. and e. tribes recognized Saul's son Ish-bosheth as king, and the tribe of Judah followed David. From this time onward Israel is frequently used to denote the 10 tribes. Ish-bosheth reigned 2 years and was assassinated, but 7 years elapsed before the breach was healed and David was anointed king of all Israel (II Sam. 2:10, 11; 5:1-5). The jealousies, however, remained, and on the death of Solomon the rupture became final. Ten tribes followed Jeroboam and one cleaved to the house of David. The 10 tribes which were rent from the house of David were Reuben, Gad, and half Manasseh e. of the Jordan, and w. of the river half Manasseh, Ephraim, Issachar, Zebulun, Naphtali, Asher, Dan, and lastly Benjamin, which belonged in part to the Northern Kingdom, Beth-el, Gilgal, and Jericho, chief places in the tribe of Benjamin, being within the bounds of the Northern Kingdom.

The causes which led to the schism were:
1. The isolation of Judah caused by nature.
2. The ancient jealousy between the 2 powerful tribes of Ephraim and Judah. It had caused a temporary disruption of the kingdom after Saul's death; it broke out again after the defeat of Absalom because Judah was the first to welcome the king back (II Sam. 19:15, 40-43). It had been freshly provoked by Solomon's lavish adornment of Jerusalem, and at his death resulted in permanent separation.
3. Discontent caused by the excessive luxury of the throne. The people were groaning under oppressive burdens. Solomon's love of splendor had led to taxation to support his enormous household and maintain his display, and to enforcement of labor to carry out his great works (I Kings 4:22, 23, 26; 5:13-16). The reasonable request of the people for relief was perversely refused by Rehoboam.
4. Idolatry, fostered by foreign marriages (I Kings 11:1-13). A subtle corruption spread through all ranks owing to the encouragement given to false religions, attachment to the worship of Jehovah was weakened, and one great unifying force was destroyed.
5. The folly of Rehoboam in refusing the request of the people for relief intensified the disintegrating forces and precipitated the catastrophe (I Kings 12:3-5, 12-16).

As compared with Judah in respect to strength the Northern Kingdom had 10 tribes, twice the population, and nearly 3 times the extent of territory. But it was more exposed to war and less easy of defense than Judah. It was the apostate nation, and defection from God is weakness and inevitably undermines the stability of a state. It had an inferior religion with its lower moral tone, and many of its best spirits forsook it; the priests and Levites migrated into Judah (II Chron. 11:13, 14).

The capital of the Northern Kingdom was at Shechem at first. It was soon removed to Tirzah, and then Omri founded Samaria and transferred the seat of government to the new city (I Kings 12:25; 14:17; 15:21; 16:23, 24).

Jeroboam, the 1st king, was afraid that if his people visited Jerusalem for worship, they would be won over to their old allegiance; he therefore established 2 shrines, one at Dan in the extreme n., and the other at Beth-el, in the s. of the kingdom. At each of these places he erected a golden calf, which he designed as an aid to the worship of Jehovah. Judgment was threatened against him and his race for this partial apostasy, and after his son, Nadab, had reigned 2 years, the dynasty was swept away. Nineteen kings in all sat upon the throne. See CHRONOLOGY, IV. Their united reigns covered a period of about 210 years; 7 of them reigned but 2 years or less: 8 were slain or committed suicide and the throne was transferred to another family, and in only 2 instances was the royal power held by as many as 4 members of the same family in succession. None of the kings removed the calves from Beth-el and Dan; indeed, under Ahab, who was influenced by his wicked heathen wife, Jezebel, the apostasy was rendered complete by the introduction of the worship of Baal instead of Jehovah. But God raised up prophets who contended steadfastly for the worship of Jehovah, at whatever risk to themselves. The most notable were Elijah and Elisha (q.v.). After the suppression of Baal worship, other prophets, especially Hosea and Amos, labored for the reformation of the moral life of the nation.

The n. Israelites were frequently at war with Judah. Indeed, the 2 kingdoms were in hearty alliance only while the house of Omri held the throne of Israel, when the royal families of Israel and Judah were united by intermarriage. When the Syrian kingdom of Damascus rose to power, it necessarily affected the politics of the adjacent Kingdom of Israel. Often the 2 were at war. They united, however, in making common cause against the Assyrians in the days of Ahab; and 120 years later they were again in alliance, their common object being the capture of Jerusalem. It was this danger that led Ahaz, king of Judah, terrified for his throne and life, and having no faith in Jehovah, to act contrary to the exhortations of Isaiah and to call in Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, at the price of independence. Judah became tributary to Assyria, and its king did homage to the Assyrian monarch at Damascus (II Kings 16:8-10). Tiglath-pileser relieved Judah of the invaders, ravaged northern Israel, struck a blow at the Philistines, besieged and ultimately captured Damascus and slew Rezin, deported Naphtali and the Israelites from the country e. of the Jordan, connived at the death of Pekah or actually ordered it, and placed Hoshea on the throne c. 730 B.C. Hoshea rebelled against Assyria after Tiglath-pileser's death. The Assyrian armies returned. In 722 (721) Samaria fell and a large number of the inhabitants were carried off to Assyria. See CAPTIVITY, I and SARGON. The place of the deported Israelites was supplied by colonists from 5 districts in the Assyrian empire, who, mingling with the remaining Israelite population of central Palestine, laid the foundations of what afterward became the Samaritan nation.

The captivity of Israel was a punishment because the people had sinned against the Lord their God and had feared other gods, walking in the statutes of the nations and of the kings of Israel (II Kings 17:7, 8). They were apostate. They had broken the covenant (II Kings 17:15; cf. Ex., chs. 20 to 22; Hos. 6:7; 8:1), rejecting the statutes of the Lord. Their apostasy had manifested itself in 2 directions: they walked in the statutes of the nations whom the Lord cast out (II Kings 17:8, 15, 17; cf. Hos. 2:13; 4:2, 11, 15; Amos 2:6-9), and they walked in the statutes of the kings of Israel, especially in the matter of the calf worship and its attendant ceremonies and ordinances, and in the general idolatry that followed in its train (II Kings 17:8, 16; Hos. 8:4-6; 10:5, 8; 13:2-4). They had sinned despite the fact that the Lord had testified unto them by prophets and by mighty acts (II Kings 17:13; Hos. 12:10; Amos 2:9-11; 4:6-13). Their sin issued in separation and degradation and paved the way for punishment. They separated from Judah and thus weakened were overthrown. Their idolatry, drunkenness, and licentiousness weakened the manhood of the nation, deprived it of sturdiness, and made its soldiery no better in character and moral purpose than the warriors of Egypt, Assyria, and Babylonia.

Is'ra-el-ite (iz'ri-äl-it). A descendant of Israel, i.e., of Jacob (Ex. 9:7); and consequently, by implication, the possessor of true religious knowledge, a faithful servant of Jehovah, and an heir of the promises (John 1:47; Rom. 9:4-13; II Cor. 11:22).

Is'sa-char (is'a-kär) [there is hire, or man of hire; or perhaps he (God or the child) causes to have or procures hire]. 1. The 9th son of Jacob, the 5th by Leah (Gen. 30:17, 18; 35:23). His sons were Tola, Phuvah or Pua, Job or Jashub, and Shimron (Gen. 46:13; Num. 26:23, 24; I Chron. 7:1). With them he went down with Jacob into Egypt (Gen. 46:13; Ex. 1:3). Jacob, shortly before death, with keen and prophetic insight into character, described Issachar and his children as a strong ass, couching down between the sheepfolds, who submits to the burdens imposed by foreign masters, provided they permit him to remain in his pleasant land (Gen. 49:14, 15).

The descendants of Issachar formed a tribe, consisting of 5 great tribal families, the posterity of his 5 sons (Num. 26:23, 24). Its prince in the early period of the wanderings was Nethanel, son of Zuar (Num. 1:8; 2:5; 7:18; 10:15), and at a later period Paltiel, son of Azzan (ch. 34:26). At the 1st census in the wilderness it numbered 54,400 fighting men (ch. 1:28, 29); at the 2d 64,300 (ch. 26:25); while in David's reign it reached 87,000 (I Chron. 7:5). Igal, son of Joseph, was the spy from the tribe (Num. 13:7). The men of Issachar were among those who stood on Mount Gerizim to bless the people (Deut. 27:12). Moses, in predicting the future of the tribes, foretold Issachar's joyous and quiet life (ch. 33:18). One of the judges, Tola, belonged to the tribe of Issachar (Judg. 10:1); so did King Baasha (I Kings 15:27). The princes of Issachar had the political insight to discern the fit moment for turning from Saul's family and accepting David as the king of all Israel (I Chron. 12:32). About that time Omri, son of Michael, was head of the tribe (ch. 27:18). Many men of Issachar, although they belonged to the Northern Kingdom, attended Hezekiah's passover (II Chron. 30:18). In the apocalyptic vision 12,000 of the tribe of Issachar were sealed (Rev. 7:7), this being the normal number.

When the Land of Canaan was distributed by lot, the 4th lot taken after the Ark was removed to Shiloh came forth for the tribe of Issachar. Its territory was bounded on the n. by Zebulun and Naphtali, on the e. by the Jordan, on the s. and w. by Manasseh and probably Asher. Jezreel and Shunem lay within its limits, while Chesulloth and Mount Tabor were on its n. border, and En-gannim near the s. line (Josh. 19:17-23); but towns within it were held by Manasseh (ch. 17:10, 11) and others by the Gershonite Levites (Josh. 21:6, 28, 29; I Chron. 6:62-72). The tribe of Issachar occupied the greater part of the plain of Jezreel, or Esdraelon, constituting the low, level, and fertile plain of the Kishon. The character of their territory combined with the tribal traits explains why the people of Issachar, in accordance with Jacob's prophecy, were so ready to submit to servitude. They had much to lose, and lived on ground well adapted for the action of the war chariots of their enemies, while the tribes located among the mountains could not so readily be attacked in this manner. That the people of Issachar were not exceptionally cowardly is plain from their conduct in the battle with Sisera, which elicited the commendation of Deborah (Judg. 5:15).

2. A Levite, appointed doorkeeper in David's reign (I Chron. 26:5).

Is'shi'ah (is'shī'ā), in A.V. once I-shi'ah (I Chron. 7:3) and twice Jes'iah (I Chron. 12:6; 23:20) [Jehovah forgets (cf. Jer. 23:39)]. 1. A man of Issachar, family of Tola (I Chron. 7:3).

2. One of those who came to David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:6).

3. A Levite, descended from Moses, and head of the house of Rehabiah (I Chron. 24:21; cf. ch. 23:14-17).

4. A Levite, family of Kohath, house of Uzziel (I Chron. 23:20; 24:25).

Is'shi'jah (is-shī'jā), in A.V. I-shi'jah [Jehovah forgets]. A son of Harim, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:31).

Is'sue. A man's disease, probably blennorrhea or perhaps gonorrhea (Lev. 15:2-15; cf. Jos. War v. 5, 6; vi. 9, 3). An issue of blood is a female complaint (Lev. 15:25-30; Matt. 9:20).

Is'uah (is'ū-ā). See ISHVAH.

Is'ui (is'ū-i). See ISHVI.

It'aly (it'ā-lī). A geographical name which, in the 5th century B.C., meant only a small district in the extreme s. of what is now called Italy; but which gradually extended its significance, till in the 1st century of the Christian era it began to be used in the same sense as we now attach to the word. In the days of the apostles Italy, and, indeed, the greater part of the civilized world, was ruled from Rome (q.v.). A cohort called the Italian was stationed in Syria (Acts 10:1). Aquila and Priscilla, who were of Jewish descent, resided for a time in Italy (ch. 18:2). Paul's appeal to Caesar involved his sailing into Italy (ch. 27:1, 6), and his ship coasted along Italy from Rhegium to Puteoli (ch. 28:13-16). The salutation in The Epistle to the Hebrews, "They of Italy salute you" (Heb. 13:24), indicates the presence of Christians, not only in Rome, but in other parts of the country (cf. Acts 28:14).

It'ai (it'ā-i). See ITTAI 1.

It'h'amar (it'h'ā-mār) [ety. uncertain; perhaps, palm-coast]. The youngest son of Aaron (Ex. 6:23; I Chron. 6:3; 24:1). With his father and his 3 elder brothers he was consecrated to the priestly office (Ex. 28:1; I Chron. 24:2). Upon him devolved the duty of enumerating the materials gathered for the tabernacle (Ex. 38:21). The Gershonites and the Merarites acted under his superintendence (Num. 4:21-33). He founded a priestly family (I Chron. 24:4, 5, 6), which continued after the Captivity (Ezra 8:2). To this family belonged Eli and his descendants, who held the office of high priest for several generations. See HIGH PRIEST.

It'h'el (it'h'ēl) [perhaps, God is with me]. 1. One of the 2 persons to whom Agur addressed his prophecy (Prov. 30:1); but see R.V. marg. for another interpretation.

2. A Benjamite, son of Jesaiah (Neh. 11:7).

It'h'ah (it'h'ā), in A.V. Jeth'ah [a hanging or lofty place]. A town of Dan (Josh. 19:42), identified by Conder with Beit Thul (Beithül), about 3 miles e. of Yalo (Aijalon).

It'h'mah (it'h'mā) [bereavement, orphanhood]. A Moabite, one of the valiant men of David's army (I Chron. 11:46).

It'h'nan (it'h'nān) [perhaps, perennial]. A town in the extreme s. of Judah (Josh. 15:23), el-Jebariyeh on the wadi Umm Ethnan.

It'h'ra (it'h'rā) [abundance, excellence]. An Israelite, or rather Ishmaelite, who married Abigail, David's sister, and became the father of Amasa (II Sam. 17:25; I Kings 2:5, 32; I Chron. 2:17). In the last 3 passages he is called Jether.

It'h'ran (it'h'rān) [abundance, excellence]. 1. A Horite, son of Dishon (Gen. 36:26; I Chron. 1:41).

2. An Asherite, son of Zophah (I Chron. 7:37); apparently the same as Jether (v. 38).

It'h're'am (it'h'rē-ām) [the (divine) kinsman has been liberal, or is abundance]. The 6th son born to David at Hebron. His mother was Eglah (II Sam. 3:5; I Chron. 3:3).

It'h'rite (it'h'rit). A family who dwelt at Kiriath-jearim (I Chron. 2:53). Two of David's mighty men were Ithrites (II Sam. 23:38; I Chron. 11:40). The word is derivable from Jether or from Jattir.

It'tah-ka'zin (it'ā-kā'zīn). See ETH-KAZIN.

It'tai (it'ā-i) [perhaps, with me (is Jehovah)]. 1. A son of Ribai, from Gibeah of Benjamin. He was one of David's mighty men (II Sam. 23:29). Called in I Chron. 11:31, Ittai.

2. An inhabitant of Gath, the commander of 600 men, who followed David from that Philistine city. He was faithful to the king through all his vicissitudes, and led a 3d part of the royal army in the battle which resulted in the death of Absalom (II Sam. 15:18-22; 18:2, 5).

It'uraea (it'ū-rē-ā) [pertaining to Jetur]. A region occupied by a people called Jetur, who were descended from Ishmael (Gen. 25:15; I Chron. 1:31). The tribe of Jetur was at war with the Israelitish tribes e. of the Jordan (I Chron. 5:19). In Hasmonaean times Aristobolus conquered a portion of Ituraea and, annexing it to Judea, compelled the vanquished inhabitants to adopt the rite of circumcision (Jos. Antiq. xiii. 11, 3). It was a mountainous country, including part of Anti-Lebanon. Its prince, Ptolemy, son of Mennaeus, had territory in Coelesyria, with Chalcis as stronghold, and proved a bad neighbor to Damascus (Strabo xvi. 2, 18, 20; Jos. Antiq. xiii. 16, 3). In 66 B.C. he purchased immunity from Pompey (Jos. Antiq. xiv. 3, 2). His son Lysanias was put to death by Antony (Jos. Antiq. xv. 4, 1), and the country was farmed to Zenodorus (Jos. Antiq. xv. 10, 1; for Zenodorus' domain cf. also 2 and 3). Part of Ituraea and Trachonitis constituted the tetrarchy of Philip (Luke 3:1). Josephus enumerates the constituent parts of Philip's tetrarchy differently, and he is not careful always to enumerate in one and the same way (Jos. Antiq. xvii. 8, 1; 11, 4, where part of the house of Zenodorus is included; xviii. 4, 6; War ii. 6, 3).

I'vah (i'vā). See IVVAH.

I'vo-ry. A substance derived from the tusk of the elephant, or of the hippopotamus, the walrus, and other animals. In Heb. it is called shēn, tooth, or shenhabbim, a compound word in which habbim probably denotes elephants. It is first mentioned in the Bible as having been brought from abroad by Solomon's ships (I Kings 10:22; II Chron. 9:21). It seems to have come from India, and was made into a throne for the king (I Kings 10:18). Afterward, when luxury had established itself to a larger extent in Jerusalem, beds (Amos 6:4) and even houses were made or overlaid with the precious material (I Kings 22:39; Amos 3:15; Ps. 45:8). The Tyrians inlaid benches for rowers with it (Ezek. 27:6). Ethiopia also supplied ivory to the ancient world (Herod. iii. 97, 114).

Iv'vah (i'vā), in A.V. I'vah. A city which the representative of Sennacherib could boast that the Assyrians had captured (II Kings 18:34; 19:13; Isa. 37:13). It is probably the same as Avva (q.v.).

I'ye-ab'arim (i'yē-āb'ā-rim), in A.V. I'je-ab'arim [ruins of Abarim]. A halting place of the Israelites in the wilderness, on the border of Moab (Num. 21:11; 33:44). In v. 45 the place is called simply Iyim, in A.V. Iim, because the context sufficiently defined the locality to be in Abarim. See IM 1.

I'yar (ē'yār) [Heb. 'iyyār, from Akkad. ayaru, a-a-ru, āru, blossom, offspring, from root meaning to go forth]. Same as Ziv (Zif), the 2d month of the year.

I'yim (i'yim). See IYE-ABARIM.

Iz'har, I (iz'hār), in A.V. once Iz'e'har (Num. 3:19) [probably Heb. Yishār, (the deity) shines, or let (the deity) shine]. A Levite, son of Kohath, and founder of a tribal family (Ex. 6:18, 19; Num. 3:19, 27; I Chron. 6:18, 38). From him descended the rebel Korah (Num. 16:1).

Iz'har, II (iz'hār), in A.V. Je-zo'ar [Heb. Yishār; cf. Arab. ṣaḥrā, fawn-colored, reddish-white]. A man of Judah, family of Hezron, son of Ashhur (I Chron. 4:5-7). The kere wəṣṣōḥar means "and Zohar" (q.v.).

Iz-li'ah (iz-li'ā), in A.V. Jez-li'ah [cf. Arab. yazaliy, unceasing, eternal]. A Benjamite, son of Elpaal and descended from Shaharaim (I Chron. 8:18).

Iz-ra'hī'ah (iz-rā-hī'ā) [Jehovah arises (cf. Isa. 60:2)]. A man of Issachar, family of Tola, and son of Uzzi (I Chron. 7:3).

Iz-ra'hite (iz-rā-hit). A member of the family, or an inhabitant of the town, of Izrah (I Chron. 27:8), perhaps the same as Ezrahite.

Iz'ri (iz'rī) [fashioner, or perhaps contraction for Jehovah has formed]. A Levite, son of Jeduthun, and head of the 4th course for the musical service of the sanctuary (I Chron. 25:11). Called in v. 3 Zeri (q.v.).

Iz-zi'ah (iz-zī'ā), in A.V. Je-zi'ah [perhaps, Jehovah sprinkles]. A son of Parosh. He was induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:25).

J

Ja'a-kan (jā'ā-kān), in A.V. of I Chron. 1:42 Ja'kan. Written A'kan in Gen. 36:27. A descendant or prominent branch of the Horites of Mount Seir, who were eventually dispossessed by the Edomites (Gen. 36:20, 21, 27; I Chron. 1:38, 42; Deut. 2:12). At the time of the Exodus sons of Jaakan constituted a tribe which occupied a district on the borders of Edom near Mount Hor, where Aaron died. The Israelites encamped at certain of their wells (Deut. 10:6; Num. 20:21-23; 33:31, 32, Bene-Jaakan.) See BEEROTH 2.

Ja'a-ko'bah (jā'ā-kō'bā) [probably, he (God) protects; cf. S. Arab. and Ethiopic akaba, to guard]. A Simeonite prince (I Chron. 4:36).

Ja'a-lah (jā'ā-lā), or Ja'a-la (jā'ā-lā) [ibex]. The founder of a family, ranked among the children of Solomon's servants (Ezra 2:56; Neh. 7:58).

Ja'a-lam (jā'ā-lām). See JALAM.

Ja'a-nai (jā'ā-nī). See JANAI.

Ja'ar (jā'ār) [forest]. A proper name (Ps. 132:6, R.V. marg.). It is believed to be the same as Kiriath-jearim.

Ja'a-re-or'e-gim (jā'ā-rē-ōr'ē-jīm). See JAIR, II.

Ja'a-re-shi'ah (jā'ā-rē-shi'ā), in A.V. Jar'e-si'ah [Jehovah plants; cf. Akkad. erēshu, Arab. gharasa, to plant]. A Benjamite, son of Jeroham (I Chron. 8:27).

Ja'a'sai (jā'ā-sī) and Ja'a'sau (jā'ā-sō). See JAASU.

Ja'a'si-el (jā-ā-sī-ēl), in A.V. once Ja'si-el (jā'si-ēl) (I Chron. 11:47) [El (God) makes]. 1. A Mezobaite, one of David's mighty men (I Chron. 11:47).

2. A son of Abner (I Chron. 27:21).

Ja'a-su (jā'ā-sū), in A.V. Ja'a'sau, in R.V. marg. Ja'a'sai [Jehovah makes]. A son of Bani. He was induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:37).

Ja-a-zī-ni'ah (jā-ā-zī-nī'ā) [Jehovah hearkens]. 1. Son of a Maacathite (II Kings 25:23). See JEZANIAH.

2. A Rechabite, son of a certain Jeremiah, not the prophet of that name (Jer. 35:13).

3. A son of Shaphan. He was a leader of idolatry in Ezekiel's time (Ezek. 8:11).

4. A son of Azzur and prince of Judah, who was seen by Ezekiel in vision (Ezek. 11:1; cf. chs. 8:1, 3; 11:24).

Ja'a-zer (jā'ā-zēr). See JAZER.

Ja'a-zi'ah (jā'ā-zī'ā) [Jehovah strengthens]. A Levite, registered as head of a father's house with the family of Merari (I Chron. 24:26, 27), and perhaps called his son or descendant (bēnō, his son); this Heb. word is rendered as a proper name, Beno. There is a textual difficulty in this passage. No hint is elsewhere given of Merari's having a 3d son. Can Jaaziah represent the house of the dead Eleazar (ch. 24:28; cf. ch. 23:22), or is the passage ch. 24:26b, 27 an interpolation?

Ja'a-zi-el (jā-ā-zī-ēl) or A'zi-el [God strengthens]. A Levite of the 2d rank, one of the musicians who played on the psaltery at the removal of the Ark from the house of Obed-edom, and afterward as a regular duty in the tent at Jerusalem (I Chron. 15:18, 20; and probably ch. 16:5). In the last passage the form Jeiel is probably a copyist's error.

Ja'bal (jā'bāl). Son of the Cainite Lamech, by his wife Adah. He was the father of such as dwell in tents and have cattle (Gen. 4:20).

Jab'bok (jāb'ōk) [cf. Arab. baḥḥa, to give abundantly, to split]. An e. tributary of the Jordan. Jacob forded it on his way back from Mesopotamia (Gen. 32:22). Rising near Rabbath Ammon, it flows for 12 miles from that town toward the n.e. and then sweeps around toward the n.w. After holding this course for about 15 miles it turns w. and for 17 miles flows through a valley which separates Gilead from Ammon. On emerging into the valley of the Jordan it bends toward the s.w. and enters the Jordan at a point about 43 miles s. of the Sea of Galilee and 23 miles n. of the Dead Sea. It is now known as the Nahr ez-Zerkā. The Jabbok was a recognized frontier. It formed the w. boundary of the Ammonites, and separated them from the Amorite kingdom of Sihon and later from the tribe of Gad. It divided Mount Gilead into 2 parts, of which the s. was held by Sihon before the Israelite conquest, and afterward was assigned to Gad, while the n. was possessed by Og and passed from him to the half tribe of Manasseh (Num. 21:24; Deut. 2:36, 37; 3:12, 13, 16; Josh. 12:2-6).

Ja'besh (jā'bēsh) [dry]. 1. A town. See JABESH-GILEAD. 2. Father of King Shallum (II Kings 15:10).

Ja'besh-gil'e-ad (jā'bēsh-gil'ē-ād) [Jabesh of Gilead]. A town of Gilead. It is believed to have stood at or near Ed-Deir, 9½ miles s.e. of Beth-shean on the other side of the Jordan. Ed-Deir is on the wadi el-Yābis, which seems to preserve the old name Jabesh. In the war waged against Benjamin in the days of the Judges on account of the matter of the Levite and his concubine, none of the men of Jabesh-gilead took part. For this indifference to a national sin, they were condemned to utter destruction. Only 400 unmarried girls were saved alive and given for wives to 400 of the remaining men of Benjamin (Judg. 21:8-15). The place was soon reoccupied. Shortly after Saul had been chosen king, Nahash, king of the Ammonites, besieged Jabesh-gilead. The town was sore pressed; and the Ammonite king doomed every man to the loss of the right eye on the surrender of the town. This was intended as an insult to the whole Israelite nation. Saul raised the siege by defeating the besieging army (I Sam. 11:1-11). The men of the town remembered their deliverer with gratitude, and when, after the battle of Gilboa, his headless body, with those of his sons, was fastened to the wall of Beth-shean, they crossed the Jordan, carried off the corpses, burned them and buried the bones in the vicinity of Jabesh-gilead (I Sam. 31:11-13; I Chron. 10:11, 12) from which they were ultimately removed to the sepulcher of Kish (II Sam. 21:12-14). David sent the men of Jabesh his personal thanks for what they had done (II Sam. 2:4-7).

Ja'bez (jā'bēz) [he makes sorrow; with metathesis of last 2 radicals of Heb. ʿāṣab, to pain, grieve]. 1. A man of Judah, whose mother gave him the name Jabez, because she bore him in sorrow. He was more honorable than his brethren. He prayed that God would enlarge the boundary of his possessions, besides keeping him from evil. God granted his request (I Chron. 4:9, 10).

2. A place, doubtless in Judah, where families of scribes dwelt (I Chron. 2:55).

Ja'bin (jā'bīn) [he (God) perceives]. 1. A Canaanite, king of Hazor in Galilee and its dependent towns and the head of the confederacy of n. and central kings whom Joshua defeated at the waters of Merom. After the battle the Israelites took and burned Hazor and slew its king (Josh. 11:1-14).

2. Another king of Canaan who reigned at Hazor, probably a lineal descendant of the 1st (Judg. 4:2). He, too, had kings fighting under him (ch. 5:19). He oppressed the Israelites 20 years; but at length his commander in chief Sisera was defeated by Barak at the river Kishon and afterward murdered. Jabin continued the war but was ultimately destroyed (ch. 4:2-24).

Jab'neel (jāb'nē-ēl) [God causes to be built]. 1. A town on the n. border of Judah (Josh. 15:5, 11). It is the same place as the Philistine city of Jabneh, the wall of which was broken down by Uzziah (II Chron. 26:6); and it was known later as Jannia (I Macc. 4:15; 5:58; II Macc. 12:8, 9). It is represented by the village of Yebnah, about 4 miles inland from the Mediterranean, and 9 n.e. by n. of Ashdod.

2. A frontier town of Naphtali (Josh. 19:33). Conder identifies it with the ruin Yemma, about 7 miles s. by w. of Tiberias.

Ja'b'neh (jāb'nē) [he (God) causes to be built]. See JABNEEL 1.

Ja'can (jā'kán), in A.V. Ja'chan (jā'kán). A Gadite, probably head of a father's house (I Chron. 5:13).

Ja'chin (jā'kīn) [he (God) establishes]. 1. A son of Simeon, and founder of a tribal family (Gen. 46:10; Ex. 6:15; Num. 26:12). Called Jarib in I Chron. 4:24, which is doubtless due to a copyist's error.

2. A descendant of Aaron. In the time of David, his family was made the 21st of the courses into which the sacerdotal body was divided (I Chron. 24:17). It dwelt at Jerusalem, according to the probable meaning of I Chron. 9:10; but it is not at all certain that the priest Jachin, who was resident at Jerusalem after the Captivity, was of this family (Neh. 11:10).

3. The righthand pillar of 2 set up in the porch of Solomon's Temple (I Kings 7:15-22), probably as a symbol of firmness. The name may be an abbreviation of an inscription like: "He (Jehovah) will establish the throne of David, and his kingdom to his seed forever." See BOAZ 2.

Ja'cynth. See HYACINTH and FIGURE.

Jack'al. The rendering in the R.V. of the Heb. plurals tannim and tannōth, which in the A.V. are regularly translated by dragon (q.v.). The creature intended is a mammal (Lam. 4:3, in A.V. sea monsters) and dwells in the wilderness (Isa. 35:7; 43:20) and in deserted places (Isa. 34:13, 14; Jer. 49:33; 51:37).

The jackal (Canis aureus) belongs to the dog genus Canis. It differs from the dog in its long and pointed muzzle. The name aureus, golden, refers to the color of the under fur, which is brownish yellow, mottled with black, gray, and brown hairs. Its length is about 30 inches, and its height at the shoulder 17. It hunts in packs, and feeds chiefly on carrion, though it carries off and devours children when opportunity arises. It has been called the lion's provider, the opinion being entertained that when its voice is heard, the lion, following on, tries to claim his share of the prey. It raises the most unearthly yell of all of its compeers. It is found throughout Palestine, especially frequenting ruins. See also FOX; and for the Jackal's Well, see DRAGON'S WELL.

Ja'cob (jā'kūb) [popular ety., one that takes by the heel or supplants; the healer. But probably rather, he (God) guards, or protects; cf. S. Arab. and Ethiopic akaba, to guard]. A son of Isaac and Rebekah, a twin with Esau, but born a short time after him and therefore considered the younger brother (Gen. 25:21-26). He was born when his father was 60 years old (v. 26). He became a quiet, inoffensive man, dwelling in tents (v. 27). He was his mother's favorite, while the father preferred Esau (v. 28). As Esau came in from hunting, faint with hunger, Jacob chanced to have pottage of lentils ready boiled, but relieved his brother's necessities only after he had compelled him first to surrender his birthright (vs. 29-34). Positive fraud followed. When Isaac was about 137 years old and nearly blind, Rebekah induced Jacob to dress himself in Esau's raiment, make his neck and hands artificially hairy, and, passing himself off as Esau, obtain from Isaac, who thought himself near death, the blessing belonging to the birthright. Esau recalled the 1st wrong when this 2d one was perpetrated, and resolved that when his father died, he would kill his brother (ch. 27:1-41). Rebekah heard the threat and, to give time for Esau's wrath to cool, sent Jacob away to her relatives in Haran, on the pretext of seeking a wife. While on this journey he had the night vision in which a ladder connected earth and heaven, angels ascended and descended, and God standing above assured him of the covenant blessings (chs. 27:42-46; 28:1-22).

Jacob sojourned in Paddan-aram at least 20 years, while he was in Laban's employ, serving him 14 years for his 2 daughters, Leah and Rachel, and 6 for a payment in cattle. During this period in Haran there were born to him 11 sons: by Leah 6, Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah, Issachar, and Zebulun (besides a daughter, Dinah); by Bilhah, Rachel's maid, 2, Dan and Naphtali; by Zilpah, Leah's maid, 2, Gad and Asher; and by Rachel 1, Joseph (chs. 29; 30). The last was born when Jacob was 90 or 91 years of age (cf. ch. 47:9 with chs. 41:46, 47, 54; 45:11). Six years later, perceiving that Laban and his sons, envying his prosperity, were turning against him, he became alarmed. While pasturing his flocks, probably 3 days from Haran (chs. 30:36; 31:22) on the Euphrates, he sent for his wives (ch. 31:4), crossed the river, and fled with his family and possessions toward Canaan (v. 21). Three days later Laban was informed of Jacob's flight; he presently gathered his male relatives, started in pursuit of the fugitives, and after a week's journey by forced marches overtook them on Mount Gilead, apparently between the Yarmuk and the Jabbok, scant 300 miles from the Euphrates, at least 10 days after Jacob's departure and probably longer, for Laban was busy shearing sheep when he received information of the flight and was unprepared for the journey. God shielded Jacob from injury, and a reconciliation and a treaty of amity between the alienated parties took place. A heap of stones was erected and a covenant meal eaten to establish the agreement that neither party should pass that point to attack the other (ch. 31).

Jacob had manifestations of the divine favor at Mahanaim and on the Jabbok, where a man wrestled with him until break of day, showed his superiority to Jacob by disabling him by a touch, and before departing blessed him, saying: "Thy name shall be called no more Jacob, but Israel: for thou hast striven with God and with men, and hast prevailed." And Jacob called the name of that place Peniel, face of God, for he said: "I have seen God face to face, and my life is preserved" (Gen. 32:22-32; cf. the names in Gen. 33:20; Hos. 12:4). This event proved a crisis in the life of Jacob. Heretofore he had been trusting to his own strength and shrewdness for success. He now learns that his own strength is of no avail in wrestling with God and that he must resort to prayer for the blessing which he cannot do without. Henceforth the record of his worshiping becomes frequent. Before he crossed the Jordan, he met Esau and obtained forgiveness for the wrongs which had so long made him an exile. Then the brothers parted, Esau returning to Mount Seir and Jacob going to Canaan (Gen. 33:1-18).

Jacob sojourned in Canaan at Shechem, where he bought a parcel of ground from the chief of Shechem, on which he pitched his camp and erected an altar (ch. 33:18-20). While here his daughter Dinah was violated by the chief's son. The deed was avenged by 2 of Jacob's sons, Simeon and Levi, and the other sons joined in spoiling the town. Jacob feared the consequences of this act; but since his sons had captured the place, slain the males, appropriated the wealth, and made captive the women and children, he recognized the conquest of the town and the consequent ownership of it by his tribe (ch. 48:22; cf. ch. 37:12). From Shechem Jacob removed to Beth-el. There Deborah died and was buried (ch. 35:6-8); see DEBORAH 1. There also, at the place where God had appeared to him as he went to Paddan-aram, God appeared to him again when he came back from Paddan-aram (chs. 35:9; 28:10-22), emphasized the change of his name to Israel, and confirmed the blessing of the Abrahamic covenant to him. As he drew near to Bethlehem on his way to Hebron, his 12th and last son, Benjamin, was born, and his beloved Rachel died (ch. 35:9-20). At length Jacob came to his father Isaac at Mamre (v. 27). Isaac died about 23 years later, and was buried by Esau and Jacob (vs. 28, 29). Jacob seems to have dwelt at Mamre during the next 33 years; for he was at Hebron about 10 years after his return (ch. 37:14; cf. v. 2), and he was evidently still there when he was summoned to go down to Egypt (ch. 46:1).

Jacob was 130 years old when he went to Egypt (ch. 47:9), and he lived there 17 years. He gave a special blessing, 1st to Joseph's children and then to his own, after which he died at the age of 147 (chs. 47:28; 48; 49). His body was embalmed, taken to Canaan with much pomp, and interred in the cave of Machpelah (ch. 50:1-14). Jacob had glaring faults of character. For his sins he suffered severely, and in his old age he was sorely chastened by the loss of Joseph. In his later life he acknowledged, at least tacitly, the sinfulness of his earlier career and his failure to walk before God, and he spoke only of God's grace (ch. 48:15, 16). He was animated also in his latter days by unwavering faith in God (Gen. 48:21; Heb. 11:21).

The Hebrew nation, as descended from Jacob, is often called in Scripture the Children of Israel (Ex. 14:16, 29; 15:1, etc.). The prophets often use Jacob and Israel as parallel names in their poetic couplets (Deut. 33:10; Isa. 43:1, 22; 44:1). See ISRAEL 2.

Jacob's Well, beside or on the edge of which Jesus sat when conversing with the woman of Samaria, was at Sychar, near the parcel of ground that Jacob gave to his son Joseph. "Jacob," the woman of Samaria said, "drank thereof himself, and his sons, and his cattle" (John 4:5, 6, 12; cf. Gen. 33:18-20; 37:12). A tradition going back as far as the time of the Bordeaux pilgrim, A.D. 333, and accepted by Jews, Samaritans, Christians, and Mohammedans, identifies Jacob's Well with the Bir Ya'kub. It is situated at the e. mouth of the valley between Mount Ebal on the n. and Mount Gerizim on the s., about 2 miles e.s.e. from Nablus, the modern Shechem, and half a mile s.s.w. of 'Askar, believed by many to be Sychar. Maundrell, generally very accurate, made its diameter 9 feet and its depth 105. Dr. John Wilson, measuring a line with which a boy was let down into it with a light in 1843, determined it to be 75 feet deep. Conder reported its depth in 1875 as 75 feet. It is less deep now than formerly, because somewhat choked with rubbish. The water is good, but is not easy to reach (John 4:11). The shaft is lined with masonry in the upper part. The lower part is cut through soft limestone. A low subterranean vault, 20 feet long from e. to w. and 10 broad, the crypt of an ancient Christian church, is built over the well, the mouth of which is contracted and covered with one or more large stones. There is a fine fountain a little to the w., and many others in the valley. The well, however, was dug, perhaps, because these fountains sometimes were dry in the summer. The water from the well is superior to that of the adjacent springs and streams.

For Jacob-el and Joseph-el, see JOSEPH 1.

Ja'da (jā'dā) [knowing]. A son of Onam, a man of Judah, family of Hezron, house of Jerahmeel (I Chron. 2:28, 32).

Ja'dau (jā'dō). See IDDO, II. 2.

Ja'du'a (jā-dū'ā) [known]. 1. One of the chiefs of the people who, with Nehemiah, sealed the covenant (Neh. 10:21).

2. A high priest, son of Jonathan and the 5th in descent from the high priest Jeshua, who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Neh. 12:11, 22). He was probably a youth in the reign of Darius Nothus, and survived Darius Codomannus, the Persian sovereign defeated by Alexander the Great at Arbela in 331 B.C. See HIGH PRIEST.

Ja'don (jā'dōn) [he rules, judges, or abides]. A Meronothite, who repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem after the Captivity (Neh. 3:7).

Ja'el (jā'ēl) [wild goat, ibex]. The wife of Heber the Kenite (Judg. 4:17). Sisera, Jabin's general, trusting to the peace subsisting between his royal master and Heber, fled to her tent after he was defeated by Barak. On his approach Jael went out, invited him to enter, and gave him milk to relieve his thirst. But as he lay sleeping in the tent, she took a hammer and drove a tent pin through his temples, fixing his head to the ground. When the victorious Barak passed, she called him in to see what she had done (Judg. 4:11-22). Deborah highly commended the deed of Jael (ch. 5:6, 24-27), though it was cruel and treacherous. It reveals a rudeness of manners and a hardness of character which found frequent exemplification in those early times.

Ja'gur (jā'gēr) [cf. Heb. gūr, to sojourn]. A town in the extreme s. of Judah (Josh. 15:21), probably Tell Ghurr, n. of Bir el-Meshāsh.

Jah (jā). A form of Jehovah occurring in poetry (Ps. 68:4, A.V., R.V. marg.; R.V. of Ps. 89:8). In various other places Jah, or, rather, Heb. yāh is rendered Lord in the A.V. and R.V.

In the Heb. sometimes Jah and Jehovah stand together, Jah first (Isa. 12:2 and ch. 26:4, marg. of R.V.).

Ja'hath (jā'hāth) [perhaps, he (God) will snatch up]. 1. A man of Judah, family of Hezron, descended through Shobal (I Chron. 4:2; cf. ch. 2:19, 50).

2. A son of Libni, a Levite, family of Gershon (I Chron. 6:20, 43).

3. A Levite, family of Gershon and head of a subdivision of the house of Shime'i (I Chron. 23:10).

4. A Levite, family of Kohath, house of Izhar (I Chron. 24:22).

5. A Merarite Levite, an overseer of the workmen engaged in repairing the Temple during Josiah's reign (II Chron. 34:12).

Ja'haz (jā'hāz) and Jah'zah, in A.V. once Ja-ha'za (jā-hā'zā) (Josh. 13:18), and twice Ja-hā'zah (jā-hā'zā) (Josh. 21:36; Jer. 48:21) [a place trodden under foot, an open space]. A place in the plain of Moab (Jer. 48:21) where Sihon, king of the Amorites, was defeated by the Israelites (Num. 21:23; Deut. 2:32; Judg. 11:20). It was assigned to the Reubenites (Josh. 13:18), and set apart for the Merarite Levites (Josh. 21:36; I Chron. 6:78). It was taken from Israel by Mesha, king of Moab (Moabite Stone, 18-20, see MOABITE STONE), and it was held by Moab in the time of Isaiah and Jeremiah (Isa. 15:4; Jer. 48:21, 34). Umm el-Walid has been suggested; Khirbet Iskander, n. of the wadi el-Wāleh, if it had remains of the Iron Age, would be an admirable identification.

Ja-ha'zi'ah (jā'hā-zī'ā). See JAHZIAH.

Ja-ha'zi-el (jā-hā-zī-ēl) [El (God) sees]. 1. A Levite, family of Kohath, house of Hebron (I Chron. 23:19).

2. One of the Benjamite warriors who joined David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:4).

3. A priest in David's reign who was employed to sound a trumpet in the sanctuary (I Chron. 16:6).

4. A Levite, son of Zechariah of the Asaph family, who prophesied in the time of Jehoshaphat (II Chron. 20:14).

5. Father of a chief of the people who returned from Babylon (Ezra 8:5).

Jah'da-i (jā'dā-i) [(Jehovah) leads]. A man of Judah, enrolled with Caleb's posterity (I Chron. 2:47).

Jah'di-el (jā'dī-ēl) [God makes glad]. A leading man in the half tribe of Manasseh e. of the Jordan (I Chron. 5:24).

Jah'do (jā'dō) [cf. Jahdiel]. A Gadite, son of Buz (I Chron. 5:14).

Jah'leel (jā'lē-ēl) [probably, may God show himself well-disposed; cf. Neo-Heb. hālāh, Arab. halā, to be sweet, agreeable]. A son of Zebulun, and founder of a tribal family (Gen. 46:14; Num. 26:26).

Jah'ma-i (jā'mā-i) [(God) protects; cf. Arab. hamā, to protect, and S. Arab. yahmī'il, hamay'il]. A prince of Issachar, of the family of Tola (I Chron. 7:2).

Jah'zah (jā'zā). See JAHZ.

Jah'ze-el (jā'zē-ēl) and Jah'zi-el [God divides, distributes]. A son of Naphtali, and founder of a tribal family (Gen. 46:24; Num. 26:48; I Chron. 7:13).

Jah'ze'iah (jā-zē'yā), in A.V. Ja-ha'zi'ah [Jehovah sees]. A son of Tikvah who opposed the proposition that the Jews put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:15, R.V.; but see marg.).

Jah'ze-rah (jā'zē-rā) [prudent; cf. Arab. hadhir, cautious, prudent]. A priest descended from Immer (I Chron. 9:12). See AHZAI.

Jah'zi-el (jā'zī-ēl). See JAHZEEL.

Ja'ir, I (jā'ēr) [Heb. yā'ir, he enlightens]. 1. A son of Segub and grandson of Hezron, of the tribe of Judah, and his wife, who was of the family of Machir, of the tribe of Manasseh (I Chron. 2:21, 22). He was reckoned with the tribe of Manasseh (I Chron. 5:23; Num. 32:41; Deut. 3:14). At the time of the conquest by the Israelites under Moses of the country e. of the Jordan, he took villages in the Argob, on the border of Bashan and Gilead, and called them Havvoth-jair (q.v.).

2. A Gileadite who judged Israel 22 years, succeeding or surviving Tola in office. Each of his 30 sons had an ass for riding purposes, which in that age was an indication of standing in the community. They also had 30 cities, called Havvoth-jair. He may have belonged to the family of the earlier Jair (see JAIRITE), and have inherited prerogatives connected with the Havvoth-jair, or have used his influence to place his sons over these encampments (Judg. 10:3-5).

3. A Benjamite, Mordecai's father or remoter ancestor (Esth. 2:5).

Ja'ir, II (jā'ēr) [Heb. yā'ir, he arouses]. Father of Elihanan (I Chron. 20:5); called in II Sam. 21:19, Jaare-oregim, where -oregim doubtless came into the text by error from Heb. 'ōregim (weavers) in the line below.

Ja'ir-ite (jā'ēr-īt). A descendant of some Jair or other, whose name was written as is that of Jair, I (II Sam. 20:26).

Ja'irus (jā'ī-rūs) [Gr. Iaeiros, for Jair]. A ruler of the synagogue (Mark 5:22; Luke 8:41), probably at Capernaum. His young daughter lay at the point of death; and he went to Jesus, beseeching him to heal her. On the way to the house word reached them that the child was dead (Mark 5:23, 24, 35; Luke 8:42, 49); but the father, with confidence in Jesus' power, still entreated (Matt. 9:18), and Jesus told him to put away all fear and to trust him (Mark 5:36; Luke 8:50). Entering the house with Peter, James, and John (Mark 5:37; Luke 8:51; cf. Matt. 9:19) he found it full of noisy professional mourners and rebuked them and said: "The damsel is not dead, but sleepeth" (Matt. 9:24; Mark 5:39; Luke 8:52). Taking the 3 disciples and the parents (Mark 5:40), he went into the chamber where the dead child lay (Mark 5:40; Matt. 9:25), took her by the hand, and said in Aram. T'liṯhā kūm (š), "Damsel, . . . Arise" (Mark 5:41; cf. Matt. 9:25; Luke 8:54). She obeyed, and he bade the parents not to tell what had taken place (Mark 5:43; Luke 8:56). But such a miracle could not be kept from public knowledge (Matt. 9:26).

Ja'kan (jā'kán). See JAAKAN.

Ja'keh (jā'kē) [pious; cf. Arab. waḳā, to guard, preserve, be pious]. The father of that Agur whose words are recorded in Prov., ch. 30. In the Heb. Bible his name is followed by ham-massā, translated in the A.V. the prophecy, and in the R.V. the oracle. The marg. of the R.V. translates the title Jakeh of Massa, and refers to Gen. 25:14, where Massa, a son of Ishmael, represents a North Arabian tribe.

Ja'kim (jā'kīm) [he (God) raises up]. 1. A descendant of Aaron. His family grew to a father's house and was made the 12th of the 24 courses into which David divided the priests (I Chron. 24:12).

2. A Benjamite (I Chron. 8:19).

Ja'lam (jā'lām), in A.V. Ja'a-lam. A son of Esau by his wife Oholibamah. He became a chieftain of Edom (Gen. 36:5, 18; I Chron. 1:35).

Ja'lon (jā'lōn). A son of Ezra, registered with the tribe of Judah (I Chron. 4:17).

Jam'bres (jām'brēs) [cf. Heb. root mārāh, to be refractory, rebellious]. One of 2 Egyptian magicians who attempted to counterwork Moses (II Tim. 3:8). See JANNES.

Jam'bri (jām'bri). Founder of a family which dwelt at Medeba (I Macc. 9:36, 37; Jos. Antiq. xiii. 1, 2).

James (jāmz) [a form of the name Jacob]. 1. James the son of Zebedee (Matt. 4:21; 10:2; Mark 1:19; 3:17), and brother of the Apostle John (Matt. 17:1; Mark 3:17; 5:37; Acts 12:2), one of the earliest disciples (Matt. 4:21; Mark 1:19, 29; cf. John 1:40, 41) and most trusted apostles (Matt. 17:1; Mark 5:37; 9:2; 13:3; 14:33; Luke 8:51; 9:28) of our Lord. Of his birthplace or early home we are told nothing. His occupation as a fisherman on the Sea of Galilee, in partnership with Peter and Andrew (Luke 5:10), might seem to suggest a contiguous locality. But the fishery of the Sea of Galilee was expressly kept free for every Israelite, and a social difference between the sons of Zebedee and the sons of Jonas may be implied in the facts that the former kept hired servants (Mark 1:20), and that John at least was known to the high priest (John 18:16) and may have had a house in Jerusalem (ch. 19:27). His father, Zebedee, appears only once in the pages of the Gospels (Matt. 4:21; Mark 1:19), where he raises no obstacle to his sons' following Jesus. From Matt. 27:56, compared with Mark 15:40; 16:1 and with John 19:25, it seems reasonable to infer that his mother was named Salome and was sister to the mother of Jesus; in which case James would be a near kinsman of Jesus, and like him of Davidic descent. His name occurs only in the Synoptic Gospels and the book of The Acts, although he is alluded to twice in the Gospel of John (chs. 1:40, 41; 21:2). It never occurs apart from that of John, which it ordinarily precedes (Matt. 4:21; 10:2; 17:1; Mark 1:19, 29; 3:17; 5:37; 9:2; 10:35, 41; 13:3; 14:33; Luke 5:10; 6:14; 9:54), while John is designated as the brother of James (Matt. 4:21; 10:2; 17:1; Mark 1:19; 3:17; 5:37). From this it has been inferred that he was the older brother; while the occasional reverse usage in Luke (chs. 8:51, R.V.; 9:28) and Acts (chs. 1:13, R.V.; 12:2 only) is supposed to arise from John's greater prominence in the apostolic circle. Along with John, he received from Christ the surname Boanerges or son of thunder (Mark 3:17), and along with him earned his Master's rebuke for the fierceness of his anger against the Samaritan village which would not receive Jesus (Luke 9:55), and the indignation of his fellow apostles for his ambitious self-seeking (Mark 10:41). After the crucifixion we find him with the other apostles in Galilee (John 21:2), and in Jerusalem (Acts 1:13), and his record closes with his death by the sword at the hands of Herod Agrippa I, probably A.D. 44 (Acts 12:2). He was the first of the apostolic band to seal his testimony with his blood.

2. James the son of Alphaeus and 1 of the apostles of our Lord (Matt. 10:3; Mark 3:18; Luke 6:15; Acts 1:13). Nothing further is certainly known of him. It is natural, however, as it has been usual, to assume that the James of Matt. 27:56; Mark 15:40; 16:1; Luke 24:10 is this James; in which case we may learn that he bore the surname of "the little" (R.V. marg.), possibly with reference to his stature (Mark 15:40); that his mother was called Mary, and was 1 of the women who accompanied Christ; and that he had a brother named Joseph, Levi, or Matthew, who, according to Mark 2:14, was son of Alphaeus, may be another brother, but it is far more probable that 2 different men bore the name of Alphaeus.

It is possible to fill in the ellipsis of Luke 6:16; Acts 1:13 (cf. A.V. and R.V. marg.) so as to make the Apostle Judas another brother. It is possible further to identify the Mary of Clopas of John 19:25 with Mary the mother of James; and it is then possible, though scarcely natural, to read John 19:25 as declaring that Mary of Clopas was Jesus' mother's sister. By this combination, James, the son of Alphaeus, would be made out to be the cousin-german of our Lord. It is common, on this assumption, to take still another step, and, on the ground of the similarity between the names of the Lord's brethren and those of the sons of Alphaeus, so obtained, to suppose that this near relative of our Lord's is intended by "James the Lord's brother." The whole construction, however, involves many insecure assumptions and scarcely satisfies the Biblical facts.

3. James, the Lord's brother (Matt. 13:55; Mark 6:3; Gal. 1:19), and the head of the Church at Jerusalem in the apostolic age (Acts 12:17; 15:13; 21:18; Gal. 1:19; 2:9, 12). This James is mentioned by name only twice in the Gospels (Matt. 13:55; Mark 6:3), but the outlines of his life may be traced by means of the notices of the "brethren of the Lord," who constituted a distinct class, both during our Lord's life, when they did not believe on him (John 7:5), and after his resurrection, when they are found among his followers (Acts 1:14). The exact relationship which these "brethren" bore to our Lord has always been a matter of dispute. Some, identifying them with the sons of Alphaeus, represent them as his cousins. Others think of them as his half-brothers, children of Joseph by a former marriage. As they always appear with Mary, living and journeying with her and holding just such relations with her as would naturally be borne by her children (Matt. 12:46, 47; Luke 8:19; John 2:12), there is no reason to question the natural implication that they were Jesus' own brothers. As James's name stands first in the lists (Matt. 13:55; Mark 6:3), it is probable that he was the oldest of our Lord's brothers. He doubtless shared their unbelief (John 7:5), and doubtless also their natural anxieties in his behalf (Mark 3:31 seq.). When or how the change was wrought in him by which he became a servant of Christ (Acts 1:14; James 1:1) we are not told: possibly, as in the case of Paul, his conversion was due to a special appearance of the risen Lord (I Cor. 15:7). From the very first organization of the Church in Jerusalem, James appears as its head (Acts 12:17; 15:13; 21:18; Gal. 1:19; 2:9, 12). As early as c. A.D. 37, when Paul first visited Jerusalem after his conversion, James's position was such that Paul felt it necessary to name him along with Peter as having been seen by him (Gal. 1:19). The reference of Acts 12:17 (A.D. 44), where James is clearly the official head of "the brethren," as well as that of ch. 21:18 (A.D. 58), where he seems to stand at the head of the elders of the Church (cf. ch. 15:6), enable us to estimate wherein his pre-eminence consisted. Since he was not an apostle (the R.V. marg. gives the correct translation of Gal. 1:19), we cannot be far wrong in assuming that he was the head of the board of elders of the Church at Jerusalem; that is, what we should call the "pastor" of that Church. See ELDER. As such, his name stands for the Church of Jerusalem (Gal. 2:12), of which he was the natural representative (Acts 12:17; 15:13; 21:18); and visitors to the Church made themselves known in the first instance to him and laid their errand before him (Acts 12:17; 21:18; Gal. 1:19; 2:9). In his position, James's lifework was naturally to smooth the passage of Jews over to Christianity. That he stood on the same platform of faith with Paul is apparent not only from Paul's assertion in Gal. 2:9, but also from James's remarks recorded in Acts 15:13-21. But on both occasions he speaks also in behalf of the Jewish-Christian conscience, and it is equally apparent that, as Paul became as all men to all men because he was sent to all, James became as a Jew to Jews because he was sent to Jews. The use of his name by intense Judaizers (Gal. 2:12, and the later Clementine literature) is thus explicable, as also the admiration which is said to have been conceived for him by the Jews themselves, who are reported to have given him the surname of "the Just" (Eusebius H. E. ii. 23). After Acts 21:18 (A.D. 58) we meet no further reference to this James in the N.T. Secular history tells us, however, that he was martyred in a popular outbreak of the Jews in the interregnum between the death of the procurator Festus and the appointment of his successor, i.e., A.D. 62 (Jos. Antiq. xx. 9, 1).

4. James, the father or, less probably, brother of the Apostle Judas (Luke 6:16; Acts 1:13). Nothing further is known of him.

B. B. W. (rev., H. S. G.)

James (jāmz), The E-pis-tle of. This letter does not announce itself as the production of an apostle, but describes its author simply as James, a bond servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ (ch. 1:1, R.V. marg.). It is most natural to think of James, the Lord's brother, as meant, and all the characteristics of the letter agree with this attribution. Although some scholars place the date of its composition near the end of the 1st century or at the beginning of the 2d, the following considerations bear witness to its primitiveness: the Christian place of worship is still spoken of as a synagogue (ch. 2:2); Christians are not sharply discriminated from Jews (ch. 1:1); the sins rebuked and errors corrected are such as would naturally spring up in a Jewish soil; while there is not a trace of the controversies which already in the 6th decade of the 1st Christian century were distracting the whole Church. It may, therefore, be reasonably dated c. A.D. 45 and considered the earliest of the N.T. writings. The letter is addressed to the 12 tribes which are of the Dispersion (ch. 1:1), that is, not to the dispersed Jews, nor yet to the whole Christian Church, considered as the spiritual Israel, but, probably, to the Christians (chs. 2:1, 5, 7; 5:7) among the Jewish Dispersion, as the Jews dwelling outside the Holy Land were technically called (John 7:35; cf. II Macc. 1:27). The object of its writing was to reform and correct those sins and errors to which its lately Christianized Jewish readers continued to be liable, and to encourage them in the sore trials to which they were exposed.

After the address (ch. 1:1), James first consoles his readers in their trials and exhorts them to steadfastness, pointing out at the same time the source of the temptation to apostasy (ch. 1:2-21). He proceeds then to warn them against mere word-service, explaining what is meant by true faith (ch. 1:22-27), what will be the effect of true faith on the prevalent sin of respect of persons (ch. 2:1-13), and how a true faith evinces itself (ch. 2:14-26). Exhortations against hasty assumption and misuse of the functions of religious teachers and exposure of their root in a jealous heart follow (ch. 3); and then reproofs of contentiousness (ch. 4:1-12) and self-sufficiency (chs. 4:13 to 5:6). The epistle closes with exhortations to patience in suffering (ch. 5:7-12) and to prayer as the sufficient resource of the Christian in every need (ch. 5:13-18), along with a final declaration of the joy of Christian propagandism (ch. 5:19-20). To this end the author sees fit to employ over 50 imperatives in a document of only 108 vs.

The linguistic and rhetorical character of the epistle is very high. It is written in excellent Greek, in a strikingly elevated and picturesque style resembling that of the Hebrew prophets. It contains more imagery drawn from nature than all the epistles of Paul, in this recalling the manner of our Lord's Synoptic speeches, to which it presents numerous parallels. The tone and matter of its teaching are appropriate to its early date and the recent emergence of its readers from Judaism. The section on faith and works (ch. 2:14-26) has often been misapprehended as a polemic against Paul's doctrine of justification by faith, or at least as a corrective of perversions of that doctrine. It is really a rebuke of a prevalent Jewish notion—that mere intellectual assent to divine teaching is all that is necessary for salvation. James as pointedly as Paul makes faith the instrument of salvation (ch. 2:22, 23), and Paul as firmly as James insists that the only saving faith is the faith that works (Gal. 5:6).

The epistle reflects a Palestinian atmosphere and is a paraenetic document of Christian origin, which was influenced by the Gospel tradition, especially the words of Jesus, without implying literary dependence. The following passages may be compared as noteworthy: James 1:2 with Matt. 5:10-12; James 1:4 with Matt. 5:48; James 1:5, 17 with Matt. 7:7-11; James 1:22 with Matt. 7:21-27; James 2:10 with Matt. 5:19; James 3:18 with Matt. 5:9; James 4:4 with Matt. 6:24; James 4:12 with Matt. 7:1 and 10:28; James 5:1 seq. with Matt. 6:19 and Luke 6:24; James 5:10 with Matt. 5:12; James 5:12 with Matt. 5:34-37; James 1:6 with Mark 11:23 seq.; cf. also James 1:9 seq.; 2:5 seq.; 4:4 seq.; 13 seq.; 5:1 seq. with Luke 1:46 seq.; 6:20 seq.; 24 seq.; 12:16 seq.; 16:19 seq.

There is clear evidence of the use of this epistle by the Church from the very earliest times. Origen, however, writing early in the 3d century, is the first writer to quote it explicitly by name; and there was a period during which the Latin writers seem to have used it little.

B. B. W. (rev., H. S. G.)

Ja'min (jā'mīn) [the right hand, south, good fortune]. 1. A son of Simeon and founder of a tribal branch (Gen. 46:10; Ex. 6:15; Num. 26:12).

2. A man of Judah, family of Jerahmeel (I Chron. 2:27).

3. One of the Levites who, under the direction of Ezra, read the Law of God to the people and caused them to understand it (Neh. 8:7, 8).

Jam'leah (jām'lēk) [(God) gives, or let him (God) give dominion]. A Simeonite prince (I Chron. 4:34).

Jam'nīa (jām'nī-ā). See JABNEEL 1.

Ja'na-i (jā'nā-i), in A.V. Ja'nai [Jehovah answers]. A Gadite chief (I Chron. 5:12).

Ja'nim (jā'nīm), in A.V. Ja'num (cf. Heb. nīm, to slumber, be drowsy). A village in the hill country of Judah (Josh. 15:53); doubtless to the w. or s.w. of Hebron.

Ja'na-i (jā'nā-i), in A.V. Ja'na (jā'nā). The father of Melchi in the ancestry of Christ (Luke 3:24).

Jan'nes (jā'nēz). One of 2 Egyptian magicians who attempted to counterwork Moses, Jambres being the other (II Tim. 3:8). The reference is to the occurrences described in Ex. 7:11, 12, 22; 8:7, 18, 19; 9:11, where, however, the names of the magicians are not given nor their number. They were known to late Jewish tradition being found in the Targum of the pseudo-Jonathan. The Talmud mentions Jōhānā and Mamrē. Jambres is believed to be the Gr. form of Jamreh (Heb. Yamreh, he shows disobedience, rebelliousness). Mamre, from the same root, is used in the Talmud for one who resists the decisions of the sanhedrin. Jannes is perhaps a corruption of Johanan (Heb. Yōhānān, John; cf. Jannaeus), but in sound suggests Talmudic Heb. yānāh, Aram. yēnī (to oppress, vex).

Ja-no'ah (jā-nō'ā), and Ja-no'hah (jā-nō'hā) in A.V. of Joshua [rest, quiet]. 1. A town of Naphtali, captured by Tiglath-pileser (II Kings 15:29). Yānūh, 6½ miles e. by s. of Tyre, has been suggested.

2. A town on the boundary line of Ephraim (Josh. 16:6, 7). It has been fixed at Yānūn, 7 miles s.e. of Shechem.

Ja'num (jā'nūm). See JANIM.

Ja'pheth (jā'fēth) [beauty, or let him make wide]. A son of Noah, and doubtless 1 of the 2 elder sons (Gen. 10:21; cf. ch. 9:24), born about Noah's 500th year (chs. 5:32; 6:10); see NOAH. At the time of the Deluge he was married, but had no children with him in the ark (Gen. 7:7; I Peter 3:20). On the occasion of Noah's drunkenness, Japheth acted to him in a dutiful manner and in consequence received a blessing, the essential part of which was that he should receive large territory and enjoy free action and that he should occupy the tents of Shem, not in the sense of conquering the Semites, but of dwelling with them in peace and sharing their privileges (Gen. 9:20-27). Japheth was the progenitor of the people who inhabited, or perhaps in some cases conquered and annexed, Gomer, Magog, Madai, Javan, Tubal, Meshech, and Tiras (Gen. 10:2), extending from the high plateau s. of the Caspian Sea w. through the mountain region s. of the Black Sea to the islands and n. shores of the e. Mediterranean, with settlements farther w.

Ja-phi'a (jā-fī'ā) [may he (God) cause to shine forth]. 1. A king of Lachish, defeated, captured, and executed by Joshua (Josh. 10:3-27).

2. A son of David, born at Jerusalem (II Sam. 5:15).

3. A border town of Zebulun (Josh. 19:12), identified with Yāfa, 1¼ miles s.w. of Nazareth.

Japh'let (jāf'lēt) [may he (God) deliver, or he will deliver]. An Asherite, family of Heber (I Chron. 7:32).

Japh'le-tite (jāf'lē-tī), in A.V. Japh'le-ti (jāf'lē-tī). The descendants of a certain Japhlet, apparently not the same as the Asherite of that name. Their location was on the border of Ephraim, near Beth-horon (Josh. 16:3).

Ja'pho (jā'fō). See JOPPA.

Jar. A vessel of earthenware, but occasionally of other material (John 2:6), used for either dry articles or liquids. An earthen jar, generally having 1 or 2 handles, was used for drawing water and for bearing it home from the well or fountain (Eccl. 12:6). Ordinarly women fetched the water for the household, carrying the jar on the head or the shoulder (Gen. 24:13, 15, 16; John 4:28), but men sometimes brought it (Mark 14:13). Wine was stored in earthen jars (Herod. iii. 6; Xen. Anabasis vi. 1, 15), which were often of great size (Homer Odyssey ii. 340). Oil also was kept in them; and they were used in the house for holding meal (I Kings 17:12, in A.V. barrel).

Eastern Waterpots

Ja'rah (jā'rā) [honeycomb]. A descendant of King Saul (I Chron. 9:42). Called Jehoadah in ch. 8:36.

Ja'reb (jā'rēb) [contentious, or he will contend]. A king of Assyria whose name has not been identified (Hos. 5:13; 10:6), or rather Jareb is not a proper name at all, but a descriptive term, and Heb. melek yārēb is to be rendered, "The king who contends"; or it may be understood as equivalent to Akkadian šarru rabū (great king); cf. Ps. 48:2 melek rāb (great King).

Ja'red (jā'rēd), in A.V. once Je'red (I Chron. 1:2) [perhaps, descent]. Son of Mahaleel and father of Enoch (Gen. 5:16-20; I Chron. 1:2; Luke 3:37). See CHRONOLOGY, I, 1.

Ja'resi'ah (jār'ē-sī'ā). See JAARESHIAH.

Ja'rha (jār'hā). An Egyptian servant of a man of Judah called Sheshan. The master gave his daughter in marriage to Jarha (I Chron. 2:34, 35).

Ja'rīb (jār'īb) [he (God) contends, pleads]. 1. A son of Simeon (I Chron. 4:24); see JACHIN 1.

2. A chief man who was with Ezra the priest at the river of Ahava (Ezra 8:16).

3. A priest who was induced to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:18).

Jarmuth (jār'mūth) [a height]. 1. A town in the lowland, whose king was defeated, captured, and slain by Joshua (Josh. 10:3-27; 12:11). It was assigned to Judah (ch. 15:35), and was inhabited after the Captivity (Neh. 11:29). Eusebius identified it with a village known in his day as Iermochōs, 10 Roman miles from Eleutheropolis on the road to Jerusalem. The site is marked by Khirbet Yarmūk, 16 miles w. by s. from Jerusalem and 8 miles n.e. of Eleutheropolis (Beit Jibrin).

2. A town of Issachar, assigned to the Gershonite Levites (Josh. 21:28, 29). It is called Ramoth (I Chron. 6:73) and Remeth (Josh. 19:21), synonyms of Jarmuth. Not identified. Albright suggests Kaukab el-Hawā, the Coquet or Belvoir of the Crusaders.

Ja-ro'ah (jā-rō'ā) [cf. Arab. wariha, to be soft, thin]. A Gadite, descended through Buz (I Chron. 5:14).

Ja'shar (jā'shēr), in A.V. Ja'sher [righteous, upright]. The Book of Jashar is quoted in Josh. 10:13; II Sam. 1:18; and in LXX of I Kings 8:53. From these citations, the book was evidently a collection of poems which were apparently accompanied by introductory, and perhaps also concluding, explanatory remarks in prose. It resembled in this respect the psalms with prose introductions, such as Psalms 18 and 51, or The Book of Job with its prose introduction (Job 1:1 to 3:1) and conclusion (ch. 42:7-17). In 1751 there appeared a volume which professed to be an English translation of The Book of Jashar, alleged to have been found, but the production was an impudent forgery.

Ja'shen (jā'shēn) [sleeping]. A name in the catalogue of David's mighty men (II Sam. 23:32) occupying the place of Hashem in I Chron. 11:34. Perhaps the preceding Heb. letters bni rendered "the sons of" are a ditto-graph of the last 3 Heb. letters bni of Shaalbonite and so should be omitted. On the basis of this emendation and a comparison with the text of Chronicles and the Lucianic reading (Gr.), the verse may be rendered: "Eliabha the Shaalbonite, Jashen the Gunite, Jonathan the son of Shammah the Hararite."

Ja'sher (jā'shēr). See JASHAR.

Ja'sho'be'am (jā-shō'bē'am) [let the people return]. 1. A man of the family of Hachmoni and chief of David's mighty men (I Chron. 11:11). He is reasonably identified with the son of Zabdiel, of the children of Perez, and consequently of the tribe of Judah, who was made military captain over the course for the 1st month (I Chron. 27:2, 3). Called in II Sam. 23:8 Josheb-basshebeth (q.v.).

2. A Benjamite who joined David at Ziklag. He belonged to the family of the Korahites, probably the Levitical family of that name who kept the doors of the tabernacle (I Chron. 12:1, 2, 6).

Ja'shub (jā'shūb) [he returns]. 1. A son of Issachar, and founder of a tribal family (Num. 26:24; I Chron. 7:1). Called Job in Gen. 46:13 A.V., probably through a copyist's omission of the Heb. letter shin (sh).

2. A son of Bani whom Ezra induced to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:29).

Ja'shu'bi-le'hem (jā-shōō'bi-lē'hēm) [perhaps, bread returns]. Probably a man, and not a locality; a member of the family of Shelah, tribe of Judah (I Chron. 4:22).

Ja'siel (jā'sī-ēl). See JAASIEL.

Ja'son (jā'sūn) [Gr. Iasōn, healing; adopted by Hellenizing Jews as a substitute for Joshua, Jeshua, or Jesus]. 1. One of the 2 envoys sent by Judas Maccabaeus to Rome (161 B.C.) to invoke aid against the Syrians (I Macc. 8:17). It was perhaps his son who was sent to renew this alliance (ch. 12:16).

2. A high priest, son of Simon II, who held office c. 174-171 B.C., and used his influence to Hellenize the Jews (II Macc. 4:7-26); see HIGH PRIEST.

3. A man of Cyrene and author of a history of the Jewish war for freedom, 175-160 B.C. (II Macc. 2:23); see APOCRYPHA 14.

4. A Christian, a relative of Paul (Rom. 16:21). He was probably the Jason who resided at Thessalonica, gave lodging to Paul and Silas in his home during their visit to the city, and was dragged by the Jews and their abettors before the rulers for this act of hospitality to objectionable men and was released only on giving bail (Acts 17:5-9).

Ja'sper. The rendering of Heb. yāshēp'heh and Gr. iaspis, a precious stone (Ex. 28:20; Ezek. 28:13; Rev. 4:3). Jasper is a variety of quartz, of a red, brown, yellow, green, or gray color, and opaque. Among the ancients the term was of broader meaning. It included, according to Pliny, a transparent or translucent green variety (cf. Rev. 21:11), and hence denoted a kind of chalcedony or agate. The LXX renders the Heb. word by onyx.

Jath'ni-el (jāth'nī-ēl) [God bestows gifts]. A Korahite doorkeeper, son of Meshelemiah (I Chron. 26:2).

Ja'ttir (jāt'tēr) [pre-eminence]. A town in the hill country of Judah assigned to the priests (Josh. 15:48; 21:14; I Sam. 30:27; I Chron. 6:57). Robinson identified it with Khirbet 'Attir, on a hill about 13 miles s.s.w. of Hebron.

Ja'van (jā'vān) [Heb. yāwān, Arab. yūnān, Greeks, Greece]. 1. A region settled by descendants of Japheth (Gen. 10:2). The name corresponds etymologically with Ionia, and denotes the Greeks; see GREECE. Javan was synonymous with the farthest w., where Jehovah's fame had not been heard (Isa. 66:19). From early days the country had commercial relations with Phoenicia (Ezek. 27:13; Joel 3:6, in Eng. version Grecians).

2. Heb. wēyāwān (and Javan) in Ezek. 27:19 was read by the LXX as wēyayin (and wine). There are textual difficulties in the passage, but if the Heb. text is retained, Javan may refer to an Arab tribe or a Greek colony in Arabia.

Jave'lin. A smaller kind of spear, which was intended to be thrown (Job 41:29), was borne suspended between the shoulders (I Sam. 17:6), and could be stretched out in the hand (Josh. 8:18). The Heb. name for it was kidōn. The A.V. never translates this word by javelin, but renders it by spear in Josh. 8:18, 26; Job 41:29; Jer. 6:23; by lance in Jer. 50:42; and by shield or target in I Sam. 17:6, 45; Job 39:23. Wherever javelin occurs in A.V. the Revisers have properly substituted spear.

Ja'zer (jā'zēr), in A.V. twice Ja'n-zer [helpful]. A city e. of the Jordan in Gilead (II Sam. 24:5; I Chron. 26:31). The Israelites captured it and drove out the Amorite inhabitants (Num. 21:32). It stood in a region well fitted for pasture (Num. 32:1, 3). It was assigned to the tribe of Gad (Josh. 13:25), who rebuilt the city (Num. 32:34, 35; II Sam. 24:5); and it was appointed to the Merarite Levites for residence (Josh. 21:39; I Chron. 6:81). It passed into Moabite hands (Isa. 16:8, 9; Jer. 48:32); was taken by Judas Maccabaeus from the Ammonites (I Macc. 5:8). According to Eusebius, Jazer was situated 10 Roman miles to the w. of Rabbath Ammon, and 15 from Heshbon; and a considerable tributary of the Jordan took its rise near the town. Jerome mentions a village called Azor, 8 Roman miles to the w. of Rabbath Ammon. These various places are commonly identified with Wadi Šir, an upper branch of Wadi Kefrein, and the ruins Šir and Šar, on opposite sides of the valley. The distance from Rabbath Ammon approximately corresponds, but the names are radically different from Jazer and Azor. Père Abel prefers Khirbet Jazsir, s. of Salt, not far from 'Ain Hazir on Wadi Sha'ib.

Ja'ziz (jā'zīz). A Hagrite, the overseer of David's flocks (I Chron. 27:30).

Je'a-rim (jē'a-rīm) [forests]. A mountain crossed by the boundary line of Judah (Josh. 15:10), and which, to judge from its connection with Chesalon (q.v.), was at that point about 8 miles to the n.e. of Beth-shemesh.

Jeath'erai (jē-āth'ē-rī), in A.V. Jeat'erai (jē-āth'ē-rī). See ETHAI.

Jeber'e-chi'ah (jē-bēr'ē-kī'ā) [Jehovah blesses]. Father of Isaiah's contemporary, Zechariah (Isa. 8:2).

Je'bus (jē'būs). The name borne by Jerusalem while the city was in the possession of the Jebusites (Josh. 15:63; Judg. 19:10; I Chron. 11:4). The area included within Jebus was, of course, small compared with the dimensions of Jerusalem in the time of Solomon. Its citadel was the stronghold of Zion (II Sam. 5:7; I Chron. 11:5).

Jeb'u-site (jēb'ū-zīt), in A.V. twice Jeb'u-si (jēb'ū-sī) (Josh. 18:16, 28, the Heb. word being transliterated instead of being translated. A tribe of Canaan before the conquest of the country by the Hebrews (Gen. 10:16; 15:21; Ex. 3:8). At the date of the Exodus they were one of the mountain tribes (Num. 13:29; Josh. 11:3). They are known only as dwelling at Jebus, i.e., Jerusalem. Their king was slain by Joshua (Josh. 10:23-26), their territory was assigned to Benjamin (ch. 18:28), and later their city was taken by the men of Judah, on the border of which tribe it stood, and set on fire (Josh. 15:8; Judg. 1:8); but the Jebusites either never lost the citadel (Jos. Antiq. v. 2, 2), or recovered the city in whole or in part. They dwelt with the children of Judah and Benjamin as strangers (Josh. 15:63; Judg. 1:21; 19:11). They still held the stronghold of Zion at the beginning of David's reign (II Sam. 5:6, 7); and even after he had captured it the old inhabitants were not wholly expelled, for Araunah, who had a threshing-floor on the site afterward occupied by Solomon's Temple, was a Jebusite by birth (II Sam. 24:16, 18; II Chron. 3:1).

Solomon subjected the remnant of the Jebusites to bond service (I Kings 9:20).

Jec'a-mī'ah (jēk'ā-mī'ā). See JEKAMIAH.

Jech'i-li'ah (jēk'i-lī'ā) and Jech'o-li'ah (jēk'ō-lī'ā). See JECOLIAH.

Jech'o-nī'ah (jēk'ō-nī'ā) and Jech'o-nī'as (jēk'ō-nī'ās). See JECONIAH.

Jec'o-li'ah (jēk'ō-lī'ā) and Jech'i-li'ah, in A.V. once Jech'o-li'ah (II Kings 15:2) [Jehovah has prevailed]. The mother of King Uzziah (II Kings 15:2; II Chron. 26:3).

Jec'o-nī'ah (jēk'ō-nī'ā), in R.V. of N.T. Jech'o-nī'ah, in A.V. of N.T. Jech'o-nī'as [Jehovah establishes]. A variant of the name of Jehoiachin, king of Judah, a cognate root being used and the constituent parts transposed (I Chron. 3:16, etc.). Contracted to Coniah (Jer. 22:24, 28; 37:1).

Je-da'iah, I (jē-dā'yā) [Jehovah has been beneficent; cf. Arab. yaddā, to do good]. 1. A Simeonite (I Chron. 4:37).

2. A son of Harumaph, who repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem opposite to his house (Neh. 3:10).

Je-da'iah, II (jē-dā'yā) [Jehovah knows; Heb. root yaddā]. 1. A descendant of Aaron. His family had grown to a father's house in the time of David, and was numbered the 2d course when David distributed the priests into divisions (I Chron. 24:1, 6, 7). Members of the family returned from Babylon (Ezra 2:36; Neh. 7:39); cf. the 2 following.

2. A chief of the priests who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:6). In the next generation a father's house bore this name (v. 19).

3. Another chief priest with the same history (Neh. 12:7, 21).

4. One of those who came from the Captivity bringing gifts for the Temple in the days of the high priest Joshua (Zech. 6:10, 14).

Je-di'a-el (jē-dī'ā-ēl) [known of God]. 1. A son of Benjamin, and founder of a family (I Chron. 7:6, 10, 11).

2. A Manassite who joined David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:20).

3. One of David's mighty men, a son of Shimri (I Chron. 11:45).

4. A Korahite doorkeeper in the reign of David (I Chron. 26:1, 2).

Je-di'dah (jē-dī'dā) [beloved]. Wife of Amon and mother of King Josiah (II Kings 22:1).

Je-dī'di'ah (jēd'i-dī'ā) [beloved of Jehovah]. A name which Nathan the prophet, by divine direction, gave to Solomon (II Sam. 12:25).

Je-du'thun (jē-dū'thūn) [praising, praise]. 1. A Levite, one of the 3 chief singers or rather musicians appointed in the time of David, and founder of an official musical family (I Chron. 16:41; 25:1, 6; II Chron. 5:12; 35:15; Neh. 11:17). He or his family is mentioned in the title of 3 psalms (Psalms 39; 62; 77). He was evidently known earlier as Ethan; see ETHAN 3.

2. Father of Obed-edom the doorkeeper and apparently of the family of Korah, a division of the Kohathites (I Chron. 16:38; cf. ch. 26:1, 4, and also vs. 8, 12, 15). Some interpreters, however, hold him to be Jeduthun, the singer, of the family of Merari.

Je'e'zer (jē-ē'zēr). See ABIEZER 1.

Je'e'zer-ite (jē-ē'zēr-it). See ABIEZERITE.

Je'gar-sa-ha-du'tha (jē'gār-sā'hā-dū'thā) [Aram., heap of witness]. Laban's designation of the cairn Galeed (Gen. 31:47); see GALEED.

Je-hal'le-lel (jê-hâl'ê-lêl), in A.V. Je-ha-le'leel (jê-hâ-lê-lêl) and Je-hal'le-lel (jê-hâl'ê-lêl) [God will flash forth light]. 1. A man registered with the tribe of Judah and founder of a family (I Chron. 4:16).

2. A Merarite Levite (II Chron. 29:12).

Jeh-de'lah (jê-dê'yâ) [Jehovah will be glad]. 1. A Levite, family of Kohath, house of Amram (I Chron. 24:20).

2. A Meronothite who had charge of David's asses (I Chron. 27:30).

Je-hez'kel (jê-hêz'kêl), in A.V. Je-hez'e-keel (jê-hêz'ê-kêl) [God will strengthen]. A descendant of Aaron whose family was made the 20th course of the priests (I Chron. 24:16).

Je-hi'ah (jê-hî'â) [Jehovah lives]. A door-keeper for the Ark in David's reign (I Chron. 15:24).

Je-hi'el (jê-hî'êl) [God lives]. 1. A Levite of the 2d degree, who played a psaltery at the removal of the Ark to Jerusalem and afterward as a regular duty in its tent (I Chron. 15:18, 20; 16:5).

2. A Levite, family of Gershon and chief of the house of Laadan in David's reign (I Chron. 23:8). He gave rise to the father's house named from him Jehieli (ch. 26:21, 22).

3. A son of Hachmoni in David's reign (I Chron. 27:32).

4. A son of Jehoshaphat, placed by his father over one of the fenced cities of Judah, but slain with others of his brothers by Jehoram (II Chron. 21:2-4).

5. A Levite, family of Kohath and house of Heman the singer (II Chron. 29:14, in R.V. Jehuel). He aided Hezekiah in his religious reformation, and is perhaps the assistant overseer of the Temple revenues who served during the same reign (II Chron. 31:13).

6. A ruler of the Temple at the time of Josiah's religious reformation (II Chron. 35:8).

7. Father of Ezra's contemporary Obadiah (Ezra 8:9).

8. A son of Elam and father of Ezra's contemporary Shechaniah (Ezra 10:2. He may be the person of this name whom Ezra induced to put away his foreign wife (ch. 10:26).

9. A priest, of the course of Harim, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:21).

For others whose name is thus spelled in A.V. see JEIEL.

Je-hi'e-li (jê-hî'ê-li). See JEHIEL 2.

Je-hiz-ki'ah (jê-hîz-ki'â) [Jehovah strengthens]. A son of Shallum, and one of the heads of the Ephraimite tribe in the reign of Pekah. He assisted in securing the release of the captives from Judah (II Chron. 28:12).

Je-ho-ad'dah (jê-hô-âd'â), in A.V. Je-ho-a-dah (jê-hô-â-dâ) [perhaps Jehovah has numbered; cf. Arab. adda, to count]. A son of Ahaz, and a descendant of Jonathan, Saul's son (I Chron. 8:36). Called in ch. 9:42 Jarah.

Je-ho-ad'dan (jê-hô-âd'ân), in R.V. of Kings Je-ho-ad'din (jê-hô-âd'in) [perhaps, Jehovah is delight]. Mother of King Amaziah. She was from Jerusalem (II Kings 14:2; II Chron. 25:1).

Je-ho-a-haz (jê-hô-â-hâz) and, contracted, Jo-a-haz [Jehovah has laid hold of]. 1. A variant form of the name of Ahaziah, youngest son of Jehoram, king of Judah (II Chron. 21:17; cf. ch. 22:1), the components of the name being transposed.

2. The son and successor of Jehu in the Kingdom of Israel. He began to reign c. 817 B.C., apparently as associate of his father, and reigned 17 years (II Kings 10:35; 13:1). He continued the calf worship established by Jeroboam. As a penalty for this apostasy, the Syrians, first under Hazael and then under Ben-hadad, were permitted to carry on successful hostilities against him, capturing city after city, till at length he had no force left but 50 horsemen, 10 chariots, and 10,000 footmen. In distress he called on Jehovah, who gave Israel a savior. This deliverer of Israel appeared after the death of Jehoahaz in the persons of his 2 successors Jehoash and Jeroboam. The former recovered the cities which the Syrians had taken from his father, and the latter restored the ancient boundaries of Israel. Probably Jehoash received unintended assistance from the king of Assyria, who, attacking the Syrians in the rear, compelled them to desist from the invasion of the Israelite kingdom and return to defend their own country. Jehoahaz was succeeded by his son Jehoash (II Kings 13:2-9, 22-25).

3. A younger son of Josiah, who, on the death of Josiah, was placed by the people of Judah on his father's throne. He was then 23, and reigned only 3 months, during which time his tendencies were evil rather than good. He was deposed and taken in chains to Riblah by Necho, king of Egypt, and afterward carried down into Egypt. Necho, as victor over Josiah, decided to dispose of the throne of Judah, and gave it to Jehoiakim, Jehoahaz' elder brother (II Kings 23:30-34; II Chron. 36:1-4). Jehoahaz was also called Shallum (I Chron. 3:15; Jer. 22:10-12), and he is the 1st of the lion's whelps (Ezek. 19:1-9). Although the 3d of Josiah's sons in point of age and the 1st to occupy the throne, he is enumerated 4th in I Chron. 3:15, perhaps by way of intentional degradation.

Je-ho'ash (jê-hô'âsh). See JOASH, 1.

Je-ho-ha'nan (jê-hô-hâ'nân) [Jehovah is gracious]. 1. A Korahite Levite, who had the 6th course of the doorkeepers in David's reign (I Chron. 26:3).

2. The 2d in honor of Jehoshaphat's captains. He had under him 280,000 men (II Chron. 17:15).

3. Father of Jehoiada's supporter, Ishmael, in the revolt against Athaliah (II Chron. 23:1).

4. A priest, head of the father's house of Amariah. He lived in the days of the high priest Joiakim (Neh. 12:13).

5. A son of Eliashib (Ezra 10:6, R.V.). See JOHANAN 9.

6. A son of Bebai, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:28).

7. A son of Tobiah the Ammonite (Neh. 6:18, R.V.). See JOHANAN 10.

8. A priest who officiated at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem by Nehemiah (Neh. 12:42).

Je-hoi'a-chin (jê-hoi'â-kîn) [Jehovah establishes]. The son and successor of Jehoiakim in the Kingdom of Judah. He came to the throne in the year 597 B.C. According to II Kings 24:8, he was then 18 years old; according to II Chron. 36:9, his age was 8. The discrepancy exists in the LXX as well as in the Heb. text, but probably Kings is correct. He did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord, according to all that his father had done. But his reign continued only 3 months and 10 days. During this short period Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, sent his generals to besiege Jerusalem, which surrendered after the 8th year of Nebuchadnezzar had begun (cf. II Kings 24:12; cf. Jer. 52:28); see CHRONOLOGY, IV. Jehoiachin, his wives, his mother, the palace servants, every dignitary in the city and the country, with all the skillful artisans, were carried into captivity (II Kings 24:8-16; II Chron. 36:9, 10). For a long period he seems to have been in actual confinement; but in the 37th year of his exile, 562 B.C., Evil-merodach ascended the throne of Babylon, released him from prison, and assigned him a daily allowance of, or for, food while he lived (II Kings 25:27-30; Jer. 52:31-34). Jeremiah, who prophesied during, and after, the brief reign of Jehoiachin, frequently mentions him under the name Jec-oniah or Coniah. On these modifications of the name, see JECONIAH.

Jehoi'ada (jê-hoi'á-dá) [Jehovah knows].

1. The father of that Benaiah who held high military office in the latter part of David's and in Solomon's reign (II Sam. 23:22; I Kings 4:4). Jehoiada was probably the priest (I Chron. 27:5, text; but not as in A.V. chief priest), and the leader of the Aaronites who brought 3,700 men to David at Ziklag (ch. 12:27).

2. A son of Benaiah, 2d to Abithophel in David's counsels (I Chron. 27:34). Most commentators believe that some copyist accidentally wrote Jehoiada son of Benaiah for Benaiah son of Jehoiada. There is no reason, however, why a grandson of Jehoiada, bearing the same name, should not be occupying a position of influence at this time.

3. A high priest during the usurpation of Athaliah. His wife concealed in the Temple the young prince Joash, the only surviving direct representative of the royal line of David, and Jehoiada planned and successfully carried out the revolt which led to the slaughter of Athaliah and the proclamation of Joash as king. Jehoiada's wife was the daughter of King Joram and the sister of Ahaziah; the high priest was, therefore, the uncle of the young monarch whom he befriended and placed on the throne. So long as he lived he was instrumental in keeping the king true to the worship of Jehovah (II Kings 11:1 to 12:16; II Chron. 22:10 to 24:14). He died at the age of 130, and, in recognition of his eminent services to church and state, he was buried in the city of David among the kings (II Chron. 24:15, 16). After his death Joash turned from the Lord and ungratefully put Jehoiada's son to death for rebuking the sins of the people (vs. 17-22).

4. A priest who was succeeded in Jeremiah's time by Zephaniah in the office of 2d priest and overseer of the Temple (Jer. 29:26; cf. 52:24).

5. A son of Paseah, who repaired a gate of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:6; in R.V. Joiada).

Jehoi'akim (jê-hoi'á-kim) [Jehovah raises up]. A son of King Josiah by his wife Zebidah (II Kings 23:34, 36). He was called originally Eliakim (God raises up). On the death of Josiah the people placed Jehoahaz, 3d son of Josiah in age, on the throne; but 3 months afterward Necho put him in chains and carried him to Egypt, and made his elder brother Eliakim king in his stead, changing his name to Jehoiakim. He began to reign c. 608 B.C., at the age of 25 years. He was obliged to collect heavy tribute from the people for Pharaoh. He departed from Jehovah, whom his father had so faithfully served, and went back to idolatry. Jeremiah wrote a roll threatening the divine judgment unless repentance took place; but Jehoiakim treated the matter with contempt, and after listening to 3 or 4 leaves of the roll cut it up and committed it to the flames (Jer., ch. 36). Babylon under the Chaldeans was now the dominant Asiatic power. In the 4th year of Jehoiakim's reign, Nebuchadnezzar defeated Necho at Carchemish (605 B.C.) and advanced, probably afterward, against Jerusalem, and Jehoiakim became his servant (II Kings 24:1; Jer. 46:2; Dan. 1:1, 2; see CHRONOLOGY, IV. Three years later he rashly rebelled against Nebuchadnezzar. There were other troubles afflicting the kingdom. Syrians, Moabites, and Ammonites made predatory incursions into its territories, as did bands of Chaldeans, whom Nebuchadnezzar probably dispatched on learning of the revolt (II Kings 24:2). The Babylonian king himself, or his army, eventually entered Jerusalem and bound the Jewish rebel with chains to carry him to Babylon (II Chron. 36:6). The purpose of carrying him to Babylon was apparently abandoned. He died or was murdered, and his body had the burial of an ass, being drawn and cast forth beyond the gates of Jerusalem (Jer. 22:19; 36:30; Jos. Antiq. x. 6, 3). He reigned 11 years and was succeeded by his son Jehoiachin (II Kings 23:36; 24:6).

Jehoi'a-rib (jê-hoi'á-rîb) [Jehovah pleads, or contends]. A descendant of Aaron. His family had grown to a father's house in the time of David and was numbered the 1st course when David distributed the priests into divisions (I Chron. 24:1, 6, 7), and it dwelt at Jerusalem (ch. 9:10).

For other persons of the name, see JOAIRIB.

Jehon'a-dab (jê-hôn'á-dâb). See JONADAB.

Jehon'a-than (jê-hôn'á-thôn), variant form of Jon'a-than [Jehovah has given]. 1. Son of Uzziah, and an official appointed by King David. He was charged with the oversight of the royal treasures which were in various places outside of Jerusalem (I Chron. 27:25, in R.V. Jonathan).

2. One of the Levites sent by Jehoshaphat to teach in the cities of Judah (II Chron. 17:8).

3. A priest, head of the father's house of Shemaiah in the days of the high priest Joiakim (Neh. 12:18).

Jeho'ram (jê-hō'rām) [Jehovah is high].

1. Son of Ahab and king of Israel (II Kings 3:1); see JORAM 3.

2. A priest, one of those sent by Jehoshaphat to instruct the people (II Chron. 17:8).

3. Son of Jehoshaphat and king of Judah (II Kings 8:16, A.V.); see JORAM 5.

Jehoshab'eath (jê'hō-shāb'ê-āth). See JE-HOSHEBA.

Jehosh'a-phat (jê-hōsh'á-fāt), in A.V. of N.T. Jos'a-phat [Jehovah has judged]. 1. Son of Ahilud and recorder under David and Solomon (II Sam. 8:16; 20:24; I Kings 4:3).

2. One of the priests appointed to blow a trumpet before the Ark when it was being brought up from the house of Obed-edom to the city of David (I Chron. 15:24, in R.V. Josphaphat).

3. Son of Paruah and Solomon's purveyor in the territory of Issachar (I Kings 4:17).

4. Son and successor of King Asa on the throne of Judah. He appears to have been associated with his father in the latter's 37th regnal year, the 11th of Omri (I Kings 16:28, 29, LXX), and to have become sole king on the death of his father 5 years later, about 871 B.C. (I Kings 22:41, 42; II Chron. 17:1). He reigned 25 years, including the time that he was associated with Asa. He was 35 years old at his accession. His mother was Azubah, daughter of Shilhi (I Kings 22:42). He was a good king. He worshiped Jehovah and "sought not unto the Baalim" (I Kings 22:43; II Chron. 17:3), although the people still sacrificed on high places (I Kings 22:43). Therefore the Lord greatly prospered him. In the 3d year of his reign, he took measures for instructing his people, sending princes and Levites, with the Book of the Law in their hands, to teach in the cities of Judah (II Chron. 17:7-9). The fear of the Lord fell upon the neighboring kingdoms. Philistines and Arabians paid tribute (vs. 10, 11). He garrisoned the fenced cities of his realm (vs. 12-19). He terminated the desultory warfare which had gone on between Israel and Judah since the time of Rehoboam. He made peace with Israel and took Athaliah, daughter of Ahab, as a wife for his son (I Kings 22:44; II Kings 8:18, 26). When he found that Jehovah was thus blessing him, he was encouraged to remove the high places and the Asherim out of Judah (II Chron. 17:5, 6). He put away also the remnant of the sodomites out of the land (I Kings 22:46).

In 853 or 852 B.C. he went on a visit to King Ahab and was persuaded to join him, with the army of Judah, in the attempt to re-take Ramoth-gilead from the Syrians. Dressed in the royal robes of Ahab, he went into battle. Ahab was mortally wounded; Jehoshaphat, notwithstanding his exposure, survived (I Kings 22:1-38; II Chron. 18:1-34). On his return home he was reproved by the Prophet Jehu, son of Hanani, for having fraternized with such a king as Ahab (II Chron. 19:1, 2). He resumed his work of reformation in church and state, promoting the worship of Jehovah, and appointing judges in the walled towns of Judah, with a supreme court, consisting of Levites, priests, and laymen of high position, in Jerusalem (II Chron. 19:4-11). After this reform had begun, a great confederacy of Ammonites, Moabites, and Edomites invaded Judah from the s.e., making their headquarters at En-gedi on the w. side of the Dead Sea. Jehoshaphat claimed the promise of deliverance which Solomon had asked (cf. II Chron. 6:24-30 with ch. 20:9). Jahaziel prophesied deliverance, and Jehoshaphat went forth with thanksgiving and placed singers before the army to praise the Lord. Success was achieved without fighting. Hostilities broke out in the confederate army, the Ammonites and Moabites attacked and destroyed the Edomites, and they, quarreling among themselves, turned their weapons against each other (ch. 20:1-30). After this event, perhaps in late autumn during the time of peace, Jehoshaphat, who had been building ships at Ezion-geber, asked Ahaziah, king of Israel, to take part in a mercantile voyage. The Prophet Eliezer rebuked him for joining himself with Ahaziah, and the ships were wrecked. Ahaziah desired to share in a new venture, but Jehoshaphat refused (II Chron. 20:35-37; I Kings 22:48, 49). About 850 B.C., Jehoram, king of Israel, desired to render Moab again tributary to Israel, and sounded Jehoshaphat on his willingness to aid. Jehoram had exhibited signs of godliness by a considerable reformation (II Kings 3:2), and Jehoshaphat consented to join him. The expedition enjoyed partial success (II Kings 3:4-27). Jehoshaphat died at the age of 60, about the year 850 B.C., and was buried in the city of David, leaving his son Jehoram to ascend the throne (I Kings 22:50).

5. Son of Nimshi and father of Jehu, king of Israel (II Kings 9:2, 14).

Jehosh'aphat (jê-hôsh'â-fât), Val'ley of. A valley where all nations shall be gathered by Jehovah for judgment (Joel 3:2, 12). At least as early as the time of Eusebius, in the 4th century A.D., the valley of Jehoshaphat was identified with the valley of the Kidron, so that now Jews, Roman Catholics, and Mohammedans fix the scene of the Last Judgment here. This identification is only a conjecture, based on the cited passages and Zech., ch. 14. So far as evidence goes, no valley actually bore this name. Joel doubtless chose this designation, which means "Jehovah hath judged," as symbolic of the event.

Jehosh'e'ba (jê-hôsh'ê-bâ), Je'ho'shab'e'ath (jê'hô-shâb'ê-âth) [Jehovah is an oath]. Daughter of Jehoram and sister of Ahaziah, kings of Judah, and wife of the high priest Jehoiada. On the murder of Ahaziah and the slaughter of the seed royal, Jehosheba rescued his infant son Joash and hid him in the Temple until he could be safely proclaimed king (II Kings 11:2; II Chron. 22:11).

Jehosh'u'a (jê-hôsh'û-â) and Je'hosh'u'ah (jê-hôsh'û-â). See JOSHUA.

Je'ho'vah (jê-hô'vâ). The common Eng. pronunciation of the Heb. tetragram YHWH, one of the names of God (Ex. 17:15). The original name was occasionally used even by so late a writer as Nehemiah (Neh. 1:5; 5:13; 8:1), in fact a form of it constitutes the latter part of his name. But it was not the favorite name of God with him; and it had ceased to be pronounced when the LXX was made, for the translators substituted Lord. It seems that, out of reverence for the divine name, there had grown up around 300 B.C. the custom among the Jews in reading to pronounce the word 'ādōnāy (my Lord, or LORD) in its stead or, when it follows 'ādōnāy, to pronounce 'ēlōhīm, God (Gen. 15:2). When the vowel points were added to the Heb. consonantal text, the vowels of 'ādōnāy and 'ēlōhīm were accordingly given to the tetragram. This pointing gave rise to the Eng. pronunciation, Jehovah, current since the days of Petrus Galatinus, confessor of Leo X, A.D. 1518. The substitution of the word Lord by the later Hebrews and by the translators of the LXX led to the like substitution in the A.V. (Gen. 2:4). In such instances Lord is printed in small capitals. The tetragram is generally believed to have been pronounced Yāhweh, because the divine name Jah (Ps. 89:8, R.V. marg.) and the forms Yêho, Yô and Yāh, Yāhū, which occur constantly in proper names, as in the Heb. of Jehoshaphat, Josaphat, Shephatiah, can all be derived from Yāhweh. This pronunciation is also favored by Gr. transcriptions: Iabe, Iaoue, Iaouai, Iaē. Yāhweh is an archaic form. It is the Qal imperfect of the verb hāwāh, later hāyāh, to befall, come to pass, happen, become, be; cf. Arab. hawā, to fall. The name accordingly means "He who happens (upon us), he who befalls (upon us), he who in the absolute sense exists and who manifests his existence and his character" (Ex. 3:13-15). The creator, upholder, and moral governor of the universe is 'ēlōhīm, God; the covenant God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, the God in whom lay their present strength and their hope for their future existence, is El Shaddai ('ēl Shadday, God Almighty); but the God of revelation and grace, dwelling with his people, guiding and delivering them, and receiving their worship is Jehovah.

Whether the name was known to other peoples before it attained to celebrity through the Hebrews is still a question. Men began to call upon the name of Jehovah in the days of Enosh, the 3d from Adam (Gen. 4:26). It must not be inferred, however, that they necessarily used the name Jehovah. They worshiped the God of revelation and grace, whatever name they may have employed to denote the idea. Its 1st occurrence in recorded proper names is in Jochebed, an ancestress of Moses (see also I Chron. 2:8, 24). In the generation after the Exodus, it appears in Joshua (Num. 13:16). It then becomes frequent (II Chron. 6:6, 7, 36).

To know that God is Jehovah and to know the name of Jehovah do not denote a mere external acquaintance with the word Jehovah, but an experience of God manifesting himself to his people in grace and love (I Kings 8:43; Ps. 9:10; 91:14; Isa. 52:6; Jer. 16:21). In Ex. 6:2-8 God promises that the Children of Israel shall be delivered from bondage and have an experience of his gracious intervention and love such as their forefathers had not known. See PENTATEUCH.

Je'ho'vah-jî'reh (jê-hô'vâ-jî-rê) [Jehovah will see or provide]. The name given by Abraham to the place where God provided a ram to be offered in sacrifice, instead of Isaac (Gen. 22:14). Exact site unknown.

Je-ho'vah-nis'si (jê-hô'vá-nîs'î) [Jehovah is my banner]. The name given by Moses to an altar built by him at Rephidim as a memorial of Israel's victory over Amalek (Ex. 17:15, 16).

Je-ho'vah-sha'lom (jê-hô'vá-shâ'lôm) [Jehovah is peace]. An altar built by Gideon in Ophrah to commemorate the visit of Jehovah's angel, who summoned him to deliver Israel, and, when Gideon expected to die because he had seen the heavenly one, said to him: "Peace be unto thee; . . . thou shalt not die" (Judg. 6:23, 24).

Je-hoz'a-bad (jê-hôz'â-bäd) [Jehovah has bestowed]. 1. A Korahite porter, son of Obededom (I Chron. 26:4).

2. Son of a Moabitess, and a servant of Joash and one of his assassins (II Kings 12:21; II Chron. 24:26). He was put to death for the deed (II Chron. 25:3).

3. A Benjamite, a high military captain under King Jehoshaphat (II Chron. 17:18).

Je-hoz'a-dak (jê-hôz'â-däk). See JOZADAK.

Je'hu (jê'hû) [probably, Jehovah is He].

1. A Benjamite of Anathoth, who joined David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:3).

2. A prophet, son of Hanani. He denounced judgment against Baasha and his house for continuing in the sin of Jeroboam I (I Kings 16:1-4, 7). He reproved Jehoshaphat for helping ungodly Ahab (II Chron. 19:2), and wrote a book in which the acts of Jehoshaphat were narrated (ch. 20:34).

3. The founder of the 4th dynasty of rulers in the Kingdom of Israel. He was a son of Jehoshaphat and grandson of Nimshi, but was often called the son of Nimshi (I Kings 19:16; II Kings 9:2). He was a soldier in the service of Ahab (II Kings 9:25), and when Ahab and Jezebel were rejected for their crimes, Elijah received a command from God to anoint Jehu king over Israel (I Kings 19:16, 17). The commission was executed by Elijah's successor, Elisha, who for that purpose sent a young prophet to Ramoth-gilead, where Jehu was with the army. The prophet anointed Jehu king over Israel and commissioned him to destroy the house of Ahab. On learning the purpose of the prophet's visit, Jehu's fellow officers resolved to support him. They went to Jezreel, where the reigning king, Jehoram, Ahab's son, was at the time. The watchman on the tower in Jezreel descried the party in the distance, and presently identified Jehu by his furious driving. Aha-ziah, king of Judah, was visiting Jehoram; and the two kings, each in his chariot, went out to meet the advancing company. They met at the vineyard which Ahab had wrongfully gotten through the judicial murder of Naboth. The parley was short, and Jehoram was killed by an arrow sent with great force from Jehu's bow, and his body was cast into the plot of ground which had been Naboth's. Ahaziah also, whose mother was Ahab's daughter, was smitten by Jehu's order. By his command also, Jezebel, the queen-mother, Ahab's heathen queen and evil genius, was flung from a window and killed (II Kings 9:1-37). Then he induced their guardians to slay the 70 princes of the royal house; and the heads were piled in 2 heaps at the gate of Jezreel. Jehu had been ordered to smite the house of Ahab (ch. 9:7); hence his deeds thus far, apart from their needless brutality, were acts of obedience. As such they are commended (ch. 10:30). But they were not wrought in singleness of heart, from a sense of duty and for the honor of Jehovah (v. 31); and the Prophet Hosea condemns the motive (Hos. 1:4). Next Ahab's great men and his familiar friends were slain, and then Ahaziah's 42 brothers. Finally the priests and worshipers of Baal were summoned to a festival of the god, and all who managed to get into Baal's temple were massacred (II Kings 10:12-28). But Jehu himself took no heed to walk in the law of God, and did not depart from the schismatic calf worship (II Kings 10:29, 31). He ascended the throne c. 842 B.C. In that year, according to Assyrian records, he paid tribute to Shalmaneser, king of Assyria, who came into the neighborhood to wage war against Hazael. He reigned 28 years (v. 36). About 821 B.C., on account of his advancing age and loss of his energy and military skill, his son Jehoahaz was probably associated with him. But the change did not prevent his reign from closing in disaster. Hazael cut Israel short (v. 32); see CHRONOLOGY, IV. A promise had been given that the dynasty of Jehu should continue for 4 generations; and it did so, the line of descent being Jehoahaz, Jehoash or Joash, Jeroboam II, and Zechariah (chs. 10:30; 15:8-12).

4. A man of Judah, family of Jerahmeel (I Chron. 2:38).

5. A Simeonite (I Chron. 4:35).

Je-hub'bah (jê-hûb'â) [kethib, Yahbâh, he (God) hides]. An Asherite, family of Beriah (I Chron. 7:34). J.V. follows the kere: "and Hubbah."

Je-hu'al (jê-hû'kāl), Ju'al [Jehovah is able]. A son of Shelemiah and prince of

Jehu Bringing Tribute to Shalmaneser, King of Assyria

Judah. King Zedekiah sent him and others to ask the prayers of Jeremiah, when the Babylonian siege of Jerusalem was imminent (Jer. 37:3). Afterward he wished the prophet to be put to death on the ground that his prediction of the capture of Jerusalem by the Babylonians discouraged its defenders (ch. 38:1-6).

Je'hud (jě'hūd) [praise]. A town in the original territory of Dan (Josh. 19:45); modern Yazūr, about 5 miles s. e. of Joppa.

Je-hu'di (jě-hū'dī) [a man of Judah, a Jew]. A messenger sent by King Jehoiakim to ask Baruch for the roll written by Jeremiah. He was afterward employed to read it, which he did, till the king, enraged at its contents, cut it in pieces and cast it into the fire (Jer. 36:14, 21, 23).

Je-hu'di'jah (jě'hū-dī'já) [Jewess]. One of the 2 wives of Mered, the other being Bithiah, an Egyptian princess (I Chron. 4:18, A.V.). Jehudiah is, however, not a proper name, but an adjective meaning Jewess; and it has the definite article (R.V.). She was called the Jewess to distinguish her from the Egyptian.

Je'hush (jě'hūsh). See JEUSH.

Je'el (jě'ēl), in A.V. twice Je-hi'el (I Chron. 9:35; 11:44) [El (God) has gathered; cf. Arab. wa'ā, gather]. 1. Father of the inhabitants of Gibeon and an ancestor of King Saul (I Chron. 9:35, 36, 39); see KISH 2.

2. A son of Hotham, an Aroerite, in the reign of David (I Chron. 11:44). Perhaps he was the Reubenite chief (ch. 5:6, 7).

3. A Levite musician (I Chron. 16:5, first half); see JAAZIEL.

4. A Levite of the 2d degree, who was a doorkeeper and played the harp at the removal of the Ark to Jerusalem and afterward as a regular duty in the tent at Jerusalem (I Chron. 15:18, 21; 16:5).

5. A Levite of the sons of Asaph (II Chron. 20:14).

6. A scribe who recorded the number of soldiers in Uzziah's army (II Chron. 26:11).

7. A Hebrew who was induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:43).

For others whose name is thus spelled in A.V., see JEUEL 3. Jehiel in R.V. is a different name.

Je-kab'ze-el (jě-kāb'zē-ēl). See KABZEEL.

Je-k'a-me'am (jěk'ā-mē'ām) [the (divine) kinsman will raise up]. A Levite, family of Kohath, house of Hebron (I Chron. 23:19; 24:23).

Je-k'a-mi'ah (jěk'ā-mī'ā), in A.V. once Jec'a-mi'ah (I Chron. 3:18) [Jehovah will raise up]. 1. A man of Judah, descended through Sheshan from Jerahmeel (I Chron. 2:41).

2. A son or descendant of Jeconiah (I Chron. 3:18).

Je-ku'thi-el (jě-kū'thī-ēl) [El (God) will nourish; cf. Arab. kāta, to nourish, support]. A man of Judah, father of the inhabitants of Zanoah (I Chron. 4:18).

Je-mi'mah (jě-mī'mā), in A.V. Je-mi'ma (jě-mī'mā) [a pigeon, a dove]. The 1st of the 3 daughters born to Job after his great trial (Job 42:14).

Je-mu'el (jě-mū'ēl). A son of Simeon (Gen. 46:10; Ex. 6:15). In Num. 26:12; I Chron. 4:24 he is called Nemuel. He founded a tribal family.

Jeph'thah (jěf'thā), in A.V. of N.T. Jeph-thae (jěf'thē) [he will open or set free; perhaps, will open (the womb)]. A Gileadite, in the twofold sense of having a certain man called Gilead for his father and the country of Gilead for his early home. He was an illegitimate child, and his brothers born in wedlock expelled him from the paternal abode. He saw injustice in the treatment which he received, and years later he charged the elders of Gilead, among whom were probably his brothers, with being party to the iniquity and animated by hatred. He fled to the land of Tob, probably in the Hauran, where life was free and where with trusty weapon abundant food was to be had. There he made a name for himself by his prowess, and attracted a band of the unemployed around him as their chief. He must not be thought of as a lawless freebooter, however, for he was a man with a conscience. He sought sufficient justification before undertaking an enterprise, he feared God and taught his daughter the fear of God, and he won her entire confidence and religious respect. About the time of Jephthah's expulsion, the Ammonites invaded the Israelitish territory e. of the Jordan and held it in subjection 18 years. In this extremity the elders of Gilead, who had driven Jephthah away, were compelled as a last resort to urge the fugitive to return and become their chief and deliverer. On assuming headship over the Gileadites, Jephthah informed the neighboring tribe of Ephraim of the distress of Gilead, but he exhorted them in vain to come to the help of their brethren. He also demanded of the king of the Ammonites the ground of his hostility, whose reply justified Israel for taking up arms. While yet the issue of the war was doubtful, Jephthah had vowed that if he were permitted to achieve victory, he would offer to God as a burnt offering whatever first came to him out of his house. On his return from the defeat of the Ammonites what first came was his only daughter, who, moreover, was his only child. He was greatly troubled when he saw her, but felt compelled to do with her according to his vow. Probably he sacrificed her (cf. II Kings 3:27), though many have thought that he may have redeemed her with money (Lev. 27:1-8) and doomed her to perpetual celibacy. The Israelite women were accustomed 4 times a year to mourn her sad fate. Hostilities breaking out between him and the Ephraimites, who complained that he had slighted them in making arrangements for his Ammonite campaign, he answered their false accusation and defeated them in battle. Jephthah judged Israel 6 years (Judg. 10:6 to 12:7). Samuel cited him as one proof of Jehovah's faithfulness to his promise to raise up a deliverer for Israel in time of need (I Sam. 12:11), and he is cited in The Epistle to the Hebrews as a man of faith (Heb. 11:32).

Je-phun'neh (jě-fūn'ē) [It will be prepared]. 1. Father of Caleb, the representative spy from the tribe of Judah (Num. 13:6).

2. An Asherite (I Chron. 7:38).

Je'rah (jě'rā) [moon]. An Arabian tribe descended from Joktan (Gen. 10:26; I Chron. 1:20).

Je-rah'meel (jě-rā'mē-ēl) [may God have compassion, or God pity]. 1. A descendant of Judah through Perez and Hezron (I Chron. 2:9; cf. vs. 4, 5). Two wives are mentioned and a numerous progeny is registered (vs. 25-41).

2. Son of a Levite called Kish, not Saul's father (I Chron. 24:29).

3. One of the officers sent by King Jeholaim to arrest Baruch (Jer. 36:26). He was probably of royal blood (R.V.). See HAMMELECH.

Je'red (jě'rēd) [descent]. 1. Son of Mahalalel (I Chron. 1:2, A.V.); see JARED.

2. A man of Judah and father of the inhabitants of Gedor (I Chron. 4:18).

Jer'e-mai (jĕr'ĕ-mī) [high]. A Hebrew who was induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:33).

Jer'e-mi'ah (jĕr'ĕ-mī'ā), in A.V. of N.T. Jer'e-my and Jer'e-mi'as (jĕr'ĕ-mi'ās) (Matt. 2:17; 16:14) [Jehovah founds, establishes; or perhaps, lifts up, exalts]. 1-3. A Benjamite and 2 Gadites who joined David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:4, 10, 13).

4. Head of a father's house in e. Manasseh (I Chron. 5:24).

5. A native of Libnah and the father of Hamutal, wife of King Josiah and mother of Jehoahaz (II Kings 23:30, 31).

6. Son of Habaziniab and father of Jaazaniah, a Rechabite (Jer. 35:3).

7. The great prophet, a son of Hilkiah, a priest of Anathoth, in the territory of Benjamin (Jer. 1:1). He was called to the prophetic office by a vision. He was young at the time, and felt his immaturity and inexperience and inability to speak to men; but Jehovah reached out a hand and touched Jeremiah's mouth, putting into it words, and setting him over nations and kingdoms, on the one hand to root out, overthrow, and destroy, and on the other to plant and to build. He was told, further, that he would meet with violent opposition from princes, priests and people, but that they should not prevail (ch. 1:4-10). He began to prophesy in the 13th year of the reign of Josiah, and continued his work till the capture of Jerusalem, in the 5th month of the 11th year of Zedekiah's reign (vs. 2, 3). Thus his public life extended through the last 18 years of Josiah's reign, the 3 months during which Jehoahaz ruled, the 11 years of Jehoiakim, the 3 months of Jehoiachin, and the 11 years and 5 months of Zedekiah, in all about 41 years. Nor did he, even then, cease from his prophetic functions (chs. 42 to 44).

The men of Anathoth, his paternal home, were among the first to oppose him, and threatened to kill him if he did not desist from prophesying. He persevered in his mission despite the persecution, but he felt keenly this opposition to the work of God from his countrymen, the chosen people of God, and he cried to God for judgment (Jer. 11:18-21; 12:3). The hostility to the prophet, which began at Anathoth, after a time became general, and again evoked a cry for judgment upon his opponents (ch. 18:18-23; cf. also ch. 20:12). But he remained faithful to his duty in spite of obloquy and persecution. In the 4th year of Jehoiakim's reign Jeremiah dictated the prophecies which he had been uttering during the preceding 20 years, and the scribe Baruch wrote them in the roll of a book. Knowing that he himself was hindered, for some reason not stated, and would doubtless still be hindered for a long time, from going to the house of God, the prophet told Baruch to take the roll to the sanctuary and read it before the people who would be coming to the Temple on occasion of a fast. The roll finally reached the king, who, after hearing a few leaves or columns read, cut the roll in pieces and flung it into the fire until the entire roll had been read and burned a section at a time (ch. 36:1-26). By divine direction the prophet at once prepared a 2d roll like the 1st, but with additions (vs. 27-32). A foe of his, the priest Pashhur, chief governor of the Temple, put him in the stocks; but he was released the next day (ch. 20:1-3).

During the siege of Jerusalem the Jewish authorities looked at Jeremiah's prophecies of the success of the Chaldeans and the subsequent captivity of Judah from the political or military, instead of from the religious, point of view; and they claimed that his unfavorable predictions discouraged the defenders of Jerusalem. And when the Chaldeans temporarily raised the siege to meet the Egyptians, and Jeremiah was about to take advantage of their absence to go to Anathoth on business, the charge was made against him that he was deserting to the Chaldeans, and he was thrown into prison (ch. 37:1-15). After many days King Zedekiah released him from his cell and committed him to the court of the guard (vs. 16-21); but the princes soon had him cast into the dungeon to die (ch. 38:1-6). An Ethiopian eunuch, however, took compassion on him and obtained the king's leave to take him from the miry pit and put him back in the court of the guard. The prophet was there when Jerusalem was taken (vs. 7-28). The Chaldeans looked upon him as one who had suffered much for them, and Nebuchadnezzar gave express orders for his kind treatment. Accordingly, Nebuzaradan, the Chaldean official, sent and had Jeremiah taken out of the court of the guard and brought to him with the other captives to

A Potter Working at His Wheel (Jer., ch. 18)

Ramah, set him free, and granted him leave to go to Babylon or stay in the home land. On his choosing the latter, Nebuzaradan gave him victuals and a present and sent him to the protection of Gedaliah, whom Nebuchadnezzar had made governor of Judah (ch. 39:11-14; 40:1-6). On the murder of Gedaliah, Jeremiah strongly urged the Jews not to flee to Egypt. It was in vain; they not merely went thither themselves, but they compelled the prophet to accompany them on their journey (chs. 41:1 to 43:7). He delivered his last predictions at Tahpanhes, in Egypt (chs. 43:8 to 44:30). The time and manner of his death are unknown.

Beyond most prophecies The Book of Jeremiah reveals the spiritual life of its author. His was a message of doom to his native land, and a message that brought the hatred of his fellow-countrymen upon him; and the burden of it forced from him the bitter lament that he had ever been born (chs. 15:10; 20:14-18). But he remained true to duty. He was a lone man, misunderstood, maligned, persecuted, his efforts for the moral welfare of his countrymen foredoomed to failure, without the solace of domestic life and social joys (ch. 16:1-9), often kept in ward, forced to turn for consolation and sympathy and companionship to God only. Being thus thrown much upon God, he came to realize the sense of individual responsibility to God (chs. 17:9; 31:29, 30). And so it comes to pass that in Jeremiah is notably exhibited the possibility and reality of communion between the individual soul and God.

Religion in the heart and in the life is a dominant note in Jeremiah's preaching. He was called to the prophetic office 5 years before the eventful discovery of the Book of the Law in the Temple, during repairs to the edifice; and he was in the midst of his work when King Josiah, under the profound impression made upon him by the words of the book, led the crusade against idolatry and inaugurated a revival in the national worship. Jeremiah, too, exhorted the people to hearken to the words of the covenant entered into at Mount Sinai; and he pointed out that God had visited them with the evils threatened therein for disobedience, and that to obey is the 1st requirement of the covenant (Jer. 11:1-8). Jeremiah would guard the people from limiting reform to things external. He would carry it into the inner life. In the spirit of the older prophets, of the familiar proverb, and of the covenant itself (I Sam. 15:22; Isa. 1:11-17; Amos 5:21-24; Micah 6:6-8; Prov. 15:8; Deut. 10:12), and using the rhetorical negation, frequently employed for emphatic antithesis (e.g. Deut. 5:3), he denied that God commanded sacrifice, and insisted that the one requirement is obedience. God commanded sacrifice indeed (Ex. 20:24; 23:14-19; Deut. 12:6), but did not speak of sacrifice. Sacrifice was not the theme; God spoke of moral conduct (Jer. 7:21-28; cf. chs. 6:20; 14:12). The sacrifices of the obedient are pleasing to God (chs. 17:24-26; 27:19-22; 33:10, 11, 18, the latter verse in a section lacking in the LXX); but the fasts and sacrifices of those who love to wander from him are not acceptable (ch. 14:10-12). Trust in the presence of Jehovah in the Temple in the midst of Israel is also vain; and equally vain is the mere possession of the Law of Jehovah. Obedience alone avails (chs. 7:4-7; 8:7-9). Eventually even the Ark will be no more remembered (ch. 3:16). God looks at the heart (chs. 11:20; 17:10; 20:12). To serve God man must remove carnal lust from the heart (Jer. 4:4; cf. Deut. 10:16), wash it of wickedness (Jer. 4:14), and return to God with the whole heart and not feignedly (chs. 3:10; 17:5). In due time Jeremiah foretold the new covenant when the people shall have a new heart and God's Law written in it (chs. 24:7; 31:33; 32:39, 40). His vision desecrated the true glory of the Kingdom of the future. Henceforth this truth holds a chief place in the mind of God's people.

Jeremiah committed some of his prophecies to writing in the reign of Jehoiakim, but the roll was destroyed by the king (ch. 36:1, 23). They were soon rewritten, however, with large additions (v. 32). The present book is a further enlargement, including the later prophecies; and is a rearrangement, prepared at the close of his ministry; for prophecies of different periods are placed together and those of the same period are often dispersed.

The Book of Jeremiah consists of an introduction narrating the prophet's call (ch. 1), 3 sections of prophecy, often recorded in connection with the event that called forth the prophetic utterance (chs. 2 to 51), and a historical appendix, added probably by a later writer (ch. 52; cf. ch. 51:64). The 3 prophetic sections are:

I. Prediction of the approaching judgment of Judah and the promise of restoration from exile (chs. 2 to 33). It includes a general denunciation of Judah (chs. 2 to 20), denunciation of the civil and religious rulers

(chs. 21 to 23), an unfolding of the design and duration of the judgment (chs. 24 to 29), and prophecy of the blessings which will follow the judgment (chs. 30 to 33).

II. History of the infliction of the judgment (chs. 34 to 44), including denunciations of the corruption which prevailed immediately before the destruction of the city (chs. 34 to 38), an account of the destruction of the city (ch. 39), and of the wretched conditions of the remnant, and the prophecies spoken to them (chs. 40 to 44).

III. Predictions respecting foreign nations (chs. 46 to 51), introduced by an address to Baruch (ch. 45).

The Messiah is spoken of in ch. 23:5-8; 30:4-11; 33:14-26; and Jehovah's sure covenant with Israel is dwelt upon in chs. 31:31-40; 32:36-44; 33.

The text of the LXX differs considerably from the Heb.: chapters 46 to 51 are not only arranged in a different order among themselves, but the entire section has been inserted after ch. 25:13; chs. 29:16-20, and 33:14-26, and 39:4-13, and 52:28-30 are wanting in the Gr.; and in many other places the Gr. version presents a shorter text than the Heb. (e.g. chs. 2:1, 2; 7:1-3). This shorter text is often due to the absence of unimportant words, such as the customary lack of "the prophet" when Jeremiah is named (e.g. ch. 28:5, 11, 15), "the king," when the proper name is given (chs. 36:32; 37:17) and vice versa (e.g. chs. 26:22, 23; 37:18, 21), "of hosts" after Jehovah (e.g. ch. 6:6, 9), "of hosts, the God of Israel," the sufficient title Lord being used instead (e.g. chs. 7:21; 19:15), and "saith the Lord," where the expression is parenthetic (e.g., chs. 2:9; 3:10; 7:13).

In chronological order the prophecies and narratives, so far as they bear explicit dates, stand thus:

In Josiah's reign of 31 years:

In the 13th year... ch. 1.

Between the 13th and 31st years. { chs. 2 to 6 (cf. 3:6),

8. A chief of the priests, who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Neh. 12:1, 7). A father's house bore his name in the next generation (v. 12).

9. A priest, doubtless head of a father's house, who set his seal to the covenant to keep separate from the foreigners and observe the Law of God (Neh. 10:2).

Jer'e-moth (jēr'ē-mōth) and Jer'i-moth (jēr'i-mōth) [swollen, thick, tall; cf. Arab. warima, to be swollen, to shoot up high]. 1. A Benjamite, family of Becher (I Chron. 7:8).

2. A Benjamite (I Chron. 8:14), probably the person called Jeroham (v. 27).

3. A Levite, family of Merari, house of Mushi (I Chron. 23:23; 24:30).

4. A descendant of Heman and head of the 15th course among the musicians in David's reign (I Chron. 25:4, 22).

5. A son of Azriel and prince of Naphtali in David's reign (I Chron. 27:19).

6-8. Two descendants of Elam (Ezra 10:26, 27) and a son of Bani (ch. 10:29, in A.V. and J.V., which follow the kere: and Ramoth), who consented to put away their foreign wives.

For persons who bear the name Jerimoth only, see JERIMOTH.

Jer'e-my (jēr'ē-mī). See JEREMIAH.

Jer-i'ah (jē-rī'á), once Jer-i'jah [Jehovah sees]. A Levite, family of Kohath, house of Hebron (I Chron. 23:19; 24:23; 26:31).

Jer-t'bai (jēr't-bī) [Jehovah contends, pleads]. A son of Elnaam, and one of David's mighty men (I Chron. 11:46).

Jer't'cho (jēr't-kō) [moon city, or perhaps, place of fragrance]. An important city situated in the valley of the Jordan (Deut. 34:1, 3), w. of the river about 5 miles from the n. end of the Dead Sea and about 17 miles from Jerusalem, at the foot of the ascent to the mountainous tableland of Judah. It was known as the city of palm trees (ibid.; Judg. 3:13). It is first mentioned in Scripture when the Israelites encamped at Shittim on the e. side of the Jordan (Num. 22:1; 26:3). As it was strongly fortified and commanded the valley of the lower Jordan and the passes into the w. mountains, its conquest by the Israelites was essential to their advance. Joshua accordingly sent spies to examine it (Josh. 2:1-24), led the Israelites across the river, and pitched camp near the city. By divine command the men of war went round the city once a day for 6 consecutive days, with the Ark of the Covenant in their midst and 7 priests blowing on trumpets in front of the Ark. On the 7th day they compassed the city 7 times; and on the 7th circuit, when the signal was given by a long blast with the horn, the host shouted, the walls fell, and the Israelites entered. It seems reasonable to suppose that God's purpose was accomplished by an earthquake which occurred at that time by divine intervention and threw down the walls. For date, see EGYPT, III. 8. The place had been put under the ban. Except Rahab, who had protected the spies, and her father's family, all living creatures were slain. The silver and the gold, with other valuables, were put into the treasury of the house of the Lord. Finally, Joshua foretold that if anyone ever fortified the town he should lose his elder son when the foundations were being laid, and the younger one when the gates were being set up (Josh. 5:13 to 6:26). The place was assigned to Benjamin, and stood on the boundary between the tribes of Ephraim and Benjamin (chs. 16:1, 7; 18:12, 21). It was occupied as a royal residence by Eglon, king of Moab, when he oppressed the Israelites (Judg. 3:13). David's ambassadors, returning from the Ammonite king by whom they had been insulted, stopped at Jericho until their beards grew (II Sam. 10:5; I Chron. 19:5). In Ahab's reign Hiel the Bethelite fortified the city, but lost or sacrificed his 2 sons as predicted by Joshua (I Kings 16:34). During Elijah's lifetime there was a community of the prophets at the place (II Kings 2:5). Elijah, when about to be translated to heaven, passed through it with Elisha, and Elisha returned to it after finally parting with Elijah (vs. 4, 15, 18). The captives of Judah, taken by the Israelite army under Pekah, were set free at Jericho (II Chron. 28:15). In its vicinity Zedekiah was captured by his Babylonian pursuers (II Kings 25:5; Jer. 39:5; 52:8). Three hundred and forty-five former inhabitants and their descendants returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:34; Neh. 7:36). Some of its new populace helped to rebuild the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:2). Bacchides, the Syrian general, repaired the fortifications of Jericho during the Maccabaeen period (I Macc. 9:50). In the early years of Herod the Great the Romans plundered Jericho (Jos. Antiq. xiv. 15, 3). Subsequently Herod beautified it, established a royal palace, and on the hill behind the town built a citadel which he named Cyprus (Jos. Antiq. xvi. 5, 2; xvii. 13, 1; War i. 21, 4 and 9). There was also a hippodrome there at the time of Herod's death (Jos. Antiq. xvii. 6, 5; War i. 33, 6 and 8). The road from Jerusalem to Jericho was the scene of the action in the parable of the Good Samaritan (Luke 10:30). At Jericho itself Jesus restored sight to blind Bartimaeus and his companion (Matt. 20:29; Luke 18:35). There also he brought salvation to Zacchaeus, whose home was in Jericho (Luke 19:1, 2).

Jericho, lying 820 feet below the level of the Mediterranean, has a tropical climate. Palms, balsams, sycamores, and henna flourished (S. of Sol. 1:14; Luke 19:2, 4; Jos. War iv. 8, 3). The rose plant of Jericho was proverbially fine (Ecclus. 24:14). Ancient Jericho stood close by the copious spring 'Ain es-Sultān, apparently the fountain healed by Elisha (Jos. War iv. 8, 3). The modern village called er-Riha is 1½ miles s.e. of the fountain.

Jer'i-el (jēr'i-ēl) [El (God) sees]. A descendant of Tola, of the tribe of Issachar (I Chron. 7:2).

Jer-i'jah (jē-rī'já). See JERIAH.

Jer'i-moth (jēr'i-mōth) [cf. Jeremoth]. 1. A Benjamite, family of Bela (I Chron. 7:7).

2. A Benjamite who joined David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:5).

3. A son of David, and father of Mahalath, a wife of Rehoboam (II Chron. 11:18).

4. A Levite, an overseer in connection with the Temple in Hezekiah's reign (II Chron. 31:13).

For others whose name sometimes appears as Jeremoth, see JEREMOTH.

Jer't'oth (jēr't-ōth) [(tent) curtains]. One of Caleb's wives (I Chron. 2:18).

Jer'o-bo'am (jēr'ō-bō'ām) [the people become numerous]. 1. An Ephraimite, who founded the kingdom of the ten tribes. His father was an official under Solomon, named Nebat, of the village of Zeredah in the Jordan Valley; his mother's name was Zeruah, who was a widow at the time of his birth (I Kings 11:26). As a young man he showed industry and ability; and Solomon, who was engaged in building operations at Jerusalem, made him overseer of the heavy work assigned to the house of Joseph (vs. 27, 28). One day as Jeroboam was walking outside of Jerusalem he was met by a prophet, Ahijah of Shiloh, clad in a new garment, who rent the cloth in 12 pieces, and gave 10 to Jeroboam as a pledge that Jehovah destined him to be king over 10 out of the 12 tribes. News of the transaction reached Solomon, who sought to kill Jeroboam, but he escaped to Egypt and was kindly received by Shishak, its king (vs. 29-40). When the refugee was notified that Solomon was dead and that an assembly of the tribes was to take place at Shechem to make Solomon's son Rehoboam king, he returned to attend the meeting. He put himself forward as spokesman of the people, and urged the alleviation of their burdens. Rehoboam denied the petition, returning a foolish and exasperating answer. Ten tribes thereupon revolted from the house of David and elected Jeroboam king. The prophecy of Ahijah had come true; yet Jeroboam resolved to depart from the counsel by which it had been accompanied. The prophet had exhorted him to remain true to Jehovah, in which case the crown should descend permanently in his family (vs. 37, 38). But he was afraid that if the people went up at stated times to Jerusalem to worship they would be won back to the house of David and would reject and slay him. He therefore established a center of worship at each of the 2 extremes of his kingdom, Dan in the n. and Beth-el in the s. In defiance of the commandment which forbids the adoration of God by means of images, he set up a golden calf in each of the 2 places (I Kings 12:26-30; II Chron. 13:8), and recommended the worship as not altogether new by using the familiar words of Aaron (Ex. 32:4). It seems that his plan was to worship Jehovah under the image of the calf. Furthermore he established houses of high places, and he made Israelites who were not of the tribe of Levi priests, doubtless because few or none of the lawful priests and other Levites consented to serve in the idolatrous and schismatic worship (I Kings 12:31; II Chron. 11:13-15; 13:9). He further decreed that the harvest festival, which was celebrated in Judah on the 15th day of the 7th month, should be observed in the Northern Kingdom on the 15th day of the 8th month (I Kings 12:32, 33). The mass of the people conformed. Thus Jeroboam made Israel to sin. This abhorrent worship continued until the fall of the kingdom. The successive kings, with the possible exception of Hoshea, supported it and are accordingly described as walking in the way of Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin (I Kings 15:26, 34; 16:19, 31; 22:52; II Kings 3:3; 10:29; 13:2, 11; 14:24; 15:9, 18, 24, 28). The idolatry established by Jeroboam was one cause which led to the carrying of the 10 tribes into captivity to Assyria (II Kings 17:16); for it kept the Hebrew nation divided and made 2 inferior kingdoms where there had been one strong united people; and, as it was a degradation of the lofty spiritual worship of Jehovah, it resulted in lowering the spiritual tone of the northern Israelites. Jeroboam was rebuked for his apostasy, first by an unnamed prophet from Judah, and then by Ahijah, the Shilonite, who had promised him the kingdom; but he continued to the end unrepentant (I Kings 13:1 to 14:18). He fortified Shechem and Penuel, both sacred places. The former he made his residence, but seems to have taken up his abode later at beautiful Tirzah (I Kings 12:25; 14:17; S. of Sol. 6:4). There was a desultory warfare between Jeroboam and Rehoboam (I Kings 15:6), and a great battle was fought between Jeroboam and Rehoboam's son and successor, Abijam, in which the army of Israel was defeated with a great slaughter, and Beth-el, which was only 10 miles from Jerusalem, was captured by Abijam (I Kings 15:7; II Chron. 13:1-20; see ABIJAM. Jeroboam was made king c. 931 B.C., and reigned 22 years (I Kings 14:20). One son of his had died in infancy (vs. 1-17); another, Nadab, ascended the throne (v. 20).

2. The son of Joash, king of Israel, and his successor on the throne of the 10 tribes. He was of the dynasty of Jehu, and the 3d in descent from that ruler. He became king in Samaria c. 785 B.C., and reigned 41 years. He found the kingdom in a low state, but raised it again to prosperity, capturing Damascus, the capital of Syria, and Hamath in the valley of the Orontes, and restoring to Israel the country from the entrance of Hamath to the Dead Sea. These successes had been predicted by Jonah (II Kings 14:23-28; cf. Deut. 3:17). Amos prophesied in Jeroboam's reign (Amos 1:1), drawing a dark picture of the moral and religious state of Israel at the time (chs. 2:6 to 5:27; 8:4-6, etc.), and predicted judgment from God (chs. 7:1-9; 8:7-10). For these prophecies of doom the priest at Beth-el made a complaint against him to Jeroboam, but it does not seem to have brought any penalty on the prophet (Amos 7:10-17). Hosea also began his prophetic work in the Northern Kingdom during the lifetime of Jeroboam. The first 3 chapters pertain to that period. On the death of Jeroboam, his son Zechariah ascended the throne (II Kings 14:29).

Jero'ham (jê-rô'hâm) [may he be compassionated, or he is pitied (by God)]. 1. A Levite, an ancestor of the Prophet Samuel (I Sam. 1:1; I Chron. 6:27, 34).

2. A Benjamite, whose sons were chief men and dwelt at Jerusalem (I Chron. 8:27). See JEREMOTH 2. He may be identical with the following.

3. A Benjamite, father of Ibneiah who dwelt at Jerusalem (I Chron. 9:8).

4. A priest of the house of Malchijah (I Chron. 9:12; Neh. 11:12).

5. A Benjamite of Gedor, whose sons joined David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:7).

6. Father of the chief of the tribe of Dan in the reign of David (I Chron. 27:22).

7. Father of one of the captains who aided Jehoiaha in putting Joash on the throne of Judah (II Chron. 23:1).

Jer'ub-ba'al (jêr'ûb-bâ'âl) [let Baal contend; or perhaps, let Baal show himself great or master, or give increase]. See GIDEON.

Jer'ub-bê'sheth (jêr'ûb-bê'shêth). For Jerubbaal with -besheth (shame) instead of -ba'al (lord) to avoid the suggestion of identifying Baal with Jehovah, which would be offensive (II Sam. 11:21).

Jeru'el (jê-rô'êl) [probably, founded by God]. A wilderness in Judah, adjacent to the cliff of Ziz, and therefore in the vicinity of En-gedi (II Chron. 20:16).

Jeru'sa'lem (jê-rô'sá-lêm) [ety. uncertain; foundation of peace, possession of peace]. The sacred city and well-known capital of Judah, of Judea, of Palestine, and of the Jews throughout the world. For the sake of convenient reference and clearness, the subject is presented under certain heads: I. Name. II. The city in itself: 1. Site; 2. Water supply; 3. Artificial defenses; 4. Notable buildings in the time of Christ. III. The history of the city: 1. The city of the Canaanites; 2. The city of the Hebrews; 3. The city since Titus.

I. Name. The earliest known name is Urusalim, i.e., Jerusalem. It was in use at the dawn of the 15th century B.C., before the Conquest of Canaan by the Israelites under Joshua, for it is found in letters from its subject prince to Amenhotep (Amenophis) IV, king of Egypt, his lord, Salem, of which Melchizedek was king, is a natural abbreviation of Jerusalem and not unlikely denoted this city. The place is mentioned as Jerusalem in the account of the Conquest of Canaan, but in that narrative it is also referred to as Jebus; in fact, this latter name is frequent after the Conquest during the occupation of the city by the Jebusites; but when David captured the city and made it his capital, the old name of Jerusalem, or abbreviated Salem (Ps. 76:2), became once more the sole designation. The pronunciation of the final syllable in Yerushālem was in later times modified so that it resembles a dual, Yerushālā(y)im, and is so interpreted by some grammarians.

II. 1. Site. Jerusalem is situated on a tableland on the crest of the central ridge of Palestine and at one of its highest points. It has the same latitude as the n. end of the Dead Sea. The portion of the tableland occupied by the city is isolated from the rest of the plateau, except on the n. On the other sides it is encompassed by deep ravines. This jutting promontory is itself cut by another valley (Tyropoeon) which, followed upward from its mouth at the s.e. corner of the promontory at the junction of the s. and e. ravines (Hinnom and Kidron respectively), trends like the arc of a circle for nearly a mile n., midway sending a branch from its concave side due w. Such at least was the original configuration of the city's site; but in the course of centuries, through municipal improvements and the devastation of war, heights were lowered and valleys filled. As a result of these ramifications, there are 3 principal hills, an e., a s.w., and a n.w. The e. hill is a ridge extending for somewhat more than half a mile from n. to s., which rises to a height of from 200 to 300 feet above its encompassing valleys, tapers to a blunt point at its s. extremity, and at its n. end is almost separated (the reference is to the ancient topography) from the tableland, of which it is a part, by a branch of the e. ravine. This ridge attains a general altitude of 2,400 feet above sea level. There is some evidence that a slight depression or valley, about 100 feet wide and in places 40 feet deep, lay athwart it toward the s. end from the so-called fountain of the Virgin n.w. to the Tyropoeon valley. The s.w. hill is much the largest of the 3. In form it is oblong, with a spur thrown out on the n.e. corner toward the e. ridge. It rises abruptly from the encircling valleys. Its broad summit begins at an altitude of about 2,400 feet above the level of the sea and swells 150 feet higher, with its greatest elevation on the w. The 3d hill is rather a projection of the plateau than an isolated mound. It lies n. of the one just described. The present elevation of that part included in the ante-Christian city is about 2,450 feet. This triad of hills, with the protecting ravines, afforded a strong position for a city, although it is encircled beyond the ravines by hills which tower above it. "The mountains are round about Jerusalem."

The e. ravine is the valley of the Kidron. The hill to the e., which faces and overlooks the hills of the city, is the Mount of Olives. The long ridge which runs n. and s. is the Temple hill, called, at least in that portion of its extent where the sanctuary stood, Mount Moriah. Its s. tapering extremity was known as Ophel. The valley w. of this ridge is the Tyropoeon. The pool in the valley at the extreme s. point of the hill is Siloam. South of the city, running from n.w. to s.e. and w. to e. and joining the valley of the Kidron, is the valley of Hinnom. A pool n. of the Temple area is Bethesda.

Which height was Mount Zion? This question has received 3 principal answers: (1) Mount Zion was the s.w. hill. This view has prevailed since the 4th century. (a) Zion was the city of David (II Sam. 5:7-9), and Josephus says that the upper city, unquestionably the s. w. hill, was called the citadel by David (Jos. War v. 4, 1). Strangely enough, however, Josephus does not explicitly call it Zion. (b) Too much building is spoken of in Neh. ch. 3, for Zion to be part of the Temple hill. (c) The sanctity of Zion is accounted for by the fact that it was for many years the abiding place of the Ark, and was celebrated as such by David (II Sam. 6:12-18; I Kings 8:1-4; Ps. 2:6). The name Zion thus became the title for Jerusalem as a whole in its quality as a holy city (Psalms 48: 87; 133:3).

(2) Mount Zion was the n.w. hill (Warren). This hill is identified with that quarter of the city called by Josephus the Acra, which in Gr. means citadel. It is, indeed, styled by him the lower city, for so it was in his day; but originally it was much higher, and was cut down by Simon Maccabaeus because it commanded the Temple (Jos. Antiq. xiii. 6, 7). It was originally a suitable site for the Jebusite fortress. (3) Mount Zion was a portion of the Temple hill. The main arguments for this view are: (a) The Temple hill is best adapted by nature for a stronghold. (b) The Temple could be reached by going from the fountain gate, up the stairs of the city of David, and past the water gate (Neh. 12:37), steps which may be those that have been discovered ascending the ridge from the pool at the s. end. (c) Zion is spoken of as holy in terms such as are never applied to Jerusalem, but are intelligible if Zion was the hill on which the Temple stood. Zion is called the hill of the Lord, the holy hill, the dwelling place of Jehovah (Ps. 2:6; 9:11; 24:3; 132:13). (d) In the First Book of the Maccabees Zion is the Temple hill (I Macc. 1:33-38). The invariable distinction of the city of David from Mount Zion and the sanctuary shows that the terms had undergone a change of meaning since II Sam. 5:7. The simplest explanation is that Mount Zion was part of the Temple hill, and by synecdoche often used for the whole of it, whereas the designation city of David, which denoted the municipality of Jerusalem (II Sam. 5:7; Jos. Antiq. vii. 3, 2), was extended, with the growth of population, beyond the bounds of Mount Zion and embraced the new suburbs on the neighboring hills, around which the protecting walls of the city were cast. The term city of David might then on occasion include the sanctuary or exclude it. The Syrians erected a fortress in the city of David, but Judas Maccabaeus came and took possession of the sanctuary on Mount Zion (I Macc. 1:33 seq.; 4:36 seq.).

The 3d opinion is correct. Zion, the stronghold of the Jebusites, had 4 gates and occupied the s. end of the e. ridge, s. of the Temple, s. also of the transverse ravine. Parts of the old walled town have been explored, traceable even into the 3d millennium B.C.

II. 2. Water supply. Although Jerusalem was often long and closely besieged, and suffered grievous famine from having its supplies of food cut off, there is no record of the inhabitants' having ever lacked water. In fact, it was the besiegers who were apt to want water, not the besieged. There is no spring n. of the city, and none is known at present e., w., or s., which was not commanded by the walls, except En-rogel. This is located in the s., below the junction of the valleys of Hinnom and the Kidron, on the wadi en-Nar. It is known also as Job's Well ('Ain 'Ayyüb), and probably is to be identified with the Dragon's or Jackal's Well (Neh. 2:13). A living fountain to supply the Mämillä pool and the pool of the Sultan on the w. has not been discovered. The s.w. hill is likewise without springs, so far as known. But the Temple hill is well supplied (Tacitus Hist. v. 12). East of the old city, in the Kidron valley, is a well-known living source: the Fountain of the Virgin (St. Mary's Well or Gihon); its abundant water was conducted to the pool of Siloam at the s. end of the hill. The water of Gihon was led originally by an ancient channel on the surface of the ground to the Old or Lower Pool, which is identified with the modern Birket el-Hamra, below 'Ain Silwān (Siloam). In anticipation of the coming of Sennacherib, Hezekiah stopped up this surface channel and diverted the water of Gihon from the Old or Lower Pool through a subterranean conduit to the New or Upper Pool (II Kings 18:17; 20:20; II Chron. 32:4, 30; Isa. 7:3; 8:6; 22:9, 11; 36:2). With Siloam may be identified the king's pool (Neh. 2:14); Solomon's pool apparently was e. of Siloam (Jos. War v. 4, 2). On the w. side of the ridge, directly w. of the Temple, are the so-called healing baths, Hammām esh-Shifā; and just n. of the ridge, Bethesda.

The springs were supplemented by cisterns. The towers, which were upon the city walls, contained immense reservoirs for rain water (Jos. War v. 4, 3); and numerous cisterns, of which not a few still exist, were found in all parts of the city (Tacitus Hist. v. 12).

Besides the supply afforded by the springs and cisterns of the city, water was brought from a distance. The Mämillä pool, cut out of the rock, is at the head of Wadi er-Rabābi, w. of the city. Lower down Hinnom, opposite the s.w. corner of the present walls, is Birket es-Sultān (pool of the Sultan), constructed in the 12th century A.D. Some have identified the Mämillä with the Serpent Pool of Josephus (Jos. War v. 3, 2). An aqueduct brought the water from Mämillä to the pool of the patriarch e. of the Jaffa gate. This is known to tradition as the pool of Hezekiah, and is probably the pool Amygdalon, i.e., pool of the almond or tower, mentioned by Josephus (Jos. War v. 11, 4). A reservoir was also constructed at a late period n. of the Temple area, in ground made where the small valley diverged w. from the Kidron. It was fed from the w. It is now known as the pool of Israel (Birket 'Isrā'īn). To the w. of this are the twin pools, which Clermont-Ganneau considers identical with the pool Strouthios (pool of the sparrow or of soapwort, which was used for cleansing wool), which existed when Jerusalem was besieged by Titus, and lay in front of the tower of Antonia (Jos. War v. 11, 4). But the most extensive aqueduct was that which brought water to Jerusalem from beyond Bethlehem; see ETAM 3. It is believed to antedate considerably the Christian era.

II. 3. Artificial defenses. Immediately after capturing Jerusalem, David took measures to enclose the city with a wall. The old Jebusite stronghold, henceforth called the city of David, already existed. David, in addition, fortified the city round about, "from Millo even round about" (II Sam. 5:9; I Chron. 11:8). David's Millo apparently was a castle which defended the old Jebusite city and doubtless was located at the n.w. end of the s.e. hill. Solomon built Millo and the wall of Jerusalem, closing up the gap in the city of David (I Kings 9:15, 24; 11:27). It appears, however, that Millo does not always denote the same place. If the word denotes acropolis or citadel, Solomon's Millo may have been in the Temple and palace area. Succeeding kings made repairs and additions, until eventually at least the wall passed near the present Jaffa gate on the w. (II Chron. 26:9), approached the valley of Hinnom on the s. (Jer. 19:2), ran near the pool of Siloam (cf. II Kings 25:4), included Ophel (II Chron. 27:3; 33:14), and on the n. enclosed the suburb which grew up on the n.w. hill (II

The Tower of David, Jerusalem

Kings 14:13; II Chron. 33:14; Jer. 31:38). This wall was razed to the ground by Nebuchadnezzar (II Kings 25:10).

Nehemiah rebuilt the wall out of the old material (Neh. 2:13-15; 4:2, 7; 6:15). It began, so to speak, at the sheep gate (Neh. 3:1), which was near the pool of Bethesda (John 5:2). This pool has been discovered near the church of St. Anne, about 100 yards from the gate now called St. Stephen's, and on what was originally the n. side of that branch of the Kidron valley which was interposed between the Temple hill and the main plateau. The sheep gate stood, therefore, in this branch valley or on the slope of the plateau to the n. or n.w. Near the sheep gate, in the direction away from the Temple, were the towers of Hammeah (Meah) and Hananel (Neh. 3:1; 12:39). Then came the fish gate, in the new or 2d quarter of the city (Neh. 3:3; Zeph. 1:10), and next the old gate (Neh. 3:6; 12:39). Some distance on from the latter point was the broad wall (chs. 3:8; 12:38), and farther on the tower of the furnaces (chs. 3:11; 12:38). To this there succeeded the valley gate, the technical designation of the valley on the w. of the city being used (ch. 3:13; cf. ch. 2:13-15), then the dung gate

(ch. 3:14), then the gate of the fountain, the wall of the pool of Siloam by the king's garden, at the s.e. corner of the city, and the stairs that go down from the city of David (v. 15); to the e. of this point was the water gate (of the Temple?), with a large open place before it (chs. 8:1-3; 12:37). The wall next went past the sepulchers of David, the pool that was made, and the house of the mighty (ch. 3:16); the ascent to the armory, at the turning of the wall (v. 19); the house of the high priest, Eliashib (v. 20); then various points indicated by other houses unto the turning of the wall, the corner (v. 24); the turning of the wall and the tower that stands out from the king's upper house, that was by the court of the guard (v. 25). Now the Nethinim dwelt here in Ophel from over against the water gate (of the Temple?) toward the e. and this tower that stands out (v. 26; cf. ch. 11:21). Then came a piece of wall from this tower to the wall of Ophel (ch. 3:27). The horse gate came next, above which the priests resided (v. 28). It was on the e. side of the city, overlooking the Kidron valley (Jer. 31:40), but it was not necessarily an outer gate. It may rather have been the connection between Ophel and the area to the n. where were located the Temple and the palace. Then came a portion of the wall over against the house of Zadok; then a section repaired by the keeper of the e. gate (of the Temple, probably) (Neh. 3:29); presently the house of the Nethinim; then a section from over against the gate of Hammiphkad (the Miphkad) (which was probably a gate of the Temple at the place where the sin offering was burned, called the Miphkad [appointed place], cf. Ezek. 43:21) to the upper chamber of the tower (Neh. 3:31); and, finally, the sheep gate, which was the starting point of the description (v. 32). The gate of Hammiphkad has also been rendered the muster gate and by some identified with the gate of the guard (ch. 12:39); this latter probably was an inner gate of the Temple area.

Two important gates of the former wall are not mentioned, though one at least existed at this time, the corner gate (II Kings 14:13; II Chron. 26:9; cf. Zech. 14:10) and the gate of Ephraim (Neh. 3:16; 12:39). The corner gate appears to have been the extreme n.w. point of the city (Jer. 31:38), and it was distant 400 cubits from the gate of Ephraim (II Kings 14:13). Through this latter gate the road to Ephraim passed; presumably, therefore, it was in the n. wall of the city, and if so, then e. of the corner gate. It was certainly w. of the old gate (Neh. 12:39). Beginning with the sheep gate and following the n. wall w., the order of gates and towers is sheep gate, towers of Hammeah and Hananel, fish gate, old gate, gate of Ephraim, corner gate. Whether the broad wall and tower of furnaces were beyond the corner gate is difficult to determine. It is to be observed that the gates of the corner and Ephraim occur in that part of the wall where it is recorded that "they left Jerusalem" (ch. 3:8, R.V. marg.), as if the wall required no repairs at this point.

There was also a gate of Benjamin, through which the road to Benjamin passed (Jer. 37:13; 38:7; Zech. 14:10); this probably corresponds to the sheep gate. There is a great deal of uncertainty concerning the location of some of the gates, and authorities are not in agreement. The gate of Ephraim may be identified with the middle gate (Jer. 39:2), and attempts have been made to equate it also with the fish gate. It has also been assumed by some that the corner gate and the old gate are the same.

During the interval between Nehemiah and Christ the fortifications of Jerusalem suffered many vicissitudes. About 150 years after the building of Nehemiah's wall, the high priest, Simon the Just, found it necessary to fortify the Temple and the city so that they might be able to stand a siege (Ecclus. 50:1-4; for such a need, cf. Jos. Antiq. xii. 1, 1). In 168 B.C. Antiochus Epiphanes had the walls of Jerusalem thrown down and a fortress with a great and strong wall and mighty towers erected in the city of David, perhaps a broad designation meaning the city as distinct from the Temple (I Macc. 1:31, 33, 39; II Macc. 5:24-26). This fortress became celebrated as the Akra. It overlooked the Temple (Jos. Antiq. xiii. 6, 7), and for 25 years was a menace to the Jews. About 2 years after the demolition of the city walls, Judas Maccabaeus partly restored them, strengthening the outer wall of the Temple; but only to have his work undone (I Macc. 4:60; 6:18-27, 62). His brother and successor, Jonathan, however, renewed the work, proposing additional fortifications and rebuilding and repairing the walls, particularly around the Temple hill (I Macc. 10:10; 12:36, 37; Jos. Antiq. xiii. 5, 11). His brother Simon carried the work to completion (I Macc. 13:10; 14:37; Jos. Antiq. xiii. 6, 4). Under this great priest-king, not only were the walls of the city built, but the foreign garrison was forced in the year 142 B.C. to evacuate the Akra (I Macc. 13:49-51). After a time the fortress was demolished and the hill on which it had stood was graded down so as to be lower than the level of the Temple (I Macc. 14:36; 15:28; Jos. Antiq. xiii. 6, 7). Although Akra means citadel in Gr., it must not be confused with Baris or the Tower of Antonia, which lay n. of the n.w. corner of the Temple area. The Akra was w. of the Temple, and the term was applied to the lower city (Jos. War v. 6, 1).

Simon appears also to have taken up his residence in the fortress Baris, which protected the Temple on the n. (I Macc. 13:52; cf. Neh. 2:8). In the reign of John Hyrcanus a portion of the fortifications of the city was dismantled by Antiochus Sidetes, but the ruin seems to have been repaired by John (Jos. Antiq. xiii. 8, 3; I Macc. 16:23). John also remodeled and strengthened the fortress Baris (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 4, 3; cf. xv. 11, 4). Pompey found the defenses of Jerusalem strong. On finally capturing the city in 63 B.C., he demolished the walls (Tacitus Hist. v. 9; and next 2 references). Caesar allowed them to be rebuilt (Jos. Antiq. xiv. 3, 5; War i. 10, 3 and 4). On the n. they consisted of 2 walls which Herod and his Roman allies took in the year 37 B.C., but did not destroy (Jos. Antiq. xiv. 16, 2 and 4; cf. xv. 1, 2).

At the time of Christ, Jerusalem had the 2 walls aforementioned on the n., and shortly afterward 3. Josephus identifies the 1st and innermost wall as the work of David, Solomon, and succeeding kings. He describes it by reference to landmarks of his day as extending from the tower of Hippicus, which stood immediately s. of the modern Jaffa gate at the n.w. corner of the old city wall, e. to the w. cloister of the Temple; and from the tower of Hippicus s. and e. by the pool of Siloam and Ophel to the e. cloister of the Temple (Jos. War v. 4, 2). It enclosed the s.w. and e. hills. The 2d wall encompassed the n. and principal business quarter of the city (Jos. War v. 4, 2; for bazaars in this section, 8, 1; i. 13, 2; Antiq. xiv. 13, 3). It began at the gate Gennath, that is, by interpretation, the garden gate, which belonged to the 1st wall and stood not far e. of the tower of Hippicus (Jos. War v. 4, 2; 3, 2 for gardens); and terminated at the Tower of Antonia, formerly called Baris, n. of the Temple (Jos. War v. 4, 2). Herod Agrippa I, who reigned over Judea from A.D. 41 to 44, undertook a 3d wall in order to include within the city limits the unprotected suburb of Bezetha, which had grown up outside the fortifications. After laying the foundations, however, he relinquished the work at the command of the emperor Claudius. It was finally completed by the Jews themselves. It began at the tower of Hippicus, extended n. to the tower of Psephinus, at the n.w. corner of the city (Jos. War v. 3, 5; 4, 3); turned e. and passed on to the monuments of Helena, queen of Adiabene (Jos. War v. 4, 2; Antiq. xx. 4, 3); included the traditional site of the camp of the Assyrians (Jos. War v. 7, 3); passed the caves of the kings; bent s. at the corner tower, near the monument of the fuller; and joined the old wall at the valley of the Kidron (Jos. War v. 4, 2). The circumference of the walls was 33 stadia, a little less than 4 miles (Jos. War v. 4, 3). The defenses of the city were augmented by the fortress of Antonia at the Temple, and by the palace of Herod with its adjacent towers on the w. wall. All these fortifications Titus razed to the ground on his capture of the city in A.D. 70. He left only the group of 3 towers, Hippicus, Phasaelus, and Mariamne, and so much of the wall as enclosed the city on the w. side. He spared this portion of the wall in order that it might afford protection to his garrison, and the towers that posterity might see what kind of city it was which Roman valor had taken (Jos. War vii. 1, 1).

II. 4. Notable buildings in the time of Christ. Besides the walls which have been already described, there were many structures to awaken conflicting emotions in the pious and patriotic Israelite. Foremost was the Temple. The n. side of Temple area is partly bounded by the great block of rock on which stood the fortress of Antonia, which was occupied by a Roman garrison; w. of it stood the council house, probably the place where the council of the nation or sanhedrin met; a little more to the w., at the farther end of the bridge which sprang from the w. cloister of the Temple and spanned the Tyropoeon valley, lay the gymnasium or xystos, an object of abhorrence on account of its heathenizing influence; above it, looking down into it and peering across the valley into the sanctuary, rose the palace of the Hasmonaeans, recalling the heroic achievements of the Maccabees. Or taking a wider circuit, to the n. of the Temple and e. of the fortress of Antonia was the pool of Bethesda with its healing waters; away to the w., at the opposite side of the city from the Temple, stood the magnificent palace of Herod with its impregnable towers, the residence of the procurators when in Jerusalem; around toward the s. was the pool of Siloam, and not too far from it were the sepulchers of the kings. In this neighborhood may best be sought the very large amphitheater erected by Herod the Great in the plain (Jos. Antiq. xv. 8, 1). It was, perhaps, the same as the hippodrome, which lay s. from the Temple (Jos. War ii. 3, 1), for chariot races as well as wild beast fights and gladiatorial combats seem to have taken place in it (Jos. Antiq. xv. 8, 1), and in the hippodrome men were confined (Jos. Antiq. xvii. 9, 5; War i. 33, 6). Other buildings were the house of the high priest (Matt. 26:3; Luke 22:54; Jos. War ii. 17, 6); the house of records, near the Temple (Jos. War ii. 17, 6; vi. 6, 3); the palace of the proselyte queen of Adiabene, Helena (ibid.).

III. 1. The city of the Canaanites. If the Salem of Melchizedek be Jerusalem, as is probable, the city first emerges in history in the days of Abraham, when it already had a king of the Semitic race, who was at the same time priest of the Most High God (Gen. 14:18). Manetho, an Egyptian priest and historian of the 3d century before Christ, transmits a tradition, which may contain considerable truth, to the effect that the nation of the Shepherd Kings (or Hyksos) to the number of 240,000 were driven out of Egypt by Thummosis [or Thmosis, perhaps for Amosis, i.e., Aahmes], and fled toward Syria; but fearing the Assyrians, who had dominion over Asia, they built a city in the country now called Judea of sufficient size to contain the multitude and named it Jerusalem (Jos. Apion i. 14, 15). This expulsion of the Hyksos took place 1580 B.C. The earliest mention of Jerusalem in extant original documents is in the Tell el-Amarna tablets, where Abdi-hiba (Abdi-khiba) of this city writes to Amenhotep IV (or Akhnaton), Pharaoh of Egypt (alone, 1375-1366 B.C.). When the Israelites entered Canaan, Jerusalem was ruled by a king, still a Semite, and occupied by Amorites, or more definitely by Jebusites. Joshua defeated its king and his allies at Gibeon, drove them down the pass of Beth-horon, and slew them in the lowland (Josh., ch. 10). But no attempt was made to enter the city. The Jebusites still dwelt in it. It was allotted to the tribe of Benjamin; but as it stood on the border of Judah, its castle commanded a portion of the territory of 2 tribes (Josh. 15:8; 18:28). In the war which was waged by the several tribes against the Canaanites within their own bounds after the death of Joshua, Judah fought against Jerusalem, took it, and set it on fire (Judg. 1:8). But apparently Judah did not capture the citadel. Neither did Benjamin (v. 21). Hence, when the city was rebuilt, it was still under the shadow of the Jebusite stronghold and its inhabitants were Jebusites. It was a city of foreigners and a reproach in the midst of the land (Josh. 15:63; Judg. 1:21; 19:11, 12). Such was the state of affairs when David began his career. When he had slain Goliath, he returned from the field of battle by way of Jerusalem and brought the head of the Philistine thither (I Sam. 17:54). And when he became king of all Israel, and found a united and enthusiastic nation obedient to him, and the jealousy between Judah and Benjamin allayed, he at once led his troops against the border town, and in face of the derision of the inhabitants, who believed their walls to be impregnable, gained possession (II Sam. 5:6 seq.). Henceforth for many centuries Jerusalem was a city of the Hebrews.

III. 2. The city of the Hebrews. David made

Jerusalem the capital of his kingdom and took measures to make it the religious center also. The Ark, which had had no dwelling place of its own since Jehovah forsook Shiloh, he brought to Jerusalem, pitched a suitable tent for it, and began the collection of materials for a temple. The city shared in the prosperity of Solomon's reign. The walls were enlarged, the Temple was erected on a scale of great magnificence, and surrounded by a wall which gave it the appearance of a fortress, and a royal palace was built not inferior to the Temple in splendor. In the next reign, however, the army of Shishak, king of Egypt, entered the city and robbed the Temple and the palace of their treasures (I Kings 14:25-27), and about 80 years later bands of Philistines and Arabs gained brief admission to the city and carried off plunder (II Chron. 21:17). The population was in the meanwhile increasing, quarters of the city began to be distinguished (II Kings 20:4; 22:14), and before the beginning of the 8th century a suburb on the n.w. hill was enclosed by an addition to the city wall. This part of the city was the mercantile district, and continued to be such after the Exile and until the destruction of the city by Titus (Jos. War v. 8, 1). Here were the sheep gate and fish gate, and the quarter was skirted by the valley of the Tyropeon (the cheesemongers). In the reign of Amaziah a portion of the city wall was broken down, and Temple and palace were despoiled of treasure by the northern Israelites (II Kings 14:13, 14). Uzziah and Jotham repaired the ruin, strengthened the walls, and erected new towers for defense (II Chron. 26:9; 27:3). But they had perhaps other ruins to care for than those wrought by war, for in Uzziah's reign the city was visited by a memorable earthquake (Amos 1:1; Zech. 14:5; Jos. Antiq. ix. 10, 4). Under Ahaz the city was besieged, but not taken, by the northern Israelites in alliance with the Syrians (II Kings 16:5), and shortly afterward, by reason of the king's inclination to heathenism, the lamps of the Temple were allowed to go out, the offering in the Holy Place ceased, and the Temple was closed (II Kings 16:14 seq.; II Chron. 28:24; 29:7). Hezekiah reopened the Temple and restored the service, but he was obliged to empty the royal and the sacred treasuries and to strip the plates of gold from the Temple doors in order to raise a sum sufficient to purchase exemption from a threatened raid by the Assyrians; and even this relief was but temporary, for eventually Assyrian troops stood before the walls (II Chron. 29:3; II Kings 18:15, 16). The city was, however, delivered by the providential outbreak of pestilence in the camp of the enemy (II Kings 19:35). When Manasseh returned from captivity he built walls for the city and strengthened the fortifications (II Chron. 33:14).

During the reigns of the sons and grandson of Josiah the city experienced its overwhelming calamities. Nebuchadnezzar besieged it in the days of Jehoiakim, entered it, bound but eventually released the king, and carried off a number of noble youth and costly vessels from the Temple (II Kings 24:1; II Chron. 36:6; Dan. 1:1). Again he came, emptied the royal and the sacred treasuries, seized the remaining vessels of gold and silver belonging to the Temple, carried King Jehoiachin a prisoner to Babylon, and deported the best and most useful citizens (II Kings 24:10-16). Nine years later, in the reign of Zedekiah, he laid siege to the city for the 3d time. The investment lasted 2 years. The misery within the walls was extreme. Finally a breach was made, the city was taken, the Temple and the palaces were burnt, the wall was broken down, and the remnant of the population, save the poorest, was deported (II Kings, ch. 25). The city lay waste for 50 years. Zerubbabel and 50,000 followers returned to Jerusalem in 538 B.C., and at the beginning of the next year laid the foundation of the Temple (Ezra 2:64, 65; 3:8). The walls of the city were rebuilt under Nehemiah about 444 B.C. The supreme power was then in the hands of the Persians, from whom it passed, under Alexander the Great, to the Macedonian Greeks. The city was taken by Antiochus the Great 203 B.C., retaken by the Egyptians in 199, and opened its gates again to Antiochus coming as a friend in 198. In 170 B.C. Antiochus Epiphanes took Jerusalem, subsequently desecrating the Temple. But the Maccabees arose; and in 165 B.C. Judas retook the city and purified the Temple. The kings of the Hasmonaeen race built near the Temple a citadel called Baris or the tower; see ANTONIA, TOWER OF. Pompey captured Jerusalem 63 B.C., breaking down part of the wall; Crassus despoiled the Temple in 54 B.C. and the Parthians plundered the city in 40 B.C. Jerusalem was taken again in 37 B.C. by Herod the Great, who repaired the walls, adorned the city with various edifices, and rebuilt the Temple on a scale of magnificence which markedly contrasted with the comparatively humble character of Zerubbabel's Temple. The work began 20-19 B.C. and was not quite completed when our Lord was on earth. Herod also strengthened the citadel and called it Antonia (see ANTONIA, TOWER OF). When he passed away there were 2 walls, in whole or in part encompassing Jerusalem, against 1 in Solomon's time. A 3d wall was begun by Herod Agrippa (about A.D. 42 or 43) a dozen years after the crucifixion. In A.D. 70 the Romans, under Titus, took Jerusalem, the Temple and nearly all the city having been burnt or otherwise destroyed during the siege. He broke down all the walls, with the exception of part of the w. one and 3 towers, Hippicus, Phasaelus, and Mariamne, which he left so that future generations might see the nature of the defenses he had succeeded in capturing (Jos. War vii. 1, 1).

III. 3. The city since Titus. Under the emperor Hadrian the Romans commenced to re-fortify Jerusalem as a Gentile city, and hold it against its former inhabitants. This seems to have been one main cause of the Jewish revolt under Bar Cocheba (c. A.D. 132 to 135). On its suppression, the rebuilding of the city was resumed and completed. The old name Jerusalem was discarded. It was called Colonia Aelia Capitolina: Colonia to denote that it was a Roman colony, Aelia in honor of Hadrian, whose praenomen was Aelius, and Capitolina because it was dedicated to Jupiter Capitolinus. To this heathen deity a temple was dedicated on the spot where those of Solomon, Zerubbabel, and Herod had stood. The Jews were forbidden, on pain of death, to enter within its walls. The Christians were, perhaps, by this time sufficiently distinguished from the Jews not to come under the prohibition. The name Aelia continued for many centuries. The emperor Constantine first partially, and then completely, removed the prohibition against the Jews' entering the Holy City; in 326 Helena, his mother, built a church on the Mount of Olives. In 333, by order of Constantine, the church of the Anastasis, marking the supposed site of the Holy Sepulcher, was begun; see CALVARY. In 614 Jerusalem was taken by storm by the Persians under Chosroes II, thousands of the inhabitants were massacred and other thousands were carried off prisoners to Persia, and the church of the Holy Sepulcher was burnt down. In 628, on the death of Chosroes, Jerusalem was retaken by the Roman emperor, Heraclius. In 638 it surrendered on conditions to the Arabs under Omar ('Umar). In 691 'Abd-al-Malik erected the magnificent Dome of the Rock (wrongly called by Europeans the Mosque of Omar), upon, or very near, the site of the Temple of Solomon. Near the Dome and in the s. section of the sacred area 'Abd-al-Malik built another mosque, possibly on the site of an earlier church; it is called al-Masjid al-Akṣa (the farther mosque), but the term is also applied to the whole collection of sacred buildings on that area. Al-Haram al-Sharif (the noble sanctuary) is another name for this group. During the period when Jerusalem was ruled by the Moslems, the treatment of the Christian pilgrims who visited the sacred shrines varied. Once the church of the Holy Sepulcher was set on fire under a Fatimite ruler, but on the whole there was toleration. It was different when the Arabs were displaced by the Seljuk Turks in A.D. 1077. The insults and oppression practiced by the semi-savages who had now gained power, threw all western and central Europe into a ferment, and brought on the Crusades. In the 1st of these religious expeditions Jerusalem was taken by storm on July 15, 1099, and a Christian kingdom established, which continued 88 years. During the Christian occupation the buildings connected with the Holy Sepulcher were enlarged and made more splendid and other edifices erected in the city. In 1187 it had to be surrendered to Saladin, sultan of Egypt and Syria; in 1192 he repaired the walls, but in 1219 they were dismantled by orders of the sultan of Damascus. In 1229 Emperor Frederick II of Germany obtained the Holy City by treaty with the stipulation that the fortifications be not restored. Ten years later the inhabitants of the city broke these conditions, and vengeance was taken by the emir of Karak. In 1243, however, the city was restored to the Christians unconditionally. The following year the Khwārizm Turks captured Jerusalem and restored it to Islam. Three years later the invaders were driven out of Palestine by the Egyptians, who held the city until 1517, when it fell into the hands of the Ottoman Turks. The greatest of their sultans, Sulaymān the Magnificent, built the present walls in 1542. In World War I Palestine was conquered by the British under General Allenby, and Jerusalem surrendered Dec. 9, 1917.

Je-ru'sha (jê-rōō'shā) and Je-ru'shah (jê-rōō'shā) [possessed, i.e., married]. Wife of Uziah, king of Judah, and mother of his successor, Jotham (II Kings 15:33; II Chron. 27:1).

Je-sha'lah (jê-shā'yā), in A.V. twice Je-sa'lah (jê-sā'yā) (I Chron. 3:21; Neh. 11:7) [Jehovah has saved]. 1. A son of Jeduthun, and a musician in the reign of David (I Chron. 25:3).

2. A Levite, son of Rehabiah; he also was in David's reign (I Chron. 26:25).

3. A son of Hananiah, and a descendant of Zerubbabel (I Chron. 3:21).

4. A son of Athaliah and head of the father's house of Elam, who, with 70 males, returned from Babylon with Ezra (Ezra 8:7).

5. A Merarite Levite who returned in the same company (Ezra 8:19).

6. A Benjamite, the father of Ithiel (Neh. 11:7).

Jesh'a-nah (jêsh'ā-nā) [old]. A city in the hill country of Ephraim, wrested by Abijah from the Northern Kingdom (II Chron. 13:19; cf. ch. 15:8). It is believed to be the village called Isanas, where Herod the Great defeated the general of Antigonus (Jos. Antiq. xiv. 15, 12). 'Ain Sinla, 3¼ miles n. of Beth-el may mark the site. See SHEN.

Jesh'a-re'lah (jêsh'ā-rē'lā) [since the Heb. has s instead of sh, the name may signify "toward Israel"]. See ASHARELAH.

Jesh'e-b'ab (jê-shêb'āb) [uncertain; perhaps, may the father (not divine) tarry, i.e., continue to live]. A descendant of Aaron. His family became the 14th course of the priesthood (I Chron. 24:13).

Je'sher (jê'shêr) [uprightness]. A son of Caleb (I Chron. 2:18).

Jesh'mon (jê-shi'mōn) [a waste, a desert].

1. A wilderness at the n.e. end of the Dead Sea, not far from Pisgah and Peor (Num. 21:20; 23:28). In both passages R.V. and J.V. render it desert. Beth-jeshimoth was situated in it; see BETH-JESHIMOTH.

2. A wilderness to the n. of the hill Hachilah and of Maon (I Sam. 23:19, 24; 26:1, 3). In these passages R.V. regards Jeshimon not as a proper name but renders it desert. J.V. considers it a proper name.

Jeshish'a-i (jê-shish'ā-ī) [old, venerable]. A Gadite, descended from Buz (I Chron. 5:14).

Jesh'o-ha'lah (jêsh'ō-hā'yā). A Simeonite prince (I Chron. 4:36).

Jesh'ua (jêsh'ū-ā), in A.V. once Jesh'uah (jêsh'ū-ā) (I Chron. 24:11) [a late form of Joshua, Jehovah is salvation]. 1. Joshua, the military leader in the wars of Canaan (Neh. 8:17).

2. A descendant of Aaron. His family had grown to a father's house in the time of David and was made the 9th of the 24 courses into which David divided the priests (I Chron. 24:1, 6, 11).

3. One of the Levites in Hezekiah's reign who had to do with the receipt and distribution of the freewill offerings in the Temple (II Chron. 31:15).

4. A high priest who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Ezra 2:2; Neh. 7:7). He was the son of Jozadak. He built the altar of burnt offering, and encouraged the workmen and the people generally to rebuild the Temple (Ezra 3:2-9). In Zechariah's prophecies he is called Joshua, and stands as the priestly representative of the returned exiles to whom divine support is given (Zech., chs. 3; 6:11-13).

5. A man of the house of Pahath-moab, some of whose children returned with Zerubbabel and others from captivity (Ezra 2:6; Neh. 7:11).

6. A Levite, head of a Levitical family, who, with members of the family, returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:40; Neh. 7:43; 12:8). He actively assisted Jeshua, the high priest, in stimulating the workmen and people to rebuild the Temple (Ezra 3:9). The representative of the house bearing his name affixed his seal to the covenant (Neh. 10:9). From the last passage, it appears that Jeshua was the son of Azaniah (v. 9). In Neh. 12:24 the word ben, the son of, after Jeshua is probably a corruption of the name Bani (cf. ch. 9:4, 5). Not unlikely it was this Levite Jeshua who was the father of the ruler of Mizpah, Ezer, who repaired a portion of the wall (ch. 3:19).

7. A Levite, probably of the aforementioned family, who aided Ezra in explaining the Law to the people (Neh. 8:7), and in preparing them for a more heartfelt worship of Jehovah (ch. 9:4, 5).

8. A village of s. Judah (Neh. 11:26), identified with Tell es-Sa'weh.

Jesh'u-run (jěsh'û-rûn), in A.V. once Jes'-u-run (Isa. 44:2) [upright one]. A name of endearment used in poetry for the nation of Israel with reference to the moral character which it was created to exhibit (Deut. 32:15; 33:5, 26; Isa. 44:2).

Jes-si'ah (jê-si'â). See ISSHIAH.

Jes-sim'i-el (jê-sim'i-êl) [God sets up, establishments]. A prince of the tribe of Simeon (I Chron. 4:36).

Jes'se (jěs'ê) [Heb. Yishay; 'ishay (I Chron. 2:13); ety. uncertain, but cf. Heb. 'ish, man]. Son of Obed, family of Perez. He was descended from Nahshon, chief of the tribe of Judah in the days of Moses, and from Ruth the Moabitess (Ruth 4:18-22). He was father of 8 sons, the youngest of whom was David (I Sam. 17:12-14). To judge from I Chron. 2:15, 1 of them died without leaving posterity; unless, as is less probable, Elihu (ch. 27:18) has been lost from the register. Jesse had 2 daughters, but by a different wife from David's mother (ch. 2:16; cf. II Sam. 17:25). Jesse lived at Bethlehem, to which Samuel was sent to anoint a king from among his sons. After 7 of them had been passed before him in the order of their birth, David was called from the flock which he was tending, and on his arrival was anointed king (I Sam. 16:1-13). After Saul had become jealous of David he usually called him the son of Jesse (ch. 20:31; 22:7; 25:10), in order to emphasize David's humble origin. Saul ignored the fact that his own father was no more a king than was David's father. In the cave of Adullam David was joined by his father, his mother, and his brothers. He allowed his brothers to share the dangers of his wanderings, but placed his parents under the protection of the king of Moab, the native land of his ancestress Ruth, till he knew what God had in store for him in the future (ch. 22:1-4). It is uncertain when Jesse died. Although of good ancestry and himself an able man, yet his station in life was lowly. This humble position of the family is alluded to by the prophets (Isa. 11:1, 10; cf. Micah 5:2; Rom. 15:12), and was recalled by all who refused the rule of the house of David (II Sam. 20:1; I Kings 12:16; II Chron. 10:16).

Jes'ui (jěs'û-i). See ISHVI.

Jes'u-run (jěs'û-rûn). See JESHURUN.

Jes'us (jě'zús) [Lat. from Gr. Iêsous, which is for Heb. Jeshua, a late form of Jehoshua or Joshua (Jehovah is salvation)]. 1. Joshua, the military leader in the wars of Canaan (A.V. of Acts 7:45; Heb. 4:8); see JOSHUA.

2. An ancestor of Christ, who lived about 400 years after David (Luke 3:29). The A.V., following a different Gr. text, calls him Jose.

3. In the LXX the name occurs several times in the Apocrypha. It was borne by the author of Ecclesiasticus, and 12 persons with this name are mentioned by Josephus outside of his references to Joshua and to Christ. It was a common name among the Jews of the Greek-speaking period.

4. A Jewish Christian, also called Justus, associated with Paul (Col. 4:11).

5. The name of our Lord. See JESUS CHRIST.

Jes'us Chríst (jě'zús kríst). Our Lord was named Jesus in accordance with the directions of the angel to Joseph (Matt. 1:21) and Mary (Luke 1:31). When given to ordinary children, the name expressed, if anything, the parent's faith in God as the savior of his people, or their faith in the coming salvation of Israel. When given to Mary's child, it was designed to express the special office he would fulfill: "Thou shalt call his name Jesus; for it is he that shall save his people from their sins" (Matt. 1:21). Christ is from Gr. Christos (anointed), a translation of Aram. M'shihâ, Heb. Māshiah (anointed, Messiah). Jesus, therefore, was our Lord's personal name and Christ was his title (the Christ); though the latter was early used also as a proper name, as it is by us, either alone or with Jesus.

It is the object of the following article to sketch the progress of our Lord's life on earth so as to place its principal events in their probable order and relation.

I. Chronology. The exact dates of the birth, baptism, and death of Jesus cannot be absolutely demonstrated; but most scholars now agree within narrow limits. Our ordinary Christian calendar originated with Dionysius Exiguus, a Roman abbot who died sometime before A.D. 550. He first selected the year of the incarnation as that before and after which dates should be reckoned. He fixed, however, on the year of Rome 754, as that in which Christ was born, and that year consequently equals A.D. 1. But the statements of Josephus make it clear that Herod the Great, who died shortly after Jesus was born (Matt. 2:19-22), died several years before the year of Rome 754. His death occurred 37 years after he had been declared king by the Romans, which was in A.U.C. 714. This might be 751 or 750, according to whether Josephus counted fractions of a year as whole years or not. The year 750 is, however, made the more probable from the further statement of Josephus that shortly before Herod's death he put to death 2 Jewish rabbis, and that on the night of their execution there occurred an eclipse of the moon. Astronomical calculations show that in 750 there was a partial lunar eclipse on the night of March 12 or 13; but in 751 there was no eclipse. Josephus also narrates that Herod died shortly before the passover, which began in 750 on April 12. We may, therefore, with considerable confidence date Herod's death about April 1, in the year of Rome 750, which was 4 B.C. Before that date, therefore, we must place the events given in the Gospels which occurred between the birth of Jesus and the death of Herod, for which a period of 2 or 3 months is probably required. Christ's birth, therefore, is to be placed at the close of 5 B.C. or beginning of 4 B.C. The observance of December 25 did not arise until the 4th century, so that it has no authority. It may, however, be accepted as an approximation to the truth, and then Christ's birth would be assigned to December 25, 5 B.C. This puts it 5 years earlier than in the calendar of Dionysius, who assigned it to December 25, A.D. 1. The date of the opening of our Lord's public ministry is to be obtained principally from Luke 3:23, where it is said that at his baptism he was about 30 years of age. The expression is obviously indefinite; but, assuming that he was born December 25, 5 B.C., he would be 30 on December 25, A.D. 26. The traditional date of the baptism is January 6, and if we suppose at any rate that it occurred early in A.D. 27, Luke's expression, "about thirty years of age," would be correct. This date also is somewhat confirmed by the statement of the Jews (John 2:20), made shortly after his baptism: "Forty and six years was this temple in building." The rebuilding of the Temple by Herod was begun, as might be shown, in 20-19 B.C.; so that the 46 years, supposing them to have elapsed when the remark was made, would bring us again to A.D. 27. If, finally, "the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius" (Luke 3:1), when John the Baptist began his ministry, be reckoned, as it properly may be, from the time when Tiberius was associated with Augustus in the empire (A.D. 11 to 12), it coincides with A.D. 26 and further agrees with our other calculations. It is true that all these items of evidence contain in them points on which opinions may not unreasonably differ; yet the dates we have given appear to be the most probable and to support one another. The length of Christ's ministry and consequently the year of his death are to be fixed by the number of passovers which John notes in his Gospel. If we had only the Synoptic Gospels (see GOSPEL), we might infer that his ministry was only a year in length, and this was in ancient times a not uncommon opinion. But John's Gospel speaks of at least 3 passovers (chs. 2:13; 6:4; 13:1), and it is highly probable that the feast referred to in John 5:1 was also a passover. If so, Christ's ministry included 4 passovers, at the last of which he died; and, if he was baptized early in A.D. 27, his 1st passover was in April of that year, and he died in A.D. 30, when the passover festival began on April 7. Those who think that John 5:1 does not refer to a passover, date Christ's death in A.D. 29. We thus obtain as the probable leading dates in Christ's life: birth, December 25 (?), 5 B.C.; baptism and beginning of his ministry, January (?), A.D. 27; death, April 7, A.D. 30.

II. Political condition of the Jews. When Jesus was born, Herod the Great, an able but cruel man, was king of the Jews. His kingdom included Samaria and Galilee as well as Judea. He was an Idumæan by descent, though professing the Jewish religion. His father, Antipater, had been made governor of Judea by Julius Caesar, and, after several changes of fortune, Herod had been declared king of the Jews by the Romans in 40 B.C. But, while an independent king in many ways, Herod ruled by the favor of and in dependence on the Romans, who had become the practical rulers of the world. On his death, 4 B.C., his kingdom was divided among his sons. Archelaus received Judea and Samaria. Herod Antipas received Galilee and Perea. Herod Philip received the territory n.e. of the Sea of Galilee (Luke 3:1). In the 10th year of his reign (A.D. 6), Archelaus was deposed by Augustus, and from that date Judea and Samaria were ruled by Roman governors (procurators) until the destruction of Jerusalem, with the exception of the years A.D. 41-44, when Herod Agrippa I was invested with the royal power (Acts 12:1). During the ministry of Christ, therefore, Galilee and Perea, where he spent most of his time, were under the rule of Herod Antipas (Matt. 14:3; Mark 6:14; Luke 3:1, 19; 9:7; 13:31; 23:8-12), while Samaria and Judea were ruled directly by the Romans through their governor, who at that time was Pontius Pilate. The rule of the Romans, whether direct or indirect, irritated the Jews exceedingly, and, during Christ's life, the land was in an almost constant state of political ferment. While the Romans sought to give the nation as much self-government as possible, so that their sanhedrin, or chief court, exercised jurisdiction in a very large number of cases; and while the conquerors granted many privileges to the Jews, especially in respect to their religious observances, yet the nation fretted under a foreign domination which was very positive, when it wished to be so, and which did not intend ever to grant them their old liberty. The Jewish aristocracy, however, including most of the Sadducees, were not unfriendly to the Romans. The Pharisees, who comprised the strictest religionists, were disposed to devote themselves to the conservation of Judaism, while generally avoiding political complications. We read also of Herodians, who doubtless favored the claims of the Herodian family to the Jewish throne, while from Josephus we learn of political patriots who successively arose in the vain endeavor to throw off the Roman yoke. In such a condition of things, one who claimed to be the Messiah would easily be involved in political difficulties. We shall see that Jesus carefully and successfully avoided these in order that he might proclaim the true, spiritual Kingdom of God.

III. Religious condition of the Jews. As already implied, this was largely affected by the state of political affairs. So far as the official classes were concerned, the purely religious hopes of the O.T. had been almost forgotten, and even among the people the idea of an earthly kingdom had nearly displaced that of a spiritual one. We meet in the Gospels with 2 leading sects, the Pharisees and the Sadducees. The former were religious and had the greater influence among the people; but they had substituted theological and ceremonial tradition, as well as casuistic subtleties, for the word of God, and in their hands the religion of Moses and the prophets often became a narrow, barren, and unspiritual form. The Pharisees naturally opposed the spiritual and unconventional religion which Jesus taught, and especially his appeal from tradition to Scripture. The Sadducees, on the other hand, were the aristocrats. They included the high-priestly families. They were infected by Gentile culture, rejected the Pharisaic traditions, and were more interested in politics than in religion. They were led finally to oppose Jesus because they thought that his success would disturb the existing political relations (John 11:48). Meanwhile the ceremonies of God's worship were carried on with much magnificence in the Temple at Jerusalem, the people attended with fidelity and in great numbers the religious festivals, and the zeal of the nation for its religious privileges and traditions was never greater, while every now and then some outbreak of mingled patriotism and fanaticism fanned the embers of popular hope into a flame. Yet there were some who still preserved the spirit and faith of a pure religion. They were found mainly, though not wholly, among the humble classes. In them the expectation of a savior from sin had not died out, and from the bosom of one of these pious circles Jesus himself came. The Jewish people, therefore, in Christ's lifetime were still a religious people. They knew the O.T., which was read in their synagogues and taught to their children. The nation was in a state of religious interest as well as of political unrest. These facts explain to us the popular excitement caused by the preaching of John the Baptist and of Jesus, the opposition of the ruling classes to both of them, and the success of the method which Jesus pursued in preaching his gospel, as well as the fate which he himself saw from the beginning to be, even humanly speaking, inevitable.

IV. Life of Jesus. 1. Family, Birth, and Infancy of Jesus. The circumstances of the birth of Jesus, as recorded in the Gospels, were in accord with his dignity and the predictions of the Messiah, yet such also as to harmonize with the lowly appearance which the Saviour was to make on earth. As Malachi (ch. 3:1; also ch. 4:5, 6) had prophesied that a herald, in the spirit and power of Elijah, should precede the Lord when he should come to his temple, so Luke tells us first of the birth of John the Baptist, the herald of the Christ. A certain pious priest, named Zacharias, who had no child and was far advanced in years, was discharging his duties at the Temple. He was chosen by lot, as the custom was, to offer the incense, representing the prayers of Israel, on the altar in the Holy Place. To him the angel Gabriel appeared and announced that he was to be the father of the promised forerunner of the Messiah. This was probably in October, 6 B.C. After his term of service in the Temple was over, he and his wife, Elisabeth, returned to their home in a city in the hill country of Judah (Luke 1:39), and awaited the fulfillment of the promise. Six months later the angel appeared to Mary, a maiden probably of Davidic descent, who lived in Nazareth and was betrothed to Joseph, who was certainly descended from the great king of Israel (Matt. 1:1-16; Luke 1:27); see GENEALOGY. Joseph was a carpenter by trade, a man of humble station though of high descent, and a devout Israelite. To Mary the angel announced that she was to become the mother of the Messiah (Luke 1:28-38) by the power of the Holy Spirit working in her, and that the child, who was to be called Jesus, should have the throne of his ancestor David. At that time she was also told of the pregnancy of Elisabeth, who was her kinswoman. When the angel left her, Mary hastened to Elisabeth. At their meeting, the spirit of prophecy came on these 2 women. While Elisabeth greeted Mary as the mother of her Lord, Mary, like Hannah of old (1 Sam. 2:1-10), broke forth in a song of praise for the salvation of Israel that was coming and for the honor which had been conferred on her. When the time drew near for Elisabeth to be delivered of the child which she had conceived, Mary returned to Nazareth. Her further protection against reproach was, however, secured by God himself. Joseph, seeing her condition, was disposed quietly to put her away without public accusation, but even this gentle treatment was forestalled. An angel revealed to him in a dream the cause of Mary's condition; told him that he was to have the Messiah for his child; and that, as Isaiah had foretold, the latter was to be born of a virgin. With faith, equal to Mary's, Joseph believed the message and made Mary his legal wife. It was thus secured that Mary's child was born of a virgin, and at the same time that he had a legal human father, while his mother was protected by the love and respectability of a husband. There can be little doubt that these facts were later made known by Mary herself.

The fact that neither Christ nor his apostles appeal to his miraculous conception in proof of his Messiahship occasions no reason for doubting the narrative. The event was not one which could be used as public proof. But the narratives of Christ's birth beautifully harmonize with what we now know of his dignity and his mission upon earth. The Messiah was to be the perfect flower of Israel's spiritual life; and so Jesus was born in the bosom of this pious family circle where the pure religion of the O.T. was believed and cherished. The Messiah was to appear in lowliness; and so Jesus came from the home of the Nazarene carpenter. The Messiah was to be the son of David; and so Joseph, his legal father, and probably Mary, his actual mother, were descended from David. The Messiah was to be the incarnation of God, a divine person uniting to himself a human nature; and so Jesus was born of a woman but miraculously conceived by the power of the Holy Spirit.

After relating the birth of John and the prophetic song which burst from the long-sealed lips of his father Zacharias over the advent of the Messiah's forerunner, the Evangelist Luke (Luke 1:57-79; 2:1-6) explains how Jesus came to be born in Bethlehem. The emperor Augustus had ordered an enrollment of all the subjects of the empire, and although Palestine was under Herod, its inhabitants also were included in the decree. The enrollment of the Jews, however, evidently took place after the Jewish method, by which each father of a household was registered, not at his dwelling place, but at the place where his family belonged in view of its ancestry. Hence Joseph had to go to Bethlehem, the original home of David. Mary accompanied him. The lodging place, or khan, where strangers were permitted to sojourn, was already fully occupied when they arrived, and they found shelter only in a stable, which may have been, as early tradition affirms, in a cave near the town. Such caves were often used about Bethlehem for stables. We are not told that any cattle were occupying the stable. It may have been unused at the time. Nor would a stable in that country and among that people have seemed as offensive a lodging place as it might with us; but it was a lowly abode for the birthplace of the Messiah. Yet such it was destined to be, for there Mary's child was born, and she laid him in a manger (Luke 2:7). But though born so humbly, he was not to be without attestation. That night shepherds in a field near Bethlehem were visited by angels, who told them of the Messiah's birth and where he lay, and sang in the hearing of the shepherds: "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace among men in whom he is well pleased" (Luke 2:14, R.V.). The shepherds hastened to Bethlehem and saw the child. They related what they had seen and heard, and then returned again to their flocks. All this was again in striking harmony with the mission of the Messiah. Yet we should remember that the event occurred in a circle of humble peasants, and that it made no noise in the busy world. For a while Joseph and Mary lingered in Bethlehem. On the 8th day the child was circumcised (Luke 2:21) and the appointed name, Jesus, was given to him. Forty days after his birth his parents took him, as the Law directed (Lev., ch. 12) to the Temple and Mary offered her gifts of purification and presented her child unto the Lord. The first-born male child of a Hebrew mother was to be redeemed by the payment of 5 shekels (Num. 18:15, 16), and this is what is meant when it is said that they brought him "to present him to the Lord." The mother was also to offer her thanksgiving, and it is specially noted by Luke that Mary gave the offering of the poor, "a pair of turtle doves, or two young pigeons." The modest circumstances of the family are thus further attested. Yet the lowly Messiah was not to leave his Father's house without recognition. An aged saint, Simeon by name, came into the Temple and the spirit of inspiration fell upon him when he saw the child. He had been promised by God that he should not die till he had seen the Messiah. Taking the infant in his arms, Simeon gave thanks and predicted the glory and sorrow of his life (Luke 2:25-35). Anna also, a prophetess of great age, who continually dwelt in the Temple, bore witness to the advent of the Christ (Luke 2:36-38).

A more remarkable attestation was soon to follow. Some time after Joseph and Mary had returned to Bethlehem, certain Magi from the East appeared in Jerusalem and declared that they had seen the Messiah's star in the heavens and were come to worship him. They had doubtless learned from the Jews scattered throughout the East of the expectation of a coming king in Judea who would be man's great deliverer. They were doubtless also students of the stars, and God used their superstitious notions to make them witnesses to the Gentiles, who awaited in the half-light of natural religion the coming of the Saviour, of whom they felt the need, but whose real character they did not understand. In the e. the Magi had seen a star which for some reason they felt portended the birth of the Jewish king. Coming to Jerusalem, they inquired for him. Their message troubled the equally superstitious Herod and, summoning the scribes, he demanded where the Messiah was to be born. When told that he was to be born in Bethlehem, Herod sent the Magi there, but bade them promise to inform him if they found the child. On the way the Magi saw the star again over Bethlehem, and, having found Jesus, offered him rare gifts of frankincense, gold, and myrrh. We can imagine with what renewed awe Joseph and Mary must have received these unexpected and strange visitors. They were another sign of the high destiny of the child. The Magi, however, were warned of God not to return to Herod, for that wicked man only intended to use them to destroy the newly born king. They departed home, therefore, by another way.

Joseph also was warned by an angel of the impending danger and instructed to take Mary and the babe to Egypt, well out of Herod's reach. It was none too soon, for presently the cruel king, whose readiness to murder even his own sons is related by Josephus, sent soldiers to slay all the male children in Bethlehem who were 2 years of age and under. He hoped thus to accomplish the object in which he had been foiled by the departure of the Magi without informing him concerning the child they had sought. Bethlehem was a small place and the number of children slain may not have been large; but the act was cruel enough at the best. Jesus, however, had escaped. How long he was kept in Egypt we do not know. Probably it was for a few months. There were many Jews there, so that Joseph could easily find a refuge. But in due time the angel informed him of Herod's death and directed him to return. It was apparently his first purpose to rear the child in Bethlehem, David's city, but his fear of Archelaus, Herod's son, made him hesitate. Again God gave him instructions, and in accordance with them Joseph and Mary sought once more their old home in Nazareth. In consequence of this, Jesus appeared among the people, when his public life began, as the prophet of Nazareth, the Nazarene. Such are the few incidents preserved in the Gospels of the birth and infancy of Jesus. Wonderful as they appear to us, they attracted no attention at the time on the part of the world. The few persons concerned in them either forgot them or kept them to themselves. But when the Church was founded we may suppose that Mary told them to the disciples. Matthew and Luke have related them to us quite independently of each other, the former to illustrate the royal Messiahship of Jesus and his fulfillment of prophecy; the latter to explain the origin of Jesus and the historical beginnings of his life.

IV. 2. Childhood and Youth. After the return to Nazareth, nothing is told us of Jesus' life, except the 1 incident of his visit with his parents to the Temple when he had become 12 years of age (Luke 2:41-51). That incident, however, is instructive. It shows the continued piety of Joseph and Mary and the devout training which they sought to give the child. It shows also the early spiritual development of Jesus, for he was already mainly interested in those religious questions on which the Jewish rabbis gave instruction to their pupils. We are not to imagine the boy of 12 as instructing the teachers, but as a pupil in one of their Temple schools, and yet as showing by his questions a spiritual insight which amazed them. The incident also illustrates the natural, human life which Jesus led. He grew, we are told, "in wisdom and stature [or age], and in favor with God and men"

(Luke 2:52). The wonders of his infancy were doubtless kept a secret by Joseph and Mary, and Jesus appeared to his companions and the family in no wise a supernatural being, but only remarkable for his mental force and moral purity. Putting together, however, other facts incidentally mentioned in the Gospels, we can form some idea of the circumstances in which the childhood and young manhood of Jesus were passed. He was a member of a family. He had 4 brothers and some sisters (Mark 6:3, etc.). Some have supposed that these were the children of Joseph by a former marriage; others that they were Christ's cousins. It seems to us most natural and Scriptural to believe that they were the children of Joseph and Mary, born after Jesus (see BRETHREN OF THE LORD and JAMES 3). But at any rate, Jesus grew up in a family, experiencing the pleasures and the discipline of family life. He became, like Joseph, a carpenter (Mark 6:3), so that he was accustomed to manual labor. But mental discipline also was not wanting. Jewish children were well instructed in the Scriptures, and our Lord's familiarity with them is evident from his teaching. His parables also reveal a mind sensitive to the teaching of nature, and which must always have delighted to ponder the evidence of God's mind in the works of his hand. Nazareth was on the edge of the busiest part of the Jewish world and not far from some of the most famous scenes of Israel's history. From the cliff back of the town the eye could contemplate many places associated with great events. Not far off was the Sea of Galilee, around which was gathered the varied life of the world in miniature. It was a period also, as has been said, of much political excitement, and Jewish homes were often agitated with the report of stirring events. There is no reason to suppose that Jesus grew up in isolation. We should rather imagine him keenly alive to the progress of events in Palestine. While the language spoken by him was Aramaic, which had displaced the older Hebrew among the later Jews, he must often have heard Greek used and may have been familiar with it. All this period of his life, however, the Evangelists pass over. Their books were written not to give biographies of Jesus, but to report his public ministry. We can see enough, however, to prove the naturalness of our Saviour's human life, the fitness of his surroundings to prepare him for his future work, the beauty of his character, and thus the gradual unfolding of his humanity in expectation of the hour when he was to offer himself as God's Messiah to his people.

IV. 3. Baptism. That important hour drew nigh when, perhaps in the summer of A.D. 26, John, the son of Zacharias, who had hitherto led a life of ascetic devotion in the desert (Luke 1:80), received from God his commission to summon the nation to repentance for their sins in preparation for the Messiah's coming. John moved from place to place along the Jordan Valley and administered the rite of baptism to those who believed his message. He called both the nation and individuals to repentance for sin, spoke in the tone of the older prophets, especially of Elijah, and announced that the Messiah was at hand, that he would purify Israel with judgments and make expiation for the world's sin (Matt., ch. 3; Mark 1:1-8; Luke 3:1-18; John 1:19-36). The effect of his ministry was widespread and profound. Even from Galilee the people flocked to his preaching. The sanhedrin sent a deputation to inquire his authority. While the ruling classes were unmoved by his appeal (Matt. 21:25), popular wonder and excitement were aroused, and the purely religious character of his message led the truly pious to believe that the long-deferred hope of Israel was at last to be fulfilled. After John's ministry had continued for some time, perhaps for 6 months or more, Jesus appeared amid the multitude and asked the prophet to baptize him. The inspired insight of the Baptist recognized in him one who had no need of repentance; saw in him, in fact, no less than the Messiah himself. "I have need," he said, "to be baptized of thee, and comest thou to me?" (Matt. 3:14). We are not to suppose that Jesus did not already know himself perfectly well to be the Christ. His reply rather shows the contrary: "Suffer it now: for thus it becometh us to fulfill all righteousness." The baptism meant for him, partly, self-dedication to the work which John had announced, and also the conscious taking upon himself of the sin of the people whom he had come to save. As he came from the baptism (Mark 1:10), John (John 1:33, 34) saw the heavens opened and the Spirit of God, in the form of a dove, descending and remaining on him, and a voice came from above: "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased" (Matt. 3:17). This was the full endowment of our Lord's human nature with spiritual power for his ministry. How truly human, as well as divine, he was through it all is shown by what immediately followed.

IV. 4. The Temptation. Jesus was not to enter on his work without adequate preparation. Realizing his vocation, he was led by the Spirit into the wilderness, doubtless for meditation. There Satan met him, and sought to pervert his purpose to selfish and worldly ends. Jesus himself must have related this experience to his disciples. While we are not to doubt the outward reality of the Tempter and the physical features of the scene as described to us (Matt. 4:1-11; Luke 4:1-13), we should not forget that the power of the temptation lay in the subtlety with which the world was presented to Jesus as more attractive than the life of stern obedience to God, with its probably fatal close. This temptation lasted for 40 days, and Jesus returned from it to the Jordan fully dedicated to the lowly, suffering lot which he knew to be God's will for his Messiah.

IV. 5. Calling of Disciples. Jesus inaugurated his work with no loud proclamation of his Advent. The Baptist pointed him out to some of his own disciples as the Lamb of God (John 1:29, 36). Two, Andrew and probably John, followed the new teacher. Simon was soon added to the number (vs. 35-42). The next day Philip and Nathanael were called (vs. 43-51). With his little band Jesus quietly returned to Galilee, and at Cana performed his first miracle, in which the disciples saw the first signs of his coming glory (ch. 2:1-11). We must be impressed with the absence of any attempt to make a public display. The new movement began with the faith of a few obscure Galileans. But John's account makes it clear that Jesus was fully sensible of who he was and what he had come to do. He was only waiting for the favorable moment to offer himself to Israel as the Messiah.

IV. 6. Early Judean Ministry. That opportunity was naturally found in the approaching passover (April, A.D. 27). From Capernaum, whither he and his family and disciples had gone (John 2:12), Jesus ascended to Jerusalem, and there proceeded to cleanse the Temple of the traders who profaned it. It was an act worthy of a prophet to reform the flagrant abuses of God's service; but Christ's words, "Make not my Father's house a house of merchandise," indicate that he claimed to be more than a prophet (v. 16). It was, in fact, a public summons of Israel to follow him in the work of religious reformation, for only when the Jews had rejected him would he proceed to organize the new Church of the future; but he himself did not expect them to follow him. This is proved by his veiled prediction of his death at their hands (v. 19), while in the conversation with Nicodemus he clearly brought out the necessity of a new birth and of his own suffering (ch. 3:1-21), in order that any might enter the Kingdom which God's love had sent him to establish. For our knowledge of this early Judean ministry of Jesus we are indebted to John (chs. 2:13 to 4:3). It lasted apparently about 9 months. After the passover Jesus retired from the city to the Judean country, and having found the nation unwilling to follow him, he began to preach, as the Baptist was still doing, the necessity of repentance. For a while the 2 worked side by side. Jesus would not begin an independent work of his own until John's providential mission was plainly over. Both labored together for the spiritual quickening of the nation. Jesus began finally to attract more disciples than John did. This led him to terminate his Judean ministry, for he would not appear as a rival of his coworker (John 4:1-3).

IV. 7. Galilean Ministry. On the way through Samaria occurred Jesus' memorable meeting with the woman at Jacob's Well (John 4:4-42). But he hastened on. Arriving in Galilee, he found that his fame had preceded him (vs. 43-45). A nobleman from Capernaum sought out Jesus, who was tarrying in Cana, and secured from him the cure of his son (vs. 46-54). It was clear that Galilee was the place where he should labor and that the fields were white to harvest (v. 35). Then, it would seem, an event occurred which indicated that the hour for him to begin his proper work had indeed providentially arrived. The news came that John the Baptist had been cast into prison by Herod Antipas. The work of the herald was over. The old Jewish church had been sufficiently called to repentance and reformation, and it had refused to listen. Jesus began forthwith in Galilee to preach the Kingdom of God, to announce the germinal principles of the new dispensation, and to gather the nucleus of the future Church.

The great Galilean ministry of Jesus lasted about 16 months. He took for his center the busy mart of trade, Capernaum. In Galilee he was in the midst of a population prevalently Jewish, yet in a region removed from interference by the religious authorities of the nation. His evident purpose was to set forth the true, spiritual Kingdom of God, and by mighty works to convince men of his own authority and of the character of the Kingdom. He asked for faith in himself. He unveiled the real character of God and his requirements of men. He did not apply to himself the name Messiah, for it would have been too easily misunderstood by carnal minds. He generally called himself the Son of Man. He did not at first speak of his death. The people were not ready to hear of that. He taught the principles of true religion, with himself as its authoritative expounder. His mighty works roused the greatest enthusiasm. He was thus enabled to attract wide attention, till the whole land was eager to see and hear him. But, as he foresaw, the final result was the disappointment of the people with his unworldly ideas. Only a little band faithfully followed him. Yet by his teaching he laid down truths which that band of disciples were to carry, after his death, throughout the world.

For the order of events in the lower or early Galilean ministry, see the harmony in the article GOSPEL. We can here only note the leading phases. The 1st was that of the opening of the work. This was marked by startling miracles, by the summons to believe the gospel, and by the awakening of enthusiastic interest in Jesus on the part of the Galileans. It included the events noted in the harmony, beginning with the 1st rejection at Nazareth and ending with Levi's feast. The close of this phase of his work, which lasted perhaps 4 months, found Jesus the center of universal interest in Galilee, and gathered about him a little company of devoted followers. We are not told much about his teaching as yet; but from what we are told and from the significant miracles he performed—such as the cure of the demoniac (Mark 1:23-27), the healing of the leper (vs. 40-45), the cure of the paralytic (ch. 2:1-12), the miraculous draught of fish (Luke 5:1-11)—it is clear that the burden of his message was substantially that which he announced in Nazareth (ch. 4:18-21), "The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor; he hath sent me to heal the brokenhearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised, to preach the acceptable year of the Lord" (A.V.).

The aspect of affairs soon began to change, for opposition arose on the part of the Pharisees. This is the second phase of the Galilean ministry. Jesus visited Jerusalem (John 5:1) and there healed the impotent man on the Sabbath. At once conflict with the rulers and rabbis broke out. Yet the conflict seems to have been purposely provoked by Jesus, in order that through it the difference between the spirit of his teaching and that of current Judaism might appear. We see in him now the spiritual interpreter of the O.T., bringing out its real meaning, and doing so (ch. 5) with express appeal to his own authority as the Son of God and the divinely appointed teacher of men. This phase included, besides John, ch. 5, the incidents of plucking the ears of corn and healing the man with the withered hand; see GOSPEL.

The conflict with the Pharisees and the continued advance of popular interest led next to the organization of his disciples, which constituted the third phase of this part of his ministry. He now appointed his 12 apostles, and gave in the Sermon on the Mount a description of the character and life of the true members of God's Kingdom. It is a sublime presentation of a genuinely religious life, in joyful union with the heavenly Father, and consecrated to his service in the salvation of the world, the real fulfillment of the old Law, though utterly opposed to the formality and superficiality of Pharisaism, the ideal of trust and communion of man in relation to God. The Sermon on the Mount was not meant by Jesus to teach the way of salvation, nor did it constitute by any means his whole gospel. He, like the apostles, taught salvation through faith in himself. But in this sermon, over against Pharisaism and popular ignorance, he set forth that spiritual life which is the manifestation of the divine Kingdom. Faith in Jesus leads into this Kingdom.

The outlines of the new organization having thus been enunciated, we read, as the fourth phase, of a succession of miracles and tours through lower Galilee—Jesus being accompanied by his apostles—for the purpose of extending his influence.—This phase extends in the harmony from the close of the Sermon on the Mount to the time when Herod inquired concerning the new teacher. During these months the popular interest in Jesus steadily increased, but the opposition of the Pharisees increased equally. The most notable point in the history just here is the great day of parables. The parable was a form of instruction in which Jesus was unrivaled. It was intended to convey truth to receptive minds, and yet to avoid such open expression of it as would give his enemies a plea for interfering with him. The appearance of parables in his teaching just at this period shows the increasing gravity of the situation, necessitating a certain reserve on Christ's part. We must, at the same time, admire the incomparable skill with which he embodied in these simple stories the profoundest truths concerning the origin, progress, perils, and destiny of the spiritual Kingdom which he was establishing in the world. At length, however, the work in Galilee came to a crisis. Herod Antipas began to inquire concerning Jesus, and the fact was a warning that complications, such as had already led to John's imprisonment, and still more recently to his murder, might ensue. A sufficient opportunity had, moreover, been given to the people to test their relation to the truth. Just then an event occurred which decided the matter. Jesus had sought temporary retirement with the Twelve; but the multitudes had followed him to a desert place on the n.e. shore of the Sea of Galilee, and, in compassion for their needs, he had miraculously fed them, 5,000 in number, from 5 loaves and 2 fishes. The enthusiastic Galileans wished to take him by force and make him a king (John 6:15); but that very fact proved that they had wholly misunderstood his mission. It was time to bring his work to a close. From the beginning he had intimated that he had come to die, and that only by dying could he be their Saviour (ch. 3:14, 15). It was now time to prepare for the sacrifice. On the next day after the feeding of the 5,000 Jesus delivered in Capernaum the discourse, recorded in ch. 6:22-71, upon himself as the bread of life and on the necessity of eating his flesh and drinking his blood. Then, after some parting denunciation of the Pharisaic misrepresentations of religion (Mark 7:1-23), he brought his public ministry in Galilee to a close by retiring with his disciples from the region in which he had hitherto been working.

The next great period in Christ's life is called the later Galilean ministry; see harmony, in article GOSPEL. It lasted about 6 months. In it Jesus went, for the only time in his life, into Gentile territory, viz., the regions of Tyre and Sidon. Then, having apparently passed s. along the e. side of the upper Jordan and the Sea of Galilee, we find him in the region of Decapolis. Again he went far into the n. part of Galilee, and finally returned again to Capernaum. The period was mainly devoted to the preparation of his disciples for his death and for the extension of his gospel to all peoples. He preached little, and then mainly to Gentiles or to the half-heathen people on the s. and e. of the Sea of Galilee. Finally, near Caesarea Philippi, at the base of Mount Hermon, he elicited from Peter and the rest the full confession of his Messiahship, and, in connection therewith, he plainly told them of his coming death and resurrection, and of the necessity that every follower of his should be willing also to bear the cross. Shortly after occurred the transfiguration, in which 3 of his apostles beheld his glory, and in which, it would seem, he devoted himself finally, with sublime exaltation of spirit, to the sacrifice to which law and prophecy, as he was reminded by Moses and Elias (Elijah), had pointed. Afterward he repeated the prediction of his death, and, having returned to Capernaum, further instructed his disciples (Matt., ch. 18) in that conception of God's service as one of humility, self-sacrifice, and love, of which his own great act of self-devotion was to be the permanent example. It was now probably the early autumn of A.D. 29, and leaving Capernaum for the last time Jesus "steadfastly set his face to go to Jerusalem" (Luke 9:51).

IV. 8. The Last Journeys to Jerusalem and the Perea Ministry. It is impossible to follow in exact order our Lord's movements, for Luke, on whom we are mainly dependent for the record of this period, does not follow a precise chronological method of narration. But the main features of the period are clear enough. Jesus now sought to attract the public attention of the whole land, including Judea. He sent out the seventy to announce his coming. He visited Jerusalem at the feast of tabernacles (John, ch. 7), and again at the feast of dedication (ch. 10:22), and on both occasions offered himself repeatedly to the people. He called himself the Light of the world and the Good Shepherd of God's flock, and boldly contended with the rulers who opposed his pretensions. He also moved back and forth through Judea and Perea, and explained in popular discourse and with more beauty of illustration than ever before the true religious life and the true idea of God and of his service. Here belong the parables of the Good Samaritan, the Wedding Feast, the Lost Sheep, the Lost Coin, the Prodigal Son, the Unjust Steward, the Rich Man and Lazarus, the Importunate Widow, the Pharisee and the Publican. Thus the announcement of the gospel became more complete, while the fierceness of the opposition of the rulers became more intense, until an event occurred which brought matters to a climax. Word was brought to Jesus of the sickness of his friend Lazarus in Bethany. Going to him, he found him already 4 days dead, and forthwith he eclipsed all his previous miracles by raising the dead man to life (John 11:1-46). The miracle was so stupendous and performed so near Jerusalem that it had a profound effect on the people of the capital; and the sanhedrin, under the lead of Caiaphas, the high priest, decided that the influence of Jesus could be destroyed only by his death (vs. 47-53). Forthwith Jesus retired from the vicinity (v. 54), evidently determined that he should not die until the passover. As that drew near he began to approach the city through Perea (Matt., chs. 19; 20; Mark, ch. 10; Luke 18:31 to 19:28), teaching as he went, but again predicting his death and resurrection, until he reached Bethany, 6 days before the feast (John 12:1).

IV. 9. The Last Week. At Bethany, Mary, the sister of Lazarus, anointed his head and feet as he was at supper, an event in which Jesus saw a prophecy of his coming burial. The next day he made the triumphal entry on an ass's colt into Jerusalem. By that he invited the anger of the rulers, offered himself publicly as the Messiah, and illustrated the peaceful character of the Kingdom he had come to found. The next day he returned again to the capital, on his way cursing the barren, though blooming, fig tree, which was so apt an emblem of the barren, though pretentious, Jewish church. Then, as 3 years before, he cleansed the Temple of the traders who profaned its courts, thus once more calling the nation to follow him in a purification of Israel. But though the pilgrims to the festival crowded about him and had hailed him at the triumphal entry as the Messiah, the rulers maintained their resolute enmity. On the next day (Tuesday) he again visited the city. Upon his arrival at the Temple, he was met by a deputation from the sanhedrin, which demanded his authority for his acts. This he refused to give, knowing that they were already resolved to destroy him, while, by the parables of the Two Sons, the Wicked Husbandmen, and the Marriage of the King's Son he described their disobedience to God, the infidelity of Israel to her high trust, and the certain desolation of the faithless church and city. Forthwith he was questioned by a succession of parties who sought to find accusation against him or to weaken his reputation. The Pharisees and Herodians asked about the lawfulness of giving tribute to Caesar; the Sadducees about the resurrection; a lawyer about the Great Commandment; and he, having silenced each in turn, discomfited them by his questioning concerning David's address to the Messiah as Lord, for the psalmist's language clearly implied that his own claim to be the Son of God and equal with God was not blasphemous. It was a day of bitter conflict. Jesus vehemently denounced the unworthy leaders of the people (Matt. 23:1-38). When certain Greeks desired to see him, he saw in their coming a presage of the Jew's rejection of him, and that the Gentiles were to be his followers, and realized that the end was at hand (John 12:20-50). As he left the Temple he sadly remarked to his disciples that soon the splendid building would be in ruins, and later on the same evening he gave to 4 of them his prediction of the destruction of Jerusalem, the spread of the gospel, the sufferings of his followers, and his own Second Advent. This prediction shows to us that amid the lowering storm of Jewish hostility the vision of Jesus was clear, and that he moved on to his fate knowing it to be the appointed path to ultimate victory. It is probable that on that very night the plot was formed to destroy him. Judas, one of the Twelve, had, we may believe, long been alienated from the spiritual ideas of the Master. He was grieved also at Christ's refusal to seek a worldly kingdom; for Judas, John tells us, was an avaricious man. At the supper at Bethany he had become finally and fully conscious of his entire want of sympathy with Jesus, and as the disappointment which he felt over the failure of his hopes grew keener he resolved to wreak his anger on the Lord by betraying him to the rulers. His offer changed their plans. They had purposed to wait until the festival was over and the crowds had departed. But in the absence of any real charge against Jesus they were only too glad to avail themselves of the traitor's proposal. The next day (Wednesday) seems to have been spent by Jesus in retirement. He probably remained in Bethany. On Thursday afternoon the paschal lambs were to be slain, and after sunset the paschal supper, with which the seven-day feast of unleavened bread began, was to be eaten by all pious Israelites. On that day Jesus sent Peter and John into the city to prepare the passover for him and the Twelve. He sent them, no doubt, to the house of a disciple or friend (Matt. 26:18); but, by the device of telling them to follow when they entered the city a man whom they would meet bearing a pitcher of water, he kept the place of assembly secret from the rest of the disciples, for the purpose no doubt of preventing Judas from betraying it to the rulers and thus possibly interfering with the last precious interview with the apostles. When evening came he observed with them the passover supper. For the order of events during the evening, see GOSPEL, harmony. The view of some that according to John's Gospel (chs. 13:1, 29; 18:28; 19:31) Jesus was crucified on Nisan 14th, the day on which the paschal lamb was slain, and therefore that he did not eat the passover supper at the regular time, but anticipated it by a day, appears to be quite inconsistent with the language reported by Matthew (ch. 26:17-19), Mark (ch. 14:12-16), and Luke (ch. 22:7-13, 15), and the expressions appealed to in John may be explained on the hypothesis which we are following. [NOTE: John 13:1 does not mean that all that is recorded in ch. 13 was "before the feast of the passover," but is an introductory remark describing the loving spirit in which the fatal passover was entered upon by Jesus; ch. 13: 29, "buy what things we have need of for the feast," may refer to things necessary for the next day, on which the freewill offerings of the people were presented; ch. 18:28, "that they . . . might eat the passover," may mean simply "keep the paschal festival"; ch. 19:31, "the preparation," was not the preparation for the passover, but for the Sabbath.] It should be noted that in all probability Judas withdrew before the institution of the Eucharist, and that Jesus twice predicted the fall of Peter, once in the upper room and again while on the way to Gethsemane. John's Gospel does not relate the institution of the Eucharist, but it gives the Lord's last discourses with the apostles, in which he comforted them in view of his departure from them by revealing the unchangeable spiritual union between himself and them, and the mission of the Spirit which would bring to fruition their relation to him. It records also his sublime high-priestly prayer (ch. 17). On the way to Gethsemane Jesus further warned the disciples that they would soon be scattered, and appointed a meeting with him, after his resurrection, in Galilee. The agony in the Garden was his final and complete surrender of himself to the last great act of sacrifice. It was interrupted by the coming of Judas with a company of soldiers, obtained doubtless from the garrison near the Temple on the ground that a seditious person was to be arrested (John 18:3, 12), together with some of the Levitical guard and servants of the chief priests. Judas knew that Jesus was wont to resort to Gethsemane. Some suppose that he had first visited the upper room and, finding Jesus gone, followed to Olivet, at the base of which the Garden lay. Jesus, after a brief expostulation, submitted to arrest; whereupon his disciples fled.

The captors took him first to Annas (John 18:13), the father-in-law of Caiaphas, where he had a preliminary examination while the sanhedrin was being convened (vs. 13, 14, 19-24). It is not improbable that Annas and Caiaphas lived in the same palace, for Peter's denials are said to have occurred in the court of the palace, both while this examination before Annas and the later one before the sanhedrin were taking place. At the 1st examination Jesus refused to answer the inquiries and demanded that evidence against him be produced. He was sent bound, however, to the apartments of Caiaphas, where the sanhedrin had hastily assembled. No harmonious evidence of blasphemy, which was the crime they sought to prove against him, could be found; the high priest at last solemnly adjured him to say if he were the Messiah. Thereupon Jesus made the claim in the most explicit manner, and the angry court condemned him as worthy of death for blasphemy. The unjust spirit of his judges appeared in the ribald mockery to which he was subjected. It was, however, the law that the decisions of the sanhedrin must be made in the daytime. Hence very early in the morning the court convened again and the same formalities were gone through (Luke 22:66-71), and then, since permission of the governor was required for the execution of a criminal, they hastened with Jesus to Pilate. The indecent haste of the whole proceeding shows their fear that the people might prevent his destruction. Pilate probably resided in Herod's palace on the hill of Zion. But the distance from the high priest's house was not great, and it was still very early when the governor was summoned forth to hear their request. They wished him at first to grant permission for the execution without inquiring into the charges, but this he refused to do (John 18:29-32). Then they accused Jesus of "perverting our nation, and forbidding to give tribute to Caesar, saying that he himself is Christ a king" (Luke 23:2). After Jesus had acknowledged to the governor that he was a king (v. 3), Pilate examined him privately (John 18:33-38), and discovered the wholly nonpolitical and harmless character of his claims. He forthwith declared that he found no fault in him and that he would let him go. But the governor was in reality afraid to thwart the will of his intractable subjects, and when they fiercely demanded the crucifixion of Jesus he fell back on various weak expedients to shift the responsibility. Having learned that Jesus was from Galilee, Pilate sent him to Herod Antipas (Luke 23:7-11), who also was then in Jerusalem; but Herod refused to exercise jurisdiction. Meanwhile the crowd had increased, and the governor appealed to them to say what prisoner he should release, as his custom was, at the passover. He evidently hoped that the popularity of Jesus would rescue him from the chief priests. But the latter persuaded the rabble to ask for Barabbas. The message of his wife further increased Pilate's anxiety to release Jesus; but though he several times appealed to the multitude in his behalf, they were implacable and bloodthirsty. The governor was afraid to act on his own convictions and weakly gave permission for the execution. Yet while the scourging which always preceded crucifixion was in progress in the hall of his palace he could not rest. Again he sought to satisfy the Jews by the spectacle of Jesus bleeding and thorn-crowned, but they, made bold with success, cried out that he ought to die because he made himself the Son of God (John 19:1-7). This, however, increased Pilate's superstitions, so that again he examined Jesus privately and again sought to release him (vs. 8-12); but the Jews finally appealed to his political ambition and practically accused him of disloyalty to Caesar in abetting a rival king. This decided the matter. Pilate had the grim satisfaction of hearing the Jews proclaim their supreme allegiance to the emperor (vs. 13-15), and therefore he handed Jesus over for execution. Jesus thus died for no crime and without any real legal process. His death was literally a judicial murder. The execution was carried out by 4 soldiers (John 19:23) under the supervision of a centurion. With him also 2 common robbers were led to death. The victims usually carried their crosses, either the whole of them or the transverse portion. Jesus seems to have carried the whole (John 19:17), but it appears that his strength gave way and Simon of Cyrene was compelled to relieve him of the cross (Matt. 27:32; Mark 15:20; Luke 23:26). The place of crucifixion was a short distance outside the city; see CALVARY. The victim was usually nailed to the cross on the ground and then the cross was placed upright in the hole prepared for it. The crime of the offender was written on a tablet and placed over his head. In Jesus' case the accusation was in Hebrew (Aramaic), Greek, and Latin. Its longest form is given by John (ch. 19:19), "Jesus of Nazareth, the king of the Jews." Mark tells us that it was "about the third hour" (i.e., 9 A.M.) when the crucifixion was completed. If we remember that the proceedings began "as soon as it was day" (Luke 22:66), their completion about 9 o'clock will not seem incredible. It is moreover in accord with the haste which had characterized the action of the Jews from the beginning.

Into the incidents which the Gospels have preserved as occurring during the crucifixion we cannot go here. Such sufferers often remained alive for several days; but the already exhausted frame of Jesus did not endure the agony so long. At the 9th hour, after 3 hours of miraculous darkness (from noon to 3 P.M.), he expired with a great cry. The words spoken from the cross, however, indicate that he retained his consciousness to the end, and that he fully realized the significance of all that happened. When he died there seem to have been but few present. The crowd which followed him at first had returned to the city. The mocking priests also had left him. A few disciples and the soldiers are all that we know to have been present at the end. The rulers were, therefore, not aware that he had died. Unwilling to have the bodies hanging on the cross over the Sabbath, the Jews went to Pilate and asked that their legs might be broken; but, when the soldiers came to Jesus for this purpose, they found him already dead. One, however, pierced his side to make sure, and John, who was near, saw blood and water issue from the wound (John 19:34). Jesus seems to have died literally of a broken heart. Meanwhile Joseph of Arimathea, a secret disciple of Jesus, though a rich man and a member of the sanhedrin—who, however, had not consented to his Master's condemnation (Luke 23:51)—knowing that death had come, had begged for the body of Jesus. By him and a few others it was laid in a garden of Joseph's, in a new tomb hewn out of a rock.

IV. 10. Resurrection and Ascension. Now it is clear that the disciples were wholly disconcerted and overwhelmed by the sudden arrest and death of their Lord. Though he had on 3 recorded occasions forewarned them of his death and of his resurrection on the 3d day, they were too distressed to have any hope. Though he had told them to go to Galilee to meet him, they lingered in Jerusalem. Their conduct will not seem incredible nor the narrative doubtful to those who know the prostration which often accompanies bitter disappointment and sorrow. Hence Jesus appeared to them in Jerusalem and its vicinity. The resurrection narratives in the Gospels are not intended, however, to be complete accounts of the events. They do not pretend to marshal the evidence for the reality of the resurrection. That consisted in the testimony of apostles to whom he repeatedly appeared (I Cor. 15:3-8). In the Gospels we have a number of incidents preserved either because of their intrinsic interest or for the sake of the spiritual instruction which they provided to believers. The order of events may very likely have been the following: Early in the morning of the 1st day of the week 2 companies of pious Galilean women proceeded to the sepulcher to anoint the body of Jesus for permanent burial. The one company consisted of Mary Magdalene, Mary the mother of James, and Salome (Mark 16:1). Joanna and other unnamed women were probably in the 2d party (Luke 24:10, which is a general statement, including the report of all the women). The former group saw the stone rolled away from the tomb, and Mary Magdalene, supposing that the body had been stolen, returned to Peter and John with the news (John 20:1, 2). Her companions went on, and entering the tomb heard from the angel the news of the resurrection and the message to the disciples (Matt. 28:1-7; Mark 16:1-7). As they hastened away, we may suppose that they met the other company of women, and that all returned again to the tomb, but only to receive from 2 angels a more emphatic assurance and direction (Luke 24:1-8). The women then hastened toward the city with the news and on the way Jesus met them (Matt. 28:9, 10). Meanwhile Mary Magdalene had reported to Peter and John that the tomb was empty, and they had run thither and found it even so (John 20:3-10). She had followed them and, when they departed from the garden, she remained, and to her also did Jesus appear (vs. 11-18). All the women finally returned to the disciples and reported the wonderful news. It was not, however, on the testimony of these women that faith in the resurrection of Jesus was to rest. During the day he appeared to Simon Peter (Luke 24:34; I Cor. 15:5), later to 2 disciples journeying to Emmaus (Luke 24:13-35), and in the evening, to all the Eleven except Thomas (Luke 24:36-43; John 20:19-24). At that time he ate before them, proving the reality of his physical resurrection. Since, however, Thomas even yet would not believe, the disciples still lingered in Jerusalem, and on the following Sunday Jesus again appeared to them and proved to the doubting apostle that he had indeed risen (John 20:24-29). Then, it would appear, the apostles returned to Galilee. We next read of 7 of them fishing in the Sea of Galilee and of the Lord's appearance to them (John, ch. 21). By appointment also he met them on a mountain of Galilee and gave to them the Great Commission, with the assurance of his power and presence (Matt. 28:16-20). This may very probably have been the occasion when 500 disciples were present (I Cor. 15:6). Later on he appeared also to James (v. 7), but where we know not. Finally he brought the apostles again to Jerusalem, and leading them out to the Mount of Olives to a place where Bethany was in sight (Luke 24:50, 51) he was taken up into heaven and a cloud received him out of their sight (Acts 1:9-12). We have thus 10 appearances of the risen Saviour recorded in the New Testament, while Paul properly adds the appearance to him on the way to Damascus (I Cor. 15:8). There were doubtless, however, other appearances not recorded. Luke says (Acts 1:3) that "he also showed himself alive after his passion by many proofs, appearing unto them by the space of forty days." Yet he did not continue with them in constant intercourse as he had done before. He rather manifested himself to them (John 21:1). The 40 days between his resurrection and ascension formed evidently a transitional period, intended to train the disciples for their future work. It was necessary to give ample, repeated, and varied proof of the resurrection, and this was done as we have seen. It was essential to give them instruction concerning the necessity of his death and the character of the Kingdom which through their labors he was to establish. It was requisite to point out to them the fulfillment of Scripture by his death and resurrection, for thus alone would they see the continuity of the new dispensation with the old. For this instruction they had not been ready before his death, but it is repeatedly referred to as having been given during these 40 days (Luke 24:44-48; John 20:21-23; 21:15-22; Acts 1:3-8). And finally the experiences of the 40 days trained the disciples to think of their Master as absent and yet living; as invisible and yet near them; as risen to a new life and yet retaining the old nature and even the old, though now glorified, body, which they had loved; as exalted but still the same, so that they were prepared to go forth and proclaim him as the glorified Son of God and crowned King of Israel, yet also the Man of Nazareth and the Lamb of God who takes away the sin of the world. Meanwhile the Jews affirmed that his disciples had stolen his body. Fearing this, they had on the day of his death requested from Pilate a military watch to guard the tomb. When the resurrection occurred, accompanied, as we are told, by the descent of an angel who rolled the stone from the tomb, the soldiers were overcome with fright and afterward fled. Superstitious pagans as they were, they doubtless were little more affected by what they had seen than ignorant men usually are by what they consider ghostly appearances. But the Jewish rulers, who may possibly have accounted for the soldiers' report by supposing a trick on the part of the disciples, gave the men money to keep the matter quiet, and thus the report was given out that the body had been stolen while the soldiers slept (Matt. 28:11-15). When, however, the apostles began, on the Day of Pentecost, to give their testimony to the resurrection, and the number of believers in it grew rapidly (Acts, ch. 2, etc.), it was by force, not by proofs, that the chief priests tried to silence their witness and subdue the growing sect (Acts, ch. 4).

We have sought in this article to exhibit, not the teaching of Jesus, but the outward framework and historic movement of his life. In the latter there appears, as we gather it from the Gospels, a gradual, progressive revelation of himself and of his message, which constitutes one of the strongest evidences of the truthfulness of the accounts on which our knowledge is based. The reality of the humanity of Christ made it possible for him thus to appear as a real character of human history, related to a particular environment, and to present in his life a career which moved naturally, yet steadily, forward to a definite goal. His was a genuinely human life and, therefore, capable of historical treatment. At the same time Jesus knew and declared himself to be more than man (e.g. Matt. 11:27; John 5:17-38; 10:30; 17:5, etc.). As his self-revelation advanced his disciples realized his divine dignity (Matt. 16:16; John 20:28). Then later reflection and experience, under the illumination of the Spirit, made his divinity still more evident to them, until the last surviving apostle was led to become the 4th Evangelist and to present in his Lord's earthly career the incarnation of the personal divine Word. Yet John never forgot nor obscured the real humanity of Jesus. He gives us the full truth concerning the person of the great Master. "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God" (John 1:1), and "the Word became flesh, and dwelt among us, (and we beheld his glory, glory as of the only begotten from the Father), full of grace and truth" (v. 14). "These [things] are written," he concludes, "that ye may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing ye may have life in his name" (John 20:31).

G. T. P. (rev., H. S. G.)

Jē'ther (jē'thēr) [abundance, eminence, excellence]. 1. A descendant of Judah through Jerahmeel. He died childless (I Chron. 2:32; cf. vs. 26, 28).

2. A man registered among the descendants of Judah, but the lineage is not traced beyond his father, Ezrah (I Chron. 4:17).

3. An Asherite, apparently the same as Ithran, son of Zophah (cf. I Chron. 7:37 with v. 38).

4. A form of Jethro, Moses' father-in-law (Ex. 4:18 marg.).

5. The first-born son of Gideon. His father bade him fall upon the captives, Zebah and Zalmunna, and slay them; but the youth shrank from the deed, and they escaped the disgrace of dying at the hands of a boy (Judg. 8:20, 21).

6. The father of Amasa, Absalom's commander-in-chief (I Kings 2:5). See ITHRA.

Jē'theth (jē'thēth). A chieftain of Edom (Gen. 36:40; I Chron. 1:51).

Jeth'lah (jēth'lā). See ITHLAH.

Jeth'ro (jēth'rō) [pre-eminence, excellence]. A priest of Midian and Moses' father-in-law (Ex. 3:1). He is called Reuel (ch. 2:18; cf. Jos. Antiq. ii. 12, 1). Reuel, which means friend of God, seems to have been his personal name, and Jethro (excellence) to have been his honorary title. His 7 daughters tended his flocks; and Moses, who had fled from Egypt, rendered them a service which led to his introduction to Jethro's family and marriage with Zipporah, one of the daughters. Moses kept his father-in-law's flocks for about 40 years (Ex. 3:1, 2; Acts 7:30). When called by God to return to Egypt and achieve the emancipation of the Hebrews, Moses obtained Jethro's permission to depart, and took with him his wife Zipporah and his 2 sons (Ex. 4:18-20); but he afterward sent her and her 2 sons back temporarily to her father's house (chs. 4:24-26; 18:2); see ZIPPORAH. After the passage of the Red Sea, which conducted the Israelites into the vicinity of Jethro's country, the Midianite priest brought his daughter and her 2 sons back to Moses (ch. 18:1-7). He rejoiced in the deliverance of the Israelites, offered sacrifices to Jehovah, and suggested the appointment of judges when he saw that the Hebrew leader was wearing himself out by deciding even trivial cases personally (vs. 8-27). See HOBAB.

Jē'tur (jē'tēr). A people descended from Ishmael (Gen. 25:15; I Chron. 1:31; 5:19). See ITURAEA.

Jē'u'el (jē-ū'ēl). 1. A man of Judah, family of Zerah. At one period he, with 690 of his clan, lived at Jerusalem (I Chron. 9:6).

2. A Levite, a descendant of Elizaphan. He took part in the reformation under Hezekiah (II Chron. 29:13, in A.V. Jeiel).

3. A contemporary of Ezra who with members of his family returned from Babylonia with the scribe (Ezra 8:13, in A.V. Jeiel).

Jē'ush (jē'ūsh), in A.V. once Jē'hush (I Chron. 8:39) [He (God) comes to aid, or may he aid]. 1. A son of Esau by his wife Oholibamah (Gen. 36:5). He became a chieftain in Edom (v. 18).

2. A Benjamite, son of Bilhan (I Chron. 7:10).

3. A Levite, family of Gershon and a son of Shimei (I Chron. 23:10, 11).

4. A descendant of Jonathan (I Chron. 8:39).

5. A son of Rehoboam (II Chron. 11:19).

Jē'uz (jē'ūz) [counseling]. A Benjamite, son of Shahrain by his wife Hodesh (I Chron. 8:10).

Jew (jōō) [Lat. Iudaicus, Gr. Ioudaios, Heb. Yehūdī]. One belonging to the tribe or to the Kingdom of Judah (II Kings 16:6; 25:25). Then the meaning was extended, and the word was applied to anyone of the Hebrew race who returned from the Captivity; and finally it comprehended all persons of that race throughout the world (Esth. 2:5; Matt. 2:2). Their language (II Kings 18:26; Neh. 13:24) was Hebrew. For their history while they were in Palestine, see HISTORY, III. 4 (2). Dispersion among the nations, to the ends of the earth, was foretold as the doom of the people of the kingdom of God in case they forsook God and obeyed not his Law (Lev. 26:33, 39; Deut. 4:27; 28:25, 36, 37, 64-68; Isa. 6:12; 11:11, 12).

Jew'ess (jōō'ēs). A woman of the tribe of Judah (I Chron. 4:18, R.V.) or of the Hebrew race (Acts 16:1; 24:24).

Jew'ry (jōō'rī). See JUDAEA

THE PLAIN OF JEZREEL

Jez'a-ni'ah (jěz'á-ní'á) [in full Jaz'az'a-ni'ah (II Kings 25:23) [Jehovah hearkens]. A captain of the forces, son of Hoshaiah, a Maacathite (II Kings 25:23; Jer. 40:7, 8; 42:1). He came with his men to pay his respects to Gedaliah, whom Nebuchadnezzar had appointed governor of Judah after the capture of Jerusalem. Jezeaniah had no complicity in the subsequent murder of Gedaliah, and seems to have taken a prominent part in attempting to bring the perpetrators to justice. He joined in appealing to Jeremiah, the prophet, to ask advice of God concerning the purpose of the remnant of the Israelites to migrate to Egypt (Jer., ch. 42). He was a brother of Azariah, or more probably Azariah is a corruption of Jezeaniah (Jer. 43:2).

Jez'e-bel (jěz'ě-bél) [ety. uncertain; perhaps, unexalted, unhusbanded]. 1. Daughter of Ethbaal, king of the Zidonians and former priest of Astarte (I Kings 16:31; Jos. Apion i. 18). She became the wife of Ahab, king of Israel. She was a woman of masculine temperament and swayed her husband at will. She was a devoted worshiper of Baal, and intolerant of other faiths. To please her, Ahab reared a temple and an altar to Baal in Samaria, and set up an Asherah (I Kings 16:32, 33). Though legally only the king's consort, and not the ruler of the country, yet she slew all the prophets of Jehovah on whom she could lay hands (ch. 18:4-13). When she planned the death of Elijah (ch. 19:1, 2), and afterward effected the judicial murder of Naboth, she similarly ignored the king's authority, though he condoned the deed (ch. 21:16-22). On account of these murders and other violations of the moral law, the divine sentence was pronounced against her that the dogs should eat Jezebel by the wall of Jezreel (ch. 21:23). The prophecy was fulfilled. When, 11 years after Ahab's death, Jehu executed pitiless vengeance on the royal household, Jezebel painted her face, attired her head, and, looking out at a window, called to him as he approached, "Is it peace, thou Zimri, thy master's murderer?" Jehu looked up at the window and said: "Who is on my side? who?" Two or 3 eunuchs looked out. "Throw her down," he cried, and they unhesitatingly obeyed. She fell in front of his chariot, which he intentionally drove over her, and her blood bespattered the horses and the wall. About an hour later, recalling that the dead woman was a king's daughter, he gave directions to bury her; but it was found that dogs, the scavengers of Oriental cities, had anticipated him, and had left of her nothing but the skull, and the feet, and the palms of the hands (II Kings 9:7, 30-37).

2. A woman at Thyatira who called herself a prophetess, and seduced some members of the Christian Church there to commit fornication and eat things sacrificed to idols. It is probable that Jezebel is a symbolic name. If so, it was given because of a resemblance between her and Ahab's idolatrous and wicked queen (Rev. 2:20, 23).

Je'zer (jě'zēr) [form, purpose]. A son of Naphtali, and founder of a tribal family (Gen. 46:24; Num. 26:49; I Chron. 7:13).

Jez'zi'ah (jě-zí'á). See IZZIAH.

Je'zi-el (jě'zī-ěl) [perhaps, God will sprinkle, or leap; cf. Arab. nasā, to leap]. A Benjamite, son of Azmaveth, who joined David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:3).

Jez'h'ah (jěz-h'á). See IZLIAH.

Je'zo'ar (jě-zō'ēr). See IZHAR, II.

Jez'ra-hi'ah (jěz'rá-hi'á) [Jehovah will arise or shine]. An overseer of singers in Nehemiah's time (Neh. 12:42).
